Having dressed himself in wide pantaloons, and shoes stuck full of large nails, his hair cropped, and every grain of powder removed, he emerged from the gardener's house in the character of a laundress's porter, with a heavy basket of clothes on his shoulder—the plate and chalice carefully packed under the linen. His young family followed a few paces behind him with the passport, but they had to pass close to the terrible instrument of death; for there it stood, always ready for use. Fontane shuddered. His wife turned pale. To them their situation was awful! But reason and necessity urged them on. Fontane resolved to act a decided part. He walked up in front of the guillotine, grasping the basket firmly with his hand, and, loosening the leather strap, as if to ease himself, he looked steadily at the scaffold.

A man of ruffianly appearance, who attended as if he were a guard of the guillotine, came up to him.

"Are you afraid," said he to Fontane, "that you look in this way at the national razor?"

"Afraid!" said Fontane; "do you take me for a Federalist, that I should be frightened at the sight of a guillotine! Sacre bleu! Look at me; do you see anything like an aristocrat in my face?"

"What are you?" said a second interrogator, addressing Fontane.

"I am a bleacher and scourer."

"And this good woman?"

"What a question!" said Fontane. "Look at the little one—don't you see the likeness—Vive la Republique!"

"Ah! that's right!" said the miscreant; "you're a good one! Down with muscadins and aristocrats! Vive la Republique! and Vive la Guillotine!"

Fontane could not join in this sanguinary cry. He saw his wife tremble, and took her hand.

"Come, wife," said he, "let us have a song."

"Ay, and a dance, too," said the barbarian who had first spoken; "so, down with your basket, my jovial fellow!"

"But I—I—"

"Nonsense! nobody will run away with your basket; down with it, I say! Why, what's the matter? is it glued to your neck?"

Fontane objected, and resisted for awhile, but was soon obliged to submit; and, wiping the cold perspiration from his forehead, in a state more dead than alive, was relieved from the burthen of his basket. He saw it placed on a heap of stones, and feared everything would be turned topsy-turvy. Oh! the fatal chalice! All hope of safety was gone; he was on the point of delivering himself up, and claiming compassion for his wife and child, in the hope that they would be allowed to pass, when, happily, he roused himself, clapped his hands, and assumed a joyful aspect.

"Hollo! my friend," cried one of the fellows, "you're wonderfully merry all at once!"

"A thought has struck me!" said Fontane; "a bold idea! You see my poor wife? I know the Carmagnole always raises her spirits. Come, my good fellows, let us dance it."

His wife gazed at him with a look of despair, as he snatched the child from her arms.

"What now? don't make a wry face, wife!" said he. "Excuse her, she's young and timid. Come, let us put the little one on the basket—there he lies, on the top of the linen, and sleeps soundly. Wife, your hand. Now, the ring—the republican ring. Come, friends, join hands for the ring—the patriotic dance!"

Madame Fontane now comprehended what her husband meant. She tripped lightly round the ring, and joined in the chorus of the Carmagnole. When the dance was over, she took up her child; Fontane was assisted in replacing his basket on his shoulder. He made his wife lead the way, and walked off after her, whistling the Chant du Depart. And so they escaped.

THE PRINCESS ELIZABETH BROUGHT BEFORE THE COUNCIL.

LIVES OF THE QUEENS OF ENGLAND.

BY J. F. SMITH, ESQ., AUTHOR OF

"AMY LAWRENCE," "ROBIN GOODFELLOW," ETC.

ELIZABETH,

QUEEN REGNANT OF ENGLAND.

CHAPTER XVII.

Yielding when weak, but to arise more strong
The very snares mine enemies have set
Shall be to me a stay!

GREAT preparations had been made in the Chapel Royal, on the eighth of September, to celebrate the festival of the Blessed Virgin. The attendance of the peers and great personages of the court was to be considered as the test of their adherence, heartily and sincerely, to the government of Queen Mary, as their absence was certain to be construed into a contrary sense. Her majesty had directed that immediately after the mass, the programme of her coronation should be made public, in which no notice was taken of her sister Elizabeth, or place assigned her in the ceremonial. The only lady of royal rank to whom precedence had been given, was the divorced Anne of Cleves, who still resided in England.

The Catholic party were in high spirits; terms could scarcely be found sufficiently strong by them to express their admiration of the firmness of the queen in excluding the princess from all share in the forthcoming pageant; the Protestants were equally discouraged—it was a death-blow to their hopes.

At an early hour the queen left her closet, and, preceded by her chamberlain and ministers, had reached the guard-room on her way to the chapel, when Elizabeth made her appearance at the opposite end of the apartment.

Mary frowned—for the first impression produced upon her mind was, that her sister, hearing of the intended promulgation of the order of the coronation, had sought the interview to brave her. Turning to Sir Henry Bedingfield, one of her oldest and most assured friends, she whispered a few words in the ear of the brave old knight, who instantly left the guard-room.

Gardiner, who, arrayed in his episcopal robes, was preceding the queen, was far from indulging in the hope that the princess had made her appearance at court so suddenly with the intention of braving or remonstrating with her sister: young as she was, he judged her to be too politic for that.

As Mary advanced, Elizabeth bent the knee: how her proud heart must have rebelled at the humiliating scene she was condemned to act! The queen regarded her haughtily, and, instead of extending her hand for her to kiss, or to raise her, harshly demanded the purport of her visit to St. James's.

"To prove my loyalty and devotion, madam," answered the royal maiden, "as well as gratitude, or the interest you have condescended to take in my spiritual welfare. As your majesty predicted, the scales have fallen from my mental sight: I now perceive the errors of the faith in which, unhappily, I have been reared; and I come humbly to solicit your gracious permission to give public testimony to the true church on this, one of its most solemn festivals!"

"Sayest thou so!" exclaimed Mary, raising her from her knees, and kissing her on both cheeks; "then—our unworthy prayers, and the endeavours of the learned divines whom my lord bishop sent, have not been fruitless! Now all praise to our Lady," she added, piously crossing herself, "to whose especial intercession I attribute this joyous conversion!"

Renaud, the Spanish minister, and Gardiner, looked as if they thought the Blessed Virgin had had very little hand in the affair.

"This is indeed most sudden—most unexpected!" observed the latter.

"But not the less welcome, Master Gardiner!" replied Elizabeth, who perfectly understood how completely his plans were frustrated by her pretended conversion to the old faith.

"Assuredly—most assuredly not, your grace!" he continued. "Alack, that my poor wit should not comprehend it! It was only last night that I saw the worthy fathers who have been honoured with her highness's commands, to explain the errors of the creed in which your infancy was reared."

"Well?" said the queen, impatiently.

"And they informed me, to their great grief, no less than my own, that their attempts had been fruitless; that the princess appeared more firmly than ever devoted to the errors of her mis-called church."

Mary fixed a scrutinising glance upon her sister, who bore it, however, without betraying the least sign of embarrassment or hesitation.

"True, my lord bishop!" she made answer; "and my explanation of my seeming hardness is as true. I wished my gracious sovereign and sister, who had deigned to take such interest in the matter, to be the first informed of my conversion. Had it been intrusted to other lips than my own, my motives might have been misrepresented—for I have enemies who seek no better," she added, "than to blow the coal of discord between my sovereign and myself!"

Of those who heard the declaration of Elizabeth, none were more perfectly aware of its truth than Queen Mary, whose very bigotry and superstition served her sister at this juncture. Nothing appeared more probable to her than that the Blessed Virgin should have operated a change in the sentiments of the speaker.

"It is enough, my lord," she said, addressing Gardiner, in that particularly sharp tone which indicated that she was displeased; "we are satisfied with the sincerity of our sister's change from the errors of her faith, and rejoice to think that our prayers for her happy conversion have not been without effect!"

The spiritual vanity of Mary—perhaps the only species of vanity which she can be reproached with—was flattered at the idea of having contributed to redeem Elizabeth from what she deemed her mistaken views in religion.

"Let the council be summoned," she added, "immediately after the holy sacrifice of the mass; and remember, my lord, nothing must be made known, or promulgated, touching our late decision, till we have further advised."

Gardiner bowed to hide his confusion and mortification, but he dared not tamper with a command so positively given. Elizabeth and the wily prelate were the only persons present, except the members of the council, who understood the purport of Queen Mary's words, and the heart of the royal maiden rejoiced that the sacrifice she had made to expediency, was likely to avail her against the secret machinations of her enemies.

"On to the chapel!" said her majesty; "we have delayed the service of heaven too long: what else remains can be discussed in the council!"

At this moment, Gardiner ventured one of those bold strokes, which, with a character less firm than Mary Tudor's, might have compromised her in her future conduct towards Elizabeth.

He demanded where the place of the princess was to be during the sacrifice of the holy mass.

Elizabeth coloured to the temples: the question implied a doubt which, in her mind, it was little less than treason to entertain.

"Her place," said Mary, taking her by the hand, "now and henceforth, is by the side of her sister and her sovereign, as heiress to the crown, and the first subject in my realm!"

Many present heard the declaration with intense satisfaction—for, from the weak and sickly constitution of the queen, it was easily foreseen that her reign would not be a long one: even those who regretted the apparent apostasy of Elizabeth, admired its prudence.

Singular enough, it did her little or no harm with the Protestant party, by whom she still continued to be looked up to; for it was generally understood that her conversion was merely a politic concession to the danger of her position and the spirit of the times.

Cecil and his friends did her good service, in rendering this impression as general as possible.

During the mass, Elizabeth had the precaution to let her responses be heard amongst the loudest of the persons present. She struck her breast at the Mea Culpa, and bent the knee at the elevation of the Host. For the first time, Mary began to regard her with some degree of complacency: it was a triumph alike to her bigotry and pride, to see the daughter of Anne Boleyn assisting beside her at the mass.

On quitting the chapel, she bestowed upon the royal maiden a yet more distinguishing mark of her favour. After the officiating prelate had given her majesty the holy water, she passed it to her sister, by touching the tips of her fingers—as we still see practised in Catholic countries.

No sooner had the ceremony terminated, than the ante-chapel and guard-room were filled with priests and courtiers, speculating on the result of the conversion of the heiress presumptive to the crown.

"It is all over with the Church of Luther!" observed one.

"Sad news for the reformed prelates!" added another.

"And Elizabeth the goddaughter of Cranmer, too!"

The last consideration seemed to weigh very little with the speakers, either in their censure or approbation of the step the young princess had so readily taken. All felt that, in the events which followed the death of Edward VI., the Protestant primacy had shown very little affection or regard for the interests of the royal maiden for whom he had answered at the font.

There was a general hush, as Mary Tudor, still leading her sister by the hand, made her appearance from the chapel. The countenance of Elizabeth was pale—that of the queen slightly flushed, indicative of her satisfaction.

It was the custom for the ambassadors and ministers at the termination of the mass, to approach her majesty, and pay their compliments. Many an intrigue received its dénouement at the accidental levee—for regular audience it can scarcely be called.

The first who approached was a cold, stately-looking gentleman, whose Spanish costume would have sufficiently denoted the nation to which he belonged, had not the collar and order of the Golden Fleece, which he wore round his neck, rendered all doubt impossible.

It was the Spanish ambassador, Renaud, who was secretly negotiating with Mary her ill-starred marriage with the son of his imperial master—the cause of so much after misery to herself, and discontent to the nation, who could not endure the thought of their sovereign bestowing her hand upon a foreign prince, and least of all, a Spaniard.

It was intended that, previous to the marriage of the queen, Elizabeth should be disposed of to the Prince of Piedmont; but the youthful princess displayed, throughout the long persecution to which she was subjected on account of her marriage, so much firmness, that every project to compel her—and consequently remove her from the kingdom—failed.

"Permit me, madam," said the ambassador, "to congratulate your highness on the auspicious event which promises to heal the unhappy divisions of the church!"

Monsieur de Noailles added his compliments on the occasion.

Mary thanked them, and declared that she considered it as one of the happiest events of her reign.

All appeared satisfied except the astute Gardiner, who clearly saw that his plans were outwitted.

"My lord," continued the queen, addressing him, "how is it that an event which brings content to my heart, appears to exercise so little influence upon yours? you do not doubt our sister?"

"Heaven forbid!" answered the prelate; "but I fear that her grace may have listened rather to her feelings than her convictions—the natural desire of pleasing your majesty: it was so very lately that the princess expressed a doubt upon the real presence."

Elizabeth coloured.

"If her grace would condescend to answer me one question, I doubtless should feel as rejoiced as your majesty."

The queen directed a glance towards the princess.

"Ask it," she said. "I read in the eyes of our sister her willingness to reply."

Thus encouraged, Gardiner demanded of the convert, "What was it she conceived she received in the blessed sacrament?"

Then was it that Elizabeth made the celebrated response which has since become historical. Fixing her keen glance upon Gardiner—for she felt that he had given her an opportunity of triumph—she said:

"Christ was the Word, and 'spake it;
He blessed the bread, and brake it;
And what the Word did make it,
That I revere, and take it."

A murmur of admiration broke from the circle: it was impossible for either Catholic or Protestant to be offended with so clear and natural an exposition of the speaker's faith.

CHAPTER XVIII.

Her cheek was pale, but resolved and high
Were the words on her lip, and the glare of her eye.
COTTONIAN MS.

THE great object of Elizabeth was achieved, when, as the reward for her seeming conversion, the place assigned her in the pageant of the coronation was next to the sovereign.

In the procession from the Tower through the City, she rode in a rich litter with Anne of Cleves, immediately after the queen. Perhaps it was not one of the least remarkable peculiarities in the temper of Mary Tudor, that the enthusiasm which her sister's appearance in public never failed to create, did not excite her personal jealousy and dissatisfaction, or, if it did, pride kept her silent.

She looked upon the divine principle of legitimacy as incarnate in her person, and would not condescend to those arts which Elizabeth, through life, wisely practised, to insure her popularity with her subjects.

In the beginning of the following year broke out the rash and ill-advised rebellion, headed by Wyatt, and in which Courtney, Earl of Devon, the near kinsman of Mary and Elizabeth, was concerned.

It is impossible to say, at this remote period, how far the princess was compromised in the transaction: the occasion was tempting, the country generally being in a dissatisfied state at the approaching marriage of Mary with the Spanish king.

Elizabeth temporised with her loyalty to her sister, if she did not absolutely compromise it. Courtney proved fickle: letters from the princess to the French ambassador were intercepted, and, on the 25th of February, the queen issued her summons to her sister, to appear at court.

Elizabeth pretended sickness, and caused the officers of her household to write to Mary, stating that it was impossible for her to travel.

The insurrection which broke out immediately afterwards, had for its avowed object the dethronement of the queen, and the substitution of her sister in her place. Wyatt's adherents even ventured to attack the palace: then it was that Mary Tudor displayed not only the courage, but the taste for blood, which she had inherited from her father.

She instantly issued her warrant for the execution of Lady Jane Grey and her husband. Wyatt, and others of his party who had fallen into the hands of the queen, denounced Elizabeth as the head and soul of the plot, which accusation derived consistency from the fact of the imprudent princess having fortified her mansion, and introduced armed men within the walls.

The Spanish ambassador insisted that it was with a treasonable intent, and the Catholic party so seconded his representations, that the queen dispatched Lord William Howard and others, to bring Elizabeth to court.

On the 23rd of February, she was brought to London, closely guarded—yet, even in this extremity, her courage did not forsake her. When she reached the City, she commanded her attendants to uncover the litter, that she might be seen by the people.

It was a fearful period—the citizens were paralysed with terror; the traitor Suffolk had been decapitated that very morning, and the scaffold was yet red with the blood of Lady Jane Grey and her unfortunate husband.

"And whither, my lord, do you bear me?" she demanded of her kinsman, Lord Howard, whose report had in some degree mollified the queen's resentment.

"To the Palace of Westminster, your grace!" replied the noble. "My first commands were to conduct your highness to the Tower; but the queen hath changed her pleasure respecting you—I trust for the better."

She was kept a close prisoner in the palace, all her attendants being sent to the City. The life of the royal prisoner hung upon a thread. Had those whom she had trusted proved feeble or Courtney betrayed her, there is little doubt but Mary, who still refused to see her, would have sent her to the block.

Elizabeth had been kept to her apartment, closely guarded, for several days, and the firm and haughty spirit which had hitherto supported her began to give way.

Her despondency was relieved by the appearance of Cecil, who, during the reign of her sister, appears to have been the guardian angel of the rash but persecuted princess. The future minister procured access to her grace, by bribing one of her guards.

"Welcome, my only true and constant friend!" exclaimed the daughter of Anne Boleyn, as the secretary knelt and kissed her hand; "all desert me, save you and my conscious innocence!"

The statesman smiled. He knew exactly how much dependence the speaker could place upon her non-participation in the treasonable plots of Wyatt and Courtney.

"I have but a few moments to lose, madam," he exclaimed; "but in those few you must decide. And, as you value your life, answer me truly!"

Elizabeth coloured—then turned pale.

"Were you imprudent enough to write to Wyatt, after the entrance of the traitor into Southwark?"

She hesitated.

"Your answer, madam! Life depends on it!"

"Suppose I did?"

"The letter, then, is genuine?"

"Perhaps!" replied the cautious captive.

"Enough! I must proceed as though I were assured it were. To-morrow your grace will be examined before the queen in council."

"To-morrow?" repeated Elizabeth.

"If you see me in the antechamber, put a bold face upon the matter. Deny all participation in the mad rebellion—for you will have the assurance that the only proof which could compromise you is destroyed!"

"And if not?" said the captive.

"Then God help your highness and the Protestant cause!" answered Cecil; "for both will be in danger!"

Never had Elizabeth, during the course of her chequered career, been in such imminent danger as at that moment. Wyatt, who possessed the letter which clearly implicated her in the plot, only delayed giving it, in order to enhance the value of the discovery, and save his own dishonoured life. This delay was fatal to his project.

Gardiner, too—by a singular combination of circumstances—who had hitherto been the unrelenting persecutor of the heiress to the crown, felt, in this solitary instance, inclined to stand her friend; for he began to feel jealous of the Spanish influence, which was undermining his own.

Renard had declared that he did not think it safe for his master, Philip, to venture into England whilst Elizabeth and Courtney lived. The astute prelate took advantage of this incautious admission to impress upon the queen that the people would consider Elizabeth had been sacrificed rather to the exigencies of her future husband, than for any real participation in the late attempt to deprive her of her crown.

"We shall see!" replied Mary, gloomily; for, knowing her dislike to the daughter of Anne Boleyn, she mistrusted herself. "Let her appear, and justify herself before the council!"

"When?" demanded the prelate?"

"To-morrow!"

"And if no proofs appear?"

"Dismiss her with all honour!" exclaimed the queen.

Gardiner hesitated.

"Should there unfortunately be proofs?" he said.

The eyes of Mary sparkled with that peculiar expression which we have more than once described.

"The axe and block!" she added solemnly; "for I have sworn never to pardon more the daring hand stretched forth to grasp my crown!"

Many a curious eye was directed towards Elizabeth, as her attendants conducted her to the council-chamber, where her enemies were all-powerful, and only too anxious to find a plausible excuse for sending her to the Tower. Many secretly offered up prayers for her welfare—for, even in the court of her sister Mary, the Protestant princess was not without her partisans.

As she advanced, she cast a searching glance around, but nowhere could she perceive Cecil; and her heart sank within her.

"Room for her grace!" exclaimed the usher of the council, advancing to the doors of the chamber, and giving the customary knocks with his rod.

The doors of the apartment opened, and Gardiner and the queens ministers, Paget and Sussex, together with many counsellors, were discovered seated at a long table—the chair usually occupied by the sovereign being empty.

"It is all over!" thought the royal maiden; "mine enemies prevail!"

A bustle at the end of the apartment caused Elizabeth to turn her head, and she discovered the handsome countenance of Cecil radiant with smiles: he had made the noise on purpose to attract her attention.

She felt that he had succeeded—that there still was hope.

With a firm step she entered the chamber, and took her seat in a small chair of estate, which had been placed for her at the lower end of the table.

ACTIVITY.—You see men with the most delicate frames engaged in active professional pursuits, who, literally, have no time for illness. Let them become idle—let them take care of themselves—let them think of their health, and they die. The rust rots the steel which we preserves.—Bulwer.

DRAMATIC CHAPTERS.

BY CHARLES SWAIN.

CHAPTER XXI.

SCENE—A hall in Indworth Castle; FALKNER stern and inflexible, stands to the right of the hall; BERTHA, pale and agitated, but full of confidence, by his side; MIDGLEY and ADOLPHUS, with OFFICERS of JUSTICE, at the left; Guards, the Retainers of LORD KELFORD, and the Attendants of LADY BERTHA, fill up the background.

BERTHA.

A sinful charge, a base malignant charge,
A monstrous charge, and most incredible!
The witnesses unworthy least belief;
One living hourly, openly, in crime;
One of a herd of gipsies, vagrants, robbers,
Who nightly in their calling prowl the forest:
Who else so like as her own self to have done it?
What drew her to a spot so far remote
As that in which you found her? . . . My Falkner,

'Tis rightly done to treat this empty charge
With scornful silence; 'tis not worth thy tongue!
I would believe the sun itself were black
Ere question thy fair honour!

OFFICER.

The lady speaks it sooth. What proof have ye
To fasten this dread deed against a man,
A gentleman, of high repute and character,
Whose general bearing gives the lie to this Malicious, cruel charge? What say ye?

MIDGLEY.

The knife found by the corpse—the open knife,
Whereon engraved appears the name of "Falkner."

BERTHA.

'Twere a stale brain could not devise as much!
The boy—what says he? Did he see the murder?
No, nor the knife! 'Twas found by that false hag;
And 'twere poor cunning could not so contrive
With what name on't might suit the purpose best!
Shame on thy lip; I see the lie upon it!

JURUS, aside.

O might of love! the dove become an eagle!

OFFICER.

You say your only evidence is this,
The knife, which bears no trace of such an use!
The knife, and nothing more? You saw him not?
No one escaping? Not a glimpse to bind
A probability against this man,
Or lodge suspicion 'gainst his character?
The knife? which might be stolen for such purpose.
No other evidence? Sir, you are free!
This woman and the boy must hence to prison,
There to take trial for this heinous deed;
And much I fear it will go hard with them.

ADOLPHUS.

So help us God, as we are innocent!

OFFICER.

You're found beside the corpse, and no one near;
None, save yourselves, upon the spot to question;
And on your lips and in your eyes are seen
Terror, and tears, and misery! Away—
Each circumstance but tends to criminate.
Guards, to your duty. Prisoners . . .

FALKNER, after an agonised struggle.

Stay!
Yet—wait yet—a moment! 'tis true; I—
They are innocent!

[With choking utterance, and hiding his face from BERTHA.]
I am guilty!

OFFICER.

Thou the murderer?

BERTHA.

Alas, he's mad!
Believe him not! Falkner! Why dost not speak?
Speak, ere my senses leave me! Falkner, turn:
Look at me . . .

[He uncovers his face.

Merciful heaven, that face! Oh, cruel! cruel!

[Faints, and is borne aside by her attendants.]

FALKNER, looking up determinedly and loftily.

Murder . . .

'Twas justice, and not murder!
There are some crimes on which the law is silent,
And this was one in which my sword was law:
He stabbed me, and I slew him!

OFFICER.

Stabbed thee?

FALKNER.

Ay; are there no stabs but from the dagger's point?
No deeds more sharp than steel? no words, no wrongs,
Whose cursed edge may wound, whose poison kill,
Whose venom strike, and yet the striker smile?
Are there no stabbers but where blood must flow?
He struck me through the dearest heart alive—
The noblest, kindest heart of all the world:
He struck me, and I slew him!

MIDGLEY.

Thou slow'st him that he did betray thy sister!

FALKNER, gazing after BERTHA.

All things are equal now: I did.

MIDGLEY.

Then art thou murderer! He betrayed her not:
She was a loving, pure, and spotless wife!

FALKNER.

Pure—saidst thou pure? a wife, and undisgraced?
Say it again—again—a spotless wife!

MIDGLEY.

FALKNER.

She was his wife.

Prove thou but that, and I'll die blessing thee.

MIDGLEY, showing papers from her bosom.

The proofs are here, and fully witnessed:
 I thought to make them serve me in my need.
 The priest he deem'd a knave was priest ordained;
 A good, though weak and easy-tempered man,
 Who cringed to fault, but would not stoop to crime.
 She was his wife, and thus the rite performed.
 Concealed within, where they might clearly hear,
 And see, and vouch, unto the ceremony,
 He had his witnesses, but sworn to silence,
 Until the time should come, as come it has,
 When innocence might need their testimony,
 To purify its name to all the world.
 Why didst thou seek this black and heavy deed,
 Thou proud, revengeful, miserable man?

FALKNER.

You count not the temptations men withstand,
 But that 'neath which they fall; whereas, if known,
 Those well withstood were twenty 'gainst that one.
 'Thou deem'st me rash! Was not his guilt the same?
 Intent as vile, unfeeling, profligate?
 Why shew a baffled traitor as he were
 A man to honour?

MIDGLEY.

A sinful man he was, and therefore had
 More need of living to repent his sins.

FALKNER.

And who art thou asserts this?

MIDGLEY.

The sister of that priest, but one whose word
 Is little worth, were testimony wanting;
 But for these proofs and living witnesses
 Wild Midgley's oath might aid thy cause but slightly.

FALKNER.

Give—give them me.

[He tears them open, and attempts to read.]

'Tis vain—
 The letters sink and tremble 'neath my sight:
 The proofs are here—and yet my faithless eyes
 Refuse to read them—valid proofs are here,
 Proofs of her love, her innocence, her wrongs—
 Iniquitous as great—yet, yet I faint—
 And the lines swim and melt in one another:—
 Am I a man? or weaker than the weakest?

[He nerves himself firmly to the task, and reads; after a pause.]

The priest—thy brother—where is he?

MIDGLEY.

Dead.

FALKNER.

My—my sister knew this?

MIDGLEY.

Alas, she did: six years ago he died.

FALKNER.

I see, 'twas then the tyrant struck his victim;
 Struck—with a coward's weapon:—
 How cam'st thou with those vile associates,
 Men whom the voice of justice soon may doom—
 Abandoned, godless, guilt-carousing men,
 Who drink of human sorrow as 'twere wine,
 And prey on men's misfortunes—knaves, whose breath
 Is poison to society, whose deeds
 Feed superstition with the grossest food,
 And build their hell on human ignorance?

MIDGLEY.

Ask me no farther: what I know, I know;
 What I have done I have elsewhere to answer
 What I believe is not for thee to judge,
 Who, scorning God's divine authority,
 Mocking the image of His sacred power,
 Denied the wisdom of His heavenly mercy,
 And struck thy brother dead before His face,
 Still glorying in that guilt thou call'st revenge,
 Justice and judgment!

Oh, blind-hearted man,

Worse than the God-unseeing infidel,
 Who, still believing in a Judge divine,
 Wrests justice from him!

FALKNER, roused to the utmost passion.

Know'st thou not a day, nay, even an hour,
 May make the mind, heaven-visited and pure,
 A denizen of Hell; a moment give
 The seed, root, leaf, and full-expanded fruit
 Of ripened passion and of crime matured;
 A moment shape the destiny of life,
 As it did mine in Hyder's cursed cell;
 A moment more blot out eternity,
 And baptise guilt in blood; brand years with shame;
 Rend out the core, the innocent core of the heart,
 And plant perdition there; change Nature's cheek
 From youth's fresh beauty into haggard age;
 For never more the angel of the morn
 Shall come with gladness to the murderer's heart,
 But midnight and its haunting shapes be there,—
 Midnight perpetual and perpetual dread;
 Whilst late Repentance, with its vulture claws,
 The murdered to the murderer shall hold up,

[As if beholding what he describes.]

Still face to face the living and the dead.
 The slayer and the slain—ay, front to front,
 The life-like corpse unto the corpse-like life?
 A moment! 'tis a cup in Heaven's hand!
 Who spoke to me of murder?

[Turns wildly and sees ADOLPHUS, who advances towards him.]

My sister, too? thou, too, against thy brother?
 Then I am lost indeed

[Seeing ADOLPHUS nearer.]

Ah! who art thou,
 Who wear'st an angel's face, yet art of earth?

MIDGLEY.

Thy sister's child.

FALKNER.

Her child! her child

[FALKNER slowly kneels; ADOLPHUS runs to his arms; he struggles for a moment, and then bursts into an agony of tears upon the boy's breast; then suddenly starting to his feet.]

Make way, if ye would live!

Nor urge a desperate, mad, and doomed man,
 Who counts no more your bristling fence of steel,
 Than reeds he thus could scatter on his course:
 Come death or freedom!

BERTHA, breaking from her attendants.

Save him—O Falkner! Save! will no one help?
 None—none—none to keep this heart from breaking?

[FALKNER throws himself violently amidst the javelins and bayonets of the guards; after a rapid struggle he staggers back wounded, and sinks at the feet of BERTHA.]FALKNER, after a pause.

'Tis well, 'tis home!

Home? home? Alas, who may receive me there,
 In that eternal home to which I hasten?

[To BERTHA, who supports him.]

My Bertha! oh, had I but met thee earlier,
 Ere this strong passion, like a baneful weed,
 Filled every space and avenue of thought,
 Claspings my being with its poisonous leaves,
 I might have lived blest in thy heart's affections,
 Seen sweeter beings gambolling at my feet,
 And blessed the angel-voices of my home!
 I loved thee, Bertha; none save her whose love
 Grew with my stature, mingled with my blood,
 My youthful pride and soldier-sense of honour,
 Had stood betwixt my soul's deep truth and thee.
 Think of me, love, when I shall be no more;
 And if thou canst with kindness . . . with forgiveness!

BERTHA.

Shall I e'er think of thee and not with love?
 Speak of thee not with honour? thou who wert
 My heart's first, last, its own and only choice!
 'Twill not be long that I can think of thee;
 Not long, perchance, but it will be till death!
 Long as I breathe; long as this heart may beat,
 This brain can think, whose every thought is thine;
 Long as I live, I'll love and bless thee still;
 And shrine thee, love, in that which cannot die,—
 My soul,—that, with God's grace, may live hereafter;
 And, oh, hereafter, love thee still in heaven!

FALKNER.

Angel thou art, and heavenly are thy thoughts,
 And we may meet; for Heaven forgives mankind
 More in one hour than Earth in centuries.
 If this be death, then it is sweet to die—
 Forgiving and forgiven.

Adolphus

* [He places ADOLPHUS'S hand in BERTHA'S.]

He is her child—her unprotected child;
 Wilt thou—both loving and both sorrowing,
 Alike in evil fortune be to him
 A friend? . . .

[Starts, and gazes wildly around.]

Hark! who calls?—her voice! Sister, I am here,
 Dying for thee! Through Him who died for all
 Seek thou thy brother mercy—mercy!

[With sudden energy.]

There lay no stain upon thy dying breast,
 That sanctuary of honour was unblurred;
 Angels received thee spotless, stainless,

[He falls.]

Ah! sharp is death. Close—press me closer, love!
 Shield me within thine arms a little while,
 Set love 'gainst death: 'twill conquer even death.
 'Tis all eternal. Love survives the tomb:
 Immortal; 'tis immortal, Bertha;—fixed;—
 Though buried 'tis not lost; there is a soil
 For love to bloom again beyond the grave!

[He dies; BERTHA falls senseless upon the body.]

[END OF DRAMATIC CHAPTERS.]

CURIOSITIES OF LOTTERIES.—The Romans invented lotteries to embellish their Saturnalia. This fête commenced with a distribution of tickets, by which might be gained a few prizes. The lotteries of Augustus consisted of articles of very little value; but Nero established them on a plan advantageous to the people, consisting of a thousand tickets a day, by which several, whom fortune favoured, acquired great wealth. The lotteries of Heliodorus were of a very singular kind. The lots or prizes were either very important or very insignificant. For instance, there would be a prize of six sheaves, and another of six flies. One man might gain a precious vase, another a common earthen jar. This lottery, thus composed, was a very just picture of the inequality with which Fortune distributes her favours. In 1685, Louis XIV. surpassed in this respect the Roman emperors. The magnificent lottery which was drawn at Maré, on the occasion of the marriage of Mademoiselle de Nantes with M. le Duc, was filled with all the precious jewellery that wealth could purchase, ingenuity invent, or talent execute, in perfection.

HOW TO BE HAPPY.

A BOON of inestimable worth is a calm, thankful heart—a treasure that few, very few, possess. We once met an old man, whose face was a mixture of smiles and sunshine. Wherever he went, he succeeded in making everybody about him as pleasant as himself.

Said we, one day—for he was one of that delightful class whom everybody feels privileged to be related to—“Uncle, uncle, how is it you contrive to be so happy? Why is your face so cheerful, when so many thousands are craped over with a most uncomfortable gloominess?”

“My dear young friend,” he answered, with his placid smile, “I am even as others, afflicted with infirmities; I have had my share of sorrow—some would say more—but I have found out the secret of being happy, and it is this:

“Forget self.”

“Until you do that, you can lay but little claim to a cheerful spirit. ‘Forget what manner of man you are,’ and think more with—rejoice more for—your neighbours. If I am poor, let me look upon my richer friend; and, in estimating his blessings, forget my privations.

“If my neighbour is building a house, let me watch with him its progress, and think: ‘Well, what a comfortable place it will be, to be sure! how much he may enjoy it with his family!’ Thus I have a double pleasure—that of delight in noting the structure as it expands into beauty, and making my neighbour’s wealth mine. If he has planted a fine garden, I feast my eyes on the flowers, smell their fragrance: could I do more if it was my own?”

“Another has a family of fine children; they bless him and are blessed by him: mine are all gone before me; I have none that bear my name; shall I, therefore, envy my neighbour his lovely children? No; let me enjoy their innocent smiles with him; let me forget myself—my tears, when they were put away in darkness; or, if I weep, may it be for joy, that God took them untainted to dwell with His holy angels for ever.

“Believe an old man, when he says there is great pleasure in living for others. The heart of the selfish man is like a city full of crooked lanes. If a generous thought from some glorious temple strays in there, wo to it—it is lost. It wanders about, and wanders about, until enveloped in darkness; as the mist of selfishness gathers around, it lies down upon some cold thought to die, and is shrouded in oblivion.

“So, if you would be happy, shun selfishness: do a kindly deed for this one, speak a kindly word for another. He who is constantly giving pleasure, is constantly receiving it. The little river gives to the great ocean; and the more it gives, the faster it runs. Stop its flowing, and the hot sun would dry it up, till it would be but filthy mud, sending forth bad odours, and corrupting the fresh air of heaven. Keep your heart constantly travelling on errands of mercy—it has feet that never tire, hands that cannot be overburdened, eyes that never sleep; freight its hands with blessings, direct its eyes—no matter how narrow your sphere—to the nearest object of suffering, and relieve it.

“I say, my dear young friend, take the word of an old man for it, who has tried every known panacea, and found all to fail, except this golden rule:

“Forget self, and keep the heart busy for others.”

THRESHING-FLOOR IN THE EAST.

We left the plain of Hinnis, by a pass through the mountain range of Zernak. In the valleys we found clusters of black tents belonging to the nomad Kurds, and the hill-sides were covered with their flocks. The summit of a high peak, overhanging the road, is occupied by the ruins of a castle, formerly held by Kurdish chiefs, who levied black-mail on travellers, and carried their depredations into the plains. On reaching the top of the pass, we had an uninterrupted view of the Subhan Dhan. From the village of Karagol, where we halted for the night, it rose abruptly before us. This magnificent peak, with the rugged mountains of Kurdistan, the River Euphrates winding through the plain, the peasants driving the oxen over the corn on the threshing-floor, and the groups of Kurdish horsemen, with their long spears and flowing garments, formed one of those scenes of eastern travel which leave an indelible impression on the imagination, and bring back in after years indescribable feelings of pleasure and repose. The threshing-floor, which added much so to the beauty and interest of the picture at Karagol, had been seen in all the villages we had passed during our day’s journey. The abundant harvest had been gathered in, and the corn was now to be threshed and stored for the winter. The process adopted is simple, and nearly such as it was in patriarchal times. The children either drive horses round and round over the heaps, or, standing upon a sledge stuck full of sharp flints on the under part, are drawn by oxen over the scattered sheaves. Such were “the threshing-sledges armed with teeth,” mentioned by Isaiah. In no instance are the animals muzzled—“Thou shalt not muzzle the ox when he treadeth out the corn;” but they linger to pick up a scanty mouthful as they are urged on by the boys and young girls, to whom the duties of the threshing-floor are chiefly assigned. The grain is winnowed by the men and women, who throw the corn and straw together into the air with a wooden shovel, leaving the wind to carry the chaff, whilst the seed falls to the ground. The wheat is then raked into heaps, and left on the threshing-floor until the tithe-gatherer has taken his portion.—Layard’s Discoveries in the Ruins of Nineveh and Babylon.

[PRESENT APPEARANCE OF THE INTERIOR OF THE CRYSTAL PALACE.]

THE CRYSTAL PALACE.

THE more we think of the purposes to which the beautiful building at Sydenham, now rapidly approaching completion, is intended to be devoted, the more we are impressed with their magnitude. We think the design, taken in its entirety, one of the best that could be offered to the acceptance of the public; but as to its present or ultimate success, there is room for much apprehension. The public, of whom vast numbers are what are called sight-seers, is naturally a very fickle and capricious body. It is enamoured of novelties. Going on very fast itself, it can only be tempted from its ordinary pursuits by something that either keeps pace with, or goes ahead of it. We perceive this exemplified in the varying fortunes of our theatres, our exhibitions, our manufactures—even our literature. One of Shakspeare's best dramas, interpreted by the best actors, with the aid of the most effective scenery, won't fill a theatre of itself. The public are tired of Shakspeare on the stage, because they have him at home—therefore they rush to something new. Farce and comedy are more susceptible of invention than gloomy tragedy, because their features are borrowed from existing men and manners—therefore at present farce and comedy are the most popular. Even the pulpit must have eloquence to recommend it to the favour of King Multitude. In the various exhibitions scattered over this metropolis, there is a continual effort to present novelties. A panorama undergoes as many transformations in the course of a year, as Proteus himself. And if we go to Manchester, we should find that if it were not for the continual invention and production of new patterns, the warehouses would be crammed with unsaleable goods. It is the same with literature: a new book sells better than an old one, and the serial publications would be mere heaps of waste paper, did not the proprietors and editors of them narrowly watch the public taste, and make the most expensive efforts to be in advance of its requirements. In short, everything of necessity, utility, ornament, amusement, or instruction, must go along with the times, just as a fashion-book. The cry is for change: Do not weary our senses with the same thing over and over again, or if you will put an old favourite before us, let him or it, like the seasons, always show us a different face.

Now one of the causes of the extraordinary success of the Exhibition, was its novelty. It attempted something which had not been attempted before—therefore the public was pre-disposed to regard it favourably. It was also recommended by royalty, supported by all classes, and, only intended to be of a temporary character, was received with universal enthusiasm. It was the first calling together of people from different parts of the country, and of the world, on record; and when this is taken into consideration, together with the wonders of art, science, and labour which the construction of the building itself evoked, it is scarcely surprising that the success was more than a success—it was a splendid triumph.

Now it must be evident that the present Crystal Palace undertaking will have none of these advantages. It will not invite all nations, nor can it be said that it will attract all England—it will simply be a grand metropolitan institution, combining, within its intention and precincts, all that is great, glorious, and immortal, in the resources of art, science, and genius. It will be a repository for everything—in fact, a microcosm filled with all the products of industry and intellect. And, as a working man said of the parent Exhibition: “The mechanic and the worker in metals will be able there to trace the mineral as it appears when first dug from Mother Earth, through all its varied processes, till finished in the powerful and almost intellectual steam-engine. The workers of textile fabrics, will there be able to inspect the silk as produced from the silkworm, and the cotton from the cotton-plant—tracing their progress, until, by the aid of man and machinery, they appear in the finished fabric, exhibiting the greatest beauty of design and skilful workmanship.”

But although a glass palace embracing all the features of a British Museum, a Polytechnic Institution, a Conservatory, and a Theatre, it will not be a novelty—and that we believe will be the greatest disadvantage it will have to encounter. It will not induce millions to make holidays to visit it. The pawnbroker's shop will not, through its attractions, be filled to repletion with watches and every description of household furniture. The people will go to it just as they go to the British Museum and National Gallery. On all holidays—thank goodness, the sordidness of the age has left us a few—such as Easter Monday, or Whit Monday—the masses will rush to it: and so the directors will reap the harvest that will enable them to announce a dividend. But on all other occasions, throughout the remainder of the year, it will have to depend for support on the higher and middle classes. Only an inconsiderable portion of the latter can snatch a day from their business; but their wives and daughters will be at liberty, and no doubt they will liberally avail themselves of the privilege. But this facility for affording amusement and instruction to the women of the metropolis will excite the fears of fathers of families.

All public places are infested by scamps in the garb of gentlemen, needy adventurers, swell-mobsmen, cum multis aliis. So that parents will naturally be anxious for the safety of their daughters, husbands for their wives, not so much on this account, as a fear of contamination by the presence of improper characters.

Respectable people are themselves an excellent moral police; but the directors will have to organise another kind of police, so as to prevent assignations, flirtations, and the unseemly pursuit of young women by the idlers who will find the place an excellent lounge, or the vagabonds who will thrust themselves into places where there is a pocket to be picked, or a woman to be insulted. Some provision to meet this special case might very appropriately be introduced into Mr. Fitzroy's bill for the better protection of women. But no doubt the directors will do all they can for the safety of the public, and take good care that none of their servants assume the office of Cupid's messenger; and we merely mention these disagreeable possibilities, to show what up-hill work the directors will have before them, and how indispensable it will be to the success of the undertaking that their management should be as perfect as it is possible to be made, and that they should always bear in mind, that all exhibitions or entertainments from which money is to be derived, can only be rendered a source of attraction and, of course, of profit, by a rigid adherence to the pro loco et tempore doctrine.

Variety, a life-like character about the illustrations, and music, will be essential to its stability—and we are assured they will be offered in infinite excellence; but, without the support of the working-classes, we should have but faint hopes of the undertaking proving remunerative.

But then how are the working classes to attend? They can less afford to lose a week-day than a merchant or tradesman. “Give them Sunday afternoon,” say the directors. “Let us have the same privileges as taverns and tea-gardens.”

That is all very well, as far as it goes. We should be glad to see the working man and his family withdrawn from every dangerous influence; but the difficulty is, shall, or rather can, the legislature legitimise a direct violation of the Sabbath? Public-houses are open on Sunday afternoon, because there is no law to restrain them, except during church-time; but there is a law to prevent Sunday trading, and a law which prohibits any theatre, exhibition, or other place of public entertainment being opened at all on the Sabbath Day; and the question to be determined is, can Parliament consistently turn round upon these laws, and make an exception in favour of a particular institution?

The public also has a voice in this matter, and the two tribunals will have to decide the question one way or another. In the meantime, we can only say, that the directors have every difficulty to surmount, and that, whatever may be the decision, they ought to command the sympathies and earnest, unobtruded support of all classes; for, as the Crystal Palace has been designed as a place of recreation and instruction for mechanics and artisans, as well as the merchants and peers, the former have quite as great an interest in it as, if not greater than the latter.

As an accompaniment to our pictorial illustration of the exterior, we this week present our readers with an engraved view of the interior, taken at the western end of the nave.

[VIEW OF THE CITY OF NEW YORK.]

THE CITY OF NEW YORK.

THE colonisation of America by Europeans, must be considered as forming some of the grandest chapters in the whole range of history. Only three centuries and a half have elapsed since the discovery of that magnificent continent by Columbus, yet, during that period, more than a hundred millions of human beings have been trampled out of existence, and their places occupied by about sixty millions of people, who, when they have become completely fused, will form one of the most perfect, energetic, and intellectual race that ever glorified the earth by their presence. This nucleus of a future empire is distributed as follows:

Mexico	8 000,000
Columbia	3,500,000
Yucatan and Guatemala...	2,500,000
Peru	2,000,000
Brazil.....	6,000,000
Small republics	4,000,000
Canada and other British dependencies	2,000,000
United States	25,000,000
Aborigines	7,000,000
Total	60,000,000

As is well known, the first settlements were established in the West India Islands; then the Spaniards fixed themselves on the shores of the Gulf of Paria, and then, by the indefatigable exertions of those bold, bad men, Cortez, Pizarro and Almagro, extended their conquests to Mexico, Peru, and Chili. Brazil shortly afterwards became subject to the crown of Portugal, and then the tide of American colonisation may be said to have fairly set in. The Dutch were the next colonists; after them the French, and, lastly, the British. The French attempts all terminated disastrously, as also did the first made by the British. The latter was commenced in 1602, under the direction of Sir Walter Raleigh. But the first permanent establishment was at James's River, in Virginia, a name then given to all the American territory facing the Atlantic. At that time religious differences prevailed in Europe, and fostered a spirit of emigration. The Huguenots of France and Switzerland settled in Canada and Nova Scotia, and the Nonconformists of Scotland, to escape from the authority of the church, fled to America. In 1620, the pilgrim fathers created for themselves a new home on the shores of Massachusetts Bay, and founded the state of New Holland. The Catholics, in 1623, followed their example, and colonised Maryland; and, in 1682, the state of Pennsylvania was founded by the Quakers. So that the original element in the North American colonies was a hardy independence, and it was not surprising that, in about a century afterwards, the colonists should have thrown off the yoke of the mother country, and erected themselves into a nation composed of separate states, bound together by the ties of mutual interest, and community of language and sentiment. The form of government they adopted has stood the test of seventy-eight years' experience, and within that short period the people of these united states have advanced to a state of prosperity unrivalled in any country on the globe. In 1776, the population did not exceed three millions. In 1851, it amounted to nearly twenty-four millions, and it is curious to note the relative growth of the two great Anglo-Saxon States.

In 1801, the population of Great Britain was 10,942,646; in 1800, that of the United States was 5,319,762—or not quite half. In 1850, the population of the United States was two millions and a third more than that of Great Britain in 1851—at this moment it probably exceeds it, by three millions. The rate of decennial increase in this country is less than 15 per cent—while in America it is about 35 per cent. In the great continental states the rate is considerably lower than in England. According to the progress of the last fifty years in France and in America, the United States will have the larger population in 1870—in 1900, they will exceed those of England, France, Spain, Portugal, Denmark, Sweden, and Switzerland combined. Prudent statesmen should bear these facts in mind. Many persons now alive may see the time when America will be of more importance to us, socially, commercially, and politically, than all Europe put together. Old diplomatic traditions will go for little in the face of a trans-Atlantic power numbering 100,000,000 of free and energetic men of our own race and blood.

The American returns exhibit to us another extremely interesting feature—the process by which Nature herself is gradually working out the vexed question of Slavery. Every one is aware that in the United States political power is based on population. With them the taking of a census is a political event of serious importance: as, according to the return of living souls in each state, its congressional rank is regulated. Every ten years some changes are made in the distribution of power. Votes are taken from one state, and transferred to another. By the law of 1842, every 70,680 must have a representative. The number has been altered several times—but the figure has always been the same for each state. Power instantly passes to the most prosperous. In looking to the future, it is therefore necessary to observe which states are growing fastest—which slowest. The present number of slave states is fifteen—of free states, sixteen. These numbers are fixed; but the number of representatives which they are severally entitled to send to Washington, is continually varying. The arrangements following on the return of the new census cause a difference of six votes on the slave question—three votes having been transferred from the almost stationary slave states to their more wealthy and thriving rivals. Nature has in this manner laid the penalty of crime on the polluted territories. They cannot even hold their own ground in a land whose law is liberty and progress. In twenty years from this time, the slaveholders promise to be in a considerable minority in the House of Representatives, by the laws of their own constitution. Before then the ballot-box—if no revolution should intervene—will have quietly settled the peculiar institution, even if no change of opinion should occur in the south itself. There is another hopeful view of the question. As the total number of representatives is limited, votes are continually passing from the old states on the Atlantic to the new states which arise on every decade on the western border. The latter are mostly free states. By these transfers, the anti-slavery cause will have gained eleven votes in five sessions. While the law of progress remains in favour or freedom, these peaceful but certain encroachments will continue. If the United States hold together a score of years longer, it is anticipated slavery must, in the natural course of things, be abolished. The law itself provides a calm solution of the difficulty.

This is extremely gratifying to a people constituted like the British; and the positive assurance thus held out will contribute immensely towards cementing that natural union which exists between a people having a common origin, and a striking affinity in their political and social institutions. But whether the plague-spot be removed or not within so brief a space of time, the friendly connection of the two countries, and an uninterrupted commercial intercourse between their people, is indispensable to the progress of civilisation and the advancement of the vital interests of mankind at large. Nothing tends better to strengthen this connection than an intimate knowledge of each other, a true idea on each side of the Atlantic of the actual condition of the other, and a mutual generous appreciation of good qualities, together with a lenient view of the defects that disfigure and mar the greatness of each of them.

Spirited exposures of slavery in America and poverty in England, are essential to the health of the public mind in each country; they are sharp medicines, intended to agitate a mass of abuses that would become stagnant, if not disturbed—and therefore they do good. But, to our apprehension, recrimination is idle work—for all reforms, to work beneficially, must be planted in prepared ground; and we think that we British would be wiser, if we exerted ourselves to cultivate the friendship of our American brethren, instead of provoking them by pointing to a particular institution, which has become so entwined with certain material interests, that it cannot be suddenly altered without endangering the safety of the whole social fabric in the federated states.

As we said before, the ballot-box, sooner or later, will finally dispose of slavery; and to the ballot-box all sensible people confidently leave the adjustment of the question. The progress of the new world is of more importance to the happiness of mankind than theoretical disquisitions, or the horrors of certain material social forms; and facts speak more eloquently than all the sentimental suggestions that could be heaped together. If we are told, as we actually were, by the last American census, that the coloured insane are fewer in proportion to their numbers than the whites, and that out of a mixed population of 24,000,000, there are only about 50,000 receiving a subsistence from the public, we may be well assured that in the United States of America the promise of the future is not only brilliant, but solid and grand.

For our own parts, we have always thought everything should be done to promote the good feeling which ought to subsist between the two nations; and we must confess that we regard the recently executed treaty, for an international copyright between the American Republic and Great Britain, as another step in the right direction. Viewed economically, it will put an extinguisher on a good deal of ill-feeling—that will be a great gain; but, looked at in all its tendencies, it will be found to show a greater respect for national honour and honesty than has hitherto been manifested in the literary transactions between the two countries.

FAITH AND FORTUNE.

CHAPTER I.

The rights of authors and publishers ought to be as much respected as the rights of merchants; and we trust that, before long, the rights of patentees, inventors, and manufacturers will also receive the same acknowledgment—the same bare but creditable allowance of justice. At all events, the mutual concession in this instance is gratifying evidence of the soundness of the morality recognised in the two countries, and is another illustration of the strength and tenacity of public opinion, when rationally directed, and approached with discretion and sobriety. English literature in England and the United States will henceforth be the joint property of the two nations—authors and publishers in neither will be pillaged as heretofore, and the harmony thus established will go a long way in purging the press of the trash and abominations that the reciprocal plunder of copyright in some degree encouraged. New York is only a ten days' voyage distant from London—in the course of the year it is anticipated that it will, by means of the ocean submarine telegraph, be brought into instant communication with our metropolis; so that the settlement of this literary question cannot be sufficiently commended, as having removed a formidable barrier to that genial intercourse between the two hemispheres which, every day that passes, becomes of greater importance to the destinies of the whole human family.

However, all such achievements speak very forcibly for themselves, and we ought to content ourselves with a general reference to such a happily constituted international disposition, and allow ourselves the privilege of dwelling a little on the greater idea of two such mighty places as the capitals of the Old World and the New being brought within speaking distance of each other. Cornhill and Broadway shaking hands, across an ocean 3500 miles in breadth, is a tremendous suggestion; but, as there is not the slightest doubt of the practicability of the correspondence, or of its being carried out, we have thought that our readers would be glad to be introduced to a pictorial sketch of the city that is to be brought within less than thinking distance of the great centre of those material and intellectual operations that rule the aspect of the world.

New York is the Liverpool of America, with a dash of Manchester and Glasgow in its external appearance, which renders its leading features almost familiar to the reader on this side of the Atlantic. It is the largest city on the vast continent of America, and at this moment contains a population of not less than half a million of people. In four-and-twenty hours, it could turn out a force of sixty thousand armed men, and man a fleet with thirty thousand of the best seamen in the world. Its inhabitants take the high rank of being among the most energetic and spirited, either in Europe or America. Its newspaper press has an extraordinary circulation, and the facilities afforded for the pursuits of science and art are more than respectable. But New York is chiefly celebrated for its fine harbour, its steamers, its manufactures, and its commerce. And it should be borne in mind, that it has risen to its present greatness in the course of the present century; for the commerce, owing to unwise restrictions, cannot be dated any farther back than towards the close of the last century; as, in 1790, the imports of the whole union did not exceed $5,000,000, and the exports were the same. The city of New York, therefore, like Liverpool, has grown with—it may be said out of—the manufacturing wealth and industry of Great Britain: both of them, at all events, had a common origin; and as both, as regards their permanent prosperity, are indissolubly linked together, each may be regarded as dependent for its greatness and flourishing condition on that gigantic commerce which has sprung up with this country and the American continent, and which is supported chiefly by that amazing mechanical and productive power which, by the aid of steam, has become centred in these islands.

The population of New York is doubled in every twenty years: so that in forty years it will contain as many inhabitants as there are at present in the British metropolis. At the end of that period, the population of the latter, at the present rate of increase, cannot be less than 7,000,000! So that, if New York would overtake London, it must travel just three times as fast as it does—which is not at all likely, or even desirable; for the vigour of an empire must rather be looked for in the variety and number of its large cities, than in one overgrown, unwieldy capital, whether commercial or political, or a combination of both.

THE ACTOR'S FAREWELL TO THE STAGE.—One night—the night of retirement—makes terrible change, and holds a tragical division: one side we see the pomp of pageant, the measured march, the robe, the gemmed crown, the lighted eye, the crowd, the brilliancy, the shout, the triumphs of well-learned passion, the beauty of beauteous poetry! On the other side all is dark! Life's coronets are blotted out—aye, and in one night! We see the lone actor, bent from his prime of place, creeping about in his low, overcast state—alone, rejected, commonly noticed, solitary, lost! The past remains to him a pangful dream! Stripped at once of all his greatness, he wanders about like one who has been sleeping—seeing others trample through in the public heart, or not daring to move the memory of such an usurpation, straying solitary in some distant spot—alone, though alone—there to hear his sorrowful appeals, to wandering shouts of a multitude, but to see quiet sadness, hear the evening wind die along the waters, and when the "matrimonious rime of silver hair," woven momentarily and monotonously at his heels, his heart turned out by his pelican children from pomp to poverty.

ALMOST all ancient nations have their hero, whose adventures and achievements having, in the course of time, become mingled with romance, make up an ideal of character a little beyond humanity, yet not without its uses in establishing a high national standard, and awakening in ardent minds an enthusiasm which leads to emulation. Gods and demigods were made thus in ancient Greece; and less romantic England has her Arthur; France her Charlemagne; and other nations their traditional great men, sometimes imbued with supernatural powers, always with wonderful ones, and with qualities the very invention of which affords some idea of the people in whose minds they originate. The early inhabitants of central America—a race scarcely traceable among the present population of that now unhappy region—are no exemption to the fact of a heroic remembrance. They, too, had their high-souled, indomitable Arthur—their ideal of all noble and chivalrous qualities—in a young prince of Tezcuco, who lived in the fifteenth century; modern time compared with the Pyramids, but quite a respectable antiquity for the western world.

This hero was no knight-errant who went about seeking for adventures by which to immortalise himself. Greatness was thrust upon him solely against his will; for the rancorous pursuit of an inveterate foe forced him into action before he had attained his sixteenth year. His name was Nezabualcoryotl—a dignified appellation, no doubt, in its day, but which, fortunately, we are justified in supposing was habitually abridged, as most very ponderous names are. We shall, therefore, by way of adopting a safe middle course, take the liberty of calling our hero Hualco.

The city of Tezcuco was one of those which boasted a barbaric splendour, at the period of which we write. No wonder that rumours of a western El Dorado had reached Europe. A bird of the air might carry the matter, in the shape of wings besprent with gold-dust, or a collar of emeralds worth an emperor's ransom. Sir John Maundeville's account of Prestor John's riches seems scarcely fabulous, after reading the history of these cities. Their sovereigns reigned like the kings in fairy-land—absolute masters of treasures inexhaustible. Their country, limited as it was in extent, comprised every variety of climate—from the perpetual snow that crowded the mountains, to the burning plains on the Atlantic coast. Between these extremes were ample regions of unchanging verdure, and that vast table-land which, elevated six thousand feet above the level of the sea, is yet sheltered by a stupendous range of hills, and is at this day, in temperature, fertility, and natural advantages, one of the most delicious regions on the face of the globe. The productions of this favoured country comprised all that nature ever grants to man; and the system of taxation insured to the sovereign a tribute in kind from everything yielded by earth, air, or water. Gold, silver, amber, turquoise, tortoise-shell, were the materials of drinking-vessels and other utensils, not only in the royal palaces, but in the dwellings of the nobility; and these are but a specimen of the wealth and luxury which prevailed. Over all this the king had nearly absolute power, and he was regarded by his people with almost the reverence due to a god.

But no splendour or dignity can secure the possessor against misfortune. Camaca, King of Tezcuco, in the midst of his prosperity—perhaps because of it—became an object of enmity to a neighbouring nation—the Tepanecs; and after a series of aggressions, the detail of which would be foreign to our present intention, these warlike people succeeded in overwhelming and destroying the more luxurious monarch. His son, Hualco, beheld the barbarous murder of his father, and, but for the vigilance and fidelity of the tutor who had charge of him, would have met the same fate. This faithful friend contrived to secrete, or disguise his master's heir so successfully, that the Tepanecs were baffled in their design to extinguish the royal blood of Tezcuco.

The young prince, who was surrounded by a few faithful friends, was at first inconsolable, both that his father was basely murdered, and that he himself still lived. He dashed himself on the ground in all the extravagance of passionate youth's first grief, and declared his determination to rid himself of a life rendered hateful by misery and disgrace.

"Why didst thou hinder me, Atahuilpa," he said, "when I would have cast myself before my father, and received in my bosom the darts which were aimed at him? These own lessons have taught me to prefer many things before life; yet it is thy fault that I live the life of a coward and a slave, while my father dies, and his kingdom is usurped by his murderers!"

"If thy death could have saved the life of the king," said the old man, "I myself would have urged thee—nay, forced thee to the sacrifice! But thou wouldst only have furnished another victim, and a more complete triumph. The lives of princes are the property of their people; and thou wert no less cowardly to throw away thine in despair, than thou wouldst have been to withhold it, if it could have preserved thy father. In this world of war and strife, Hualco, he is the brave man who dares to live. If thou wouldst show thyself worthy to avenge thy sovereign upon his enemies, thou wouldst begin with a mastery over thyself!"

Hualco had been taught from infancy the most implicit obedience to his preceptor. The customs of the country gave to those to whom was confided the instruction of youth of the higher classes—and particularly those of the blood-royal—unlimited authority.* The words of Atahuilpa aroused the prince to reflection, and he took part in the council which was now held, as to the safest disposition of his person, and the carrying out of those plans of education ordained by law for the heir of the crown.

The posture of affairs allowed no present hope of an armed resistance to the Tepanecs, whose warlike habits and unscrupulous ambition would incline and enable them to retain the power they had gained in a kingdom now under the disadvantage of a royal minority. It was therefore considered advisable that Hualco should retire with his tutor to a rural retreat not far from the city, and there adopt such precautions as would secure, as far as possible, the incognito rendered necessary by his present unhappy position.

Stripped of the golden ornaments which denoted his rank, and clothed in a garment of nequen—a coarse cloth, made from the fibres of the aloe, and used by the lower classes—Hualco was conducted by his tutor to the humble residence which was to be his home for the present. It was a cottage of considerable size, thatched with palm-leaves, and shaded by the magnificent cypresses which at that time abounded in the country, and were afterwards destroyed by the Spaniards. Here, with his excellent tutor, the prince applied himself assiduously to his studies.

"The gods have already shown thee, Hualco," said the sage, "that thou art but as a feather in their hands. Whether they will have thee monarch or peasant, they require of thee knowledge and virtue, which will fit thee for either destiny. If, in spite of all my cares and all my hopes, thou art reserved but to grace a sacrifice of the Tepanecs, their fires can detain thee but for a moment from the presence of the sun, where thou wilt take rank with other glorified spirits, according as thou hast well used the few years of thy probation here."

By such counsels, heard by the youth with the deepest reverence, did the wise and good Atahuilpa seek to train, by study, effort, and sacrifice, the precious charge upon whose course the eyes of all true Tezcucoans were secretly fixed. It is not surprising that, in such society, and secluded from all injurious influence, the young prince grew in all good things, even as his slender and graceful proportions gradually assumed the strength and symmetry by which he was afterwards distinguished.

The elders of the people, the priests, the caciques, and such of the nobility as had not been won over by the splendid bribes of the conqueror, found means not unfrequently to visit the lonely cottage, strengthening the resolution, encouraging the hopes of the prince and his preceptor, and devising plans for a concerted attempt to restore the liberties of the kingdom. Perhaps, by means of these visits, the vigilance of hatred and self-interest accomplished what had been vainly attempted by corruption.

Hualco was wandering by starlight with his tutor, listening to a lesson in astronomy—a science in which the learned of that country had even then made surprising advances.

"Thy star is blood-red to-night, Hualco!" said the old man. "It seems as if Quetzalcuati, whose mild influences we invoke, were about to yield thee to his fiercer master. There are those among our wise men who would read this heaven for thee, foreshowing thy future course—perhaps thy fate!"

"And would this knowledge enable me to avoid the evil that might threaten me, father?" said the prince. "If not—if the decree of the gods be unalterable—to know of certain misfortune could but weaken resolution and extinguish hope. I would rather study with thee the outward aspect and wonderful revolutions of those bright orbs, leaving their deeper meaning to be spelled by those who can make better use of such knowledge. Teach me only what will fit me for the work that lies before me."

As he spoke, they passed beneath the deep shade of a liquid amber tree; and, at the same moment, a net, made of the fine-twisted fibres of the aloe—a plant which serves in that country for a thousand useful purposes—fell over and enveloped both tutor and pupil; while armed men sprang upon them, and easily overpowered them—entangled as they were, and without weapons.

"What would you have with us?" said the prince, when, at length exhausted, he ceased to struggle with his captors. "My father, at least, can have committed no crime: let him go, and then bear me whither ye will?"

"Thy father, young serpent," said the deep voice of one of the warriors, "shalt see thy heart cast out at the feet of our great god, Huitzilo Potatti,* as the reward of his treachery to our master! That once accomplished, he shalt see the death of a dog!"

The prince would have made a furious reply to this threat, but Atahuilpa controlled him by a sign.

"Cowards war with words," he said; "while silence is the strength of the prudent!"

Hualco no longer dared to question his captors, but followed, unresistingly, as well as his fettered limbs would allow.

Day was breaking as the armed men, with their prisoners, entered the gates of the city. The vast splendours of that wonderful capital lay in dim repose, and scarce a sound was heard, save the voices of innumerable singing birds, with which the gardens of the nobility were filled. These welcomed the dawning light, and flattered amid the perfumed branches, scarce conscious of captivity; although nets of great strength, almost imperceptible from their extreme fineness, prevented their straying beyond the prescribed limits. Far different was the prison to which the prince and his friend were destined. It was a strong, gloomy dungeon, built of unburnt brick, with walls of immense thickness, ornamented here and there, at the angles, with the hideous image of some god who was supposed to delight in vengeance. The huge gates opened at a sign from the leader of the party; and Atahualpa, who had been watching on every side for some one to whom he might find means of communicating the situation of the prince, was obliged to follow his royal pupil into the prison, with the certainty that those gates would shut out all hope from any friend in the city. So important a place would probably be entrusted only to a tried servant of the usurper; and all that the prisoners could hope, was a speedy termination of their suspense.

* The Mexican Mars.

Coarse fare and harsh treatment were now their lot; and they had the additional vexation of finding, in the governor of the prison, a man whom they had ranked among their friends. From one capable of such treachery no favour could be expected, and they resigned themselves to their fate, with such philosophy as they could summon. The Tepanec sovereign was about to depart upon one of his visits to his ancient dominion, and Atahualpa and Hualco anticipated nothing less than forming a conspicuous part of the sacrifices with which it was usual to propitiate the gods upon such occasions.

In effect, such were the orders received at the prison. Emissaries from the king came to prepare Hualco for the solemnity, by the aid of baths, perfumes, rich dresses, jewels, and flowers, which were employed for many days, with many mystic ceremonies, to fit the victim for the high honour of being offered to the great Tetzcatlipoc, or Soul of the World. Atahualpa was treated with less respect, and given to understand that an ignominious and obscure death awaited him.

The latest sun was setting. The morning was to see the forming of the immense procession in which Hualco, with many victims of less note, the prize of late victories, was to pass to the great temples, whose altars were already decorated for the ceremony. The prison swarmed with priests and their attendants, every avenue was filled with gorgeous preparation for the sacrifice, and an extra guard was set, lest, in some paroxysm of fruitless loyalty, the populace should attempt the rescue of their native prince. But night settled calmly on the scene of bustle and anxiety, and fatigue deepened the slumbers of those who had been most active in the labours of the day. Two priests watched by the side of Hualco, whose only consolation now was, that his revered preceptor was not separated from him. The governor of the prison had signified his intention of guarding the victims in person. At midnight he entered, and took his station in front of the seat on which Hualco was placed. The priests, somewhat relieved by this vigilance, resigned themselves to short repose, and the most profound silence reigned, where all had so lately been hurry and agitation.

The governor, when this quiet had become established, so that the low breathing of the sleepers was the only sound heard, arose from his seat, and whispered a few moments with Atahualpa. Each of the two then approached a priest, and, falling upon him suddenly, bound him with cords which the governor had provided, threatening instant death if they gave the alarm. The priests, accustomed to strike only unresisting victims, submitted almost without a struggle, and sat, terrified spectators, while the governor, falling at the prince's feet, besought his pardon for even the appearance of treachery.

"My life was vowed to your service," he said; "and I sought this post from the tyrant, in order that, if you should fall into his hands, I might become your keeper. I have lent myself to his cruelty, lest I should be displaced; and behold the fruit of my care! I am the deliverer of my master's son!"

"But your own fate?" said Hualco, whose senses were in confusion with surprise and agitation.

"I take your place, of course, but with joy and pride! No Tezucan but will envy me my death upon the altar. But come, my prince, the moments are precious. Here is the key of the east gate, where you will find a trusty attendant, and a change of garments. Farewell! hasten to Mexico, and engage the intervention of the king, who is powerful with the usurper. Farewell, good Atahualpa! thou hast another life for thy prince when he shall need it!"

Remonstrances were unavailing. The governor reminded them that he was irrevocably compromised by the presence of the priests, whom to kill would have incurred the displeasure of the gods on him in whose behalf they were sacrificed. To linger, therefore, would render unavailing his self-immolation; and Hualco, dizzy with contending emotions, and urged vehemently by both his friends, at length consented to depart, after embracing, in an agony of grief, the faithful Tezucan, who exulted in laying down his life for his sake.

CHAPTER II.

BEFORE the east had become ruddy with the dawn, the fugitives were well advanced on their way to the shore of the lake, by means of which they must reach the city of Mexico. But as the day approached, the rising hum, more and more audible from the city they had left, reminded them that, with the early preparation for the tremendous ceremonies of the day, their escape must be discovered, and innumerable scouts would be dispatched to thread every avenue in the neighbourhood, so that to attempt to proceed would be certain discomfiture. Trusting, therefore, to the impenetrable foliage which abounded on every side, they concealed themselves in a tree, where they could observe those who passed, without fear of being discovered. It was not long before they perceived among the people who began to throng towards the city, others who came from the opposite direction, and who were making the most anxious inquiries on every side. At the same time, far in the distance, the great teocalli, or temple, which rose quite above the walls and buildings of the city, was alive with priests, ascending and descending its numerous staircases, and preparing for the sacrifices which were to take place upon the two altars that flamed upon its summit. The heavy sound of the great drum, and of the wild chorus of instruments and voices which announced the forming of the procession, soon became audible even at that distance; and as the sun rose, the foremost priests, canopied under arches of flowers, and bearing in their hands the various instruments of sacrifice, ascended to the summit of the temple. An innumerable throng, high above whose heads, on a gorgeous throne, and protected from the sun by innumerable plumes of every splendid dye, was seen the sovereign himself, crowned with his tall golden mitre, followed the sacred legion; and still later, heralded by shouts that rent the sky, the mournful file of victims, bound two and two, with flowing crowns about their heads, and torches of aromatic wood, lighted at the sacred fire, burning in their hands. Loud and louder sounded the great drum of serpents' skin, and wilder grew the shouts that rent the transparent heaven, as the dark-robed priests bound the first victim to the sacrificial stone. In another moment, the chief pontiff, raised high above the whole crowd, held up towards the sun some object which could not be discerned at that distance, but which our wanderers knew well was the heart of the victim. Hualco shuddered. Nature in the young speaks louder than superstition; and even the superstitions of his people were far milder than those of the warlike nation who now ruled them.

"When I am king, Atahualpa," he said, "I will not offer up human brethren to the good gods."

"When thou art king, Hualco," said the old man, thou wilt be the instrument of thy people. A monarch may control the lives and fortunes of his subjects, but not constrain their consciences. While the people feel the sacrifice of their enemies to be acceptable to the gods, thou must not only allow, but sanction the custom. When thou hast persuaded them to leave these bloody rites to their neighbours, who delight in carnage, and to be satisfied with offering at the altars the fruit and flowers which are the gift of heaven, then mayst thou banish for ever the scent of blood from the sacred places, without becoming impious in the estimation of those to whom thou art bound to set an example of all goodness."

As Hualco sighed at this exposition of the duties of a monarch, he turned his eyes from the odious spectacle, now shown still more distinctly by the full blaze of the up-risen sun, and perceived that the wide way, so lately trampled by thousands, was solitary as a desert.

"Let us proceed, my father," he said; "the lake is not far distant, and we may reach the city of my kinsman before this ceremony has ceased to attract the multitude."

In a short time they found themselves safely seated in the pirogue of an old fisherman, the only individual of his neighbourhood who had resisted the temptation of the day.

The old man steered them safely through the multitude of chimampas, or floating gardens—those wandering islands of verdure with which the bosom of the lake was studded in every direction. They reached the city at noon, and Atahualpa rewarded the old fisherman with a small golden ornament which he had concealed about his person. The Tezucan took it—looked narrowly at the giver, and still more narrowly at the younger stranger; then, prostrating himself on the earth, he kissed the feet of Hualco. The fugitives saw that they were recognised; but it was by a Tezucan, and they had no fears.

The Mexican monarch received his royal kinsman with great kindness, and assigned to him and his tutor a residence which afforded every facility for the prosecution of the various studies considered necessary for the perfecting of the prince's education. This was bound to include a store of traditional lore, the mysteries of hieroglyphics—in which the laws were registered, accounts kept, tax-rolls recorded, and the whole system of their mythology, their rituals, and their calendars, presented to the people; a knowledge of astronomy and astrology; and, what seems singular, a trade or business, which should render the possessor independent of the vicissitudes of fortune. All this required a long period; and we are told that Hualco lived several years at the Mexican court, quietly fitting himself for the splendid station which he was to occupy, as a gladiator is trained for the arena. The intervention of his cousin of Mexico proved a protection from the persecutions of his enemy; and at length the usurper went the way of all men, and his son reigned in his stead.

Whether this successor, who was called Maxtla, had been so much in the background, during his father's lifetime, that his real character was not known; or whether, on coming to the throne, he took up, with the royal insignia, his father's hatred, the Mexican monarch was so mistaken in him as to recommend that Hualco should take the opportunity of rejoicings upon his accession, to conciliate him by a present. The prince, with a proper escort, and such gifts and offerings as seemed likely to be considered as evincing a desire for friendly relations with the Tepanec sovereign, presented himself at his court, and, though much against his will, made such demonstrations of friendship as had been recommended by his more politic kinsman. The result was such as often waits upon diffidence. As the prince approached, attended by his tutor, and by servants bearing his offering, the now-made monarch, seated on a throne of gold, and himself covered with rich garments, sprinkled with pearls and precious stones, turned his head aside with marks of the greatest contempt and aversion, and, stamping his golden sandal on the ground, said something in a furious tone to his attendants. One in the crowd whispered to Hualco that this boded his destruction, and advised him to withdraw at once. The confusion of the moment enabled him to minge in the crowd of splendidly-dressed persons by whom the king was surrounded; and in a short time the prince was once more a fugitive, with the additional grief of being, for the first time, separated from his venerable guide, who had not been able to follow him from the presence-chamber.

Anticipating hot pursuit, Hualco struck as speedily as possible into the country, where he wandered, exposed to all inclemencies of weather; lying concealed during the day in dens and caverns, and stealing out at night to find sustenance, which, in that bounteous climate, was never far to seek. A thousand times was he tempted to dare the hate of Maxtla, rather than live on thus wretchedly; but the lesson so deeply instilled into him by Atahualpa, that his life belonged to his people, was of power, in the darkest moment, to restrain him from following his inclination. He endured existence, therefore, and endeavoured to fix his thoughts on the future, believing that if it was the will of the gods that he should yet redeem his people, they would interpose to afford him their protection.

He was surprised one day by a Tepanec soldier, who chanced to enter the cavern where he lay concealed. The man sprang upon him, and shouted to his comrades; but Hualco, vigorous and desperate, grappled with him, and, after a short contest, left him lifeless on the ground.

The prince then plunged still deeper into the forest, and after travelling a considerable distance, came to an open glade, at one extremity of which stood a large, low building, evidently the residence of a farmer or cultivator of the better class. At the door of the house, under the shade of a well-spreading cypress, and the still closer screen of a bending plume of feathers, sat a young girl, engaged in embroidery, and singing as she worked. A white robe, confined at the waist by a rich girdle, was her simple costume. Upon her arms she wore bracelets of turquoise, from which hung little golden ornaments, making a tinkling music as she moved her hands. Her long, black locks hung over her shoulders, held back from her brow by a chaplet of Californian pearls.

At the approach of Hualco, the maiden drew over her a delicate veil of pita, which she had thrown aside on account of the heat, and, rising from her seat, waited for him to speak.

One more practised in female society than the young prince might have felt embarrassed at coming so suddenly upon this beautiful apparition; but Hualco was dumb. Recovering himself, however, he found words to ask shelter, and to say that there were those in pursuit who hunted for his life.

"And who art thou," said the maiden, "that thy blood should be sought thus early? Hast thou committed some crime, for which thou art pursued by order of the gods?"

"No, lady!" said the prince; "I am accused of no crime. The Tepanec king, who now rules Tezucan, is my enemy, and his soldiers are in the forest in pursuit!"

"The king thine enemy!" said the maiden, looking intently at Hualco; "who art thou, then?"

"Fair lady," said the prince, "I cannot look upon thee, and believe that thou wouldst betray the unfortunate! I am the prince of Tezucan, banished from my country, and hunted like a wild beast by the usurper!"

Before he could be aware of her intention, the damsel had prostrated herself at his feet, bowing her graceful head till her long locks swept the ground.

"This poor house is yours, my lord!" she said, "and those to whom it belongs hold their lives at your service! She arose as she spoke, and, lifting the mat which closed the door, the ringing of the small pieces of metal with which it was bordered, awoke an ancient dame who had been sleeping on a couch at the further end of the apartment. She started at the sight of Hualco, but, the damsel whispering to her, she would fain have done homage, if the prince had not prevented her. At this instant the sound of men's voices was heard approaching the house, and Hualco looked round for some place of retreat. The maiden pointed to a large heap of magney (aloe) fibres in one corner, as the only attainable hiding-place. Scarcely was the prince covered under these, when his pursuers entered the house. All their inquiries, though enforced with threats, elicited no information; and, after examining the different apartments, they withdrew.

As evening approached, Hualco ventured forth, and learned from the young lady and her duenna, that the household in which they were sojourners were faithful Tezucans, who would glory in dying for their prince. The people of the house, who had been assisting at some festival, returned soon after, and confirmed this assertion; but they brought the intelligence that the soldier whom Hualco had but stunned, having joined his companions, gave such positive testimony of the prince's being in the neighbourhood, that there was reason to expect another visit, and a more thorough search, on the following day.

One night of rest, however, was something for the fugitive; and he resigned himself to slumber with all the zest which belongs to excessive fatigue and long watching. So sound was his sleep, that it was with difficulty he could be awakened by the master of the house, who, watching through the night, had seen lights glancing in the forest, which he knew must belong to the party in search of the prince. Not a moment was to be lost; and Hualco, leaving the house by the opposite side, fled towards a small settlement, in which his host assured him he would find friends. The darkness, however, prevented him from keeping the proper path; and after long following a light, which he supposed to proceed from the settlement, he came into the midst of some soldiers, who were beguiling a night-watch with songs and dances. Their noise and the words of their songs convinced him that they were his own countrymen, and he boldly demanded protection. This was readily granted, and they offered him refreshments, with every mark of the reverence which they were accustomed to show their monarchs. Upon the approach of his pursuers, they concealed him under the immense drum around which they had been dancing, and renewed their mirth. Hualco, from his hiding-place, heard the soldiers of Maxtla proclaim the price set upon his head: "An ample domain, with the hand of a noble lady in marriage;" and threaten the most dreadful tortures to those who should conceal him; but he knew the devotion of his people too well to fear anything but that the soldiers might bethink them of removing the drum. They passed on, however, and the prince found himself in the midst of friends, who, disguising him as one of themselves, conveyed him safely to Mexico, where he had again the happiness of embracing his beloved preceptor.

CHAPTER III.

ONCE more under the protection of his powerful kinsman, Hualco was in a condition to make some terms with his implacable enemy; and the result of the negotiation was an agreement that Hualco should succeed upon the death of the usurper, and permission for the prisoner to inhabit his own palace at Tezcutzinco, about two leagues from Tezcuco, under certain restrictions. Not without many suspicions of treachery, Atahualpa decided to accept the offers of Maxtla, judging it best that the young prince should have the opportunity to become personally known to his future subjects, even at some risk to himself. All seemed tranquil, and the situation afforded important facilities for the instructions considered so essential for the future sovereign. Yet Hualco for the first time showed a disinclination for the pursuits which had formerly so much interested him. His eyes were dull, his step languid; he yawned over the abstruse calculations of his tutor; made verses, and sang them to the twilight, and spoiled his picture-writing, by drawing fair maidens with long, willowy tresses, instead of hideous men with globular heads and triangular eyes.

"What ails thee, Hualco?" said his tutor, at last—fer between him and his royal pupil there had never been any reserve. "Art thou becoming a woman, when thy people are looking for a man able to hurl the usurper from his throne, and make his heart an offering to the red-eyed war-god?"

"A woman, father! a woman!" said Hualco, with an absent air. "What woman? Hast thou seen her?"

The old man gazed on his pupil with dismay. Had persecution and hardship turned his brain, or had Maxtla contrived to have some slow, subtle poison given him, of power to mar his brilliant promise, and make his life worse than death?

Good Atahualpa suspected not the subtlest of poisons; and Hualco, recollecting himself, contrived to set his tutor's mind at rest for the time, although his thoughts wandered too often to the forest glade, and the fair creature who sat singing under her plummy screen.

His favourite retreat, when evening softened the heat of day, and the moonlight made a scene of enchantment of those magnificent terraced gardens, so long a proverb of loveliness, was the topmost terrace of all, where, from an artificial lake, or basin, the purest water was distributed in numerous channels through the whole extent of the domain, falling over the rocks in cascades, and shedding freshness on the flowers and shrubs below. Gilded aviaries, containing the rarest and most splendid birds enlivened the bowers; and representations of others, exquisitely wrought in gold and silver, were among the decorations of the reservoir. But the object upon which, amid this magnificence, Hualco chose to fix his perversely pensive eyes, was the marble statue of a nymph, bending over the placid water, as if seeking a mirror for her beauty. This figure was, perhaps, the last that would have attracted a casual observer, since, though it was exquisitely wrought, its pale, subdued hue gave it a melancholy air, surrounded as it was by gorgeous colours and glittering objects. It was an allegorical figure, we are told, and Hualco seemed to be studying its hidden meaning.

Here he lay, watching the effects of the declining light, and touching at intervals a musical instrument which he held in his hand, when a slender arrow fell just before him. He took it up, and found tied to its feathers a small scroll, covered with the picture-writing of the country. As we have no conveniences for giving a facsimile of this epistle, we shall only offer a paraphrase of its contents, which may be thus translated:

"He who sits on thy father's throne, O prince, has this day drawn across thy portrait the line of blood. Three suns will not set before he has fulfilled the vow thus made. Save thyself, then, among thy faithful people!"

The signature was a veiled figure, kneeling. Hualco dwelt more upon this than upon the warning. Could it be the forest maiden? He was too much of an adept in the ambiguous picture-writing not to know that the mysterious figure was quite as likely to mean grief or secrecy, as humility; but the notion once in his brain that the scroll came from the beautiful unknown, he thought of nothing else, and, keeping the missive in his bosom, forebore even to mention it to his tutor.

The next evening found the prince, as before, lying by the crystal reservoir, and indulging in such reveries as will visit prince as well as peasant. A slight rustling started him, and a figure, covered from head to foot in a garment of the coarsest nequen, knelt on the pavement of polished porphyry.

"Prince," said a gentle voice, "you are here still! Your friends sent you yesterday a warning. To-morrow it may be too late!"

"Lady!" said Hualco, springing up, as if he felt already the assassin's dagger, and approaching his mysterious visitor.

"Ladies do not appear thus," said the voice again, but with some slight embarrassment; "your subjects watch over your life, and employ the messenger most likely to gain access to you, to warn you to fly from certain destruction. Every avenue to the palace is guarded by those devoted to Maxtla, and it was only among the slaves who brought provisions from the market that I found entrance. It was hoped that the scroll of yesterday would be sufficient; but, finding you are still here, those who watch have sent a token which will convince you of the danger."

So saying, she unfolded from beneath her robe a piece of maguey cloth, on which was depicted a figure, instantly recognised by the prince as intended for himself, with a line drawn across the centre of the face, while an arrow, to denote swiftness, a skull, signifying death, and a tall mitre or crown, emblematic of the king himself, told Hualco that this was indeed his death-warrant.

"And where could you procure this, maiden?" said the prince, completely bewildered by such tidings brought by such hands.

"The order was given to my—to Xicote, who is supreme judge of Tezcuco," said the messenger, holding out her hand to receive it again.

"But Xicote is among those who have forgotten their allegiance," said Hualco; "surely it is not from him that this warning comes?"

"It comes from a friend—from your friends, prince!" replied the damsel; "and I trust the unsuitable character of the messenger will not make it of no avail. They did as well as they could, and I am not at liberty to explain all!"

"Tell me, at least, lady!" said Hualco, who felt more and more certain that the trembling being before him was none other than the noble maiden of the forest; "tell me thy name, that I may know whom to thank for this perilous service!"

"Know me as one of the humblest of your servants, anxious only for your safety," said the messenger; and she bent low before the prince as she spoke, showing him again the never-forgotten outline which had haunted his dreams.

She turned to depart, but Hualco sprang after, and attempted to detain her.

"Stay but a moment!" he said; but the lady, in a voice seemingly choked with emotion or terror, exclaimed:

"Do not cause me to repent!"

And he let go her robe, suffering her to disappear as mysteriously as she had come; while he threw himself on a bank, more vexed that he was left in uncertainty as to her identity with the goddess of his recollections, than disturbed by the new persecution of his enemy.

He sought Atahualpa, however, and communicated to him the intelligence he had received. The old man concerned himself but little as to the messenger, whom he supposed from the description to be some faithful slave. He agreed with Hualco that it would be in vain to attempt escape when every avenue was guarded; and they concluded rather to rely on stratagem, when the moment of danger should arrive.

A large party, consisting of soldiers and others, made their appearance at Tezcutzinco, on the following morning, charged, as they said, with important messages from Maxtla. The prince and his tutor received them courteously, and ordered refreshments to be brought, upon which a sumptuous banquet, which had been previously prepared, was served in one of the immense saloons of the palace. Game of all sorts, with the delicious fruits and vegetables of the country, confections, and pastry, regaled the emissaries of the usurper; while pulque in abundance, and the scarcely less intoxicating tobacco, induced the travellers to prolong their repast, and to mingle with their conviviality the songs and dances with which such entertainments were wont to conclude.

Hualco was all attention to his guests, ever in the midst of them, and furthering their enjoyment in every way. After they had risen from the table, and the foaming chocolate—even then a favourite beverage with the Central Americans, to whom we owe it—had been served, it was proposed that the company should repair to another part of the palace, where some dramatic representations were prepared for their amusement. These consisted of a sort of pantomime by masked performers—a favourite pastime with these people, as with all others. In one part of the performance a burning censor was introduced, into which the principal actor threw such quantities of incense, that the whole room was obscured, and the spectators found themselves half suffocated with the dense perfume. When it dispersed, Hualco and his tutor were gone.

CHAPTER IV.

THIS last effort of the perfidious Maxtla—who, anxious to avoid a rupture with the Mexican monarch, had cloaked under various pretences his determination to destroy Hualco—proved favourable to the fortunes of the prince. The people, extremely discontented with the Tepanec rule, which they had contrasted with the far milder sway of their own sovereigns, were ripe for a general revolt; and their chiefs found, in this new demonstration of Maxtla's enmity, a reason for immediate action. Measures were therefore taken for the organisation of a force which should drive the intruder from Tezcuco, and set the young heir upon the throne of his fathers.

After a struggle, the arms of Tezcuco triumphed, as had been anticipated, and the usurper, humbled and dispirited, was left a prisoner in the hands of those who had every reason to detest him. Hualco was entreated to permit his vanquished enemy to be sacrificed to the gods, without delay for the people of Tezcuco, though of gentler tone than the surrounding nations, had not then renounced the horrid practice of human sacrifices. But the new king, though not superior to a feeling of strong resentment against Maxtla, and perhaps not slightly tempted to rid himself thus easily of one who seemed—for reasons which will soon be evident to the reader—the only obstacle between him and his dearest wishes, resisted the double impulse, and signified to those who importuned for the death of the usurper, his intention that the royal captive should be subjected to the sentence of the highest court of the kingdom. The people murmured, but, accustomed to absolute submission, forbore all open demonstration of their disappointment; and preparations were made for the holding of this solemn court, on the very day when Hualco was to be formally invested with the royal dignity.

The coronation of a monarch was always an occasion of great pomp; and the peculiar circumstances under which the new sovereign came to the throne—fresh from a splendid victory over the conqueror who had threatened to reduce Tezcuco for ever to the condition of a province—made him so much the popular idol, that the preparations for the ceremony were unusually magnificent. The chiefs flocked around their new-found king with their armed vassals, and the rich tribute in kind which contributed so much to the luxury of the royal residences. The national standard, bearing, in hieroglyphical symbols, the armorial ensigns of the state, embroidered in gold and feathers, floating from the *axoteas and pinnacles of the palace, while every great chief displayed his own, gave to the whole city the air of a carnival. Couriers were arriving every moment from distant parts of the kingdom, and even from the ocean, with gifts and offerings to enhance the splendour of the great event. All was excitement and exultation, while he to whom the whole was dedicated, depressed by a hopeless, yet intense passion, would gladly, if his inclination had only been consulted, have renounced the pomp of empire to bury himself in the forest glade, for the sake of the lovely Farahtzin. When the day arrived which was to behold the solemn recognition of the new sovereign, and to decide the fate of Maxtla, it might have been difficult to determine on which event the minds of the immense multitude that thronged every avenue of the city were most intently fixed.

The coronation took place in the morning, and the air was rent with the joyful acclamations with which the crowded streets received the announcement. But the ceremony was not complete without the sacrifices, which Hualco, although his soul detested such abominations, was unable to prevent; and previous to the sacrifice, must Maxtla's sentence be pronounced. The king, surrounded by all his real could furnish of power and grandeur, took his seat upon the golden throne, from which the judgments of the sacred tribunal were pronounced. Before him, upon a stand formed of military weapons—shields, quivers, bows, and arrows—was placed a human skull, on the crown of which gleamed an immense emerald, surrounded by a brilliant plume, ornamented by precious stones. The walls were hung with the rich tapestry peculiar to the country, festooned with gold rings, and covered with the figures of birds and animals, embroidered in the most glowing colours. Around the throne were placed the great lords of the kingdom, marshalled according to their rank.

In the midst of profound silence, the perfidious Maxtla was brought into the open space in front of the throne. His brow wore an air of haughty defiance, for he felt that his hour had come, and he scorned to implore the clemency of him whom he had pursued with so much rancour. He fixed his eye upon his youthful judge with an expression of the deepest hatred, while the king, rising from the throne, placed his left hand upon the skull, and raised in his right hand the golden arrow with which the whole breathless assembly waited to see him draw the fatal line across the face of a portrait intended to represent the prisoner, which had been placed near him for that purpose. What was the surprise—the dismay of all, when Hualco, breaking the arrow, held out his hand to his fallen foe, and pronounced his pardon with the words:

"A monarch may punish, but he must not revenge!"

The sullen nature of Maxtla scarcely permitted him to acknowledge with decency the grace that had been accorded him; and he retired from the presence amid the suppressed or half-murmured execrations of the assembly, to whom the clemency of the new sovereign was anything but agreeable. He passed from the palace into the crowded street—a herald proclaiming his pardon, and extolling the unmerited goodness of the king—just as the grand procession was forming which was to precede the court to the principal teocalli, where the sacrifices were about to commence. The astonishment and rage of the populace knew no bounds. A moment's pause, like that before the falling of the thunderbolt, was succeeded by shouts that shook the city to its foundations, and thousands, moving as one man, by one impulse, tore the unhappy captive from his guards, and, rushing with him up the broad stair of the teocalli, forced the trembling priests to begin with him the sacrifices which were to propitiate their gods.

CHAPTER V.

THE beautiful lady who had shown so much interest in the fate of Hualco, was the only child of the chief councillor, Xicote—a sort of Tezcuacan Polonius—whose worldly policy had induced him to adhere to the dominant interest, and to betroth his daughter to the usurper, for whose sake she was educated in seclusion, according to the custom of the country. It was thus that Hualco had met her in his wanderings; and it was owing to her high rank, and her position as the future wife of the sovereign, that she had been able—after she had half-unconsciously imbibed an interest in the royal wanderer—to find access to him under circumstances which would have made it impossible to another. Detesting Maxtia, yet knowing her fate inevitable, she believed herself but indulging a sentiment of womanly pity, when she interposed to save the young prince, whom fortune had first thrown in her way; but when she found herself at liberty, and this same prince a humble suitor at her feet, we need not wonder that she discovered in him all the excellencies which his fine face and gallant bearing had led her to imagine; not that Hualco, thus accomplished, and quite as much in love as ever, should be successful in his suit. His marriage with the charming Faraltzin afforded a new occasion of rejoicing to his people; and, through a long and happy life, the pupil of Atahulpa maintained the character which that excellent guardian had laboured to establish, and his history remains on record as that of the greatest and best monarch his country ever knew. He established wise laws—encouraged intellectual and scientific progress among his people, both by institutions of great magnitude, and by his own example—executed many costly works for the convenience and establishment of his capital—dispensed his immense revenues with the utmost munificence—brought agriculture to such perfection, that, during his reign, not a spot, however rude or inaccessible, was left uncultivated; and, above all, and what is most surprising, he not only discouraged the human sacrifices which were universal in that region, but built a temple “to the Great Unknown—the Cause of Causes,”—in which he allowed no image of any kind, saying:

* Terraced roofs.

“These idols of wood and stone can neither hear nor feel; much less could they make the heavens and the earth, and man the lord of it! These must be the work of the All-powerful Creator of the universe.”

SCIENCE.

NEW INVENTIONS, ETC.

NEW MOTIVE POWER.—A Dr. Carosio, of Genoa, has, it is said, succeeded in constructing an apparatus for the decomposition of water by the electro-magnetic current, the gaseous products of which he conveys into the cylinder of an engine, in lieu of steam, and thus saves the expense of fuel. Several scientific men and practical engineers have, it is stated, subscribed a sufficient capital to give the invention a fair and full trial.

To feed an ox to one thousand two hundred pounds' weight, usually takes five years; while the same weight of poultry can be made ready for the table in about three months, and at less than half the cost in food.

LACON'S BOAT LOWERING TACKLE.

In the ordinary mode of lowering a boat, it requires two men in the boat (one at each fall, to unhook), and on board the ship, two men to lower, and two men to clear the falls—no easy matter where the falls are little used, as, in the case of the largest merchant steamers, each fall is twenty-two fathoms, or 132 feet, long. Under any circumstances, it requires the greatest unanimity of action on the part of these six men; but this is not to be insured during periods of excitement and danger, and during dark nights. If one of the falls should be lowered too quickly, or if one of them should foul, or be accidentally let go, then one end of the boat having reached the water before the other, it is impossible for the men in the boat to unhook at the same time, and an accident must inevitably happen. Or, supposing that all has gone right on board the ship, and that, before the boat has reached the water, a sea should lift the stern of the boat, and unhook the after-tackle, then, as in the case of the Amazon, the boat would sheer across the sea before the people in her could unhook the fore-tackle, and they would thereby be washed out, and the boat would remain hanging by the bow; or if, in the act of lowering, a sea should strike the bow, and unhook the fore-tackle, then the fore-end would immediately fall down, and the people would be precipitated into the sea and drowned.

There is no reason why this operation of lowering a boat should be different from any mechanical operation of the like character. We see, in the every-day operations of raising a weight, that when the weight has attained the requisite elevation, the power is disconnected, and a break, or other analogous contrivance, is substituted, in order to regulate the descent. Why, therefore, should not the same plan be adopted in the case of boats which remain for a lengthened period at the requisite elevation, and which are only required on sudden emergencies? That the principle was acknowledged even by sailors themselves, might be shown in the case of the anchor. After the anchor has been elevated by means of the chain to the level of the water, a tackle, called the “cat,” is used, to raise it to the level of the deck. This is the power; and sailors know very well that, if they were to allow the same to remain, the anchor could never be used on sudden emergencies; they therefore substitute a single rope (called the “cathead stopper”), and remove the tackle. They remove the one tackle from the anchor; why, therefore, should they not remove the two tackles from the boats, which, it has been shown, in their use require the greatest unanimity of action?

In Mr. Lacon's method of lowering a boat this is proposed to be effected by a long bar, or rod of iron, with a barrel at either end, of a sufficient size to carry the requisite length of rope or chain, with a friction pulley and break in the centre. The ropes or chains are connected to the barrels in such a manner that they will support any amount of weight till the boat has reached the water, when they will unshipl, and disconnect by their own weight; by which means he prevents the possibility of the boat being dragged forward, capsized, or swamped, by the motion of the ship. By means of the friction break he enables one man to regulate the descent of the boat, and by means of the parallel action of the two barrels, he insures the boat's descending evenly upon the water. Some months ago, the Queen of the Belgians steamer made the trial off Folkestone, in a high gale of wind. He himself was on board. It was tried first with four men, and the boat was lowered safely whilst the steamer was going at full speed. Again it was tried with two men and Mr. Lacon, with equal success, notwithstanding a heavy sea was running high at the time, and the steamer was going at the rate of twelve and a half knots an hour.

A “CHINK IN THE SHUTTER.”

PERHAPS, gentle reader, you cannot form even a conception of what might be conveyed by my quaint-looking title. Fortunate you certainly are in that case; for there are few indeed whose lot has been one entirely of pleasantness, and it is to be hoped that there are fewer still who have not had occasionally bright glimpses let in upon their pathway. Among the latter I shall be sure to meet sympathisers, which is almost all that I desire.

Somehow or other, I have been always accustomed to associate in my mind the festivals of past years with that description of weather most in accordance with the particular circumstances in which I happened at such seasons to be placed. It was, as I recollect, a very stormy winter, that upon which my thoughts are at this moment occupied. I am not alone in remembering it as such; and, owing to the peculiarity of mind which I have just alluded to, I would prefer taking the opinion of others to depending upon my own. Indeed, it was no wonder that I should feel anything but comfortable. I had been foiled in a long-cherished project; I had failed in a commercial speculation; I had been crossed in love. Add to this slight catalogue, that I was far from any at whose hands I could look for sympathy, and that I was very poor. I repeat, that it was no wonder that my thoughts should take a dark hue, and that the weather should seem to be severe. Often have I had to endure much in silence, but seldom indeed so much as then.

It was Christmas Eve. The streets were crowded by parties running to and fro, engaged in the various pursuits of that happy and exciting season. I noted them not, or but slightly; and then only to contrast my own condition unfavourably with that of the humblest among my neighbours. Even those sunny specks in the past which everybody can look back at, were of no service to me, and I voted myself, without condition or reserve, the most unhappy of mortals; and, in such mood, I strolled about, silent, aimless, dissatisfied.

Turning abruptly round the corner of one of our principal streets, I was jostled by a burly, multi-coated, bemuffled individual, with a force which made me reel again. The street was slippery, too; and, after I had staggered back a pace or two, my head came in contact with a lamp-post, and I fell senseless. Some indistinct sounds about “lifting him” reached my ear, and then all consciousness fled. It was, indeed, a rather unusual kind of accident, but it happened, nevertheless.

Of course there was a great bustle in the street, and, as usual, every well-disposed person did precisely what was calculated to be of the least possible use under the circumstances. I have often remarked that those whose presence of mind would be of real service in contingencies of the kind, belong, as a general rule, to that highly respectable class of society addicted to passing on with a shake of the head, or crossing the way before they come up to the crowds that collect on these occasions. As for me, it mattered little what they said or did, for I was rambling about in a world all of my own creation.

I felt myself at first drop, as it were, into a deep well, the bottom of which was perfectly dry, the orifice by which I entered closing after me as I descended. In a moment I fancied that I was proceeding along a cave from which I could find no outlet, and into which no glimmer of light penetrated. All around was darkness, and silence unearthly. In vain I walked backwards and forwards, vainly I measured the breadth of my prison-house in paces, fruitlessly I essayed to reach with my hands the roof of my dungeon. My first sensations were those of chilling dread, mingled with some degree of vexation, and the latter increased momentarily. Baffled in obtaining a clue to my whereabouts, or even reasonable data whence to infer my position with any degree of exactness, I sat myself down in the centre of the cavern, and gave way to my reflections.

After all, I thought to myself, there was no great occasion to fret myself much upon what had happened. The whole world, I was satisfied, had leagued itself together for the destruction of my peace, and surely I ought not to lament the accident which had taken me out of its reach. It was now to be presumed that it had done its very worst, and I rejoiced in the contemplation that all would soon be over. I laughed outright at the idea.

To me it has always appeared that the genius of mirth and that of harmony, if not identical, are very closely related, and hence, nothing has, from my boyhood, seemed to grate upon my ear so harshly as an unmusical laugh. It is to me absolutely painful to listen to one. Judge, then, gentle reader, of my surprise and horror, when in the depths of that cavern I heard the sound of my own—a very combination of all the discordant jingles which it is possible for the imagination to grasp! It seemed to go forth to the further end of the cave, return by the roof and sides, increase in volume as it reached me, and, having sought out the remotest corners of the rear, again glide past me to the front. I could feel my flesh creep, and my hair stand on end, before it had passed me the second time; but as the horrifying din became stronger every instant, I plainly foresaw that a few minutes must render it intolerable. Under these circumstances I sought to obtain such relief as might be afforded me by placing my fingers within my ears; but even that comfort, trifling as it was, had been, I found, denied me. I was utterly unable to move a limb. I strove to speak, but my tongue clove to my palate, and I had a dry, burning sensation spread itself over me, even as if my blood had been changed, by some enchantment, to ashes. Powerless and horrified, it appeared to me as if I had become a breathing, feeling statue, doomed to dwell in that darkness, and listen to those sounds for ever. I longed—oh, how much I longed—for one drop of water—for one ray of light—for one moment's respite from those funereal noises! None of them came.

And then a change took place in the current of my thoughts; and even in the midst of my present desolation I recurred to my late condition as one which was not altogether so miserable as I had imagined it. All the cares, all the anxieties, all the difficulties of my past life, appeared unworthy of consideration when placed beside the agony which I then endured; and I was grateful for the many benefits which had been heaped upon me. There was comfort unspeakable in that reflection; I found my tongue loose itself—the healthful current seemed again to flow through my veins—the noises became hushed, and I sank into a peaceful slumber.

I knew at once, when I awoke that Christmas morning, that something uncommon had happened to me, but whether of good or evil, my senses were as yet in too confused a condition to collect. That I was at home, in my own small bed-room, was clear to me. I knew it by the curtain-pattern—the only one of the kind I had ever seen, but, with the quaint outline of the extraordinary plant represented on which, I was, nevertheless, right well acquainted. In point of fact, that old plant—which belonged to no classification ever attempted, and which pretended to belong to none—that old plant and myself were friends, and I could not be mistaken in it. And so I concluded I must be at least at home. The soreness which I felt at the back of my head, told still another portion of the night's history, but the rest was mystery. Outside my window I could hear footsteps passing and repassing, and I could hear, also, the voices of merry children as they went past, discoursing of pastimes in prospect, and the expenditure of gift-money. There was light in the apartment, too, and the struggling beam that shone through the shutter-chink appeared to me so delightful. It was not, it is true, a broad, manly light, such as a full-grown window might be supposed to afford—only a small stripe, a thin slice of Creation's Christmas cake, sent to cheer the heart of the desolate one.

Throwing back the curtain to enjoy it properly, I saw that out of doors there was sunshine, and the recollection of my dream for the first time occurring to me, since I became conscious, my feelings of fortitude were revived at the sight. But I saw more than that. I saw such beautiful little fingers inserted in that same chink, and the shutter-leaf gently laid back, and then I saw the light fall upon features that were indeed dear to me.

“Heavens, Louisa! You here?”

“Even so, my dear, dear Edward!”

It was even so. She had not been heartless enough to desert me because of my difficulties, as I had too rashly concluded, but had come to fulfil her promise to me, notwithstanding the failure of my projects; and had just arrived in time to see me borne home insensible, on the previous evening. But I must not now fatigue myself, and I should learn all presently.

And so I did. The speculation had not been such a failure, after all, and Louisa's friends, now that it was impossible to help it, became reconciled to us; and I have never been lonely since.

“But you must have had a terrible dream that night, Edward—you struggled so violently.”

“A terrible dream, indeed, my love, and yet I often think that I would endure another night's darkness at any time, if I were only certain to have light break in at last through such a Chink in the Shutter!”

A WORD ABOUT WEDLOCK.

WHEN Socrates was asked whether it were better for a man to marry or remain single, he made answer:

“Let him take which course he will, he will repent of it!”

The reply is similar to that of the youth who, being asked which of two very bad roads to a certain place was the least bad, cried out:

“Take either, and before you get half way, you will wish you had taken the other.”

This kind of talk does very well for satirists. Heaven knows, too, that there have been unhappy marriages enough to “give occasion” for a little “talk.” But the wedded state is altogether a better state than it is reputed to be. We suppose that one man out of—say five or six, is really happy in his domestic relations. Looking upon the other side of the picture, we may find one confirmed bachelor out of fifty, contented with his loneliness. This, we think, a fair estimate. With woman it is different, and there are strong reasons why there should be a difference in this matter, as it regards her. She is more domestic than man. Seldom diversions can fill that place in her heart which only household duties, loves, and cares, were designed to fill. Besides, she has not that freedom to seek diversions that man has. A happy marriage is a far greater good to a woman of soul, than to any man; and it is doubtful if one among a thousand old maids, is to be envied by her wedded sisters.

For young persons, everything depends upon a proper understanding of the relations of marriage, and of each other, before exchanging vows at the altar. Courtship is usually a mere school of deception. Jane prefers that John should know as few of her faults as possible before marriage—no matter how many afterwards. She dresses and puts on unaccustomed smiles to receive him. Thus the Jane he loves and the Jane he weds, prove to be two quite different persons. The former was angelic, the latter is altogether human. The life of the sweetheart is a brilliant surface; that of the wife, a substance, dark, and full of imperfections. The lover is no more candid than the mistress. What is the natural result? Bitter disappointment.

Even where a good understanding exists before marriage, and the bride and bridegroom have been wise enough to give each other a fair insight into their true characters, they are apt to expect too much. They forget that there are anything but fruits and flowers in the paradise they are entering. For stones and briars they are in no way prepared. It would seem that they should learn from those around them, since every youth and maiden must have more or less experience with the married. But every man fondly believes himself to be an object of peculiar favour with fortune.

His case is exceptional. His ambition aims at what was never reached by married mortals, and if he be no philosopher, the failure will taste of gall. "I compared notes with one of my friends who expects everything of the universe," says Emerson, "and is disappointed when anything is less than the best; and I found that I begin at the other extreme, expecting nothing, and am always full of thanks for moderate goods." Would that all young persons could learn to enter the sacred ground of wedlock with this philosophic spirit! But they will not—nor ever will. Hope is too sweet for them. They will not stoop till they stumble. Lofty expectation hovers over the precipice of disappointment, towards which so many of our married friends have been lured, until too late to save themselves from tumbling down.

FACETIÆ.

"JOHN, either you or I must quit this house." "Very well, sir," said John; "where will your honour be going to?"

"It has been remarked, that ladies have generally a great fear of lightning, and this has been superficially ascribed to their natural timidity; but the truth is, that it arises from their consciousness of being attractive."

The individual who broke the ice with his maiden speech, was drowned by applause.

An Irishman never truly enjoys himself, unless he can manage to get up a bit of a row. "Past eleven o'clock, and no fight yet," said an Irishman, at Doneybrook fair; "will any gentleman just tread on the tail o' me coat?"

THERE is something very conducive to longevity in holding office. To make a man live till eighty, all that's necessary is to give him a salary of ten thousand a year.

It would require several horses to draw all the strings of a piano-forte to concert pitch, the strain upon them, when in perfect tune, being about seven tons.

USE OF A WIFE.—Richter says, "No man can either live piously or die righteously without a wife." A very wicked bachelor of our acquaintance says to this, "O yes! sufferings and severe trials purify and chasten the heart."

"EREMINE" EXTRAORDINARY.—Should Mr. Disraeli ever be promoted to the House of Peers, it is but reasonable to conclude that his style of dress would be that of an Upper Benjamin.

A NEW READING.—Barry Cornwall says, that, "song should breathe of scents and flowers." Well and good; but it would be as well at times if writers would make songs breathe of sense and flowers.

PERTINENT.—It has been asked when France—which is being constantly fleeced by dynastic changes, will become thoroughly threadbare. The probability is, when the Nap is off!

CON. FOR THE MILLION.—Why ought the people of England to acquire wealth under the present government? Because the ministers give the nation the benefit of all their talents.

A young lady in Albany was lately married to Mr. William Tongue. Isn't she Tongue-tied? We hope she will be happy and hold her Tongue many a long year.

OUR friend Lucius Hart tells a capital story of the ingenuity exercised by a little boy, in calling attention to his first pair of new boots. The little fellow would draw up his pantaloons, and display the whole of his boots; then walk up and down the room, with eyes now on the shining leather, and now upon a friend of his father's, who was present; but it was a bootless effort. At length, however, he succeeded. Sitting in front of both, he exclaimed: "Father, aint three times two, six?" "Yes, my son." "Well, then," said he, pointing to each of their feet, "if three times two is six, there's just six boots in this room!"

WHY is a successful merchant like a needle? Because he's got an eye for business.

NATURAL MAGIC.—A pretty girl.

"IKE," said a rusty old heathen of the desk, "how do astronomers measure the distance to the sun?" "Why," replied the young hopeful, "they guesses at one-fourth the distance, and then multiplies by four."

SAVAGE.—Theodore Parker said, in a recent sermon on the "Power of the Human Will." "To this day, the dead hand of John Calvin holds New England Orthodoxy by the throat!"

LOOK AT THIS—AND THEN FAINT.—It is said that "Uncle Tom's Cabin" was not written by mortal hands. Of course not, seeing that it was written by Mrs. Beecher's toe.

A returned Californian says, he lived for ten days on the broth he made of an old door-mat.

MR. LE FUSKY, a Parisian perfumer, has discovered a beautiful rouge, which has the singular quality of being indelible, but at the same time natural. Once put on, it cannot be effaced, except by the process of nature, and ladies using it should be cautious how they apply it. The ladies of Paris, it is said, are so afraid of it, that they have an artist to do the painting for them.

A SHARP WIT.—An Indiana wit says that, during a trial in Lawrenceport, a young lad, who was called as a witness, was asked if he knew what was the obligation of an oath, and where he would go if he told a lie. He said he supposed "he would go where all the lawyers went to."

ONE proof of the increased prosperity of Ireland is, that the lawyers are all grumbling at the decline of their business.

MR. GARDINER, a celebrated musical amateur, gave £10 for a tooth of Shakspeare. After it had been in his possession about fourteen years, he exhibited it one evening to a celebrated surgeon, who discovered that it was the tooth of a calf! However, as it cost so much money, the virtuoso still retains it, and will not be persuaded that he was imposed upon.

SUETT'S JOKE.—"The candles you sold me last were very bad," said Suett, to a tallow-chandler. "Indeed, sir, I am very sorry for that." "Yes, sir; do you know they burnt to the middle, and would then burn no longer." "You surprise me; what, sir, did they go out?" "No, sir, no; they burnt shorter."

AN Irish half-pay colonel, named Stack, obtained an interview with the Duke of York, seeking promotion to the rank of major-general. On being introduced to the Commander-in-chief, he was honoured with the expression of the duke's usual politeness, and the customary question, "Well, colonel, what can I do for you?" "I perceive, your grace," replied Stack, "that there is a brevet coming out, in which I hope to be included. I am the senior colonel in his majesty's service." "True, Colonel Stack; but give me leave to ask you, of what religion are you?" "I am of the religion of a major-general!" The duke bowed, and Stack was gazetted.

QUITE A DIFFERENCE.—The Springfield Republican mentions that a clergyman and advocate of the Maine Law recently stopped at an hotel in that city, and, on being shown into his room, ordered the waiter to bring up some drinking water. A tumbler of "coloured beverage" was brought. Suspecting that it was not a glass of pure Adam's ale, the reverend gentleman cautiously protruded the tip of his tongue, till it came in contact with the suspected article, and instantly shouted, with great indignation: "Waiter! why did you bring me this stuff?" "Did you not order it, sir?" asked the waiter. "Order it? no! I told you to bring me some drinking water!" "Oh," responded the waiter, "I misunderstood you! I thought you told me to bring some drink, in water!"

INTERESTED FRIENDSHIP.—The grandfather of the late Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland was a great humorist, and used frequently to divert himself with a village fool, or "natural," called Will Spears. One day Will met his lordship in the avenue leading to Eglinton Castle; but the peer, being in a brown study, passed his brainless acquaintance without recognition. Proceeding on his way, the "natural" found a bone, and, sitting down on the bank, commenced lunching on the same. Lord Eglinton, shortly afterwards retracing his steps, came up to Will Spears, and, being now aware of his presence, saluted him with his wonted cordiality, exclaiming: "This is a fine day, Will, my man!" Will had not forgotten the supposed cut which he had so recently experienced: he glanced suspiciously at his lordship, and, holding the half-polished bone behind his back, observed, in a sneering and half-reproachful tone: "Ay, ay! folk hae plenty o' freens when they hae any thing to gie!"

LETTERS FROM HAYTI.—The Emperor Souloque lately caused a sound thrashing to be administered to an unfortunate Frenchman, who, in endeavouring to enlighten the empress as to the value of the notes of the pianoforte, ventured to assert that the Blacks were worth only half as much as the Whites.—Diogenes.

VERY APPROPRIATE.—It is proposed to alter the name of the "Australian Royal Steam Navigation Company," to the "Australian Royal Sub-marine Navigation Company."—Ibid.

MUCH ADO ABOUT NOTHING.—The newspapers are all writing, and statesmen are all debating, as to the talked-of partition of Turkey, and how it ought to be divided. Why don't they buy the "Hand-book of Carving," which would tell them how to divide or cut up any kind of poultry?—Ibid.

LEGAL.—What is the difference between a Queen's Councillor and a Queen's Counsel? One makes the law, and the other mutilates it.—Ibid.

THE GOLDEN NUMBER.—We noticed the other day a tailor's advertisement commencing: "Every well-dressed man knows how difficult it is to find a tailor who thoroughly understands the peculiarities of each figure." True; but there is one figure all our tailors fully understand, and that is Number 1.—Ibid.

"WELCOME, LITTLE STRANGER."—A project is on foot to establish a Free Library in the City. We are delighted to hear it: such libraries can never be more free than welcome.—Ibid.

WHY ought the bishops to begin to display symptoms of the greatest disgust at the conduct of the present government?—Because, come what may, they seem determined to put the screw on every see.—Ibid.

A PRIME JOKE.—A capital joke occurred lately, which has set all Paris laughing and talking. A large crowd had assembled in the Rue d'Argenteuil, near the Palais Royal, in consequence of a thief detected in the act of robbing a house having succeeded in reaching the roof, where it was dangerous to follow him. The man, who had on a blouse, but was without shoes, was seen to move about for some time, as if seeking a window through which to escape, and at last he disappeared altogether. Meanwhile a detachment of soldiers was sent for, and they blocked up all issues from the house; some firemen were also sent for, who went on the roofs, but they arrived just as the man vanished. The military, firemen, and crowd waited for two hours, and then a commissioner gave the following laconic letter to the sergeant who was in command: "Brave Sergeant,—Do not fatigue your men any longer by making them wait for me; when you receive this letter I shall be a long way off. In visiting the house next to that in which your men are, you will see how I escaped—nothing was more simple. After having passed from one roof to the other, I opened the window of a chamber, which I found to be nicely furnished. I found, in a box placed under the bed, a great coat and a pair of varnished leather shoes; and, after having put them on, I went away by the porte cochère, which the two curious porter left free. I talked a few moments with you, and told you that you would have a good deal of trouble in catching the thief. I said thief, for I confess that, having found a 100*fr*. note, and 100*fr*. in gold, in the trunk, with the coat and shoes, I could not resist the temptation of taking them." The statements of this letter having been ascertained to be exact, the soldiers were sent home, and the crowd dispersed. The secret police have commenced a strict search after the man.

STORY OF A HUMORIST.

WELL, I have seen your friend, and find him to be exactly what you described him as being—a humorist. He seems to have imparted much of that character to everything around him. His servants are all admirably disciplined to second his whims, and his very furniture is, for the most part, adapted to the same purpose. This put me upon my guard, and there was hardly anything in the room that I did not touch with apprehension. No trick, however, was practised upon me; and, as I found subsequently, I was indebted for such indulgence to one which was reserved for me at night, and which was such as perhaps all my English phlegm would not have enabled me to bear with patience. I escaped, however, being put to the proof, by the merest accident—the arrival of a poor Irish surveyor, who was thought a fitter subject for the often repeated experiment.

The Irishman was treated with extreme hospitality; he was helped to everything to excess; his glass was never allowed to stand, full or empty, for one minute. The potatoes were suspended until, and only while the cloth was laying for supper, during and after which, they were resumed with renovated energy. Our entertainer was like the landlord described by Addison: the liquor seemed to have no other effect upon him than upon any other vessel in the house. It was not so with this Irish guest, who was by this time much farther advanced upon the cruise of intoxication than half seas over.

In this state he was conducted to his chamber—a fine, lofty Gothic apartment, with a bedstead that seemed goeveal with the building. I say seemed; for that was by no means the case, it being in reality a modern piece of structure. It was of dark mahogany, with its four posts extending completely to the ceiling of the chamber. The bed, however, was not more than about two feet from the floor, the better to enable the party to get into it. The Irishman, with a good deal of assistance, was soon undressed, and had his body deposited in this place of repose. All the party then retired, wishing him good night, and removing the candle, for fear of accidents.

When the door was closed, I was for the first time made acquainted with the structure of the bedstead, which our host considered as his masterpiece. Upon the touching of a spring, outside the door, the bed was so acted upon by a pulley, that it ascended slowly and smoothly through the four posts, until it came within two or three feet of the ceiling. The snoring of the Irishman was the signal for touching the spring, and he was soon at the proper altitude.

The servants required no instructions how to act. In one moment the house was in an uproar; cries of "Fire! Fire!" were heard in different directions. A pile of shavings was set in a blaze opposite the window where the poor Irishman slept. The landlord's voice was continually heard, exclaiming, "Good heavens! save the poor Irish gentleman, if possible; the flames have got into the room just under him!"

At this moment, we heard him fall, and bellow out. A sudden silence took place—every light was extinguished, and the whole house seemed to be buried in the most profound repose. The Irishman's voice could alone be heard, roaring out, in the high dialect of his country, for assistance.

At length, two of the men-servants, in their shirts, entered the room, with a candle just lit, and yawning, as if just aroused from their first sleep. They found him sprawling on the floor.

"Oh dear, sir, what is the matter with you?"

"Matter!" says he; "why, isn't the house on fire?"

"Not at all, sir."

"What was the reason of the cries of fire, then?"

"Bless you, sir, you must have been dreaming; why, there's not so much as a mouse stirring, and his honour and the whole family have been asleep these three hours!"

The Irishman now gave up all credit in the testimony of his own senses.

"I must ha' been dreaming, indeed, and ha' hurt myself by falling out of the bed."

"Hurt yourself, sir!—not much, I hope, the bed is so low;" and by this time it had been made to descend to its first level.

The poor Irishman was quite confused; quite ashamed at disturbing the family; begged a thousand pardons; accompanied the servants to the door, closed it after them, and was once more left in the dark.

But the last act of the pantomime was not performed. The spring had been immediately touched upon closing the door, and the bed was soon beyond the reach of our guest. We could hear him groping about, and uttering frequent ejaculations of astonishment. He easily found the bed-posts, but it was in vain he would endeavour to get in. He moved his hands up and down. His leg was often lifted by way of getting in, but always encountered the floor upon its descent. He uttered exclamations of surprise, not loud, but deep, for fear of again disturbing the family. He concluded himself to be in the possession of some evil spirit.

In short, when it was found, by his silence, that he had given up the task as hopeless, and had disposed of himself upon one of the chairs, the bed was allowed to slide down again; and, in the morning, he could not but express his astonishment at not being able to find it in the dark.

GEMS OF THOUGHT.

A good book is the best of friends—the same to-day, and for ever.

MEN scanning the surface, count the wicked happy; they see not the frightful dreams that crowd a bad man's pillow.

THE COMPANION TO CHOOSE.—The most agreeable of all companions is a simple, frank man, without any high pretensions to an oppressive greatness; one who loves life, and understands the use of it; obliging alike at all hours; above all, of a golden temper, and steadfast as an anchor. For such a one we gladly exchange the greatest genius, the most brilliant wit, the profoundest thinker.

A mother once asked a clergyman when she should begin the education of her child, which, she told him, was then four years old. "Madam," was the reply, "you have lost three years already. From the very smile that gleams over an infant's cheek, your opportunity begins." —Bishop of Norwich.

CELESTIAL LOVE, with the affections of good and truth and the perceptions thence derived, and at the same time with the delights of these affections and the thoughts thence derived, may be compared to a tree with beautiful branches, leaves, and fruits: the life's love is that tree, the branches, with the leaves are the affections of good and truth with their perceptions, and the fruits are the delights of the affections with their thoughts.—Swedenborg.

GOETHE says: "Our desires are the presentiments of the faculties which lie within us, the precursors of those things which we are capable of performing. That which we would be, and that which we desire, present themselves to our imagination, about us, and in the future: we prove our aspiration after an object which we already secretly possess. It is thus that an intense anticipation transforms a real possibility into an imaginary reality. When such a tendency is decided in us, at each stage of our development a portion of our primitive desire accomplishes itself, under favourable circumstances, by direct means; and in unfavourable circumstances, by some more circuitous route, from which, however, we never fail to reach the straight road again."

MISCELLANEOUS.

STATISTICAL.—A man who is seventy years old, has spent twenty-three years of his life in bed, and five years at table!

REMARKABLE TREE.—A very remarkable tree was many years ago discovered growing on the Island of Ferro, or Hierro, one of the Canaries. The island is a dry and barren spot, affording no water except what is supplied in a surprising manner by the Fountain Tree, which grows there, and distils water from its leaves in such plenty, as to answer all the purposes of the inhabitants. This tree, as regards the history of the Canary Islands, is the only one the natives have. One of a similar kind is said to be in the Island of St. Thomas, in the Gulf of Guinea.

TAKE CARE WHAT YOU SAY BEFORE CHILDREN.—It is always well to avoid saying everything that is improper; but it is especially so before children. And here parents, as well as others, are often in fault. Children have as many ears as grown persons, and they are generally more attentive to what is said before them. What they hear they are very apt to repeat; and as they have no discretion, and not sufficient knowledge of the world to disguise everything, it is generally found that "children and fools speak the truth." See that boy's eyes glisten while you are speaking of a neighbour, in a language you would not wish to have repeated. He does not fully understand what you mean, but he will remember every word; and it will be strange if he does not cause you to blush by the repetition.

MARCH OF SURGICAL SKILL.—Leopold, Duke of Austria, the same who imprisoned our Richard Cœur de Lion, met with an accident. His horse fell under him, and crushed his leg. The surgeons said that the limb must be amputated, but none of them knew how to amputate it. Leopold, in his agony, laid a hatchet on his thigh, and ordered his servant to strike with a mallet. The leg was cut off, and he died of the gush of blood. Such was the end of that powerful prince. Why there is not now a bricklayer who falls from a ladder in England, who cannot obtain surgical assistance infinitely superior to that which the sovereign of Austria could command in the 12th century.—Macaulay.

INTERESTING PRECOCITY.—It once happened that an anxious mother asked Mrs. Barbauld at what age she would begin to teach her children to read. "I should much prefer that a child should not be able to read before five years of age," was the reply. "Why, then, have you written books for children of three?" "Because, if young mammals be ever busy, they had better teach in a good way than a bad one." I have known clever, precocious children at three, dunces at twelve, and dunces at six, particularly clever at sixteen. One of the most popular authoresses of the present day could not read at seven. Her mother was rather uncomfortable about it, but said that, as every person did learn with opportunity, she supposed her child would do so at last. By eighteen this apparently slow genius paid the heavy but inevitable debts of her father, from the profits of her first work, and before thirty, had published thirty volumes.

ANTIPATHY TO CAPS.—Some ladies seem to have an abhorrence, and a very just one, too, of wearing caps. When one considers for a moment that women wear the long hair which nature has given them, both for an ornament and to keep the head warm, one is apt to wonder by what perversion of taste they can be induced to inclose it in a cap: a mob cap, a lace cap, a high cap, a low cap, a flat cap, a cap with ribbons hanging loose, a cap with ribbons tied under the chin, a peak cap, an angular cap, a round cap, and a pyramid cap. How would Canova's Venus look in a mob cap? If there be any ornament to the head in wearing a cap, it must surely be a false ornament. The American ladies are persuaded that the head can be ornamented without a cap.

OLD MAIDS.

I am a lover of all womankind,
And maidens old are not old maids to me—
Though beauty flies, there still remains the mind.
And mind is surely better company!
What though the harp be new, and trimmed with gold
Does sweeter music tremble in its tone,
Than when the gaudy polish has grown old,
And nought is left but sweet accord alone?
Or is the gem held in less high esteem,
Because the casket is defaced by time?
A woman's mind a priceless gem I deem—
Her heart a harp that music yields sublime:
No wonder, then, that years hide not from me
The jewel's glow—the harp's sweet melody.

THE LATE MR. TURNER, R.A.—He never allowed a picture from his pencil to be sold by public auction without sending some person to bid for it; and his wishes on this subject were so generally known, that auctioneers made a point of calling his attention to the catalogue whenever they had any of his pictures for sale. If time pressed, and he was unable to attend in person, he would sometimes, but rarely, intrust his commission to the auctioneer; his ordinary practice was to send some agent, with written instructions, to bid in his behalf, and he was not always very fastidious in his selection. At the sale of the pictures of Mr. Green, the well-known amateur, of Blackheath, two pictures by Mr. Turner were among the most attractive lots, though neither important in size nor of his best time. In those days their market value might have been about eighty guineas each. They would, however, have been knocked down for considerably less, but for the impetus given to the biddings by one of Mr. Turner's agents, whose personal appearance did not warrant the belief that he was in search of pictures of a very high order. He was, in fact, a clean, ruddy-cheeked butcher's boy, in the usual costume of his vocation, and had made several advances, in five-guinea strides, before anything belonging to him, excepting his voice, had attracted Mr. Christie's notice. No sooner, however, did the veteran auctioneer discover what kind of customer he had to deal with, than he beckoned him forward, with a view, no doubt, of reproving him for his impertinence. The boy, however, nothing daunted, put a small piece of greasy paper into his hand—a credential, in fact, from the painter himself. The auctioneer smiled, and the biddings proceeded.

IMPERIAL HONOURS.—The Emperor Nicholas breakfasts on a cup of tea and a rusk; dines on a collet, a culet or a chop, with a bisquit and a glass of sherry and water. In the evening he takes a cup of tea. He suffers from an internal disease, and is obliged to be abstemious. Then what is the use of being an emperor, after all? With a table loaded with every luxury, with cellars stocked with the choicest wines, he is obliged to live as moderately as a man with an income of £100 a year. He can make laws for his subjects as he pleases; but nature has made a law that is as binding upon him as upon the meanest serf in his dominions. He may put to death those who disobey his laws, but he disobeys with equal peril those under which he lives. A good appetite, and health to make its gratification safe, would be poorly exchanged for imperial honours. The best gifts of God are free to all his creatures. The free air of heaven, the pure water that springs from the earth, taste as freshly and as sweetly to the poor man as to the rich. Exercise invigorates him, sleep refreshes him, the beauties of nature delight him as well; and, in this happy country, at least, the power of intellectual and moral improvement is as great. As humanity progresses, the difference between an emperor and a common man shows less and less.

EDUCATION FOR THE LOWER CLASSES.—We train up our poor in the way they should not go. We cannot give them leisure, yet leisure is the balance-weight they would need, for the sort of instruction we afford them. And this is more especially the case with the female part of our population. As long as our school-girls answer more readily to such questions as, Where is Kamschatka? How do the Laplanders prepare their food? What is a fixed star? Who is Prince Albert? What is death said to ride in the Revelation? How much is 426 times 1247? Instead of the more natural interrogations: What are the habits of an English labourer? How much flour and suet will make a pudding for six persons? How many yards of cotton or linen will cut into six shirts? What remedies would you apply if a child were seized with croup, and no medical help at hand? English education for the lower classes is at fault. We teach a smattering of subjects we ourselves find it extremely difficult to master and commit to memory, though we have what the poor have not, the habits of thought, and the luxury of leisure; and then we send them into the world, to begin lives of manual exertion, daily privation, retail purchases, and cottage industry: where every farthing wasted and lost is a drop of the poor man's blood drained away. Having taught them what is a fixed star—who is Prince Albert—how dead bodies were embalmed in Egypt—and what is the meaning of doubling a promontory—we are amazed they cannot keep house for John Diggory. We are amazed that they cannot lay by like the ant, build like the beaver, and rear their broods as easily as chickens: we raise an angry outcry at the "stupid improvidence of the poor;" whereas it is often the stupid improvidence of the rich. We sow tares, and we want to reap wheat.—Stuart of Dunleath, by the Hon. Mrs. Norton.

LAUNCHING OF A SHIP.—The real interest of a ship-launch commences when the men lie along under the vessel to "give her a rally"—that is to drive in a number of wedges, to ease the ship off the blocks under her keel. A couple of hundred men may be about the ship in this work, and, at the voice of the leading man, every one of them strikes his wedge, at the same instant gradually raising the ship, and producing a sound like muffled thunder. The centre blocks are then removed, and the shores taken away from the sides of the ship. The ship is now ready for launching, and the master shipbuilder and his friends stand on a platform at the head of the vessel. The men place themselves down each side of the "ways," the signal "Out oakum" is given, and immediately the oakum, which has kept the dust from the grease, is removed. "All out, sir," is the response. "Out keys" is the next command, and as quickly as in the former case the men remove some small pieces of wood, which have been placed down the ways to assure them that all continues true. Again the men respond, "All out, sir," and they hasten from the sides of the ship. The whole interest is now in the daggars, both of which the master shipwright sees, "Out chisels," "Out small toms," "Down daggars," follow in rapid orders, and the ship is freed from her restraints. A bottle of wine from the fair lady breaks on the ship's head, she glides down the ways, and the ship is launched.

LINES WRITTEN IN AN ALBUM.

BY EDWIN WAUGH.

Ah! this wild voyage o'er the sea of life
Needs all the help that heaven and earth can give;
Through its dark storms, and shoals, and battle-strife,
God must be pilot to the ships that live.

Happy the heart that finds a haven of love,
Where, in the tempest, it can sweetly moor,
And taste below the bliss that but above
Is ever stainless, and is ever sure.

And bless the hearth where pure affections glow,—
The husband's and the father's best retreat;
Where heavenward souls in one direction grow,
With darling tendrils twining from their feet.

Such be thy home, through earth's mutations strange,
A garden where the flowers of heaven grow;
And sheltered there from blight, through every change,
Its loves, its hopes, no touch of ruin know.

May Time, whose withering finger ever hies
To nature's best, the doom of sure decay,
Float over thee with gently-fanning wings,
And find thy twilight hour of life decay.

And ever hand-in-hand, along your path,—
For thee and thine, thus doth the poet pray,—
That ye may walk in joy through life to death,
And earth's night be the dawn of heaven's day.

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

A BRIDESMAID asks, "Is it the bride or the bridesmaid who has the privilege of cutting the wedding-cake at breakfast?" We should say the bride, but if too agitated, as would be very likely, then the bridesmaid must perform that delicate office for her.

UNE FILLE.—The phrase "foaming Pacific" sounds oddly, but as that ocean sometimes flies into a rage, like its sister, the Atlantic, we presume it must be accepted as correct, although a contradiction.

C. CLAUDE.—We cannot assist you. Love ought to laugh at locksmiths. But the honourable course would be, as you have obtained the lady's consent, to apply for that of her parents.

DUKE OF N.—In point of law, all the inhabitants of England form the constituent body of the Church of England; but in point of fact, scarcely a moiety does. Baptism, confirmation, and communion are the visible signs of membership.

ROSE BUD.—The gentleman (?) is a scamp. Dismiss him from your presence with scorn and loathing. Love you, indeed! Why he is your bitter enemy. A beast of prey would use you more gently—it would devour you. This wretch would torture you, and cover you with shame. He is a leper. To touch his hand is moral contamination.

RETLAW.—Young ladies are not so candid as young gentlemen. "No" sometimes means "yes." Depend upon it she loves you, or she would not make you her confidant. As to the other matter, follow her some day, with a horsewhip in your hand, and stop the annoyance at once. Men who insult women are always cowards.

ROWLAND.—A will is not a will until the testator's death, and then it must be proved within six months afterwards. A copy may be obtained from the registrar of the court in which it was proved.

H. R. H.—A married man should insure his life within three months after his marriage. Some of the insurance offices grant policies securing weekly payments during sickness, &c. Peruse the assurance advertisements in the daily and weekly Times.

WAIT.—Only petty spite. The conductors of those periodicals are envious of our success. Our circulation is the largest of any publication in the world. That accounts for the "stabs" so dark aimed at us occasionally, but the thrusts are frantically wide. When we know that the public prefer our periodical before any other, we are satisfied the public consider it the best, and in that assurance we rest serenely contented.

A. B.—Touching warts with lunar caustic will remove them, but the skin is discoloured. Try the following: Boil half a dozen roots of the common yellow dock for ten minutes, in half a pint of white-wine vinegar, strain it, and after washing the hands in pure water, and drying them well, rub the liquid over the parts affected, allowing it to dry in. This should be repeated morning and evening, for a week or ten days.

X. X.—The exact number of troops Napoleon took with him to Russia is not known. Sir Walter Scott, who had access to official records, gives the following estimate of the men the great warrior lost in his expedition to Russia:

Slain in Battle	125,000
Died from fatigue, hunger, climate, &c.	132,000
Prisoners	193,000
	450,000

What a prodigious waste of human life! But we fear we shall have to witness massacres on as gigantic a scale.

SHYLOCK thinks Burns's immortal "Scots wha hae," &c., begins too abruptly. He proposes the following introduction. It's so funny that "faith we'll prent it."

On Bannockburn King Edward lay,
The Scots they were not far away;
They both did long for break of day,
To beam on Bannockburn.

At length the sun lit o'er the heath,
That lighted up the field of death;
Then Bruce, with soul-inspiring breath,
His heroes thus address'd:

"Scots wha hae," &c., &c.

H. N.—Memory may be strengthened by referring single facts and observations to one simple principle—so that we can easily remember the principle by remembering the fact, or the fact by remembering the principle. Thus, if we were to prove that democracy leads to despotism, we may refer to Julius Caesar, Cromwell, and Bonaparte.

A STONEMASON puts forth the most substantial reason we ever saw or heard in defence of the moustache. He says, that if worn by masons, it would prevent the fine dust from settling on the lungs, which so much injures and shortens the duration of the working mason's life. The evils arising from this dust are known only to those who are in the habit of working stone or slate. The dust from the latter is more injurious, being of a much finer kind than that of stone. He says a young fellow-workman of his died lately, and on a post mortem examination of the body, it was discovered that the lungs were charged with slate dust. Medical men are agreed that in cold climates the moustache is a warm friend to the nasal organ.

EMMELINE.—A cast in the eye may be cured by a very simple contrivance. Place a pasteboard tube before each eye, so that when it looks it can only see through the tube, and perceive objects by looking straight. In time it will acquire the habit of looking straight, just as it acquired the habit of squinting.

E. T. E.—Wedding-cards should be sent to all the grown-up members of a family residing in the same house. But it is generally considered that a card sent to the parents, means to include the daughters in the compliment. The etiquette observed in leaving visiting-cards is, that should there be daughters or sisters residing with the lady called on, the corner or corners of the card may be turned down, to signify that the visit is meant for them also.

ADAM BOND.—The law of lunacy will be revised and amended very shortly, but under the law as it stands, the disqualification as to wills, on the ground of lunacy, is founded on the natural incapacity of an idiot to exercise such a degree of understanding as constitutes volition. An idiot, or natural fool, is one who has had no understanding from his birth, and is therefore deemed in law never likely to attain any. He is undoubtedly an idiot who has so little sense as to be unable to number twenty, or to tell his age, or to answer any plain, common-place questions. But a man is not an idiot who has any glimmering of reason; so that he can tell his age, know his parents, and the like. If any one attempt to call in question, or overthrow a will, on account of any supposed insanity, or "want of memory," as it is technically termed, in the testator, he must prove such impediment to have existed previous to, and at the date of the will. A man is not incapacitated from making a will because he is foolish or eccentric in his manners. The law will not scrutinize into the depth of a man's capacity, particularly after his death, if he was able to conduct himself reasonably in the common course of life. A man's capacity may be limited, his manners eccentric, and he may have many very foolish propensities; but he is not therefore excluded from the power of disposing of his property by will. And we may add, that as every person making a will is presumed to be of sound understanding until the contrary be proved, the proof lies on the other side.

SAMUEL A. R.—Habitual tobacco smoking is injurious. It is death to the youthful. It softens the brain and the muscular tissues, weakens the nerves, and brings on consumption and a hundred other diseases. It affects lean people more than it does those who are naturally inclined to be stout.

GOOD JIMMY.—The Americans adopted the eagle for their coinage, as an emblem of strength, courage, and freedom. The Austrians, Prussians, Russians, and French use the eagle—so that as an emblem it has been sadly soiled.

STUDARS.—Procure prospectuses of the leading Scottish assurance companies. To secure £100 at death, a person in his twenty-first year would have to pay about £110s. annually.

W. G.—The cannon-balls supplied chiefly to her Majesty's Navy, weigh respectively 4 lbs., 12 lbs., 18 lbs., 24 lbs., 32 lbs., 40 lbs., 56 lbs., 64 lbs., 86 lbs., and a few heavier.

J. O. S.—As a general rule in law, sixty years' undisturbed possession of land is sufficient to prove the title to it—but there are exceptions. Under a power of appointment, a legal right may extend long over that term.

DOUGLAS.—The personal property which a wife possessed before marriage, or came to her afterwards, all belong to her husband. You are evidently in a position to sue the executors, but as you would have to employ a solicitor to do that, you had better place your case in the hands of one at once.

R. W.—An acknowledgment of the receipt of a wedding card is not compulsory. The sending such a card is an invitation to continue or renew an acquaintance, which of course the recipient may decline.

HENRY STANTON.—An apprentice under no circumstances can demand his deed of apprenticeship from his master; but, at the expiration of the term, it is customary to hand him the document, with an indorsement upon it, stating that he had faithfully performed the agreement.

ALFRED WEBB.—An Act of Parliament cannot be considered a guarantee for the safety of any joint-stock company. When Parliament gives its sanction to a scheme, it does not take upon itself any responsibility for the liabilities. As to the insurance company you inquire about, you had better be guided by the judgment of a shrewd, respectable solicitor.

A. H. H.—It is lawful for a person to marry his aunt's half-sister.

FITZ-HORACE.—We admire your "Sonnet to a Faded Rose."

Sweet rose, untimely 'reft of beauty's glow!
Methinks I read upon thy wither'd leaves
A tale that recollection oftentimes weaves,
When memory recalls some frail one's vow.
This flow'r once on a sunny border grew;
Lovely in fragrance, with no rival near:
A stranger came—'t caught his ardent view—
And culld the rose, beside his heart to wear.
There fondly cherish'd was the little gem;
Careless, admird'—(but, oh, love's proffer'd sigh!)
'Twas only severed from its genial stem.
To charm awhile, then left alone to die.
So faded beauty on the forlorn cheek,
Beguiled, and left an early grave to seek.

EDWARD HIND.—Poets are queer mortals. They fancy composers have the gift of second-sight, and are able to read every villainous scrawl placed in their hands. You must improve your calligraphy, for you have only yourself to blame for the substitution of an applicable word for one that no person could read without much trouble.

M. E. J.—The metropolitan daily papers charge for the insertion of announcements of births, deaths, and marriages; but the provincial newspapers make no charge. Space in the London press is too valuable to be given away.

AMY is anxious to know how to cure her husband of smoking immediately after breakfast, which is the annoyance of her and pets. If the pets are not the pets the husband loves to see clambering about the knees of a wife, we rather think Amy ought not to grumble. If she indulges her whim, why should not he be his? But if the pets are bona fide "wee toddling things," Amy has a right to complain—no gentleman should smoke before dinner. It is a nasty, lazy, foreign habit, and we are sorry to see it becoming so prevalent in England. There is no cure—it must wear itself out, like every other bad habit.

STUDIO.—When ladies painted, which we regret to say they once did, an inch thick, they adopted black patches, to conceal moles and blotches. Afterwards black patches became a mania. It originated among the ladies of the court of Louis XIV.

HENRY ASHTON.—It is said that a person who has what is called "no ear" for music, will never be a proficient but we do not believe it. Everything is possible to perseverance, and, as music exists, not only in the higher, but lower grades of creation, we think it quite possible that any man or woman may be educated to sing or play correctly. The passion and sentiment are foreign considerations.

CLARA. being deeply fond of a farm-house, feels persuaded she would make for a young farmer a very happy home. She is tall, of fair complexion, and lively disposition. The husband of her choice must be tall, dark, and good-tempered, and not object at some future time to emigrate to the south of Britain.

PIERS WHITTAKER responds to the matrimonial wish of "Ellen," and would be happy to correspond with her. He is tall, rather light-complexioned, twenty-three years of age, considered good-looking, and possessed of considerable property.

LIVE AND LET LIVE. a country tradesman, aged twenty-five, of gentlemanly appearance, five feet seven inches in height, with dark hair and whiskers, and generally considered good-looking, would be happy to correspond with "Red Rose."

CELEBS. a gentleman both by birth and education, will be happy to correspond with "Ave Maria." He is a professional man, thirty-four years of age, five feet eleven inches in height, dark in complexion, of lively and agreeable manners, and generally considered handsome. He moves in very good society, and thinks that Ave Maria has not, in her description, done justice to her attractions.

AMY thinks, from the description, that "W. D." would be just the young man she could love, and would like to marry. She is eighteen years of age, the daughter of a solicitor, fair in complexion, with brown hair, round face, a rosy colour, and very nice figure.

SINCERITY has expressed a wish to correspond with "Hope." She is an heiress and an orphan, twenty-three years of age, tall, fair, blue-eyed, and very pretty.

CECILIA, wanting a husband, thinks she is in every way calculated to make "Herbert" a happy man. She is air, beautiful, and highly educated, a thorough musician, in her twenty-first year, and moves in a superior sphere of life.

ELLA requests a snug little corner in the columns of our Journal, where she could make known her wish to meet with that vara avis a well-educated, steady, intelligent, and gentlemanly man, not less than twenty-eight years of age, who seeks in a wife an affectionate disposition, with industrious and domesticated habits, rather than wealth and beauty—for of neither can she boast, being simply one of those every-day sort of people, who might pass through a crowd without remark. Belonging to the middle class, she would not wish to descend in the scale of society, although her ambition is to have a cheerful home, with a kind and intellectual companion in it, who would not object to a little music occasionally, of which she has a slight knowledge.

CAMBYSES begs to offer himself to the notice of our fair correspondents. He is tall in stature, light-complexioned, with brown hair and whiskers, blue eyes, fine teeth, and possesses an income of £240 per annum, together with a small estate on which he resides.

A. M. is desirous of forming an acquaintance, with a view to marriage, with a young man of respectability, upon whose affections she might rely. She is twenty, tall for her sex, with blooming features, beautiful dark hair, splendid white teeth, and straight, graceful figure. She would prefer a young, professional gentleman.

SARAH, a tall, dark girl, twenty years of age, thinks she might suit "Frank Wilton." She understands music, is domesticated, has very respectable relations, and her mother, her only surviving parent, lives independent.

DON SEBASTIAN would be happy to cultivate the acquaintance of either of the sisters "Fanny" or "Amelia." As his own circumstances are sufficient for the maintenance of two, he seeks only, in the object of his choice, mental worth, and a gentle, confiding disposition. His age is twenty-five, he is handsome and accomplished, and would make both a faithful and affectionate husband.

A. Z. presents his compliments to "Marguerite," and begs to inform her that he should be most happy to correspond with her. He is a bachelor, aged thirty-four, tall, fair-complexioned, and certainly considered very good-tempered. His profession is that of the church. He has a small country parish of his own, with a fixed life income of about £300, with further expectations. His parish is situated close to a large town in the south of England, in which there is the best society. He adds, that he belongs to the old-fashioned and easy, not the modern, straight-laced school of divines.

LETTERS RECEIVED.—Miss E. D. (The "Exile's Wish," is creditable both to your head and heart, but the length of the lines is an objection).—D. B. D. W. D. (Persevere).—W. M. (If you wish to make love to "Miss E. B.," why don't you go at once to her, and make a clean breast of it? In courtship there is a great difference between modesty and timidity).—Snowdrop (Consult a Gazetteer).—A. B. Stockport (The answer of the agent was correct).—Wm. Pipe (Apply to Bethlehem Hospital, London).—D.R. (We really cannot take the trouble to read any more "Welling-ton" effusions. The hero is dead and buried).—Edwin (The enlargement of this Journal commenced with No. 420, which was the first number of a new volume—so that it did not interfere with the binding of the previous volume).—Hy. Lane (The "Lives of the Queens of England," commenced in No. 387 of this Journal).

—G. N. (Order the numbers through an agent).—Fanny (Pretty, but too irregular for publication).—T. M. T. (The stations of every ship in the Royal Navy, are published in the WEEKLY TIMES newspaper, at the beginning of every month).—Mrs. Thomas Sandars (We respectfully decline the offer).—Richard Vain (Put an advertisement in the daily Times).—Ann Eliza Edwards (Search the "Law List").—A. B. C. (The second marriage was illegal, and the man is liable to be prosecuted for a very grave offence).—A Well Wisher (Apply at the Royal Navy Depot, Liverpool).—S. Bowden (Search the list of unclaimed dividends kept at the Bank of England).—Mars, Junior (May congratulate himself upon not being tall enough to be food for powder).—E. K. (We never made any such promise. Read the original announcement, and judge for yourself).—Mrs. Wilson (Declined. We made the LONDON JOURNAL ourselves, and do not require assistance from any one who, like you, would step forward after the hill had been climbed, and proffer services in such terms as, "perceiving the very elevated tone that periodical is assuming, would be very happy, &c., if agreeable, &c., to supply a series of." &c.).—B. Smitten (Yes).

—A Poor Yorkshireman (The landlord cannot compel you to repair the house).—Edward Draper (We were aware that the incident of Eliza's escape, in "Uncle Tom's Cabin," was founded on fact. The novelists of England, France, and America, borrow their incidents, in many cases, from the newspaper press).

—L. M. (The mark signifies dollars).—Ellen Lily (The law of England does not legitimise the birth of a child born before the marriage of the parents; but, in Scotland, the post-nuptial ceremony does place the child in the same position as it would have been if born after marriage).—Forty-two (Breaking a window is an expensive freak, or accident, when the party is inclined to be vindictive. Magistrates do not hear summonses for nothing).

—Trendside ("Mechanics Institution" is correct, and sounds better).—Horatio Sara (Walker's Pronouncing Dictionary, latest edition).—J. ("Eliza" is a contraction of "Elizabeth").—R. S. (Very well written, but it is hazardous to attempt anything that way, after Thompson's immortal invocation, "Hail! gentle spring, ethereal mildness come!")—J. B. K. (Both the questions would be decided by the custom of the county or district, or the general custom of the country).—Edward R. (Wearing belts round the loins is considered advisable in some cases. Tailors wear belts, because they could not work so freely if they wore suspenders).—Jane Cecilia (A remarkably pretty style of handwriting. Our fair correspondent, we should think, was a very clever girl).

—S. B. (Order from the news-agent).—T. B. (The "Adventures of Ferdinand, Count Fathom," by Smollett, is not read now. It was a stupid, filthy book).—Q. D. C. (We cannot say we admire the lines, but they are not so very faulty).—H. C. (Appointments in the Navy are not purchased—they are presented by the Admiralty; but it requires great influence to obtain one).—Petronille Angelique (All the works of Sir Walter Scott, and the majority of the dramas of Shakespeare, may with propriety be placed in the hands of young persons).—R. W. (Johnson's definition of the word "cockatrice," is about the best).—Uncle Tom (Should the ballot be had recourse to, substitutes will be allowed in the militia).—B. K. (Pray have some consideration for us. One question at a time is sufficient).

—J. H. K. (Consult some work on "Australia").—T. B. (A list of all the brethren is kept at the Trinity House).—The Snowdrop (The "French Lessons," commenced in No. 312, and were concluded in No. 402 of this Journal).—D. C. (At a mathematical instrument maker's).—S. L. W. (See the book advertisements in the daily press).—A. S. P. (Apply at Heralds' College. The fees are only a few shillings).—Kitty (The town residence of the Arch bishop of Canterbury, is Lambeth Palace).—J. W. (The "Windy Day," is a promising attempt).—W. H. (All letters addressed to us are treated as strictly confidential. The moment they are answered, they are destroyed).—J. B. B. (You must have the desks made expressly for you).—J. G. (Order from the news-agent).

—Isabella G. (We regret that we cannot assist you. We rather dislike such trifles as "Enigmas" and "Charades." We think them not only childish, but great promoters of idleness).—Robert Allen. Spes Amoris. J. E. J. Annie. O. S. H. Miss E. G. W. Perry. N. G. Susanah. Mina. Theresa. Veritas. A. A. Mercedes and Valentino. Ed. Fell-Chance. Resolve. M. S. L. J. S. P. Augustus Stafford. T. S. Fanny and Emily. O. S. Vincent. J. M.C. Lovely Rose. Egerton. John Jackson. Mary Robinson. Cassy and Annette. Libra. J. Morris. Walter. Bachelorship. The Village Muse. E. M. L. W. S. W. W. F. C. S. J. E. T. Icent. Blanche and Madeline. B. C. and D. T. C. S. T. P. Hope. Ellen. E. M. Lizzy. Z. Z. Z. Henry de Corby. J. L. Henry Truman. E. A. M. Arthur ap G. Matthew Taylor. M. J. L.

—J. H. K. (Consult some work on "Australia").—T. B. (A list of all the brethren is kept at the Trinity House).—The Snowdrop (The "French Lessons," commenced in No. 312, and were concluded in No. 402 of this Journal).—D. C. (At a mathematical instrument maker's).—S. L. W. (See the book advertisements in the daily press).—A. S. P. (Apply at Heralds' College. The fees are only a few shillings).—Kitty (The town residence of the Arch bishop of Canterbury, is Lambeth Palace).—J. W. (The "Windy Day," is a promising attempt).—W. H. (All letters addressed to us are treated as strictly confidential. The moment they are answered, they are destroyed).—J. B. B. (You must have the desks made expressly for you).—J. G. (Order from the news-agent).

—Isabella G. (We regret that we cannot assist you. We rather dislike such trifles as "Enigmas" and "Charades." We think them not only childish, but great promoters of idleness).—Robert Allen. Spes Amoris. J. E. J. Annie. O. S. H. Miss E. G. W. Perry. N. G. Susanah. Mina. Theresa. Veritas. A. A. Mercedes and Valentino. Ed. Fell-Chance. Resolve. M. S. L. J. S. P. Augustus Stafford. T. S. Fanny and Emily. O. S. Vincent. J. M.C. Lovely Rose. Egerton. John Jackson. Mary Robinson. Cassy and Annette. Libra. J. Morris. Walter. Bachelorship. The Village Muse. E. M. L. W. S. W. W. F. C. S. J. E. T. Icent. Blanche and Madeline. B. C. and D. T. C. S. T. P. Hope. Ellen. E. M. Lizzy. Z. Z. Z. Henry de Corby. J. L. Henry Truman. E. A. M. Arthur ap G. Matthew Taylor. M. J. L.

—J. H. K. (Consult some work on "Australia").—T. B. (A list of all the brethren is kept at the Trinity House).—The Snowdrop (The "French Lessons," commenced in No. 312, and were concluded in No. 402 of this Journal).—D. C. (At a mathematical instrument maker's).—S. L. W. (See the book advertisements in the daily press).—A. S. P. (Apply at Heralds' College. The fees are only a few shillings).—Kitty (The town residence of the Arch bishop of Canterbury, is Lambeth Palace).—J. W. (The "Windy Day," is a promising attempt).—W. H. (All letters addressed to us are treated as strictly confidential. The moment they are answered, they are destroyed).—J. B. B. (You must have the desks made expressly for you).—J. G. (Order from the news-agent).

—Isabella G. (We regret that we cannot assist you. We rather dislike such trifles as "Enigmas" and "Charades." We think them not only childish, but great promoters of idleness).—Robert Allen. Spes Amoris. J. E. J. Annie. O. S. H. Miss E. G. W. Perry. N. G. Susanah. Mina. Theresa. Veritas. A. A. Mercedes and Valentino. Ed. Fell-Chance. Resolve. M. S. L. J. S. P. Augustus Stafford. T. S. Fanny and Emily. O. S. Vincent. J. M.C. Lovely Rose. Egerton. John Jackson. Mary Robinson. Cassy and Annette. Libra. J. Morris. Walter. Bachelorship. The Village Muse. E. M. L. W. S. W. W. F. C. S. J. E. T. Icent. Blanche and Madeline. B. C. and D. T. C. S. T. P. Hope. Ellen. E. M. Lizzy. Z. Z. Z. Henry de Corby. J. L. Henry Truman. E. A. M. Arthur ap G. Matthew Taylor. M. J. L.

—J. H. K. (Consult some work on "Australia").—T. B. (A list of all the brethren is kept at the Trinity House).—The Snowdrop (The "French Lessons," commenced in No. 312, and were concluded in No. 402 of this Journal).—D. C. (At a mathematical instrument maker's).—S. L. W. (See the book advertisements in the daily press).—A. S. P. (Apply at Heralds' College. The fees are only a few shillings).—Kitty (The town residence of the Arch bishop of Canterbury, is Lambeth Palace).—J. W. (The "Windy Day," is a promising attempt).—W. H. (All letters addressed to us are treated as strictly confidential. The moment they are answered, they are destroyed).—J. B. B. (You must have the desks made expressly for you).—J. G. (Order from the news-agent).

—Isabella G. (We regret that we cannot assist you. We rather dislike such trifles as "Enigmas" and "Charades." We think them not only childish, but great promoters of idleness).—Robert Allen. Spes Amoris. J. E. J. Annie. O. S. H. Miss E. G. W. Perry. N. G. Susanah. Mina. Theresa. Veritas. A. A. Mercedes and Valentino. Ed. Fell-Chance. Resolve. M. S. L. J. S. P. Augustus Stafford. T. S. Fanny and Emily. O. S. Vincent. J. M.C. Lovely Rose. Egerton. John Jackson. Mary Robinson. Cassy and Annette. Libra. J. Morris. Walter. Bachelorship. The Village Muse. E. M. L. W. S. W. W. F. C. S. J. E. T. Icent. Blanche and Madeline. B. C. and D. T. C. S. T. P. Hope. Ellen. E. M. Lizzy. Z. Z. Z. Henry de Corby. J. L. Henry Truman. E. A. M. Arthur ap G. Matthew Taylor. M. J. L.

—J. H. K. (Consult some work on "Australia").—T. B. (A list of all the brethren is kept at the Trinity House).—The Snowdrop (The "French Lessons," commenced in No. 312, and were concluded in No. 402 of this Journal).—D. C. (At a mathematical instrument maker's).—S. L. W. (See the book advertisements in the daily press).—A. S. P. (Apply at Heralds' College. The fees are only a few shillings).—Kitty (The town residence of the Arch bishop of Canterbury, is Lambeth Palace).—J. W. (The "Windy Day," is a promising attempt).—W. H. (All letters addressed to us are treated as strictly confidential. The moment they are answered, they are destroyed).—J. B. B. (You must have the desks made expressly for you).—J. G. (Order from the news-agent).

—Isabella G. (We regret that we cannot assist you. We rather dislike such trifles as "Enigmas" and "Charades." We think them not only childish, but great promoters of idleness).—Robert Allen. Spes Amoris. J. E. J. Annie. O. S. H. Miss E. G. W. Perry. N. G. Susanah. Mina. Theresa. Veritas. A. A. Mercedes and Valentino. Ed. Fell-Chance. Resolve. M. S. L. J. S. P. Augustus Stafford. T. S. Fanny and Emily. O. S. Vincent. J. M.C. Lovely Rose. Egerton. John Jackson. Mary Robinson. Cassy and Annette. Libra. J. Morris. Walter. Bachelorship. The Village Muse. E. M. L. W. S. W. W. F. C. S. J. E. T. Icent. Blanche and Madeline. B. C. and D. T. C. S. T. P. Hope. Ellen. E. M. Lizzy. Z. Z. Z. Henry de Corby. J. L. Henry Truman. E. A. M. Arthur ap G. Matthew Taylor. M. J. L.

—J. H. K. (Consult some work on "Australia").—T. B. (A list of all the brethren is kept at the Trinity House).—The Snowdrop (The "French Lessons," commenced in No. 312, and were concluded in No. 402 of this Journal).—D. C. (At a mathematical instrument maker's).—S. L. W. (See the book advertisements in the daily press).—A. S. P. (Apply at Heralds' College. The fees are only a few shillings).—Kitty (The town residence of the Arch bishop of Canterbury, is Lambeth Palace).—J. W. (The "Windy Day," is a promising attempt).—W. H. (All letters addressed to us are treated as strictly confidential. The moment they are answered, they are destroyed).—J. B. B. (You must have the desks made expressly for you).—J. G. (Order from the news-agent).

—Isabella G. (We regret that we cannot assist you. We rather dislike such trifles as "Enigmas" and "Charades." We think them not only childish, but great promoters of idleness).—Robert Allen. Spes Amoris. J. E. J. Annie. O. S. H. Miss E. G. W. Perry. N. G. Susanah. Mina. Theresa. Veritas. A. A. Mercedes and Valentino. Ed. Fell-Chance. Resolve. M. S. L. J. S. P. Augustus Stafford. T. S. Fanny and Emily. O. S. Vincent. J. M.C. Lovely Rose. Egerton. John Jackson. Mary Robinson. Cassy and Annette. Libra. J. Morris. Walter. Bachelorship. The Village Muse. E. M. L. W. S. W. W. F. C. S. J. E. T. Icent. Blanche and Madeline. B. C. and D. T. C. S. T. P. Hope. Ellen. E. M. Lizzy. Z. Z. Z. Henry de Corby. J. L. Henry Truman. E. A. M. Arthur ap G. Matthew Taylor. M. J. L.

—J. H. K. (Consult some work on "Australia").—T. B. (A list of all the brethren is kept at the Trinity House).—The Snowdrop (The "French Lessons," commenced in No. 312, and were concluded in No. 402 of this Journal).—D. C. (At a mathematical instrument maker's).—S. L. W. (See the book advertisements in the daily press).—A. S. P. (Apply at Heralds' College. The fees are only a few shillings).—Kitty (The town residence of the Arch bishop of Canterbury, is Lambeth Palace).—J. W. (The "Windy Day," is a promising attempt).—W. H. (All letters addressed to us are treated as strictly confidential. The moment they are answered, they are destroyed).—J. B. B. (You must have the desks made expressly for you).—J. G. (Order from the news-agent).

—Isabella G. (We regret that we cannot assist you. We rather dislike such trifles as "Enigmas" and "Charades." We think them not only childish, but great promoters of idleness).—Robert Allen. Spes Amoris. J. E. J. Annie. O. S. H. Miss E. G. W. Perry. N. G. Susanah. Mina. Theresa. Veritas. A. A. Mercedes and Valentino. Ed. Fell-Chance. Resolve. M. S. L. J. S. P. Augustus Stafford. T. S. Fanny and Emily. O. S. Vincent. J. M.C. Lovely Rose. Egerton. John Jackson. Mary Robinson. Cassy and Annette. Libra. J. Morris. Walter. Bachelorship. The Village Muse. E. M. L. W. S. W. W. F. C. S. J. E. T. Icent. Blanche and Madeline. B. C. and D. T. C. S. T. P. Hope. Ellen. E. M. Lizzy. Z. Z. Z. Henry de Corby. J. L. Henry Truman. E. A. M. Arthur ap G. Matthew Taylor. M. J. L.

—J. H. K. (Consult some work on "Australia").—T. B. (A list of all the brethren is kept at the Trinity House).—The Snowdrop (The "French Lessons," commenced in No. 312, and were concluded in No. 402 of this Journal).—D. C. (At a mathematical instrument maker's).—S. L. W. (See the book advertisements in the daily press).—A. S. P. (Apply at Heralds' College. The fees are only a few shillings).—Kitty (The town residence of the Arch bishop of Canterbury, is Lambeth Palace).—J. W. (The "Windy Day," is a promising attempt).—W. H. (All letters addressed to us are treated as strictly confidential. The moment they are answered, they are destroyed).—J. B. B. (You must have the desks made expressly for you).—J. G. (Order from the news-agent).

—Isabella G. (We regret that we cannot assist you. We rather dislike such trifles as "Enigmas" and "Charades." We think them not only childish, but great promoters of idleness).—Robert Allen. Spes Amoris. J. E. J. Annie. O. S. H. Miss E. G. W. Perry. N. G. Susanah. Mina. Theresa. Veritas. A. A. Mercedes and Valentino. Ed. Fell-Chance. Resolve. M. S. L. J. S. P. Augustus Stafford. T. S. Fanny and Emily. O. S. Vincent. J. M.C. Lovely Rose. Egerton. John Jackson. Mary Robinson. Cassy and Annette. Libra. J. Morris. Walter. Bachelorship. The Village Muse. E. M. L. W. S. W. W. F. C. S. J. E. T. Icent. Blanche and Madeline. B. C. and D. T. C. S. T. P. Hope. Ellen. E. M. Lizzy. Z. Z. Z. Henry de Corby. J. L. Henry Truman. E. A. M. Arthur ap G. Matthew Taylor. M. J. L.

THE LONDON JOURNAL:

And Weekly Record of Literature, Science, and Art.

No. 429.—VOL. XVII.]

FOR THE WEEK ENDING MAY 14, 1853.

[PRICE ONE PENNY.]

[APPREHENSION OF WILL SIDELER, AT CROMWELL HOUSE.]

THE WILL AND THE WAY.

BY THE AUTHOR OF
"THE JESUIT," "THE PRELATE," "MINNIGREY," ETC.

CHAPTER LXXXV.

Although the ear be deaf, and will not hear,
There is a voice in conscience which appeals
Unto the heart of guilt. A still, small voice,
Which, like the mountain streamlet, wears its way
Over the hardest rock. HEIR OF THE SEPT.

WHEN Red Ralph let fall the door of his trap—as he designated the entrance to the subterranean passage in which he had so cleverly caught the warren—the ruffian found himself plunged into comparative obscurity. The only rays of light which found their way into the cold, damp recess, were from a species of tunnel, about twenty feet long, cut in the crown of the vault, and terminating in an iron grating directly under one of the windows in the great hall—a contrivance intended, doubtless, for the purpose of ventilating the place.

This tunnel, even if Will Sideler had been able to reach it, was far too small for him to pass through; and, being of stone, defied all attempts at enlargement. The uncertain light, or rather darkness visible, which it admitted, only served, as the eyes of the prisoner became accustomed to it, to increase the horror of his situation.

Foul, slimy, nameless, hideous things, such as are engendered in darkness and humidity, were creeping along the damp, uneven walls of his prison; and more than once, as he lay upon the ground, groaning with the agony of his bruised limbs, or venting his impotent rage in bitter blasphemies and curses, the warren felt the cold and bloated toad crawl lazily over his face.

The disgust occasioned by the contact with these odious reptiles, did more to allay the storm of passion and fever of his blood, than the obscurity and solitude around him—for as yet he had not felt their terrors; the voice of humanity was yet fresh in his ear, and the light of heaven familiar to his eye.

When reason, tottering on the verge of insanity, shrieks for aid, and not even an echo responds to its despairing cry—when the scanty light which penetrates the prison walls only serves to make solitude more apparent—then it is that man feels the full horror of being abandoned by his fellow-man, and the overfraught heart and busy brain turn, like the scorpion's sting, to prey upon themselves.

"My usual luck!" muttered the hardened wretch, with an impious curse at his ill-fortune. "My leg is all but broken, and I am bruised in every limb by that infernal fall! First, Meeran Hafaz finds the strength, and then this brat discovers the means to baffle me. No matter! Patience! patience! Perhaps I may one day be even with them both!"

The low, hissing, serpent-like voice in which he pronounced the word "patience," betrayed how very far he was from feeling the virtue he invoked.

The warren listened for a few minutes, in the expectation of hearing the door of his prison raised—but all continued silent. Not even the echo of a footfall could he distinguish in the chambers above. His heart began to sicken, and his brain to be overcast by the approach of those thick-coming fancies, which precede alike madness or the grave. His eye gradually lost its confident expression, and his manner became more and more restless.

"Would I had never left Carrow!" he kept muttering to himself! "Would I had never left Carrow—I have known nothing but misfortune since! The instant I get free from this den, I will return; but not," he added, with a ferocious expression of countenance, "till I have twisted the neck of the young rascal who has played me this pretty trick!"

Full of this praiseworthy resolution, Will Sideler resolved to await, as calmly as possible, the return of the boy—who had only gone, as he imagined, in search of assistance, to release him from his present uncomfortable position. He did not—would not imagine that Ralph could leave him to pass the night there with no other companion than the toad or rat, without food or water—the damp, fetid earth his only pillow.

He was sadly mistaken. So far from feeling for his condition, the urchin, as he sauntered along the road to London, had a serious debate within himself, whether, as the old fellow, as he believed, had broken his leg by the fall, it would not be wisest to let him die quietly in the hole, and say nothing about it. He knew that the rats would soon materially shorten his sufferings.

The decision which he finally came to, of telling everything which had occurred, was conditional. It depended upon his meeting with Joe Beans; for Red Ralph had not the same confidence in the lawyer.

As the day closed in, the subterranean passage became more and more obscure, till at last the prisoner was unable to discern the toad, crawling in disgusting proximity to his person, or the slimy, creeping things upon the walls.

Sideler, who was half benumbed by cold and pain, was startled from the sullen stupor into which he had fallen, by the scampering of numerous feet upon the floor, and the short, hurried squeak peculiar to the rat, when either surprised or enraged. He recollected that it was about the hour of high water, and that the rising tide would drive swarms of these ferocious vermin from the banks of the river to the vaults and cellars of the houses upon its banks.

"If they do not come to release me soon," exclaimed the ruffian, with an oath, "they will only find my bones!"

The voracious animals at first were doubtless dismayed at the presence of the warren in their usual place of retreat—for nearly an hour elapsed before they ventured to approach him; gradually, however, this timidity vanished, and one or two, bolder than the rest, began to spring at his legs. These he easily shook from him; but, as their numbers increased, he found the task more difficult.

Fortunately, he remembered that he had a phosphorus bottle in his pocket, and a small dark lantern, which he had procured to enable him to find his way, at all hours of the night, about the house. To light it was the work of an instant.

As the warren turned the bull's eye upon the corner of the vault, he discovered between fifty and sixty rats, herded together like a pack of hounds. Some were in the act of disappearing in the burrows which they had formed in the interstices of the walls, by scratching out the mortar; others were timidly staring at him; whilst the largest of them stood upon their hind legs, and faced him.

One grey-headed old fellow, who seemed the leader of the party, sprang at the lantern with the ferocity of a terrier dog, and, had not Will Sideler held it firmly, must have dashed it from his hand.

"I must kill them," thought the prisoner, "or they will destroy me!"

Full of this conviction, he looked round the floor of the passage for some implement to assist him in the work of destruction. The only thing he could discover was a bar of iron, which had fallen from the opening above: it had originally been intended as a support to the trap-door; several similar ones were still remaining. Armed with this, he fell upon his enemies; but, before he could destroy many of them, they disappeared in their holes. Several times, during the night, he was compelled to resort to the same means to rid himself of their attacks.

The light appeared to alarm the animals even more than the assault which the warrener had made upon them. It was a fortunate thing for him that it lasted till the morning, when the rays of the rising sun penetrated his prison, by means of the contrivance we have already described.

Whether it was that his eyes had become more accustomed to the place, or the day was brighter, Will Sidelor saw much more distinctly the second than on the first day of his captivity.

Could the ruffian have seen himself, he would have been startled at the change which had taken place in his appearance. His eyes were wild and bloodshot, and his features haggard in the extreme; he felt devoured by thirst and fatigue, but dared not sleep; for he could distinctly see the heads of the rats peering out of the holes at him, as though they were impatiently counting the hours when, from inanition, he should become their prey.

The grey-headed one, who had sprung so boldly at the lantern, eyed him, he fancied, with a mocking expression, which seemed to say:

"Strive as you will, our feast is only postponed!"

"They will be off soon," he thought, "in search of food; and then I may venture to snatch a few minutes' sleep!"

Contrary to his expectation, they did not stir. To judge from the squeaking and scampering which he heard in their burrows, the number of his enemies seemed to increase rather than diminish: instinct told the ferocious animals that they would soon have a feast, and they awaited patiently the appointed time.

As their hunger increased, several of them ventured from their holes, and approached—cautiously at first—towards their prey: they would pause, and fix their keen little eyes upon him with a reproachful expression, as he imagined, for keeping them so long waiting for their dainty meal. Gradually they became bolder and bolder; and the wretched man was once more obliged to use his weapon to defend himself from their attacks. As these were renewed, the animals became more numerous; and Will Sidelor saw that the hour was fast approaching when he would have to defend his life against the fury of his hungry assailants.

Leaving the ruffian a prey to the well-merited terrors of the prospect of being devoured alive, it is time we returned to the office of Mr. Elworthy, where we left Red Ralph and our readers' old acquaintance, Joe Beans.

"And so, my man," said the lawyer, "you are quite certain that the late occupiers of Cromwell House have left the place?"

"Ees, quite!"

"All?"

"All except t' old un."

"Whom does he mean by the old un?" demanded Mr. Elworthy.

Joe replied by naming the warrener.

"He, then, has been left behind?"

The boy nodded in the affirmative, and grinned and laughed at Joe, in whom, as we before observed, he had much more confidence than in the lawyer.

Henry's friend saw that something had occurred which Ralph was determined to impart to him alone. He had already seen enough of the urchin to feel assured that it would be useless to attempt to make him speak plainly in the presence of a second party.

Whilst he was considering how he should proceed, one of the clerks brought a note for Mr. Elworthy, marked "immediate." The old gentleman read it with surprise.

It was from the governor of Newgate, to inform him that the ex-butler to Lady Mowbray, who had been committed on a charge of robbing his late master, Captain Elton, begged most earnestly to see him.

"What the dence can the fellow want with me?" said the lawyer, as he passed the note to Joe.

The young man suggested that possibly he might be inclined to turn evidence against his mistress. At all events, he recommended Mr. Elworthy to lose no time, but proceed to the prison at once, and, by way of precaution, to take a magistrate with him.

"Good!" said the old gentleman, as he left the room; "that young man would have made an excellent lawyer: pretty notions of business—very pretty, indeed!"

With this commendation—which, considering the peculiar bent of the speaker's mind, was about the highest he could bestow—Mr. Elworthy started upon his visit to Newgate, not forgetting to call upon his friend, the magistrate at Bow Street, by the way.

"Well, Ralph," said Joe Beans, as soon as they were alone, "you can speak plainly now."

"Speak I speak what?" demanded the boy.

"What you came purposely to London to tell me," replied the young man; "for I am not such a simpleton as to imagine that you came all the way from Mortlake merely to tell Mr. Elworthy and myself that you had nothing to tell us!"

"Then heest a cute chap!" exclaimed the urchin, with a grin of intense admiration; "a deal 'enter than lawyer, tho' he does carry a good-headed stick, like doctor, and talk so fine, loike. What does 'ee think?"

"What should I think?" indignantly inquired Joe.

"I ha' got un!"

"Got who?"

"The old un," said the boy, with a hearty chuckle;

"you know who I mean; the chap that wanted to kiss the pretty lass at Cromwell House, only she wouldn't let un. I say," he added, with a knowing look, "she didn't so much mind thee!"

"You mean the warrener?" answered his hearer, not choosing to take any notice of the last part of his speech, although he secretly longed to pull his ears for his impertinence. "Do you mean to say that you have locked him up in any of the rooms of the old mansion?"

"No—no; he beant in any room!"

"Where, then?"

"In my trap, as I call it!" continued the boy.

And he once more danced round the room, and chuckled and grinned with delight, at the clever manner in which he had outwitted his enemy: so exuberant was his mirth, that some minutes elapsed before the young man could glean from him a tolerably distinct account of the affair.

"And when was this?" he inquired.

"Yesterday."

"During which time," observed Joe, "he must have been without food or drink?"

Ralph grinned, and answered in the affirmative.

Independent of the fear that the ends of justice might partially be defeated if anything occurred to Will Sidelor, the heart of the honest rustic was shocked at the idea of his remaining with a broken limb, unassisted. He proposed, therefore, without waiting the return of Mr. Elworthy, to depart with the boy for Mortlake.

"I don't think his leg be broken!" grumbled Ralph; "it wot only to frighten I, loike! I ha' jumped down trap a hundred times, and never hurt I! Besides," he added, slowly, as if he were deliberating some doubtful point with himself, "I don't think it wot much use!"

"And why not?"

"Cos of the rats!" replied the boy, raising his head, and looking at Joe with a countenance expressive of archness and simplicity. "It be full of un—real Thames water-rats: ten to one but they picked his bones clean enough before morning!"

Joe was horror-struck. The idea of the guilty and—as he believed him—crippled wretch, being torn in pieces by the ferocious animals—devoured, as it were, in detail—inexpressibly shocked him; and, despite the disinclination of Ralph, who began to repent his confidence, he decided on setting out at once for Cromwell House, and releasing the warrener.

Leaving a few hastily-written lines with the clerk, for Mr. Elworthy, explaining the cause of his absence, he started immediately for the scene of his late adventures.

As a matter of precaution, he armed himself—not from any mistrust of his companion; but he knew, by experience, that Will Sidelor was no ordinary person to deal with.

CHAPTER LXXXVI.

Despair makes cowards brave, and the rogue
Honest! Gives nerve to woman's trembling hand,
And energy to age. OLD PLAY.

WHEN Mr. Elworthy, accompanied by his friend, the Bow Street magistrate, entered the prison-yard of Newgate, he was much struck by the alteration which had taken place in the sleek, well-fed person of Lady Mowbray's butler. The eyes of the pampered menial, once so insolent and mocking in their expression, were now wandering and restless, and his cheeks—no longer redolent of health—hung in bags upon his lower jaw, giving an unnatural prominence to his cheek-bones.

The instant he beheld the lawyer, his doleful countenance brightened up, and he thanked him, with servile humility, for having complied with his request.

The fact was, that the position of the fellow was anything but satisfactory. We were then in the hanging days of dear, pious old George III.: when breach of trust, forgery, sheep-stealing, and highway robbery—crimes for which the legislature has since assigned a secondary punishment—incurred the penalty of death.

"Perhaps, sir," said the prisoner, in a submissive tone, "you would not object to speak to me in one of the turnkeys' rooms: here every word we utter is sure to be overheard, for the unfortunate wretches act as spies upon each other. The governor, I am sure, won't refuse any request you may make!"

The event proved that he was right—for a few minutes saw them seated in an apartment belonging to one of the officers of the prison.

"I am sorry to hear, sir," observed the man, as soon as the door was closed, "that you are concerned against me!"

"It is rather unfortunate," replied the lawyer, drily; "for I never undertake to conduct a criminal prosecution, unless I am certain—quite certain—of a conviction!"

The butler winced: he had heard as much amongst his fellow-prisoners, several of whom told him that his case was hopeless, as soon as they heard that Lawyer Elworthy was concerned against him.

With increased dejection, he inquired in whose name he was to be prosecuted.

"Doubtless in the name of the widow of your late master," replied his visitor; "the daughter of my old friend Sir Jasper Pepper."

Now the fellow naturally supposed that Sir Jasper Pepper would not wish that his daughter's name and disgraceful marriage should be dragged before the public—and on this supposition he built his hopes of safety. Still protesting his innocence—for he was artful enough not to make any admission that could criminate himself—the prisoner let it be understood that the jewels of Captain Elton's widow might be restored, provided his own safety were assured him.

Mr. Elworthy reflected for a few moments: he felt assured that the hope of making a compromise was not the prisoner's only motive in requesting to see him.

"And what has this to do with me?" he said, fixing his eyes steadily upon the man; "do you think, after your dastardly conduct in accusing my young friend Mr. Beans, that I take the least interest in your fate?"

"No, sir!"

"Or would compromise my own reputation by lending myself to an arrangement?"

"Not unless it was to your interest, sir!"

"Hang the fellow!" thought the lawyer, with a shrug; "does he hope to bribe me?"

"Of course I don't allude to money," continued the man; "I know that you are above that; but perhaps, if you were to think over all the transactions which have taken place within the last six months, even your strict principles might relent, to obtain the key to some of them."

Although his visitor felt deeply interested, he was too much of a tactician to show it. One point he was perfectly satisfied of—that the speaker was not alluding to the murder of the baronet; for the marriage of Captain Elton, and the robbery of the jewels, as our readers will doubtless recollect, preceded that terrible event.

"One thing is very clear, my good man," he said, "that the restoration of the stolen property alone will not save you."

"What will?"

The lawyer shrugged his shoulders—of course it was not for him to suggest the means.

"Will the placing of Colonel and Lady Mowbray in your power?" demanded the butler.

His visitor remained silent.

"Recovering the lost will of Sir William Mowbray?"

Still not a word.

"Placing the life of the man at your mercy who deprived you of it?"

"Yes," said Mr. Elworthy, firmly, "that will do! Place, as you propose, Colonel and Lady Mowbray in my power—discover the lost will of my murdered client—give me proof of the identity of the ruffian who intended me the same fate—and, though I blush to cheat the galleys of such a rascal as yourself, I will suppress the evidence, and save your life!"

Extraordinary as the proposition may appear, it was perfectly in the power of the speaker to accomplish it; for Sir Jasper Pepper had more than once consulted him on the possibility of obtaining back the jewels without the exposure which must necessarily take place upon the trial.

"I must have security," said the butler.

It was one of those transactions, for fulfilling the conditions of which it was impossible to offer security on either side: this, after some considerable exercise of patience, the lawyer succeeded in convincing the prisoner of—who yielded with an ill grace; for, like most bad men, he was naturally suspicious. In the present instance he had no other alternative—he was in the power of his visitor, and possessed no hold upon him.

When the affair was quite arranged between them, Elworthy called the magistrate into the room, where the butler made his deposition, which pointed out not only Lady Mowbray's and his late master's complicity to obtain the will, but identified the warrener as the party through whose attack Elworthy had so nearly lost his own life.

The last piece of intelligence was even more valuable than the first. The lawyer had long and anxiously been coveting the means to get Will Sidelor into his power. From the day he saw him sleeping in his hut, his suspicions had rested on him—but they were only suspicions; now he had certainties to act upon, and he felt that he held him as firmly as though the walls of Newgate already inclosed him.

The magistrate, on the oath of the butler and his friend, made no difficulty in issuing his warrant against the warrener. How to act with regard to Lady Mowbray, required consideration—it being a far more delicate and complicated affair.

The name of the party to whom Captain Elton had confided the will, was well known to Mr. Elworthy, and he doubted not but, by a judicious use of money and threats, he should be able to recover it. Armed with that, he would at once appeal to the Chancellor, to prevent the colonel's further interference, either with the property of his deceased brother, or the guardianship of his niece.

It was with an air of considerable satisfaction that, accompanied by his friend, he quitted the prison, and returned to his chambers in the Temple, where the clerk, on his arrival, placed Joe Beans's letter in his hands.

"What had I better do?" he said, as he handed it to the magistrate.

"Take two of my fellows with you, and follow them to Mortlake."

This was about the best advice; and in an hour, the lawyer, accompanied by two officers of justice, started for Cromwell House, where Joe Beans and Red Ralph had arrived a short time before them.

When the boy raised the door of his trap, as he called it, Joe Beans beheld a sight which drove the blood from his honest, manly cheek. His old enemy, the warrener, was struggling on the ground, resisting, with maniac fury, the attack of hundreds of rats, many of which had not only fastened on his clothes, but on his flesh. In his agony, the terrified wretch rolled upon them, crushing some by his weight. Others he seized with his hands, and hurled them against the walls or roof of his prison—may, so desperate were his terrors, that he fought against them with his teeth.

"Pang it!" exclaimed Ralph, with a look of astonishment; "if that don't beat cockfighting! Old un don't went for pluck!"

Joe's first impulse was to leap down the chasm to the assistance of the warrener, whose great strength was already beginning to fail him; his next, to assist him in beating off his numerous assailants—an achievement which fortunately did not require much time to accomplish, for the animals began to lose courage at the unexpected intrusion, and retreat to their holes.

"Hang it, Master Joe!" said the boy, who was still peering down the passage, "but thee hast spoilt all the fun!"

His companion shuddered, and desired him to fetch a ladder from one of the offices.

"What for?" demanded Ralph; "for thee? ay, wi' a good heart—but not for that old villain! He would have murdered me, and thought no more on it that I should of killing a rabbit! See here!" he added, picking up the long knife which the warrener had dropped in the passage, when he fell down the trap-door. "What does 'ee think of this?"

He held it to the light as he spoke.

"Very bad, Ralph—very bad!" replied Joe; "but we are not his judges!"

"I don't want to judge un!" replied the lad, in a surly tone; "I want to leave un to the rats—they be best judge and jury, too?"

For some moments it appeared doubtful to Joe Beans, whether the speaker really intended to procure him the means he requested for quitting the subterranean passage—for there was evidently a struggle in the boy's breast; but, fiercely as the urchin hated Will Sidelers, he could not abandon one who had shown him so much kindness, to a similar fate. His love for Joe prevailed—so he even went and procured the ladder as requested, muttering on his way, "that if he had known how foolishly his companion would have acted, he would have kept the secret to himself a few days longer."

The person of the warrener presented a shocking appearance, when rescued from the miserable place in which he had passed so many hours of captivity. His clothes were torn in every direction, and his hands and face were thickly spotted with blood.

"Give him some water," said his preserver, addressing the lad; "he must not, bad as he is, die for want of help!"

Ralph, with an air of distaste, filled a jug from some indifferently clean water in the kitchen—where they had carried the all but senseless ruffian—and held it to his parched lips.

"He won't drink," he said.

Sideler began slowly to open his eyes.

"Where am I?" he groaned.

"Where you never ought to be again!" exclaimed Ralph; "in clear, honest daylight!"

The scowl with which the old man recognised the speaker and his preserver, showed how little impression the scene of horror he had passed through had made upon his callous heart.

"Water! water!" he said.

The lad held the jug to his lips, and he eagerly drained the contents. Never, in the course of his existence, had any draught so refreshing passed them. His eyes began to glisten with pleasure.

"More—more!" he said.

"You must get it yourself, then!" replied Ralph, who felt anything but at his ease, while within reach of his arm. "I must go and see after Farmer Remnant's cows."

As he advanced towards the door of the kitchen, it was suddenly thrown open, and Elworthy, followed by two persons whom Joe Beans had never seen before, entered the room. He was not permitted to remain long in doubt as to the purport of their visit. Without addressing a word to any one, they advanced to the chair upon which the warrener was sitting, and, before he could rise, slipped a pair of manacles upon his wrists, with that professional dexterity which only long experience gives.

"Is your name Sidelers?" said one of the officers, in a tone which showed he was merely fulfilling a necessary form—for he felt sure of his man.

The astonished ruffian could not reply to him.

"I can answer that it is!" said Joe Beans; "I have known him ever since I was a boy."

"Quite sufficient!" observed the second officer, at the same time putting the key of the fetters in his pocket. Turning towards the warrener, he added:

"You are our prisoner!"

"Upon what charge?" faltered the wretch; "send for Colonel Mowbray, for his lady, or his friend, the rich Indian, Meeran Hafaz! They will bail me—bail me to any amount!"

"Murder is not aailable offence!" replied his captors.

At the word "murder," he uttered a deep groan, and sank back in his chair. His physical courage had entirely abandoned him, and he felt prostrate and nerveless as a child.

"At last!" he murmured; "at last!"

In consideration of his enfeebled state, the officers permitted some little time to elapse before they took their departure for London with their prisoner, who slept that very night in Newgate.

"Murder!" ejaculated Ralph, as he saw "the old un"—as he called Will Sidelers—lifted into the chaise which was to convey him to prison; "dang I if I didn't think he wor summat of that kind; I be glad Joe didn't leave un to the rats—it will be better sport to see un hanged; it will be a rare day for Mortlake!"

With this charitable conclusion, he dismissed the subject from his mind, which was so constituted, that few things left any lasting impression there.

As Elworthy rode with Joe Beans to London, he explained to him all that had taken place at the interview between himself and the late servant of Captain Elton, at Newgate.

"I see!" exclaimed the young man; "it is for having attempted your life that Sidelers is arrested?"

The lawyer nodded in the affirmative.

"I thought it had been for the murder of Sir William Mowbray."

"No," said his companion; "however strong my suspicions, I have no proof of that yet!"

CHAPTER LXXXVII.

Calm does not always prove content,
But, like the frost on Etna's brow,
Too oft it hides the fires unspent,
Which rage beneath the winter's snow.

THE despair and rage of Meeran Hafaz, at the loss of Ellen, were the more bitter from being concentrated within himself; for he was one of those who, like the Spartan boy, suffered the fox he had stolen to destroy him—he seldom betrayed the emotions which consumed him.

At first he knew not whom to blame for his disappointment; for Colonel Mowbray, for his own sake, had artfully contrived to divert his suspicions from Dr. Guyot, whom he feared, to the ayah, whom he only disliked. It was some time, however, before the young Indian could bring himself to think that his foster-mother would betray him—nothing less than an avowal from her own lips could lead him to that conclusion. He had not long to wait.

Zara, with all the fierce passions of her race, was not without some of its redeeming virtues. The sufferings of Ellen had shaken her resolution to take any means to see her the wife of Meeran Hafaz; she began to fear—that her charge had often asserted—that death should be her bridegroom, rather than the man who was once the friend of her youth, but now her bitterest persecutor.

The affectionate impulse which induced the fair girl, whom she had so cruelly assisted to persecute, to risk the success of the scheme which was to restore her to liberty, rather than compromise the safety of her nurse, had touched the iron heart of Zara: she pondered it over in her mind, and repeatedly asked herself if she had acted wisely in sacrificing the love of such a being.

The conduct of Meeran tended to increase this predisposition to regret the past. In his anger and despair at losing Ellen, his reproaches fell upon all; even the ayah was not spared, and her proud nature swelled with indignation at the injustice of her foster-son; yet she did not complain.

"I have gone too far," she muttered to herself, "to recover the love of the fair girl I nurtured at my breast, unless I could consent to deny the past, and live a deceitful, guilty thing! Yes, yes—it is too late to redeem the affection of my child, but not," she added, "to atone for the wrongs I have done her! but how atone them?—by betraying Meeran? Never—never!"

For several days the ayah was torn by conflicting feelings—fidelity to her foster-son and affection for Ellen by turns preponderating in her breast. Had the poor girl been near her—could she have seen her pallid cheek and sunken eye, the triumph of virtue would have been complete.

Meeran, as soon as he had recovered from the first effects of his disappointment, acted with that characteristic energy and decision peculiar to himself: he immediately placed persons on whom he could depend, to watch the chambers of the lawyer. He had not many days to wait, before he discovered all he wished to know.

The retreat of his victim was betrayed to him.

Strange to say, neither he nor Colonel Mowbray made any immediate attempts to withdraw her from the protection of the Khan: to do so by violence, they knew would be dangerous; for, independent of the determined character of the renegade, his house was too well guarded to admit of a surprise.

They therefore resolved to accomplish by legal means, what they might fail to achieve by violence. An application was made to the Lord Chancellor, at a private hearing, for an order to secure possession of his ward, whose mind, it was artfully hinted, had become impaired by the terror she experienced on the night of her uncle's murder.

How was it possible that the first officer of the crown could suspect a person of Colonel Mowbray's respectability and position in the world? The tears, too, of his wife, as she entreated his lordship to restore to her her dear Ellen, whose abduction and flight had all but broken her affectionate heart!

The order was signed, and placed in the hands of one of the officials of the Court of Chancery. We need not say that Meeran Hafaz did not appear in this.

"Success, my dear fellow—success!" exclaimed the colonel, as he entered the breakfast-room, with the important paper in his hand; "here we are at last, not only with might, but justice on our side! His lordship has granted my application!"

Meeran smiled.

"There must be no failure this time!" continued the speaker; "and, if possible, no violence!"

The young man nodded assent.

"Where shall we take her?"

"To India," answered Meeran; "to the land of her birth and mine; where, surrounded by all that delights the sense, or touches the heart of youthful sensibility, she will forget the miseries she has endured in this unhappy land, or remember them only as a hideous dream."

"And can you, too, forget?" demanded his confederate, fixing an inquiring glance upon him.

"Everything, in the arms of Ellen," was the reply; "the vessel is already engaged which is to convey us. I will not again risk the treasure for which I have toiled and sinned," he added, "by an hour's delay!"

To this arrangement the colonel saw but one difficulty: the officer of the Court of Chancery, who was to accompany them, was bound to report to the Chancellor the due execution of his decree. Now his decision said that Miss Ellen De Vere was to be placed under the protection of her uncle; who, consequently, became answerable for her appearance, should Elworthy, Dr. Orme, or any of her friends, move the court upon the subject.

It might be all very well for Meeran Hafaz to brave the authority of that powerful court—although it was questionable, perhaps, if he could do so with impunity, even in India; but for his confederate, who was to remain in England, to expose himself to its indignation, would have been ruin and madness.

"I have but one objection to your arrangement," he observed.

"Objection!" repeated the young Indian, haughtily; "I presume I did not rightly hear the word!"

"It was the one I used," continued the colonel.

"Ellen can only leave the land of her forefathers as your wife!"

"What matters when or where the —"

"Hear me!" interrupted her unworthy relative; "it is from no ridiculous superstitious importance which I attach to the ceremony—for I am perfectly aware that I might trust to your honour for its fulfilment—but for my own security."

"I do not understand," exclaimed Meeran, "how my marriage with your niece can affect your safety?"

This was easily explained, and the impetuous young man was made to comprehend that there was a power in England more stubborn than even his own unbending will—more implacable in its resentment, when offended, than his unforgiving disposition: that this power was the more terrible from being irresponsible, and that Colonel Mowbray had far better brave his wrath, than incur the indignation of the Court of Chancery.

"Are you convinced?" said the latter, when he had finished.

"I am."

"And yield?"

"Thus far—that Ellen shall be my wife before we start for India."

It was finally settled between them, that Ellen once more in their power, they should proceed to Carrow Abbey. All the old servants of the late baronet—those who were likely to sympathise with, or assist his orphan niece—were dismissed. Dr. Orme had set out on his voyage to Italy, in order to discover his adopted son. Henry was absent, and Old Martin a harmless lunatic, wandering, with child-like simplicity, about the place.

It would be easy, they thought, either by persuasion or violence, to compel Ellen to give her assent to a marriage there.

When Zara was informed of the arrangement, she shook her head disapprovingly. Like most of her sect, she was superstitious. From the first hour she had set her foot in the abbey, the cold, stately aspect of the place had chilled her. It appeared to her imagination, accustomed to the gay and graceful architecture of India, more like a tomb than a residence for human beings.

"You will fail!" she said; "it is not there that Ellen can become your bride!"

"And why not?"

Because the spirits of her forefathers will watch over her there, and defeat your purpose! Blood has been shed there," she added, with a shudder; "and where the blood of a good man falls, the stone becomes an altar and the pile a temple. I warn you, Meeran! seek not your bride at Carrow: you will only meet your doom!"

With a scornful laugh, the young Indian turned a deaf ear to her prediction. He was too well versed in the philosophy of the East, and the scepticism of Europe, to yield his mind to any such impression. If he believed in the future, it was as the materialist believes in it.

"Zara," he said, "thy next step will be to turn Christian! I were indeed the slave of my own imagination, could such motives restrain me! You must prepare at once to return to Carrow!"

The ayah, finding that all further remonstrance would be useless, replied by making the sign of mute obedience common in the East, and her foster-son left the room.

As the party were about to proceed to the house of the Khan, Colonel Mowbray was informed that an old, shabby-looking man demanded to see him.

"Pshaw!" he exclaimed; "some beggar: send him away!"

"I thought so at first," replied the domestic, who had been one of the men intrusted with the secret at Mortlake; "but I have discovered that he comes from the warrener."

"From Will Sidelers?" said his master.

"Yes, sir! Poor Will is in Newgate!"

At the word "Newgate," the countenance of Colonel Mowbray turned pale: independent of late events, conscience whispered him that the warrener and himself had been mixed up together in transactions which would not bear the light of day.

"In Newgate!" he repeated. "Upon what charge?"

"Murder, I believe, sir!"

"Show the man into the library!" said his master. "I will see him there."

When Meeran and the speaker entered the room to which the messenger of Will Sidelers had been shown by the domestic, they saw a thin, shrewd looking person, apparently not less than sixty years of age. A cold, restless eye peered from under his shaggy brows, which partially veiled their expression.

He was one of those men who exist by hanging about the prisons and courts of justice—a cross between the human alligator and the lawyer. Few men were better judges of character than himself, or quicker to seize an occasion.

The affected calm and aristocratic bearing of the two gentlemen, as they entered the library, did not impose upon him. In the utter absence of anything like curiosity or eagerness on their part, he read the anxiety which secretly devoured them.

"Humph!" he muttered to himself, as he rose, and bowed respectfully; "fifty guineas, at least, if properly managed."

He was not far out in his calculation, as the sequel will prove.

"Now, sir," said the colonel, "I understand it is your wish to see me; you come from an old domestic of my late brother, I believe, one William Siderer—am I correct?"

"Quite, colonel," said the man, fumbling in the lining of his hat, from which he drew a scrap of dirty paper, and handed it to the speaker.

"What is this?"

"From him—you know!" replied the messenger of the warner, nodding in a familiar manner.

"No, I do not know!" replied the colonel, haughtily; "nor can I conceive the reason of these precautions." After a few moments' reflection, he added, "I am in doubt whether I ought to receive a message conveyed with so much mystery."

Meeran impatiently snatched the paper, and found, to his relief, that, instead of being charged, as he had foreboded, with the murder of Sir William Mowbray, the warner was in prison for an attempt upon the life of Lawyer Elworthy.

With an air of intense satisfaction, he passed the communication to his friend.

(To be continued in our next.)

OLD FRIENDS TOGETHER.

BY CHARLES SWAIN.

Oh, time is sweet, when roses meet

With Spring's sweet breath around them;

And sweet the cost, when hearts are lost,

If those we love have found them!

And sweet the mind that still can find

A star in darkest weather!

But nought can be so sweet to see,

As old friends met together!

Those days of old, when youth was bold,

And Time stole wings to speed it,

And youth ne'er knew how fast time flew—

Or knowing, did not heed it!

Though grey each brow that meets us now—

For age brings wintry weather—

Yet nought can be so sweet to see

As those old friends together!

The few long known, that years have shown,

With hearts that friendship blesses

A hand to cheer—perchance, a tear

To soothe a friend's distresses!

That helped and tried—still side by side—

A friend to face hard weather;

Oh, thus may we yet joy to see,

And meet old friends together!

THE FALLING STAR.

It was deep midnight, and no moon shone; but the thousand stars of heaven looked down upon the earth, and kept bright watch for her. A fair girl knelt by the bed of the dying mortal. She was his sister. She had tended him for many days with untiring love; she would not that an alien eye should catch his latest look, or menial hand minister to his latest earthly want. For many hours she had not left his side; but, kneeling there, with one hand clasped in her upraised hands, she gazed alternately from him to the vast heaven, searching its inmost depths with an untiring ken, as she would tear from out its mystic heart the secret of a fate so interwoven with hers. But no sign came, and she turned aside, and wept. Oh, the deep agony of that young heart! It was an unalloyed sorrow, which admitted of no earthly consolation. They were alone—these two young hearts—and other tie had none. All they had loved were in the grave; and they awoke, one day, as from a trance, and looked around, and cried out for a friend! But they found none, and from that day they were one heart. They were both beautiful, and genius had been their heritage, and grew alike in both, only that hers was much less bold than his, for that it had received its tone from her sweet gentleness, mixed with deep reverence for his more reasoning mind; as the gazer on the water sees some bright star reflected in its bosom, and perceives they are alike, save that the image is more shadowy, which is but caused by the properties of that in which it shows. So rapt were they in each other, that the outer world had no charm for them, saving its humanities—the follies of fashion and the frivolities of life were unknown to them. They had drawn around them a magic circle, in which nought save what was bright and beautiful dare enter.

Day after day did they gather wisdom from the pages of the mighty dead; and, as the old world opened to their ardent minds, the present faded as a dream. They loved to dwell upon some tale of rare affection, of deep devotion, or self-immolation at the shrine of duty—instances of which the past has in perfection, gilded, perchance, by the romance a lapse of time never fails to bestow, but still unaffectedly human. And when they rose from their labour of love, they felt the deep effect which lessons of exalted virtue ever impress upon reflecting minds. They impart a dignity to life which is unobserved in the everyday world, and link the heart to its kind by the noblest sentiments nature can evince. They were the philanthropists of the closet, unbounded in their sympathy, but, from their sensibility and refinement, all unfit to mingle with the coarser spirits of the world. What excited their benevolence in the mass, would, most probably, cause disgust in the individual; and they would turn away heart-sick, to find the world not what they thought it: they would mourn for the suffering million, but the leprous wretch in the filthy hovel, would be a loathed and hideous object in their eyes.

Such is the difference between the theoretical and practical Christian: the one refines and gives out Utopian theories to the world, which never are adopted, benefiting no one, though not the less noble in their aim; the other seeks out misery in its home, and bars out famine from the starving wretch, and though the means of assistance may be small, the never-failing fount of sympathy skims over the wounds it cannot radically heal. They saw that the world was beautiful, and were content so breathe the odour of its flowers, without distilling the poison from their hearts. They were dreamers, and had they been separate, such feelings would have craved for the sympathy of some kindred heart, and they might have loved; but they were all in all to each other; their feelings were so knit, so interwoven, that the approach of any other sentiment seemed to threaten a disruption of their tie; and they sensitively and gladly shrank back into the gentle and unreserved commune of their own pure thoughts. They were orphans, and friendless! they were alone, and loving! And now the sister knelt by the side of the dying brother! That was her grief; for him her tears flowed fast, and the visible silence was broken by deep and fervent prayers. And the fever raged with unabated violence—he muttered wild words, which conjured up visions of a thousand happy hours and innocent joys, and caused a fresh burst of grief from the spirit-broken girl. The malady was evidently approaching its crisis; every moment the stillness became more awful; she longed to call for some one to share her watch, yet could not for a moment tear herself from the couch. He had breathed hardly until now, but now she missed the sound—it had sunk into a child's breathing. Faint and frequent beat the pulses at his heart—the eye, which had been glaring and restless, became fixed. She longed to scream, but the voice seemed frozen to her heart. More feebly still he breathed—an expression of agony was upon his brow; his hand relaxed its grasp, and, with one deep sigh, his features sank into a quiet smile. His spirit seemed to have left its earthly home! She shrieked aloud, and raising her despairing eyes to heaven, exclaimed: "Oh, God, have mercy!" And a bright star fell! But he recovered, and a week hence was seated on a couch, with that fair girl nestling at his feet.

"I have been a grievous trouble to thee, Marian! Thine eye is as bright, thy smile as sweet, but thy cheek is pale, and thy hands have shrunk to thinness. And I fear that in my madness I may have spoken harsh words to thee, or have been wilful and fretful, or wishful and exacting; but now I crave your pardon, dearest, and throw myself upon your love for your forgiveness!"

"Hush! hush!" said Marian, as she placed her hand upon his lips. "Dear Ernest, most wrongfully do you accuse yourself; both gentle and patient were you during all your sufferings. No murmur fell from your lips—no repining, no impatience; and every office I performed for you was more than repaid by the look of love and thankfulness by which it was received."

"But —"

"Nay, hear me. If I have lost the ruddiness of health from off my cheek, and its fullness from my form, it was not caused by watching and waiting at your couch, but by the ever present fear that you might be taken from me. It tortured me through the day, and affrighted me in the night. I could not fly from the thought. I read it in the setting sun, and in the flickering taper; and as the stars came out, and faded as the night wore on, each seemed to bear upon its ray a mystic recognition of your half-embodied spirit."

"I have but faint remembrance of the past. I know the days, though cheered by sight of you, seemed endless."

"'Twas strange, too, Ernest, throughout the day you would appear strangely unsettled; a feverish restlessness seemed to pervade your frame; but as the night came on, this was superseded by a calmness, trance-like—nay, almost death-like—that made my blood stagnate in every vein—as if your soul had left its mortal frame, to hold communion with the invisible spirits of the silent night! At those times, with a philosophy which failed me utterly in the day, I would speculate upon the possibility of your death, and all at once I seemed to cease to be a being of the earth; the mystic line was broken, and my mind was cognisant of the immaterial elements. Countless bright shapes peopled the circumambient air—if shapes they could be called, that were without form or substance. I was in the heart of nature, and saw how the progress of decay was but a preface to another birth—a state of being in which soul was all. I was conscious of an elevation of mind, an expansion of intellect, which rendered the deep-sought, stored up knowledge of a thousand generations of man, but as a grain of sand compared to the earth's gross bulk. And I saw that those of earth who approached nearest to the reality of a state of being which, in sooth, surpasses all that the powers of imagination can conceive of it—were those who, in the earnestness of a beneficent nature, sought out the humanities from wisdom's page, and, blending both, saw nature through the heart and mind—neither with the misjudging warmth of the enthusiast, nor the fact deducing coldness of the philosopher; but bringing, as an offering, the uttermost attainable refinement of intellect, warmed by angelic love! I saw through the world, man yearning unceasingly to rise; the soul warring with its incumbering clay, and striving ever to sever from it. The pale student, in his midnight study, burying the recollection of the miseries of the by-gone day—forgetting the want of friends, the cold repulse, the unappreciation, the want of sympathy, the hungering morrow, in his absorbing love of the pursuit of truth. The mighty statesman retiring from the admiring crowd, and seeking consolation in seclusion, for the failure of those aspiring, but baseless schemes, by which he hoped to raise the herd from its desperate, besotted condition, and was repaid with revilement and scorn, by that very class he sought to benefit. Seeking in solitude deep commune with his own heart, he strove to work out from the philosophy of the past, and the sad experience of the present, a state of mind in which the desire of dispensing happiness should be, of itself, sufficient compensation, apart from and independent of the reception of the benefit by its object. Thus deeply pondering, and in secret, the quiet came upon his soul, and he became of us. I cannot describe to you the nameless feeling that possessed me at those times; there was a consciousness of existence, without its cares, of knowledge without the blindness of prejudice, which ever accompanies our earthly wisdom. I felt that I was apart from the world, yet of it; for that sympathy which pervades all nature, which binds heart to heart, and is the medium through which human sensations and affections are felt alike, and simultaneously conveyed throughout the universe, now and for ever, was acting upon my spirit with a mighty force; my nature was etherealised, and I was an impalpable though sentient link of that wondrous harmoniser of creation—Sympathy or Love! And you were there, my brother; our spirits met in that bright star, with which we have so oft imagined that our fates were inseparably linked, and —"

"Stay, Marian, dearest, thou dost remember me that, as I lay on my bed of sickness, I had a dream of a most terrible and strange import. I know that for days I lay unconscious of all, save of a raging fever, that seemed to dry up all moisture in my blood and brain. I seemed to breathe hot air, which in its passage dried up my tongue, and parched and cracked my livid lips. Each day, as it broke, brought with it an increasing but nameless terror, which, ever and anon, like unto ice-strings made each trembling nerve; and though the fury of a thousand fires leaped through each vein, my heart felt chilled! On that night which caused thee so much terror, this harpy feeling was upon me, and gripped me with a giant's force; nor could I fortify myself against it, for my mind had lost all power of connecting ideas of any kind. All was vagueness and dread. As the night wore on, the increasing stillness added a new terror to my mind. Methought I lay chained and immovable in the midst of a vast sandy plain, over which the hot sun was vertical: throughout the day, from morn till night, he poured his fierce beams upon my seething skin, until I felt it crack and gape like the parched earth; and when the sun had set, the moon's rays, and the beams of the golden stars, seemed to dart fire that jarred my brain to madness. There was no rest for me, night nor day—my furred tongue could not give out my agony. And I was alone in my suffering, when suddenly a mighty form approached. It wore a grave but beautiful aspect, and on its brow there was a calm that chilled at once my burning blood; it seemed as if it had never known a youth, nor could know age: it was not the calm of thought, nor the passiveness of overwhelming grief, but I felt at once that it was the cold, eternal calm of death. Nearer it came, and my soul recoiled at its approach; nearer—still nearer; it had gained my feet, when, in a moment, the cells of memory gave up their treasured store. Father, mother, friends, came flocking round me; our happy home, our childish sports, each happy hour that in its passage bore a pleasant thought; snatches of old wild melodies, and all the thousand things that endeared and made a joy of life, rushed forth to keep the dreaded terror off, but in vain! It paused not in its career; it raised its hand above me; a cold sweat stood upon my brow. I strove to speak, but no sound came forth. I struggled to arise, but the mighty spell withheld me, and I was sinking fast. Slowly the withering hand descended towards my heart—already did I feel its grasp stilling the pulse of life—my soul paused, wavering ere it took its flight, when in the still night air, the deep and fervent prayers of thy innocent heart arose, and from the orb heaven rushed forth a radiant form, and stood between me and my dread foe."

"My brother! I saw that star fall!"

THE BEST RECOMMENDATION.—A youth seeking employment, went to one of our large cities, and on inquiring at a certain counting-room if they wanted a clerk, was told that they did not. On mentioning the recommendations he had, one of which was from a highly-respectable citizen, the merchant desired to see them. In turning over his carpet-bag to find his letters, a book rolled out on the floor. "What book is that?" said the merchant. "It is the Bible, sir!" was the reply. "And what are you going to do with that book?" The lad looked seriously into the merchant's face, and replied, "I promised my mother that I would read it every day, and I shall do it!" and burst into tears. The merchant immediately engaged his services, and in due time he became a partner in the firm, one of the most respectable in the city.

[ELIZABETH RECEIVING THE DEPUTATION OF THE COUNCIL.]

LIVES OF THE QUEENS OF ENGLAND.

BY J. F. SMITH, ESQ., AUTHOR OF

"AMY LAWRENCE," "ROBIN GOODFELLOW," ETC.

ELIZABETH,
QUEEN REGNANT OF ENGLAND.

CHAPTER XIX.

Now innocence befriend me—to worldly craft
I have no other shield than my true faith,
And woman's simple wit. THE PRINCESS.

ALTHOUGH no outward emotion betrayed the feelings which agitated her, it was not without a secret misgiving that Elizabeth beheld the cruel Gardiner presiding at the council. She knew that he was amongst the bitterest of her enemies, and naturally doubted the result of an examination which he was to conduct.

Although it would be difficult to obtain, at this remote period, legal proof of the daughter of Anne Boleyn having joined the conspiracy which was to dethrone her elder sister, and transfer the crown of England to her own brow, there is every reasonable presumption that she had tampered in the plot.

The object of the confederacy had been to unite her in marriage with her cousin, the handsome but weak-minded Courtney, Earl of Devonshire, whom mortified vanity, at the rejection of his hand by Mary, rendered capable of listening to any scheme, however rash or ill-considered.

Sir James Crofts, Wyatt, and Carew, were equally compromised.

On the failure of the insurrection—in which the name of the unfortunate Lady Jane Grey was used as a pretext—the ringleaders were arrested. Courtney at least acted honourably towards Elizabeth—for, however frank in his examinations in other respects, not a word could be extorted from him to implicate the princess. The other prisoners were far from exercising the same generous forbearance.

Sir James Crofts confessed that he had had several interviews with Elizabeth, and advised her to retire from London; Lord Russel, that he had been the agent of her correspondence with Wyatt.

The French ambassador was one of the prime movers in the affair: not that his object was to advance the interests of Elizabeth—it was rather to compass her destruction, by involving her in an unsuccessful rebellion against her sister, and rendering the way to the succession open to the daughter-in-law of his sovereign, the young Queen of Scots.

But the greatest danger of the future queen was from the influence which the minister of Spain exercised over the mind of Mary. Already betrothed to Philip, he declared that her affianced husband could scarcely venture to set foot within the kingdom whilst Courtney and Elizabeth lived. The jealousy which Gardiner entertained of this man, led that wily minister, contrary to his inclination, to befriend the Protestant princess.

On being questioned by the chancellor, Elizabeth stoutly denied that she had ever received any letters from the traitor Wyatt, or sent word or token of communication to the King of France: this she was emboldened to do from the confidence the presence of Cecil inspired.

"But, madam," urged the Earl of Arundel, who was present, "the letters of the traitor Wyatt are in the hands of the council!"

"Addressed to me?" demanded the royal maiden.

"Even so, madam!" answered Lord Paget, who, more than any other present, earnestly desired to compass her death; for he was the most devoted partisan of Spain and the alliance with Philip.

"Then, my lords," replied the princess, "the fact of their being in such hands proves that I never received them; for it is not likely that, if I had been weak enough to enter into a traitorous conspiracy or correspondence against my sister and sovereign, that I should have been fool enough to have kept the proofs of my culpability by me! You would not find a jury in all England," she added, "to convict the meanest person upon the evidence of a letter addressed to them, but which they had never seen: will you, then, venture to accuse, on such slight ground, the daughter of a king?"

Elizabeth was dismissed, after an interrogatory, which she answered both with prudence and courage; and the council retired, to make their report to the queen.

That same night a reconciliation was effected between Gardiner and the head of the Spanish faction, who had accused the wily prelate of being lukewarm in the service of his sovereign. The consequence was, that a report—most unfavourably drawn, as regarded her sister—was presented to the queen, who decided at once upon committing the princess to the Tower.

Mary was about to meet her parliament at Oxford, and she felt the danger of permitting her sister to remain behind, in London; she was equally averse to taking her with her.

Elizabeth was in her lodging—or rather her prison—at Whitehall, attended only by one gentleman usher, three ladies, and two grooms of the chamber—the rest of her household having been dismissed by command of the queen. Vainly and anxiously, during the day, had she striven to communicate with her friends; but such precautions had been taken as effectually prevented her. A party of guards had been placed in her antechamber, and a yet stronger force was stationed upon the lawn between the palace and the river, to prevent escape.

When the popularity of Elizabeth with the Protestant party is considered, these measures will not appear harsh or unnecessary. The throne of Mary was seriously menaced by the partisans of her sister; and yet that queen, so justly condemned by posterity, contented herself with sending her rival to the Tower. It is a question whether the daughter of Anne Boleyn would have been equally generous in her place; one thing at least is certain, that Mary never would listen to the advice of her council, no matter how irritated she might be at the time, and consent to shed her sister's blood.

It is pleasing to find one bright spot amid so many dark ones.

Elizabeth was seated near the window, sorrowfully watching the birds in their flight, envying them, most probably, their freedom. At times she cast an anxious look upon the river, then turned, and made some half-whispered comment to Lady Tyrwhit.

"Look!" said the princess to her lady of honour, as a closely-covered barge, rowed by watermen in the royal livery, drew in sight, from the direction of Westminster. "Hath our sister taken water to visit us? Perhaps by this time she repents of her unjust suspicions of our fidelity!"

Although the speaker well knew that Mary was far too incensed against her to honour her by such a mark of favour, she affected to believe that it was the queen, even after Lady Tyrwhit had called her attention to the absence of the royal standard, which would have floated at the stern of the barge, had the sovereign really been present.

"Your grace," observed one of the ladies, who was watching from the window next to the one at which the princess was seated, "it is a deputation of the lords of the council. I fear they come to visit you!"

"Fear!" repeated Elizabeth, haughtily. "What is the wench prating about? We have no cause for fear, for our conscience is free alike from disloyalty and reproach towards our dear sister!"

Although these words were uttered in a bold, firm tone of voice, and her cheek retained its colour, a close observer might have discovered in her eye an expression which belied her professions of confidence and innocence: terror and rage were mingled.

"See!" she said, half speaking aloud and muttering to herself, "it is Gardiner—the crafty, subtle Gardiner—whose allegiance is sworn to Mary, but given to Spain and Rome! He would ape Wolsey—as if great events or men could ever be successfully imitated: he is a priest, consequently close—cruel by temperament! I have heard it said," she added, "that when my father beheaded Fisher—whom the Pope had invested with the purple—that my lord chancellor expressed a hope that he should live to see the royal blood of England on the same scaffold!"

Her companion shuddered, and drew closer towards the speaker, as if her feeble presence could protect her.

"He is, indeed, a fearful man!" she observed; "and, unhappily for your grace, I have it from good authority, that he is reconciled again with the ambassador of Spain: he visited Messire Renaud last night!"

"How know you that?" demanded Elizabeth, hastily.

"By my cousin, Elias Tyrwhit, of the queen's chamber: he has fallen into favour with the queen's grace lately, and is frequently the bearer of private communications between St. James's and the residence of the intriguing minister of Spain!"

"If Gardiner and the ambassador are reconciled," observed the princess, "this visit of a deputation of the council bodes me no good! See!" she exclaimed, as a tall, portly nobleman, with the air of an abbot rather than a courtier, stepped from the barge upon the landing-place reserved for visitors to Whitehall; "the bigot Paget!"

"And Lord Sussex!" added her companion.

"Sussex," said Elizabeth, "with all his devotion to Rome, is a true Englishman: he loves the church better than the priests—his country better than Rome! He bore himself like a loyal subject when our brother Edward died! I think well but of few men; but amongst those few, foremost stands the Earl of Sussex."

Nine members of the privy council had landed, during the short colloquy at the window, between the captive daughter of Anne Boleyn and her attendant. Their arrival boded little good to Elizabeth—for, with the exception of the nobleman she had last named, they consisted only of her personal enemies.

"God help me!" she sighed. "I must e'en meet them with what little wit nature hath given me, and mine own innocence!"

The future queen spoke the truth. Her reliance upon the latter was not half so firm as upon the former defence. Few sovereigns ever exceeded Elizabeth in quickness of understanding or powers of deception: as her future conduct, when we come to touch upon the execution of the beautiful but unhappy Queen of Scots, will sufficiently prove.

A gentleman usher entered the apartment, and formally announced the arrival of a deputation of the honourable members of the privy council, with an order from the queen.

At the word "order," Elizabeth turned pale.

"Order!" she repeated. "Who spoke that word? Art thou not mistaken?"

"My lord chancellor!" replied the officer, respectfully. "Permit me to assure your grace that I have not changed a letter of his message!"

"Admit the members of the council," said the princess.

"It would be discourteous to keep them waiting in our antechamber, since they are the bearers of an order from our dear sister!"

The only emotion which Elizabeth betrayed, when Gardiner and the nobleman entered her presence, was a slight nervous twitching about the corners of her mouth: her eye was clear, and her bearing as royal as ever.

As soon as Gardiner entered the apartment, he bowed slightly to the princess, and commenced reading from a parchment, how her grace, having been charged, and partially proved guilty, of holding a traitorous correspondence with Wyatt; and, moreover, having, either directly or indirectly, connived at and abetted the rebellion made by Sir Peter Carew, in the west of England; that the queen, by the advice and consent of her privy council, had determined, till such matters could be more thoroughly sifted and inquired into, upon removing her sister, the Lady Elizabeth, to the Tower.

"The Tower!" repeated the royal maiden, with a shudder, "for the sister of your sovereign!"

Gardiner was silent.

"The daughter of Henry VIII.!" she added.

"Even so, your grace," observed Gardiner, in a tone which showed how little sympathy he felt for her distress.

"My lords," exclaimed Elizabeth, "is this just? Is it worthy of the advisers of the queen, to counsel the dishonour of her sister—the imprisonment of an innocent woman, who has never conspired against her crown and dignity, or offended in word, act, or thought? Return, return, I implore you! and represent to your sovereign the cruelty, the injustice of such a proceeding!"

Not one of the noblemen offered to stir.

"At least permit me to write to our dear sister?"

"It would be useless, your grace!" coarsely observed Gardiner. "Where the safety of a crown, the interests of a mighty nation, are at stake, and the welfare of our holy church, the queen's highness has schooled herself to disregard the cry of nature!"

"And listen only to that of justice!" observed Lord Paget.

"Hard men!" exclaimed the princess; "hard men!" "the unhappy have seldom friends!"

Lord Sussex, moved by the chivalry of his disposition and the helplessness of the speaker, bent his knee suddenly at the foot of the chair on which Elizabeth remained seated; for, even in her present distress, a captive on her way to the Tower, which had been the prison of her mother, and the scene of her execution, and that of many of her friends, the royal maiden maintained her state.

"Do not mock me, my Lord of Sussex," she exclaimed, "with the semblance of service!"

"By my faith, your grace," replied that powerful nobleman, "but the service which I proffer you is real, good service! And, always excepting my loyalty to my sovereign, it is given without reserve! Your grace shall have time to write the letter you demand!"

The eye of Elizabeth brightened.

Gardiner was about to speak, but the earl interrupted him.

"I have said it, my lord, and will be answerable for the advice with my life! More, princess," he added; "confide your letter to me—I pledge my honour to deliver it to the queen, and bring you back the answer!"

"Thanks, my good and faithful cousin of Sussex!" exclaimed the captive, whose object was to obtain time, so as to render it impossible for the barge to pass under London Bridge, in consequence of the tide; and she knew very well they would not venture to conduct her through the City.

Seating herself at a table, she wrote the following remarkable letter, one of the clearest and best which ever issued from her pen. The original may be seen in the Harleian collection.

ORIGINAL LETTER OF ELIZABETH TO QUEEN MARY.

"If any ever did try this old saying, that 'a king's word was more than another man's oath,' I must humbly beseech your majesty to verify it in me, and to remember your last promise and my last demand—that I be not condemned without answer and due proof—which it seems that I now am; for, without cause proved, I am by your council, from you, commanded to go to the Tower, a place more wanted for a false traitor, than a true subject. Which though I know I deserve it not, yet in the face of all this realm it appears proved. I pray to God I may die the shamefullest death that any ever died, if I may mean any such thing; and to this present hour I protest before God (who shall judge my truth, whatsoever malice shall devise), that I never practised, counselled, nor consented to anything that might be prejudicial to your person any way, or dangerous to the state by any means. And therefore I humbly beseech your majesty to let me answer afore yourself, and not suffer me to trust to your councillors—yea, and that afore I go to the Tower, if it be possible—if not, afore I be further condemned. Howbeit, I trust assuredly your highness will give me leave to do it afore I go, that thus shamefully I may not be cried out on, as I now shall be—yea, and that without cause!"

Gardiner, as Elizabeth had reached this part of her memorable epistle, walked towards the window, to observe the tide: he saw that it was rapidly falling.

"Permit me, your grace," he said, "to remind you that we have not long to wait!"

"Our orders must be executed!" added Paget.

"Our duty to the queen!" chimed in the other members of the council, who did not share in the enthusiasm which had prompted the noble Sussex.

"I will take upon myself," he said, "the responsibility of this delay, my lords!"

Gardiner turned impatiently away.

Elizabeth, who had listened anxiously, was strengthened in her resolution of outstaying the tide. She smiled, and resumed her letter.

"Let conscience move your highness to pardon this my boldness, which innocence procures me to do, together with hope of your natural kindness, which I trust will not see me cast away without desert, which what it is I would desire no more of God, but that you truly knew—but which thing I think and believe you shall never by report know, unless by yourself you hear. I have heard of many in my time cast away, for want of coming to the presence of their prince; and in late days I heard my Lord of Somerset say, that if his brother had been suffered to speak with him, he had never suffered; but persuasions were made to him so great that he was brought in belief, that he could not live safely if the admiral lived, and that made him give consent to his death. Though these persons are not to be compared to your majesty, yet I pray God the like evil persuasions persuade not one sister against the other, and all for that they have heard false report, and the truth not known.

"Therefore, once again, kneeling with humbleness of heart, because I am not suffered to bow the knees of my body, I humbly crave to speak with your highness, which I would not be so bold as to desire, if I knew not myself most clear, as I know myself most true.

"And as for the traitor Wyatt, he might, peradventure, write me a letter, but on my faith I never received any from him. And as for the copy of the letter sent to the French king, I pray God confound me eternally if ever I sent him word, message, token, or letter, by any means, and to this truth I will stand in till my death.

"Your highness's most faithful subject, that hath been from the beginning, and will be to my end.

"ELIZABETH.

"I humbly crave but only one word of answer from yourself."

What makes this letter the more remarkable is, that, in style and composition, it was the unassisted effusion of Elizabeth, who, never, perhaps, showed herself to be more clear-headed than when pleading for her life.

How deeply is it to be regretted that the royal maiden, in after years, when destiny had raised her to a throne, did not remember the agony of suspense and terror she had herself endured whilst her life and liberty hung, as it were, in the balance.

Queen Mary had more mercy towards the daughter of Anne Boleyn, than Elizabeth displayed to her rival, Mary of Scotland.

So true is it that power hardens the heart.

As the writer sealed her letter, she cast a sidelong glance upon the river, and saw that the tide no longer served.

"I am saved," she murmured, "for four-and-twenty hours at least!" Then, advancing towards the earl, who had so unexpectedly befriended her, she placed the letter in his hand: it was addressed to her Majesty the Queen.

"Accept, my lord," she said, "the thanks of a poor, friendless maiden: you have acted kindly, when all else frowned—bravely, when others feared!"

Sussex bowed, and kissed her extended hand.

"Should the hour arrive," added the speaker, lowering her tone, "in which I can prove my gratitude, Elizabeth will not forget that, in the hour of adversity, she found a friend in the Earl of Sussex!"

This was one of the few promises which the future monarch of England did not forget.

Sussex, whose influence and rank gave him easy access to the queen, placed the letter of her sister, as he had promised, that very evening in her hands.

"You have done wrong, my lord," she exclaimed, after she had perused it, "to disobey our orders!"

"I see," replied the peer, "that my enemies have been beforehand with me!"

This was uttered with a glance towards Gardiner.

Mary, who in person was neither lovely nor dignified, possessed that which, in a sovereign, is perhaps as great an advantage—utter immobility of expression. No one, from the study of her countenance, could ever read her thoughts. She had few friends, and less confidants. The many snares by which she had been surrounded in her infancy, had taught her caution.

"I listen to no man's enemies, my lord," replied the queen, in her usual quiet manner; "least of all to yours! We have read the letter of our sister Elizabeth, who protests much loyalty and affection for our person. Would I could believe it to be sincere! She also reminds us of our promise."

The enemies of Elizabeth began to look uneasy, for they knew that their royal mistress had a scrupulous respect for her word. Once given, she was not to be induced to break it.

"It shall be kept! and now," added the queen, firmly, "my lord chancellor, Paget, Sussex, and others, listen to our final orders touching this unhappy affair."

The noblemen drew near, and stood in a semicircle round her.

"It is our will and pleasure, that without further delay—not even the grace of a single hour," she added, glancing towards the Earl of Sussex, "after the rising of the tide, the Lady Elizabeth be conveyed to the Tower! And I shall hold it an act of treason in any who presume to thwart our pleasure in this matter. Once in the Tower," she continued, "we shall have time for further reflection."

So saying, she left the cabinet, followed by Gardiner alone, who, as he passed the mortified Earl of Sussex, cast on him an insulting, pitying look.

THE book-post, which has now become an important channel for the diffusion of literature, will be commenced on the first of May, between this country and the East Indies. The total charge, from any part of the United Kingdom to any part of our Indian Empire, for a book half a pound weight, will be 6s.; a pound, 1s.; two pounds, 2s.; and three pounds (the maximum by post), 3s.

HOW TO TURN A WHITE DAHLIA BLUE.—I have been told, but never have tried the experiment, by a celebrated cultivator of dahlias in Belgium, that he will be able, in the course of a year or two, to produce a blue one, by keeping constantly watered the root of a white one with a solution of sulphate of iron. The sulphate of iron turns hydrangeas blue, and why not other white flowers as well? Of course, the solution must be very weak when used.—Gardeners' Chronicle.

ESSAYS.

No. CLXXXIV.—PEOPLE WHO NEVER SAY NO!

I had rather do and not promise, than promise and not do.
WARWICK.

In this good, moral, Christian society of ours, there are numbers of people whose company ought not only to be shunned, but whose influence ought to be dreaded.

We do not mean those unfortunate beings whose voices have brought them into painful notoriety, or those contemptible persons whose flagrant errors have deprived them of every particle of respect or confidence at the hands of their fellow-creatures. We allude to a class sui generis very numerous, and very remarkable; a class distinguished in some of its manifestations by a reputation for extraordinary good-nature, and that genial sympathy which rarely fails to touch the most obdurate heart. The individuals composing this class, are scattered over the surface of society. They are to be found in the higher ranks as well as in the lower; among women as well as men; the aged as well as the youthful; the learned as well as the ignorant; the pious as well as the profane. But the whole of them may be recognised by their utter inability to pronounce or act upon the wisdom conveyed by one little monosyllable. In short, they are "People who never say 'No!'"

Generally speaking, they are a bland, mild spoken race, with extremely captivating manners, and very winning ways. They are all acquiescence. Their silvery souls cannot entertain the harsh sound of a harsh negative. Their daily food seems to be the notes of nightingales, and their censure the softest breeze that ever the west sighed over a bed of roses. They float in a calm atmosphere of melodious affirmatives.

Circumstances they never attempt to control, but allow themselves to be passively borne by the current of destiny whithersoever it likes to go. All the rest of the world imagine them to be quite celestial in their temperaments—indeed of angelical origin—and regard them with the same sort of reverence as a Hindoo does the mute images of the various manifestations of Brahma. We ourselves, in our green and halcyon days—would they were back again, for experience dispels the most pleasing illusions, and throws earth on the most thrilling romances—we say that, in our younger days, we were disposed to look upon them as the absolute personification of good-nature—"pure and perfect chrysolites"—beings almost worthy of reverence.

"He never says 'No!'" What an inestimable creature, we thought, as the graphic text fastened upon our mind. Such a man would never refuse a beggar a coin, or the afflicted a kind word. However, when we began to know the gentleman better, we commenced studying the characteristics of his class, and we had no sooner done so than the illusion under which we had previously been labouring, vanished. We discovered that there was something about people who never say "No," not only contemptible, but dangerous. We found, in the great majority of them, not only weakness of the very worst quality, but an hypocrisy, a deception, and a lamentable want of principle.

Thus instructed, we thought it would not be an unprofitable employment to take the characteristics of these people, and examine them separately. In the course of our observations we drew some conclusions, which we present to our readers just as they were formed.

People who never say "No," may be divided into two classes: those who have a little good-nature, but scarcely any common sense; and those who have abundance of the latter, but scarcely an atom of the former. Those who have some of the commodity which passes current under the general term good-nature, may be recognised by the total absence of all power of self control, their moral lassitude, and their improvidence. As heads of families, they appear to have no will of their own, no independence, and, we might add, no proper sense of the awful responsibility of parents. Their wives rule them with a rod of iron—and thus they submit to a complete perversion of the matrimonial union, and an unseemly submission to a domestic tyranny which inevitably results in unhappiness, and too often in poverty and ruin; for when the head of a house is weak, it is seldom long before those who have usurped his authority bring the whole building about his and their ears.

The children of such imbeciles are allowed all their own way. The most improper indulgences are allowed them; and as they grow up, they become more and more freed from wholesome restraint. They acquire coarse habits and manners, become intractable, and, unless saved by a miracle, fall into devious ways; and then the parent, in his frightful helplessness, exclaims: "That his children are breaking his heart, and bringing his grey hairs in sorrow to the grave."

This kind of never-say-no-man is apt to be a lender of money—a bad practice almost any way, but necessary in some of the circumstances of business. But he only lends, because he cannot say "No!" An old acquaintance, whom probably he well knows to be a very great scamp, asks him for a five-pound note. Now, although he has a large family dependent on his industry and economy, he cannot induce his tongue to utter the little word "No!" And so the scamp obtains the five pounds, which, very likely he spends in debauchery; and the lender, through his weakness, is so much the poorer, and the other not in the slightest degree benefited—perhaps injured; for if even such a person was of the strictest moral habits, the mere act of borrowing weakens his moral power, and so, to a certain extent, unfits him for the pursuit of that independence of feeling which is so essential not only to success, but to the proper working of the very machinery of business.

We have a lively remembrance of an example in point.

D., a young man, started in life, with every prospect of doing well. He married a pretty wife, had blooming children, and ought to have been happy and prosperous; for he had excellent opportunities, and, withal, was a very sober, steady young man. But he was a sad coward. Not physically—for he would face any danger—but morally. He could not say "No!" One acquaintance was perpetually borrowing trifling sums from him, another induced him to embark in some foolish speculations, and another prevailed upon him to become surety for a large loan. That proved his ruin; for, being unable to meet every demand made upon him, he had to go to prison, and obtain the benefit of the insolvent debtors' law. He never recovered the blow, and his friends advised him to emigrate. He did so, but died on the passage, leaving a young and helpless family to struggle for bread, sixteen thousand miles away from every friend they had. One of his trifling loans, we should mention, occasioned a fearful calamity. He had an acquaintance—an idle, never-dowell, dissipated kind of fellow, who was seldom out of the tavern. This man was a confirmed drunkard, and whenever he was short of money, to gratify his degrading propensities, he applied to D. On one occasion he asked the latter for the loan of a sovereign. D. hesitated, but could not say "No!" The fellow promised so earnestly, that he wheedled him out of the money, and went straight to a tavern with it, where he got so frightfully intoxicated, that, on his return home, he killed his wife, because she had reproached him with his beastly condition; and then, smitten by remorse, laid violent hands on himself. So that D.'s inability to say "No!" in the course of a few hours led to a murder and a suicide.

The wife afflicted with this description of moral incapacity is a fearful agent in bringing about misery and destruction. The children are either sullen and slattern, or froward and tawdry. Having been reared from the restraints of proper discipline, they grow up just like weeds; and when arrived at the estate of men and women, are just as useless as weeds. Their mother is indolence itself, at home and abroad, and has acquired the equivocal reputation of being a good, easy sort of creature. We have seen some very melancholy mothers of this kind. One we have before us in painful distinctness. Her husband's means are respectable, and he is a thrifty man. She has two children, a boy and a girl: the latter is indulged in every whim, is very ignorant, excessively vain, and shockingly affected; the former is a riotous young cub, with a Milbank Penitentiary cast of countenance. Both are unchecked—have every caprice gratified. The mother never says "No" to any request, and so they are encouraged in their intractable habits; and no doubt, in course of a very short time, like innumerable children similarly neglected, they will turn round upon their over-indulgent parent, and set even the remnant of her feebly-exercised power at defiance.

Nothing can be more mischievous than this class of mothers. It places the future of their children on an insecure foundation, and, we firmly believe, is one of the great sources whence spring many of the monster evils that afflict society. Spoiled children are intolerable nuisances; sensible people avoid and dislike them; but when it comes to be considered that those spoiled children may very likely prove spoiled men and women, the question deepens in gravity, and becomes one of intense interest. We therefore would say that, the oftener a mother says "No" to her child, the better it will be for that child, both physically and morally; because, by being restrained early, it will become accustomed to the rules of authority, and not only never feel them to be a burthen, but submit to them cheerfully, and voluntarily add to their number and stringency.

We might extend the list of these so-called good-natured people to a great length, but think we have written quite sufficient to show that a parent or man of business, acting in the manner we have described, is not a good member of society; and, as such people have much blunt humour, mildness, and placidity in their manner, which obtain for them a certain popularity, it would be as well to study their characters, before subscribing to the general opinion, that because they never say "No," they are very respectable and very moral. They are neither one thing nor the other. The husband who never says "No" to his wife, is a fool; and the parent who cannot apply the word to the whims and fancies of his or her children, is worse—for such sugarcandy weakness throws off poison into the stream of society, and thus contaminates waters that, under the best of circumstances, are not very pure. A tradesman who cannot say "No," when asked to lend a sovereign or put his name to a bill, is a rogue to his family, and an encourager of failings and vices in others. It is owing to the criminal blindness of such people, that society is infested by men who live by their wits, or that equally reprehensible body who are always in debt—in fact, subsist entirely by getting into debt—and periodically disincumber themselves of their embarrassments by the process known, in slang technology, as "whitewashing." Such unbusiness-like conduct seriously blunts a man's respectability; and, when regarded morally, it cannot be denied that, if getting into debt is an evil—which it undoubtedly is—those who promote it are committing a very great wrong; and, as respects culpability, the debtor and debtee are about on a par.

They are not respectable, they are not moral, well-doing people; and if we ascend the scale of responsibility incurred by people who never say "No," we shall be at a loss to find terms in which to express censure with sufficient vigour. Take a young girl, for instance. Her parents wish her to be married to a man whom they have selected. She does not love him, but as she has never been in the habit of saying "No" to anything, she acquiesces with a sort of delirious smile, and weds discord—probably misery.

Again, how many young women are courted by men whose conduct they are aware is extremely irregular, and they are almost certain will lead them to destruction. Yet notwithstanding this shuddering apprehension of misfortune—this palpable view of grim shadows cast before coming events—they go the altar, and plight their love to men whom they doubt—and, doubting, of course cannot love; for true affection is a mirror undimmed even by the breath of an angel. And all because they cannot say "No."

The same remark applies to women who are beguiled from home and honour. Instead of arming themselves with a negative as hard as cold steel, they offer but a passive resistance to deceit, and treachery, and cruelty; and in consequence, almost as a matter of course, fall victims as tamely as a lamb yields up its throat to the knife of the butcher. A good "No," sounded from the chest right upwards—not a gasping, smirking denial, but a right loyal and openly spoken womanly negative, would have saved them.

Who can say "No" like a woman? When in earnest, it comes from her rosy lips as piercingly as a gush of wind from the North Pole. Her pursuer is frozen dumb by her attitude; her eyes rain snow-balls, in the shape of "Noes;" her locks glitter with them like icicles, and, in her tout ensemble, she is so repellent, that the person she would drive away sneaks off like a cur at the sight of a whip it has once felt. But the women, as a rule, don't like saying "No;" indeed, when they do utter the word, their eyes, lips, and cheeks are saying "Yes," as plainly as possible; and they are taken at their looks, and so get involved in engagements which too frequently lead to the most deplorable and fatal consequences.

However, of all the people who never say "No," preserve us from those who promise much, without ever intending to perform anything. These are the villains of the social drama daily played before us all—apples goodly to the view, but rotten at the core. Their name is Legion, and they are as oily-tongued as the prince of arch-deceivers himself. They can promise with marvellous unctious, and their appearance may be readily recognised, when we describe them as generally sleek-visaged, smooth-spoken ladies and gentlemen (?) who can talk by the hour with as much gusto as Falstaff did when he described his imaginary encounter with the fiery Hotspur. They are also well crammed with the piety that costs nothing but the breath—are always hopeful, exultant; sometimes chirruping over what is called ill luck and good luck, in a very bird-like fashion. They scatter promises around them, just as a sower does seed; but with the difference, that so many grains of sand would do quite as well. If asked to do a favour, they never say "No"—that would be against their principles, and also might impregnate the odour of benevolence that they collect around them, with something that might probably seriously disturb the celestial atmosphere in which they are thought to move.

Wrapped up in a cloak of spiritual immaculation, they are prodigal of promises. They are smiling heaps of smiling promises. They are not common men and women. Their terrestrial mould has passed through the crucible of a living faith in themselves; and, after a protracted baptism in the waters of promise, they step into the ordinary every-day world to distribute promises—to sleep on promises, to sell promises, to give promises—to be benign and excellent, and preach homilies from texts of promise. They are a rare tribe, and we might describe their features and characters in detail, but we are afraid we should disturb the serenity of these extraordinary beings.

An incident came under our notice not long ago, which may be taken as a pretty fair example of the moral excellence of the whole. A poor man had got into debt with his landlord, and, in consequence, had "a man in possession." The tenant applied to a friend, who had promised over and over again to do him a good turn whenever the opportunity arose.

"Five pounds! I'll do it—call to-morrow!"

The tenant, overjoyed, walked home to console his family. The morrow came, and with it an answer:

"Sorry I am, but couldn't get any money in! Call to-morrow!"

The poor man called on a good many morrows, and, to keep the man in possession as well as his goods, had to make many sacrifices. A fortnight elapsed, and the redemption of the promise was still the same smiling, cheering assurance, that on the morrow the thing should be done. But the broker would wait no longer, and everything was swept away; so that the tenant lost not only his furniture, but a great portion of the wearing apparel of himself and family, which had been disposed of to defray the expenses—and all through a promise!

When the friend heard of the catastrophe, he still promised. This time it was a bright, angelic kind of promise; but days, weeks, rolled by, and the poor man, weary of the promise, looked his disaster manfully in the face, and went to work to earn money to repair it. The promise is no doubt well treasured up in the breast of the friend. He did not lend the money, neither did he refuse, and that was intense consolation to his bright and particular ideas of morality.

But this illustration of these men is far from being the most telling that we could give. We know that some of them could not lie down at night, without having promised something in the course of the day. They are infected by a kind of fever—the promise fever, of course. And when we think of the cruelty, the equivocation, the mental reservation, and the wanton trifling with the feelings of others, of which they are capable, we are tempted to have recourse to those strong expletives in which our language is so rich. However, as quarrelling with them would not eradicate their bad habits, all that we can say or do is, commend us to the man or woman who can say "No" with gusto, and look as if he or she meant it. There is something honest about the word—for, although rough and rugged, it does not deceive. "Yes" is indefinite, and therefore treacherous. But "No" is straightforward, and the person that utters it heartily, can look you in the face without shrinking or blinking, which is more than the people who never say "No" can do. If they did, or even tried to do so, we should not hear of so many distressing cases of misfortune and guilt—so many instances of servants robbing their employers—of parents neglecting or imperfectly performing their duties—of tradesmen and men of business playing with fortune, as a child would with a sharp razor—of sons and daughters being disobedient, and of society being grievously disordered by circumstances under complete control, if common candour and prudence were only allowed fair play.

The moral indolence of one section, and the criminal indifference to truth which distinguishes another section of the people who never say "No," is really awful. We do believe that they are at the bottom of half the mischiefs and disorganisations that twine their legs about the neck of our social system, and make it wan, weary, and halting, as it staggers along under its heavy load.

J. P. II.

A SPIDER LIVING A YEAR WITHOUT FOOD.

MR. T. EDWARDS sends us the following curious particulars:

Having mounted and arranged a number of birds, I put them in a case. The case had lain aside for a short time previous to the front, which is of glass, being put on; and during this time a spider, doubtless on the look-out for a canny nook, managed to take up his quarters among the birds, and was not observed until after the front had been attached, and the whole finished. It was a little vexing to see the unwelcome intruder parading about in the box, as regardless of its contents as if they had been as many old rotten sticks. He walked over one bird, then over another; now in the bottom of the case, then again on the back, sides, &c., until he at last became stationary in one of the corners. Being an eyesore in such a place, he would have been summarily dealt with, but for the case being a close one, and all but hermetically sealed, the reopening of which would have cost some trouble, and not a little risk. The consequence was, the little creature was permitted to remain, in the hope that want would terminate his existence. In this, however, I have been mistaken; and from being looked upon as a grievance, he ultimately became an object of some interest, and has in consequence already more than fully repaid the space which he occupies. Towards noon of the second day of his incarceration he commenced operations in the corner already alluded to, and by breakfast time of the day following the web was completed. The little artisan was then observed to walk slowly, and very sedately, all over the newly formed fabric, seemingly with the view of ascertaining if all was secure. This done, the aperture was next examined, and with more apparent care than was bestowed upon the rest of the structure. This wonderful mechanical contrivance, which serves at once the fourfold purpose of storehouse, banqueting-hall, watch-tower, or of an asylum in times of danger, being found all right, the artificer then took up his station within it, no doubt to await the success of the net which he had spread, and whence, had fortune proved kind, he would boldly have rushed to secure the struggling prey. It happened, however, that no other insect had the misfortune to be imprisoned along with himself, and, as already hinted, none can get in. There, on his watch-tower, he still remains as motionless as a statue. There has the patient little animal continued for the space of twelve months, having taken up his position on the 3rd of October, 1851, and kept watch and ward without ever having moved, night or day, as far as could be observed, except on three occasions, which, however, were so trifling, that they were not worth mentioning. But this is not all, as will be anticipated. The animal being still alive, it follows, as a natural consequence, that life has been sustained during all this time without the least particle of nourishment having been obtained. The little creature is still as life-like as the first day of his imprisonment. This circumstance is not a little curious, and to the naturalist the fact must be of some value. Mr. E. adds, that the longest period during which, so far as he can learn, spiders have been ascertained to have lived without food, is ten months.—Banffshire Journal.

It is said that a remarkable change is in progress among the Jews in every country, owing to a MS. being extensively circulated by an influential rabbi, proving from Scripture, that the time has come when the Jews must set about making preparations for returning to the land of their fathers.

EVERY animal eats as much as it can procure, and as much as it can hold. A cow eats but to sleep, and sleeps but to eat; and not content with eating all day long, "twice it slays the slain," and eats it over again. A whale swallows ten millions of living shrimps at a draught; a nursing canary bird eats its own bulk in a day, and a caterpillar eats five hundred times its own weight before it lies down to rise a butterfly. The mite and maggot eat the very world in which they live—they nestle and build in their roast beef; and the hyena, for want of better fare, eats herself. Yet a maggot has not the gout, and the whale is not subject to sciatia. Nor do we ever hear that an Esquimaux is troubled with the toothache, dyspepsia, or hysterics, though he eats ten pounds of seal and drinks a gallon of oil at a meal, and though his meal lasts as long as his meat.

[EBENEZER ELLIOTT, THE CORN-LAW RHYMER.]

EBENEZER ELLIOTT.

SHEFFIELD is about to honour itself by taking some pains to preserve a copy of the exterior of a man, who, if he was not exactly one of

The poets, who on earth have made us heirs
Of truth and pure delight, in deathless lays,

was at least a man of a robust, energetic temperament, and possessed of just sufficient genius to give force and direction to his peculiar mental tendencies, and at the same time humanise and soften some of the rugged suggestions he had acquired in a school of politics that taught people to consider the unfortunate affair at Peterloo as bad as the massacre of Glencoe, and to look upon the higher classes as tyrants, and the lower, as suffering, bleeding martyrs.

Ebenezer Elliott, the poet, better known as the Corn-law Rhymer, was born a radical reformer. He came into the world at a period when the mind of all Europe was in a ferment, and the seeds sown by the war of American independence were rapidly germinating into living plants. His father was a Dissenter, and evidently a man of extreme political opinions, for he had earned the soubriquet of "Devil Elliott." Ebenezer first saw the light on the 17th of March, 1781, at the New Foundry, Masbro', where his father was employed at a salary of from £60 to £70 a-year, with house, candle, and coal. On Sundays, his father, who called himself a Berean, used to preach the tremendous doctrines of ultra-Calvinism. "On other days," we quote from the autobiography—"he delighted to declaim on the virtues of the slandered Cromwell, and of Washington, the rebel; or, shaking his sides with laughter, explained the glories of 'The glorious victory of His Majesty's forces over the rebels at Bunker's Hill.' Here the reader has a key which will unlock all my future politics."

As if pre-destined to be a murmurer and declaimer against abuses, the young Ebenezer, in his sixth year, had the small-pox, which left him for days frightfully disfigured, and caused him ever afterwards to respond heartily to the sentiment of Haynes Bailey: "Oh, blessed are the beautiful." At twelve, he fell violently in love, and had, it seems, a heavy, thick, supernatural taste for the horrible—"a passion, a rage for seeing the faces of the hanged or the drowned." His disposition being thus of a brooding, solitary caste, he shunned playmates, and everybody nearly who knew him, judged, from this morbid propensity, he was deficient in intellect. He was sent to several schools—but to a boy with the mind like his, the wretched systems of education then in vogue afforded scarcely a ray of knowledge. Hating the imposition of task lessons, he played the truant so often, that his father discovered he was fast hastening to a state of vagabondism, and, as a punishment, sent him to work in the foundry. This had quite the contrary effect to what the father intended, for Elliott himself tells us:

"I could play my part at the York Keelman with the best of its customers; yet I never thoroughly relished the rude company and coarse enjoyments of the alehouse."

A taste for botany, it appears, rescued him from this degradation; and "Thompson's Seasons" falling in his way, the description of the polyanthus and auricula fired his fancy—"botany in verse—a prophecy that the days of scribbling were at hand." His first poetical attempt was an imitation, in rhyme, of Thompson's blank verse thunder-storm. This was a melancholy failure, for Elliott did not know a single rule of grammar, and afterwards acquired nearly all this, as well as every other description of knowledge, more by intuition than anything else: his memory was not mechanical enough for the drudgery of learning by rote. But we give his own explanation of the origin of the power he afterwards wielded so successfully. "It would seem," wrote he, "that my poetical propensities are traceable to certain accidents; but that, about the end of the fourteenth year, my mind began to make efforts for itself. Those efforts, however, were favoured by an accident of importance in the history of my education. A clergyman called Frith, who held a poor curacy at a desolate place called Middlesmoor, bequeathed to my father his library, containing, besides scores of Greek and Latin books, several first-class English works."

At this period, all his reading was desultory; but on this he tersely remarks: "I always took the shortest road to an object: this tendency led me into some errors, but is the principal cause of my ultimate success as an author. I never could read a feeble book through: it follows, that I read master-pieces only—the best thoughts of the highest minds."

After making these and similar remarks, and not doing himself common justice, when he says, "to me a primrose is a primrose, and nothing more," he states, in his brief autobiography, "that from his sixteenth to his twenty-third year, he worked for his father at Masbro', as laboriously as any servant he had, and without wages, except an occasional shilling or two for pocket-money: weighing every morning all the unfinished castings as they were made, and afterwards in their finished state, besides opening and closing the shop in Rotherham, when my brother happened to be ill or absent."

The father at length took the son into partnership; but it proved unfortunate; and, at the former's death, our poetical Vulcan had to begin the world again. He borrowed £100, and, leaving Rotherham, established himself in business at Sheffield. Here, by dealing in the raw material of Sheffield-cutlery—he managed to make a fortune; but the crash of 1837 stripped him of all but £6000, and he was rejoiced, he says, to escape so easily. His biographer and son-in-law, Mr. John Watkins, seizes this point in the life of Elliott to give us the key to his leading opinions, and pithily informs us how he came to be the Corn-law Rhymer.

"Elliott," says he, "had a scape-goat on which to lay all his misfortunes and all the sins of the nation—viz., the Corn Laws. To these he attributed the tantalising uncertainties of life, so vexatious both to employers and the employed—its struggles to mount upwards ever ending with a sudden downfall—capitalists compelled to lower wages, or stop work; and the strikes of labourers, who only saw the stick that struck, and not the hand that held it. That hand, said Elliott, was the bread-tax. In Sheffield, indeed, he had found a congenial sphere: it was here that he first succeeded in business, and here he began to be popular as a poet."

As the Corn-law Rhymes were written for a time of excitement, and under the aggravation of a sense of oppression, they must not be criticised too keenly. His political creed was—

Be supplication dumb,
When charity is deaf.

He would rather demand than entreat: hence the energetic, and, too frequently, coarse style of his far-famed "Corn-law Rhymes." The following is a fair sample of the whole, as regards poetical merit; but it forcibly reminds you of the immortal sonnet of Milton, "Avenge, O Lord, thy slaughtered saints." It is called the Jacobin's Prayer.

Avenge the plundered poor, O Lord!
But not with fire, but not with sword—
Not as at Peterloo they died,
Beneath the hoofs of coward pride.
Avenge our rage, our chains, our sighs,
The famine in our children's eyes!
But not with sword, no, not with fire,
Chastise thou Britain's locustry!
Lord, let them feel thy heavier ire;
Whip them, O Lord, with poverty!
Then cold in soul as confined dust,
Their hearts as tearless, dead, and dry,
Let them in outraged mercy trust,
And find that mercy they deny!

But, as Mr. Watkins has said, "luckily for literature and the fame of the poet, the Corn-law Rhymer has written much poetry that has nothing to do with politics; and this portion of his poetry will live, and transmit his name to posterity." What can be more graphic than his eulogy of the town of which he had constituted himself the bard?

Ere Bedford's loaf, or Erin's stybe be thine,
Cloud-rolling Sheffield! want shall humble all.
Town of the unbowed poor! thou shalt not pine
Like the fallen rustic, licensed Rapine's thrall,
But first to rise, wilt be the last to fall!
Slow are thy sons the pauper's trade to learn;
Though in the land that blossoms like the rose,
The English peasant and the Irish kerne
Fight for potatoes, thy proud labourer knows
Nor workhouse wages, nor the exile's woes.
Not yet thy bit of beef, thy pint of ale,
Thy toll-strung heart which toil could ne'er dismay,
Nor yet thy honest, skilled right hand, shall fail;
Last from thy hearths the poor man's pride shall stray,
And still shall come thy well-paid Saturday,
And still the morn of rest be near and sure.

Or what of the kind could be finer than the following delicate, highly-finished, yet natural portrait of that unfortunate and abused queen, Mary Stuart?

Perhaps the artist might, with cunning hand,
Mimic the morn on Mary's lip of love;
And fancy might before the canvas stand,
And deem he saw the unreal bosom move.
But who could paint her heavenly soul which glows
With more than kindness—the soft thoughts that rove
Over the moonlight of her heart's repose—
The wish to hood the falcon, spare the dove,
Destroy the thorn, and multiply the rose?
Oh, hadst thou words of fire, thou couldst not paint
My Mary, in her majesty of mind,
Expressing half the queen, and half the saint—
Her fancy wild, as pinions of the wind,
Or sky-ascending eagle that looks down
Calm on the homeless cloud he leaves behind,
Yet beautiful as freshest flower full-blown,
That bends beneath the midnight dews, reclined;
Or yon resplendent path o'er ocean's slumber thrown.

The amatory effusions of Ebenezer Elliott are remarkably few in number. His poem on "Love" is a very solid composition, but it glows with fine and soul-elevating thought. The following invocation to the genius of home is unsurpassed by anything in the language:

Blessed is the hearth when daughters gird the fire,
And sons that shall be happier than their sire,
Who sees them crowd around his evening chair,
While Love and Hope inspire his wordless prayer.
Oh, from their home paternal may they go,
With little to unlearn, though much to know.
Them may no poisoned tongue, no evil eye,
Curse for the virtues that refuse to die—
The generous heart, the independent mind—
Till truth, like falsehood, leaves a sting behind.
May Temperance crown their feast, and Friendship share—
May Pity come, Love's sister-spirit, there.
May they shun baseness as they shun the grave;
May they be frugal, pious, humble, brave;
Sweet peace be theirs, the moonlight of the breast
And occupation and alternate rest;
And dear to care and thought the rural walk,
Thine be no flower that withers on the stalk,
But roses cropped, that shall not bloom in vain,
And Hope's blest sun that sets to rise again.
Be chaste their nuptial bed, their home be sweet,
Their floor resound the tread of little feet;
Blessed beyond fear and hate, if blessed by thee
And heirs, O Love! of thine eternity.

Mr. Elliott, who had been long afflicted with severe bodily disease, yielded up his indomitable spirit on the 1st of December, 1849. We say indomitable spirit, because he retained the clear use of his faculties to the last; and although, according to Mr. Watkins, "he lay helpless as a new-born babe, yet, with the strong self-will which had governed him through life, he could not submit to death, but looked, with a frown, as though he resented the intrusion of that stern power into his presence, and was indignant of the advantage which the conqueror was taking of his weak and prostrate condition."

Of the moral worth of this extraordinary man, too much cannot be said. He loved truth for truth's sake. His benevolence was tempered by prudence. He disdained the part of charity-monger. He wished men and women to be hard-working and independent; and, bearing that in mind, few English people, we think, will hesitate to subscribe to the sentiment contained in almost his last epigram:

Though Take's a rogue, and Give's a fool,
Yet Give and Take mean good for good:
Thus, Mine for Thine is blessing doubled
It's pence for pence, its cloth for wood!
It's hay for steel; its work for food!
With two enrich'd, and no one troubled.

In personal appearance the poet was a man rather under the middle size, slightly formed, with features marked by the small-pox, a light-blue eye, eyebrows very shaggy, thick, grey hair, and long upper lip. Our illustration affords an admirable idea of these personal characteristics.

[PALACE OF SULTAN KHOSROO, AT ALLAHABAD.]

TALES OF THE BRAHMINS.

THE FEAST OF RAJAS.

OUR English traveller, in the course of his wanderings in India, visited the city of Allahabad, a place celebrated in the annals of the Mogul dynasty, but now more distinguished for its being one of the permanent stations of the civil establishments attached to the British authority, in the province which has been indebted to the capital for its name.

Following the course of the Ganges, Allahabad is 820 miles from the sea; but the travelling distance from Calcutta is only 550 miles. It stands in latitude 25 deg. 27 min., north, longitude 81 deg. 50 min., east. The population, exclusive of the garrison, is estimated at not more than 30,000.

"The antiquity of the place," Tennant says, "is supported, not only by the tales of ancient tradition, but by large fields of rubbish, which seem to attest its former splendour, as well as its remote origin. The soil, for several miles in the vicinity of the fort, consists of mortar, broken pottery, and brick-dust. The straggling huts cover a space of five miles. Nine-tenths of the buildings are of mud, reared upon the foundations of more substantial edifices of brick, which have long since fallen to decay."

Allahabad, however, was once a very important place, for the Emperor Akbar made it one of his favourite residences, and adorned it with many magnificent edifices. The fortress erected by him was one of the many that extended from Lahore to Chunar, on the Ganges, and so secured his empire, from the confines of Persia to the borders of Bengal. In the present day, Allahabad is esteemed by the Hindoos as the king of worshipped places, because it is near to the junction of the Ganges and the Jumna. It is one of their popular places of resort; and, standing in perhaps the most favourable situation which India affords for a great city, when it is connected by railways with Calcutta, Madras, and Bombay—as no doubt it will, in the course of a very few years—there can scarcely be a question that, under the vigorous rule of the British, it will regain more than its ancient importance—probably become the capital of the Anglo-Indian government.

When our English friend paid it a visit, he found it in a very squalid condition—it having obtained, even among the natives, the soubriquet of "Fakeerabad," or beggars' abode. The principal buildings consisted of the fort, the Jumna Musjeed, and the palace of Sultan Khosroo—all of which have been subsequently repaired at the expense of the Indian government.

The illustration shows this palace when it flourished as an imperial residence; having, very likely, no less a distinguished occupant than Akbar himself, or his still more illustrious grandfather, the renowned Mahomed Baber.

Bishop Heber, referring to this palace, says: "The finest things in Allahabad, are Sultan Khosroo's serai and garden: the former is a noble quadrangle, with four fine Gothic gateways, surrounded—within an embattled wall—by a range of cloisters, for the accommodation of travellers. The whole is now much dilapidated, but was about to be repaired from the town duties, when, unhappily, the Burmese war arrested this excellent appropriation of an unpopular tax. Adjoining this serai, is a neglected garden, planted with fine old mango trees, in which are three beautiful tombs, raised over two princes and a princess of the imperial family. Each consists of a large terrace, with vaulted apartments beneath it, in the central one of which is a tomb like a stone coffin, richly carved. Above, is a very lofty, circular apartment, covered by a dome, richly painted within and without, carved yet more beautifully. All these are very solemn and striking, rich, but not florid or gaudy."

As our traveller surveyed this splendid pile, his fancy reverted to the period when its arcades, supported by beautiful Moorish pillars, were thronged by the great men who sustained the dignity of the Mogul court; when the fountains in the courtyards sparkled and murmured in the blazing sun, and richly-caparisoned elephants marched solemnly round them; while Arab steeds, bearing fierce warriors—probably ferocious Afghans—pranced about, and the whole palace glittered in savage splendour.

Turning to the intelligent Brahmin who acted as his guide, he said:

"The history of India, my learned friend, seems to me a cycle of changes. When I look upon this beautiful palace, from which luxurious emperors once issued commands, that millions obeyed without a murmur, I am reminded that from this very spot, a few centuries ago, the Hindoo Maharajah did precisely the same thing; and now the authority of both has passed away, and a people from a distant island rule the whole territory from Cape Cormorin to the Valley of Cashmere: a people, my friend, who were only sea pirates when Alexander visited these regions, and were sunk in the barbarisms of what we call the middle ages, when, in the year 1000, the great Sultan Mahmood poured his legions from the north-west, and scoured the plains of India as far as Allahabad, even to Benares, your holiest cities. Hindoos and Mussulmen both seem to have yielded to an inscrutable but invincible destiny."

The Brahmin, with a countenance as passionless as a bronze-visaged idol, answered:

"All things change but the Creator of all things. As he is all, and in all things, and by him are all things, so does he order all things to change but himself."

"A sound Christian doctrine," observed the Englishman.

"It is the doctrine of the religion of Brahma," replied the pundit; "and whatever name we give him, he is always the same."

"Do you style Brahma the Deity?"

"Yes, we have no other name for the impalpable essence, beyond the power of our faculties to comprehend, which we call God. Brahma is the Hindoo Great One. But there have been many avatars of God in different lands. You Christians have had one, so have the Mussulmen, and so has every land and every people. There is a spirit in whom God is more especially, and who cometh from God, and is with God, and is likewise God; who hath made known to man the will of God, and the father of all, whom we call Krishnu, and worship as God's image, and believe to be the same as the sun."

"It is a singular worship, but it has undergone many modifications," said the Englishman; "the Hindoos in many parts do not worship Surya."

"No, but they have other emblems for the same active creative power. Behold our monuments and images, do they not all refer to the primary universal agent—life, light, soul, or however else you may choose to symbolise a thing which is, was, and must be."

A loud shouting and beating of drums was heard outside the palace walls; and upon the Englishman inquiring the cause, the Brahmin said:

"It is the beginning of the festival of Ramayuna. If you wish to behold it, I will conduct you to a convenient spot."

The traveller gladly assented, and while on their way

* The sun. Bishop Heber says: "Traits of resemblance to the history of our Lord are in fact to be found in the midst of all the uncleanness and folly in the popular legends respecting Krishnu."

to it, the Brahmin, with unctuous gravity, informed him that what he was going to see was another proof of the unchangeable character of the Hindoos and their institutions.

"The festival of Rama," said he, "has been held for more than two thousand years, and in precisely the same manner: so that the incarnation of Brahma must have visited the earth some thousands of years before."

The Englishman was too eager to see the show, to pause to enter into a chronological discussion; so, while listening to his guide in silence, he was conducted within the lines formed by Sepoy soldiers, and placed opposite the awning, in the principal street, under which the performance was going on. That consisted of a Hindoo drama, of which the chief characters were played by children. Rama, his brother Luchmun, and his betrothed wife, Seeta, were children about twelve years old. Each of the boys had a gilt bow in his left hand, and a sabre in his right; their naked bodies were almost covered with ornaments and tinsel; they had high, tinsel crowns on their heads, their foreheads and bodies were spotted with charcoal, and altogether they perfectly resembled the statues of Hindoo deities—

Except that of their eyes alone,
The twinkle showed they were not of stone.

Seeta wore a gorgeous veil of flimsy finery. The action of the play consisted of Seeta being stolen away by Ravana and his attendant evil spirits, and Rama and Luchmun going into the jungle in search of her. Huniman, the famous general of the monkeys, proffers his assistance; and the next scene disclosed a first and unsuccessful attack of Rama and his army on the fortress of the gigantic ravisher. The fortress was an inclosure of bamboos, covered with paper, and painted with doors and windows, within which was a frightful paper giant, fifteen feet high, with ten or twelve arms, each grasping either a sword, an arrow, a bow, a battle-axe, or a spear. The brothers, in a splendid palkee, were conducting the retreat of their army; the divine Huniman, as naked, and almost as hairy as the animal he represented, was gambolling before them, with a long tail tied round his waist, a mask to represent the head of a baboon, and two great painted clubs in his hands. His army followed—a number of men, with similar tails and masks, their bodies dyed with indigo, and also armed with clubs.

"Rama and Bacchus are one!" exclaimed the Englishman to himself. "Here we have Bacchus, his brother Ampelus, the Satyrs, and the Great Pan commanding them. I wonder whether the Greek fable is a copy of the Indian? I am afraid it is, and that if we were too curiously to inquire into a number of other things, we should have to part with many a cherished conviction as well as classic tradition."

As the pageant had now concluded, the Brahmin informed him that there yet remained three days of festival before Seeta's release, purification, and re-marriage to her hero lover. The pundit, however, did not state that, although the show was then a very innocent one, in "the good old times" before the British police was established, there prevailed a hideous practice, which shows the Hindoo superstition in a shocking light.

The poor children who had been thus feasted, honoured, and made to contribute to the popular amusement, were always poisoned in the sweetmeats given them on the last day of the performances, that it might be said their spirits were absorbed into the deities whom they had represented. Nothing of this sort can now be done. The children, instead of being brought for the purpose from a distance, by the priests, are the children of neighbours, whose prior and subsequent history is known; and Rama and Seta now grow old, like other boys and girls.

* The brothers Bala Rama and Krishnu flourished, it is supposed, about 3000 years ago. Rama is the Indian Hercules. He was a warrior, and, together with his brother Krishnu, subjugated nearly the whole of India.

"What do you think of what you have seen of our Hindoo drama?" inquired the Brahmin.

"It has its moral," was the reply. "But it is the same story which has been told from age to age in every country, and among every people. The giant Ravana is tyranny—or, rather, power grown cruel and licentious; Seta and Luchinnu are the oppressed people; Rama is the patriot, and Hanuman, the monkey warrior, represents wisdom or cunning. But, considering that this drama has been played in India for, as you say, upwards of two thousand years, and I do not the least doubt it—I say, considering that, I much wonder that the people have been so blind to the lesson it teaches as to submit so passively, so mechanically, as they have done, to foreign invaders and domination. The Mussulman tyranny was a dreadful one—the most detestable that could possibly be imposed on the liberties and consciences of any people; yet it endured for upwards of six centuries, and was only broken at last by decay, produced by internal dissensions."

The Brahmin sighed, as he said:

"Alas! treachery and ambition can pull down a good house as well as build up a bad one. If you have no objection, I will tell how it came to pass that the followers of the Gentile avator, Mahomet, acquired empire in the land of the Indi."

The Englishman cheerfully acquiesced; and, after each had partaken of some refreshments in the abode of the priest, the latter told the following story—which, it may be mentioned, is based, in all its leading details, on authenticated history.

THE FEAST OF RAJAHS.

Towards the close of the twelfth century of the Christian era, the present city of Allahabad was a Hindoo one of much celebrity, being called Prayag, which means the sacred confluence of the Jumna and Ganges. Benares and the holy cities, as they were called, were in possession of the Maharajah, or Emperor of India, who at that time was Jychund Rathore, whose capital was Kanojee. This monarch had a magnificent kingdom, and was very popular. All the other rajahs paid him homage, and he was of so tolerant a disposition, that many natives of Persia and Tartary were engaged in his service.

But it appears that as Jychund waxed older, he was not satisfied with an implied supremacy over the reigning monarchs of India, but insisted upon its acknowledgment in due form.

He called a meeting of Brahmins and warriors, at Prayag, where there was a holy bathing-place; and, after the whole court had passed in solemn procession through the subterranean temple, and touched the sacred tree and drunk out of the sacred spring within its dark recesses, the monarch adjourned to his palace, which stood on the very spot where the accursed palace of the accursed Mussulmen now stands.

Having ascended his throne, he placed his crown * of jewels, that shot light upwards, like light from the morning sun, upon his brows, and at this signal Brahmins and warriors fell prostrate in mute adoration.

"Brahmins, princes, and potentates," cried the monarch, in a loud voice, "after much prayer and meditation, the descendant of Rama, Yom, Surya, and the Surya of all the Indis, has resolved to perform the Raisoo Yag, the great sacrifice which shall proclaim him lord and emperor of the world. Scatter yourselves, heralds, far and wide, and command our rajahs to attend the solemn feast!"

The assembled multitude sprang to their feet, and, after giving vent to their joy in deafening acclamations, retired, with low obeisances. A cloud of Brahmins encircled the monarch, and he was conducted to the temple of the dead forked tree, to invoke the strength of Brahma, as Rama, his great ancestor, had done before him.

When the news of this royal determination had been spread abroad, all the rajahs of India—even those from the Indus to the Brahmapootra, and from the Cow's Mouth, in the snow-capped Himalaya, to the solemn temple of the Black Bull in Tanjore—cheerfully hastened to assist at the sacred ceremonial. Pithowra, the Rajah of Delhi, alone was rebellious.

When the royal mandate reached him, he was at the head of his body guards, exercising them in the great inclosure behind the gardens of his palace.

Pithowra was in the full flush and vigour of manhood. Thirty summers had not passed over his head, and yet he had seven times overthrown the Moslems in as many pitched battles. On the last occasion, he had vanquished a hundred thousand Turkish, Persian, and Afghan cavalry, led in person by the renowned Mahommed Ghouri, the conqueror of Lahore, and pursued them, with prodigious slaughter, for forty miles. No wonder, then, that he was esteemed as the mightiest warrior and bulwark of India, or that his undaunted courage should have been accompanied by unconquerable pride.

When the herald approached, bearing a splendid present from the emperor, the youthful and strikingly handsome rajah reined in his foaming steed, and, bowing his head, received the envoy from the descendant of Rama with profound respect. The herald fell on his knees, and, while thus prostrate, said:

"Jychund, the lord and emperor of the Indi, the master of the world, the invincible and illustrious, the light of heaven, Surya, sends greeting."

"How!" exclaimed the rajah, instantly covering his head; "Surya, didst thou say?"

"Even so—Jychund is the Sun of the World!"

The wrath of Pithowra blazed terrifically, but, restraining himself, he said:

"There is only one Surya, and that is Pithowra, in whose veins flows the golden blood and life of Krishnu, the chief manifestation of the power of Brahma!"

The herald, unimpaired, performed his office, and then the anger of the rajah rolled forth in terrific volumes. He heaped every kind of execration on the head of the Rajah of Kanojee—as he styled the emperor—and then, as his fury exhausted itself, he assumed a tone of scorn, and, as he dismissed the herald, tauntingly exclaimed:

"Let the son of Rama befool himself as he may. The feast of rajahs is not complete without the son of Krishnu—and Pithowra is too great to grace the sacrilegious ambition of an upstart by his presence! Begone! Pithowra defies and contemns Jychund and all his race, and all his mockeries!"

As eastern sovereigns, when ruffled, were apt to forget the difference between an ambassador and a vile paria, the herald hastily retired from the illustrious presence of the descendant of Krishnu, and rode out of the city as swiftly as his fleet Arab steed could bear him.

The Rajah of Delhi, being naturally as magnanimous as hasty, soon dismissed the circumstance from his consideration, and busied himself in perfecting the discipline of his army, and directing the government of his kingdom.

This serenity, however, was not to endure long, for one day a minstrel—the favourite of all the courts in India, particularly at that of Delhi—made his appearance; and, as, by virtue of his office, for which he had been specially trained from the earliest infancy, he was privileged to enter the royal harem, the rajah sent him an invitation, and he was speedily ushered into the recesses of the zenana.

After diverting the ladies with his ballads of love, war, and adventure, the rajah, as was customary, asked him what news there was abroad.

The face of the minstrel became troubled, as he replied:

"Much that concerns your highness."

"Indeed! are the Ghizians about to pour down again upon us from their mountains? If so, we are ready to drive them back!"

"Worse than that!"

The rajah laughed, and said:

"As I apprehend no danger from any other quarter—indeed, fear none from any—speak, Chanda, openly, and reserve thy poetical riddles for another day."

"The Maharajah!" answered Chanda, tremblingly.

"What of him?" asked the rajah, carelessly, as he toyed with the long, flowing locks of his Cashmerian favourite.

"He has appointed a day for the Raisoo Yag!"

"The old fool!"

"And he has sworn that your highness shall be present either in person, or by deputy."

"Ah! proceed good Chanda—proceed! Nay, never turn so pale: your person is as sacred as our own."

The minstrel, thus encouraged, delivered himself of the astounding intelligence, that Jychund, on learning how his envoy had been received, had resolved on leading an army against Delhi; but the courtiers represented that such an undertaking would require a long time for execution—while the hour appointed for the sacrifice was near at hand. Their remonstrances had prevailed with the emperor; but, in order to make the festival as little incomplete as possible by the absence of Pithowra, they had made an effigy of him in gold, and intended to give it the office of porter at the gate.

It has been stated that Pithowra was hot-tempered; but on this occasion he never uttered a word; yet everybody could perceive that he was choking with rage, and that, had the throat of the fair damsel by his side been in his grasp, instead of her thick hair, she would inevitably have supped that night with Seraswati herself.

After a dreadful pause, during which the ladies of the zenana trembled like frightened birds, the rajah said, in a husky voice:

"We thank you, Chanda: your news is worthy ten crores of rupees; but, as we have not so much to spare in these stirring times, thou shalt have a chain of gold, and an office about our person!"

So saying, the rajah gathered his robe about his chest, and strode out of the apartment. The ladies evaporated in a whirlwind of gauze and dazzling-white ankles, and the minstrel, picking up his cittern, hurried to a less dangerous part of the palace.

In the meantime, the preparations for the Raisoo Yag had proceeded with such order and energy, that, when the appointed day arrived, it was found that due provision had been made for every portion of the ceremony.

An effigy of gold, attired in the costume of a rajah, stood at the palace entrance, holding in its hand a formidable key; and, by some curious contrivance, it inclined its head obsequiously to every guest as he entered. It would be too tedious to enter into all the details of this memorable sacrifice. To describe the countless number of self-tortured devotees, or the sacrifice of the thousand virgins, or the largeness and magnificence of the gifts to the emperor, or the unprecedented success of the Rama-yuna spectacle, or the omens vouchsafed on the occasion by Brahma himself, would require volumes: therefore, O Englishman, I must hurry you on to the last day—the day of the Feast of Rajahs."

Ten thousand guests were assembled in the hall of audience, and twice ten thousand goblets of wine sparkled on the tables: for, on that day, as well as on many other days, Hindoos are allowed to indulge in libations in honour of the vicereigns of heaven. The flesh of the goat and of the birds of the air they may eat, but not the flesh of the oxen.

All went merrily in the hall, for fire was in every eye, and joy on every lip; and, after a thousand cocks had been sacrificed, to appease the infernal gods, the herald proclaimed the sovereign will.

"Honour, glory, and a long and peaceful reign to the Surya!"

This was received with acclamation.

"Confusion to his enemies!"

So was this.

"May he ascend to Swenga, and not go down to Narac, when Yamen calls him!"*

This was boisterously echoed.

"If fate wills his soul should stay on earth, may it not enter an unclean animal, or a vegetable, or a mineral!"

So was this.

But when the herald came to denounce the emperor's personal enemies, the applause redoubled in vehemence.

"Death and disgrace to Pithowra, the false Rajah of Delhi!" screamed the herald.

"He is a paria: he worships the obscene Maritale!" shrieked the guests.

The shouts had scarce died away, when a guest arose. He was young, tall, handsome, and had a death-dealing eye.

"Pithowra is here!" he cried, in a voice of thunder, as he waved above his head a sword of flaming brightness, and at one blow smote off the head of the rajah nearest to him.

This was the signal for five hundred warriors—sober and terrible as Krishnu, the prophet and soldier—to start from their seats, and begin the work of slaughter. The guests, surprised and terrified, fell an easy prey to the swords of the exasperated guards of the Rajah of Delhi; and it was not until the troops of the emperor began to surround the building, that they retreated, carrying with them the effigy which had provoked this sanguinary retaliation. Of rajahs, nobles, and Brahmins, above a thousand fell that day. The emperor escaped unhurt; and next day would have carried fire and sword into the heart of Delhi, had not his courtiers prevailed upon him to consider how unequal the contest would be with such a celebrated general as Pithowra. The emperor paused, and after a few moments' reflection, cried out:

"We will marry our daughter to the Rajah of Malwal, and, with our united forces, we will bear down upon the murderer, like a mountain rolled by the hands of the gods of the winds and the waters!"

This was a wise resolution, and was warmly approved of by the courtiers; and the emperor, after ordering a purification of his durbar, departed to announce his intention to the peerless Aileen, his daughter.

That priceless and incomparable pearl of beauties was a tall girl, with a full, rounded figure, the limbs and gait of an Amazon, the eye of an eagle, but the soft lips of Suradevi, and cheeks as smooth and delicate as the peach in its ripened beauty. She was also as accomplished in mind as person, being a proficient in the Hindostanee, Persian, and Talmul languages, besides having a knowledge of half a score of Indian dialects. She had heard of the exploits of Pithowra, and that, acting on a warm imagination, which had previously been touched by glowing descriptions of the beauty of his person and the heroism of his character, had created within her a violent prepossession in his favour. Therefore, when her august parent entered the zenana unannounced, as was his custom, and found her, as usual, splendidly attired, and made known to her his errand, he was inexpressibly surprised to find her obstinately averse to his proposed disposition of her hand.

"The Rajah of Malwal is rich!" urged the emperor.

"He is old and ugly!" was the tart reply.

"I have promised!" rejoined the emperor.

"I have not!" responded his daughter.

Rather ruffled, the emperor said, angrily:

"Am I not your father?"

"Yes; and in that assurance, I am satisfied you have my happiness at heart!"

Somewhat mollified by this answer, the emperor took a seat, and deigned to explain to his daughter the awkward position in which he was placed.

"The blood of my subjects, of my allies, of my friends, must be avenged," said he; "and, as I cannot carry war into the territories of that fiend Pithowra, without assistance, you must, you see, marry the Rajah of Malwal."

"I will neither marry the Rajah of Malwal, nor will I be made the instrument of inflicting any injury on the Rajah of Delhi!" was Aileen's resolute reply to this parental mode of reasoning.

"Not injure the Rajah of Delhi?" exclaimed the emperor.

"No!"

"He is a murderer—an assassin!"

"He is valiant—he is a hero!"

The emperor sprang to his feet as nimbly as if he had been stung by a nagao (cobra di capello), and heaped upon his daughter such a torrent of reproaches, that she became exasperated into the utterance of divers undutiful retorts, and finally avowed a fixed and rooted passion for the Rajah of Delhi.

"I love him!" she passionately exclaimed. "His valour is magnificent, and if he did slay your minions—would he had cleared your court of the vermin—they deserved it. Nay, they deserved more: they should have died by less illustrious hands. Pariahs should have backed them to pieces!"

Swenga is the first heaven; Narac, the region of serpents.

* The solar nimbus is common to Indian, Persian, Grecian, and Christian representations of sacred or royal personages. Its use in India has been traced as far back as the days of Noah.

The emperor was staggered, but not subdued, by this burst of passion. He gave the princess three days to consider, and, at the end of that time, she seemed as resolute as ever. He expelled her from his harem, and had her closely confined in a separate palace, where she was subjected to many hardships and indignities. But, despite them all, she remained firm. She had set her woman's heart on a certain purpose, and neither force nor guile should make her swerve from her adopted line of action.

Such an extraordinary circumstance soon obtained the most extensive publicity. Of course it was wafted to the ears of Pithowra, and he immediately fell desperately in love with the maiden; not more on account of her charms—which, although he had not seen them, he had heard extravagantly praised—than the romantic generosity of her passion for him, the enemy of her father. And thus it happened that a prince and a princess, known to each other only by repute, conceived for each other an affection which actually acquired more force and tenacity through the unparalleled obstacles that not only opposed its gratification, but actually prevented its mutual avowal. Each was ignorant that the passion was reciprocated.

Pithowra was so constituted, that he could not despair. Like his fabled ancestor, he never set but to rise again in renewed brilliancy. Knowing the talent for intrigue possessed by the minstrels who wandered from court to court, he summoned Chanda to his presence, and candidly explained the novel difficulty into which he had been plunged.

The minstrel sympathised with the rajah as readily as if he had been the mighty Cama himself; and, after divers consultations, to the intense regret of all the fashionable people in Delhi, one day he disappeared. The loss was irreparable; for, in that age, a minstrel filled the place now occupied by books, songs, instrumental music, newspapers, and gossiping tea-parties. However, he had vanished, and, for a whole month, Pithowra was sad and gloomy. The whisper ran through the court that Surya was in a state of eclipse.

The Princess Aileen endured the restraint which had been put upon her previously limited freedom, with firmness. A gentle languor had crept over her senses, and, while revelling in delightful day-visions of love, her maiden heart was soothed by the delicious lull which had fallen upon her soul; and which, as a foretaste of joy, steals upon the senses of all of us some time in our lives, like incense wafted from the far-off future. In the evening she would gaze upon the sky, and in the twinkling of the stars read her love and its destiny. While thus occupied one evening, she heard music beneath the lattice at which she stood, and, as she listened, a rich voice trilled a sweet Indian lay. The burden of it was, that an "Indian prince was dying for the bird which had sought his nest, and until he could see the silken fringe shut softly on her starry eyes, he would know no rest."

Aileen's pulse fluttered with delicious fear. Had Pithowra heard of her love for him, and what did he think of her?

The minstrel sang a bolder lay. It was of a prince as handsome in person as he was dauntless in war; it compared him to Agniasthra hurling his thunderbolts from the Himalaya to the plains of India, and then represented him as resting in gloom and solitude, pierced to the heart by one of Cama's flower-wreathed shafts. Aileen could not be mistaken—it was a messenger from Pithowra. Love is daring, and she spoke. The minstrel replied:

"The gold of Delhi is in the eyes of the guard. Listen, lady, to the song of Chanda, the messenger of Pithowra."

He then, in glowing terms, described the burning love of the rajah for the beautiful Aileen, his rage and distraction at her cruel imprisonment, and his determination to risk life and kingdom in the attempt to effect her deliverance. The princess returned an agreeable answer, and thus a correspondence between the lovers was opened and maintained, in despite of the vigilance of the emperor and the hundred thousand troops he had drawn round the sacred city.

Pithowra, disdaining to try what peaceful mediation could effect, one dark night accompanied Chanda as one of his attendants, and pleaded his affection in person. Aileen returned it with ardour, and, in the morning, the emperor found the officer of the guards, and some score of sentinels, cut to pieces, and the cage of his daughter empty.

He would have gone mad, had not a wily courtier suggested that he might revenge himself by calling in foreign assistance.

"By the Ring of Justice I will!" he cried. "I will form a league with the Turk, the Persian, even the robber bands of Sind and Guzerat, but I will be avenged!"

"Call in Mahommed, the Sultan of Ghizni," suggested a noble.

The fatal advice was taken, and the emperor entered into a league with the common enemy of India.

Pithowra was so wholly engrossed with his lovely bride, that the foe had entered his kingdom ere he could tear himself from her arms. But when he did so, he was once again the soldier. All his valour, however, proved fruitless. The hardy warriors of Khorassan and the fierce chivalry of Arabia, united to the forces of Jyehund, were too powerful for him to offer an effectual resistance. In the battle which ensued, on the plains of Tanassar, victory deserted him, and Mahommed and Jyehund entered Delhi in triumph.

"Alas!" concluded the Brahmin; "the infidel took such a violent fancy to the fertile plains, rich valleys, and opulent cities of India, that he shortly afterwards turned his arms against Jyehund himself, and, having easily overthrown him, became master of the largest and most wealthy provinces in Hindostan. He levelled Prayag to the ground; and, having built another city on its site, which he adorned with many palaces and mosques, he commanded it to be called ALLAHABAD, or the Lord's Abode—as if the Divinity could be said to reside among infidels. But the followers of the avator of the Arabs founded a powerful empire, which in after ages, descended to the grandchildren of the savage Mogul, Timour: and thus was established that mighty monarchy, which you English now, as if in mockery of its nothingness, permit to be styled, by heraldic right, the dominions of the Great Mogul. As for Pithowra and his wife, Aileen, some accounts state that he was slain in the battle, and she was transferred to the harem of the Ghiznian conqueror; but another and more probable account is, that he was taken prisoner, and, having made terms with Mahommed, was allowed to retire to the mountains of Nepal, and take the beautiful Aileen with him. Most certain it is, that among Ghooora tribes there is a tradition, that centuries ago they were governed by a mighty chief, who had only one wife, whom he loved so dearly, that when she died he took up his abode in a mountain-hut by her tomb, and offered himself as a living sacrifice to the Judge of departed souls."

SCIENCE.

NEW INVENTIONS, ETC.

POWER OF SIGHT IN BIRDS.—The swallow, while flying at the rate of three miles a minute, is yet employed in looking up and down, right and left, for the minute insects on which it feeds, and which it captures and swallows without any diminution of the prodigious speed at which it is travelling.

DEPTH OF THE OCEAN.—Captain Denham, R.N., now prosecuting a scientific voyage, recently read a paper at the Royal Society, in which the deepest sounding of the ocean ever made was recorded. On the passage from Rio de Janeiro to the Cape of Good Hope, in 36 deg. 49 min. south latitude, and 37 deg. 6 min. west longitude, on a calm day, the ocean was ascertained to be 7706 fathoms deep—7.7 geographical miles. The weight of the superincumbent water was so excessive, that a bottle of fresh water being lowered to a great depth in the sea, the pressure drove in the cork, and expelled the contents, the seawater taking the place of the fresh.

TO MAKE RAISIN WINE EQUAL TO SHERRY.—Let the raisins be well washed and picked from the stalks; to every pound thus prepared and chopped, add one quart of water, which has been boiled and has stood till it is cold. Let the whole stand in the vessel for a month, being frequently stirred. Now let the raisins be taken from the cask, and let the liquor be closely stopped in the vessel. In the course of a month let it be racked into another vessel, leaving all the sediment behind, which must be repeated till it becomes fine, when add to every ten gallons, six pounds of fine sugar, and one dozen of Seville oranges, the rinds being pared very thin, and infused in two quarts of brandy, which should be added to the liquor at its last racking. Let the whole stand three months in the cask, when it will be fit for bottling; it should remain in the bottle for a twelvemonth. To give it the flavour of Madeira, when it is in the cask, put in a couple of green citrons, and let them remain till the wine is bottled.

IMPROVEMENTS IN THE PRESERVATION OF WOODS AND METALS FROM DECAY.—The composition specified in Machabee's patent, is formed by melting together three one-fifth parts of vegetable tar, one part of mineral tar, one-sixth part of resin turpentine of Pinus Larix, one-third part of wax, one-sixth part of white grease, with or without the addition of one-third part of Roman cement, and a similar quantity of hydraulic lime, in fine and sifted powder. The mineral ingredients are added to the others when in a boiling state, but are only required in those cases in which the material to be coated with the composition of mastic is to be exposed to the action of heat. The composition is applicable to wood, metal, brickwork, &c., the surfaces of which must be well cleaned prior to its application, which may be effected by means of a brush, whilst in a heated state, and any number of coats may be employed. When the composition is used for covering the inner surfaces of walls, a coating of plaster is applied over the mastic.

IMPROVEMENTS IN GENERATING STEAM.—Mr. S. Cable, of St. Louis, U. S., has taken out a patent for a new mode of generating steam, by which he proposes to dispense with boilers altogether. His plan is to employ a metallic net work, similar to Ericsson's, upon which, when in a properly heated state, jets of water will be thrown, and, being immediately converted into steam, will be conveyed to the steam-chest, where it will be employed in the usual manner. The advantages claimed are economy in fuel, and safety from explosion. How he proposes to restore the heat we do not know.

THE SHIP-WORM.—Destructive as the ship-worm unquestionably is, nevertheless its services could ill be dispensed with. Though a devastator of ships and piers, it is also a protector of both: for, were the fragments of wreck and masses of stray timber, that would choke harbours and clog the waves, permitted to remain undestroyed, the loss of life and injuries to property that would result, would soon far exceed all the damages done and dangers caused by the teredo. This active shell-fish is one of the police of Neptune—a scavenger and clearer of the sea. It attacks every stray mass of floating or sunken timber with which it comes into contact, and soon reduces it to harmlessness and dust. For one ship sunk by it, a hundred are really saved; and, whilst we deprecate the mischief and distress of which it has been the unconscious cause, we are bound to acknowledge that, without its operations, there would be infinitely more treasure buried in the abysses of the deep, and venturesome mariners doomed to watery graves.—Westminster Review.

ON THE CAUSES OF EARTHQUAKES.

Few, if any of your readers any more than myself, ever had it in their power to read a simple description of earthquakes, and the atmospheric conditions under which they occur, so as to enable them to judge correctly of the theories already propounded, or to enable them to advance one more in accordance with facts. To judge correctly of the cause of earthquakes, I would submit the following description, observed at Comrie and immediate neighbourhood, a village in the western district of Perthshire.

There are four forms in which earthquakes are exhibited. 1. The perpendicular: in these sometimes there is but one heave, more generally two; on one occasion there were three heaves. When there is more than one heave, they are in rapid succession; but more so in dry weather than in damp. There is a quivering of the ground, while I cannot find that the shocks are perpendicular above a mile in diameter. Assuming the centre to be a short distance north of Comrie, one thing is certain: at the distance of two miles from the assumed centre, the shocks are felt inclined. Those in opposite directions held contrary opinions as to the source of the shock. The second class have a side motion—like the wave. With these earthquakes there is sometimes one side wave, but more generally two: I never observed three. The third class is merely a slight tremour of the ground, such as is produced by the rapid motion of a carriage passing through the village. I am not aware that this class of earthquake is observed six miles distant from Comrie, whilst the two former are often transmitted great distances from that place. The fourth class is nothing but a slight explosive sound, more distinctly heard in the open air than in houses: in this respect it is the reverse of the other three. I contend that it is wrong to class them as earthquakes: they are, however, more frequent than the others, and on some occasions, very numerous, but are not heard at any distance, the loudest not extending two miles from the seat alluded to. These are all the forms of earthquakes observed at Comrie.

The sounds of earthquakes, from the different forms they assume, and the different degrees of intensity, it is impossible to describe; but they are not so loud in the open air as is generally supposed; but, as the sound is caused by the motion of the earth, any one may understand that the sound will be different upon different strata. Let it be distinctly noted, that the shock is felt at Comrie before the sound is heard: at a distance from Comrie the sound is heard first; at greater distances, the space of time elapsing betwixt first hearing the sound and feeling the shock is greater—clearly proving that the velocity of the earthquake shock is less than that of sound.

As to the atmospheric conditions under which different earthquakes occur, I may state, in the first place, that they occur in hot, in cold in wet, and in dry weather; likewise in windy, and what we understand by calm weather; but not during easterly or westerly winds. As this is an important point, I repeat that, when an earthquake occurs in windy weather, the wind is either from the north or south points, or nearly so. Again, on many occasions, when the state of the atmosphere permitted such observation, I observed that when the under-current of air, at the time of an earthquake, was from the south, there was an upper current from the north, and vice versa. All the earthquakes that have occurred here were preceded by much wind or rain, within twenty-four hours of their occurrence. At the instant of the shocks occurring, there were great quantities of aqueous vapours in the lower regions of air, either in the form of clouds, mist, hail, &c. I am positive that it was so with all the earthquakes since 1839, excepting the second on the night of the 23rd of October, 1839. At the time of the first shock that night, which was perpendicular, it was not only dark, but the air felt thick; at the time of the second, which was undulating, it was clear; yet, from the fact that it was getting clearer at the time of the shock, I am justified in assuming that the aqueous vapours were moving at the time. All the earthquakes that occur in dull or wet weather, are slower in motion and longer in duration, as the one in wet weather will be found to last three or four times as long as the one in dry weather. The earthquakes are not felt in all parts of this district alike: the shocks are much more severe upon good stratum than on bad; all the houses that were damaged were situated where there was a very wet substratum, and no houses were damaged where there was a depth of dry soil.

Mr. Editor, I think we might as well attempt to submerge the British Isles, as to attempt the solution of the earthquake problem, upon the hypothesis of their being the effects of molten matter in the interior of the earth. Those who think otherwise, may try their ingenuity to make it out; but let them not forget the injury they do to the inhabitants of earthquake countries, who suffer more terror from false theories and exaggerated statements, than from the earthquakes themselves.

I will now very briefly state what appears to me to be the cause of earthquakes. First, no person doubts but that the sound of the earthquake is produced by the motion of the ground consequent on the shock. If so, the earth must move before the sound is heard; and as the neighbourhood of Comrie is the only part where the shock is felt before the sound is heard, it follows that earthquakes must originate there; and as in other parts the sound is heard before the shock is felt, it shows that the earthquake moves with a velocity less than that of sound. Again, the fact that earthquakes in dry weather, being more abrupt and greater in velocity than earthquakes in dull, wet weather, shows that they originate in the surface stratum, so as to be controlled by the solar influences; it likewise points to electricity as the agent—electricity being higher in tenacity in dry weather than in wet. Again, the fact that at the time of the great earthquakes occurring there were great quantities of aqueous vapours in the lower regions of the air, and the shocks being severest where there was most aqueous matter at or near the surface of the earth, shows that aqueous matter has much to do with the cause of earthquakes; in short, it is the medium through which electricity acts in producing the earthquake phenomenon. In this case, what could be more natural than that the largest quantity of vapour in the lower regions should produce the greater earthquake? What could be more natural than that, when the aqueous vapour was stationary, the earthquake should be perpendicular? and what could be more natural than that, when the aqueous vapour was moving, the earthquake should be side or undulating? It is most probable that, at the instant of the shock, there is a conjunction of the higher and lower currents in the air above-mentioned. Again, most probably those explosive sounds that are so frequently heard, are caused by the explosion of oxygen and hydrogen gas, consequent upon the decomposition of water in the trap rock under the bed of the River Lednock, where the centre or seat of earthquakes' disturbance is. One thing is certain—those living nearest this spot, hear more of these explosive sounds than others. Here it will be proper to observe, that the course of the Lednock is north and south—the direction of the winds under which the earthquakes occur. I am aware that some still hold the seat of earthquakes to be under some of the neighbouring hills.

Lastly, I will give what appears to me, from a review of the whole facts bearing upon the question, the origin of the Comrie earthquakes, which began in 1788. In 1787, a magnetic rock was opened out for a quarry, for the benefit of the hewers of Comrie, upon the edge of the River Lednock; a short distance south from the centre of the earthquake, the magnetic rock dips north under the river, where different geological formations underlie each other. Previous to the excavation, the magnetic rock was covered with dry soil, so as to exclude the atmospheric influences; but when the quarry was opened, a medium of communication for the magnetic disturbances opened, which did not previously exist. That this is the true solution, the following facts will strongly support: From the opening the quarry until 1809, the hewers frequently required stones: by the frequent quarrying, a fresh surface of the magnetic rock was exposed to the atmosphere: this period was marked by very frequent earthquakes—many of them were very alarming. About 1809, a young nobleman, who at present stands high in her Majesty's councils, came with his sister to reside in Comrie Mansion, which is near the quarry: in consequence of this, the hewers were forbidden the use of the quarry until about 1817 or 1818, when it was reopened.

During the period that the quarry was shut, a marked change took place in the earthquakes—they were far milder, and much less frequent; but when the quarry was reopened, the earthquakes resumed their former activity, until the quarry was again closed, which was followed by a milder form of earthquake. About 1834, the quarry was again opened; and, in 1838, a new quarry was opened on the same rock, upon the other side of the river: so that, by the working of the two quarries, a greater extent of the magnetic rock was exposed to the atmosphere than ever before; and it is a well-known fact, that, between 1839 and 1846, there was a greater number of alarming shocks than ever occurred in the same period of time. There has not been any quarrying since 1846, and the earthquakes, since that time, have assumed their milder form, and are of less frequent appearance.—JAMES DRUMMOND: Comrie, N. B.

THE SEWING GIRL.

A pure, young heart and a thrifty needle
Are better than pride and a golden girdle.

"Sir, you have dropped this letter!"

The words were few, but they were spoken in so sweet a tone, and in so courteous and modest a manner, that the young gentleman to whom they were addressed involuntarily raised his hat as he stopped and turned towards her, and, with eyes of deep and respectful admiration—which beauty, combined with modesty and grace, always command—took the letter from her hand.

"Thanks, miss; you are very kind, to take the trouble to bring it back to me!"

"It was no trouble, sir!" answered the young girl, modestly; and, dropping her eyes to the ground, she added, in that rich cadence which had already entranced his ear:

"Good evening, sir!"

And she passed on her way with a light, graceful step, as if she was as cheerful-hearted as she was beautiful; for, though it was deepening twilight, the young stranger had seen that her features were uncommonly lovely.

He stood for a moment gazing after her, and then silently remarked, both philosophically and sentimentally:

"How much beauty there is in this world!"

He then resumed his progress. He had, five minutes before, come down in the mail-stage, to pay a visit to an aunt whom he had not seen since his boyhood, when he went to school in the town he had now once more returned to. The stage had left him at the inn, and passed on its way; and, as the distance was short, he took his valise in his hand, and, muffled in his cloak—for it was a clear, bracing, autumnal evening—he proceeded on foot towards the residence of his aunt, which was a large, square, old family mansion, just out of the town, and half hidden from the street by a group of stately elms and oaks.

He had passed on his way but a few rods, when a letter that he had been reading in the coach, and which he had not properly returned to his pocket, fell out. At the moment, a young girl, in a small, neat hood, lined with blue silk, and a closely-fitting, dark-blue habit, that displayed her fine figure, yet without coquetry, her hands thrust into a little muff, passed the spot, not meeting him, but crossing from another street.

Seeing the letter glitter white upon the ground, she picked it up; and, looking round, saw the young stranger, whom she immediately hastened after, and presented him with it, though not without having very naturally glanced at the superscription. It was: "Edward Custis, Esq."

The letter thus dropped, and so gracefully restored, had been received by him, two or three days before, from his father. The contents were as follows:

"My dear Edward,—I have a few words to say to you in confidence, and I beg you will receive them more as the counsel of a friend than the authority of a father. You have just now completed your legal studies, and have passed an honourable examination as a candidate for the bar. Your career is now in your own hands; and I have that confidence in your talents and perseverance, which prompts me to anticipate for you the highest honours of your noble profession.

"You must now take a wife! You will smile at the abrupt manner in which I have introduced the subject; nevertheless, I have written what I have with seriousness. You have a handsome fortune, and are able to live in that style which becomes your family and position in society. I advise you to this because I know you will be happier. Your mother's death breaks up my household, in a great measure, and deprives you of a home. Nothing is more dangerous for a young gentleman than to live a bachelor's life at an hotel or fashionable boarding-house. To make no mention of the habits that he acquires—I do not speak of immoral ones, for I do not fear you would fall into any—he is robbing himself every day of so many hours of domestic happiness. The home alone is the place where the heart learns to know itself, and to unfold its nobler and purer attributes. The 'hearth-stone' develops the man, and elevates and purifies his character. The finer sentiments, the better feelings, the holier emotions, all the great wealth of the heart, all the abundance in the treasure-house of his affections, is brought out within the magic circle of home.

"You must be married, Edward! The parental solicitude with which I have trained you up from boyhood, and followed you through your academical studies, your collegiate pursuits, your law studies, and to the bar, will only find its reward and crown in seeing you the happy husband of some good, noble girl, worthy of you.

"I have selected one for you. You are doubtless ready to say that, if I insist on your taking a wife, you ought to be at liberty to choose her! So you shall be; but how do you know that your choice may not fall where mine has?

"I have long had in my eye Caroline Clifford, your aunt's protégée, and your distant relation. I don't know whether you have seen her since you were at school in B—. I saw her last month, and I must confess that I never saw a young lady who has pleased me more. She has grown very beautiful, and is remarkably intelligent, as well as accomplished. She appears to me to be one whom any man might be well proud of. She spoke of you with the greatest kindness and interest, and wondered why you had not been down to pay them a visit; for she remembered you as a youth of fifteen, and said that she thought you were the handsomest boy in the academy. She asked me a great many questions about you, and really seemed to talk of you as if you were a brother. Thus you see the way is paved for you, by her prepossession in your favour. I am assured by her aunt, who is also your aunt, though you are only cousins by marriage, that her heart is wholly disengaged.

"Now, my dear boy, if you would please me, go down to B— at once, and fall in love with Miss Clifford. You can't help it, when you see her. Her father and I were bosom friends, and when he was alive, he used to take pleasure in talking about the future union of Caroline and yourself. That such a marriage would gratify me you already know. So go down and pay a visit of two or three weeks at your aunt's, before you fall in love with anybody else. I am sure Caroline will catch you without remedy!

Your attached father,

"C. CUSTIS.

"P. S. Caroline Clifford has about six thousand pounds in her own right, and will probably have ten thousand more when her aunt dies. But this is no consideration to you, as your fortune is ample. Had she not a penny, I should equally desire to bring about the match. Now, be docile, my dear boy, and try and make me, as well as your cousin, happy; for a happy girl she will be to get you for a husband.

C. C."

This was the letter which had been picked up by the young girl in the hood lined with blue silk.

Edward Custis had taken it out to read over again as he drew near the town where the fair subject of it resided; and, but for the maiden who had crossed his path, would have lost it, and perhaps exposed to the whole village gossip, the especial object of his visit to B—.

As he now pursued his way towards the mansion of Madame Powell—as the respectable maiden aunt was called throughout the town—he could not get the sweet, pure face of the young girl out of his thoughts; though, it is true, he did not try very hard to banish them. At length he reached the gate, and entered the spacious walk that led to the house.

We will pass over his reception which, by aunt and niece, was all that he could desire. The beauty of Miss Clifford struck him with admiration. He assented in his mind to his father's words, that she was one of the most beautiful females he had ever beheld. Her age was just past nineteen. Her education had been all that wealth could make it. She was perfect in all feminine accomplishments. But when this is said, all has been said. Her head was educated, but not her heart.

Proud of her beauty, proud of her aristocratic connections, proud of her reputation as an heiress, she had little room for the heart's virtues to bloom and bear fruit. Such a character could not be otherwise than purely selfish; and Caroline Clifford loved herself infinitely. Her character exhibited itself in her air and features; for, beautiful as they were, they betrayed pride and passion to be active ingredients in her nature. But she had the art to conceal these darker features; and the most finished and perfect veil is a lovely face. Beauty is a mask that will defy the keenest penetration. It often conceals the worst aspects of moral deformity.

Miss Clifford had successfully concealed the errors of her character before Mr. Custis. She hoped that she might win the son through the father's good-will; for she had long had her thoughts upon Edward Custis. She remembered him only as a lad, but she knew that he was now a young man of great wealth, and that if she could marry him, she could, with her beauty, take her own rank in the society of the metropolis—perhaps be the very leader of fashion. With these ambitious views in her heart, she had played her cards with the father.

After his departure, her aunt made known to her the recent wishes of the old gentleman, and told her that they would probably, by-and-bye, have a visit from the young heir.

"There is no doubt, Carry," said her aunt, "that you will at once captivate him by your beauty. Mr. Custis was almost in love with you himself; and I think Edward will fall quite in love. You have only to resolve that he shall, and you will effect your object!"

Thus spoke Madame Powell, a proud, cold-hearted, wise woman of the world, who looked forward only to the "establishment" of her niece, without regarding scrupulously the means by which it could be accomplished. She had set her heart on the union quite as strongly as Mr. Custis. But the former was actuated by selfish ambition, because Edward Custis was very rich; while the latter was actuated only by the desire to get his son a good wife, which he firmly believed Caroline would make him.

The reception of the young heir, therefore, could have been none other than most flattering.

Miss Clifford's success more than confirmed her anticipation: Edward was captivated and bewildered by her beauty and fascinations. She saw her power. Closer and closer, day by day, she drew around him the snares of love, and completely made him her willing prisoner. But all this was not effected by mere diplomacy. Caroline Clifford's heart was at length ensnared by her very victim. She began to love with the wildest passion; and thus nature took the place of art in sealing her conquest. She conquered only by being conquered. The spell which she had cast over his soul involved her within its toils. She loved with all her heart, and with all her being. He loved with his head—with that sentiment which is intoxicated with the beautiful. He admired rather than loved. His passion partook of pride in her beauty, rather than trust in her affection. His imagination was pleased, leaving intact his deeper feelings. He willingly deceived himself. He believed that he loved, when, in truth, he was only enchanted.

The week after his arrival, he addressed a letter to his father:

"B—

"My Dear Father—I have now embraced the first moment I could steal from the society of the enchanting Caroline, to write to you. You did not say too much in her praise. She is all that I could desire. Beautiful without a fault—generous to a fault. She gives much to the poor daily, and in her character seems to me without a blemish. You will have your dearest wishes gratified, if I can prevail upon her to accept my hand. To win and wear such a treasure would make me perfectly happy. In a few days I think I shall make her the offer of my hand and heart.

"To-morrow night, Madame Powell is to give a large party, chiefly on my account. I am sure that Caroline will eclipse the brightest coronet of beauties that can be assembled here.

"Your affectionate son,

"EDWARD CUSTIS."

An hour after he had written this letter, and was returning from the post-office, where he had taken it himself, to enjoy the walk thither and back, he was passing a neat two-storey house, of respectable but unpretending exterior, close by the street, when he saw at the window a face which had more than once flitted like a fair vision across his mind, since he had been in B—. He had seen it before only in the soft radiance of twilight, but it was indelibly imprinted upon his remembrance. It was that of the young girl who had picked up the dropped letter. She was now seated at the window, her exquisite profile towards him as he was going by. She was bending gracefully forward, and seemed to be sewing. He stopped full, almost without being aware of it, and gazed upon her charming face. There was a sweet, serene beauty reposing therein, which he had never seen anything like, except in the divine scriptural heads—the Marys or Madonnas of Raphael.

She looked up, and, seeing him, blushed deeply, with instant recognition and surprise. Recalled to himself, he bowed with an air of respectful apology, and moved on his way, wondering who that angelic and sweetly modest girl could be. A few paces on, he met a servant of Madame Powell.

"James, who lives in that house with the green blinds?"

"That small one, sir, with the low windows and the lilacs in the yard?"

"Yes!"

"The Widow Brandon, sir."

"Who is she, James?"

"Well, sir, I believe she is a very respectable person indeed," exclaimed James, with a formal air, as if he did not acknowledge any personal acquaintance with the family. "Her husband used to be a doctor; but, instead of curing sick people, he was sick all the time himself, and never had any practice."

"Is he dead?"

"Yes, sir. He died about five years ago, very poor. The family is respectable, I believe; and I remember when his widow used to go to the first parties, and her daughter, too; but it ain't so nowadays! Nice people, sir—very nice—but that's all!"

"Thank you, James!" answered Edward, giving way to let him pass on.

When he entered the drawing-room, he found Miss Clifford and her aunt engaged in the very important discussion of who should be invited to the party.

"You must have a great many ladies in the neighbourhood, Caroline," he said, glancing over the list of names which his aunt placed in his hand.

"Yes," answered the beauty, "we have a very large and fine society here, and unusually select. There are a great many more people who, I dare say, will think they ought to be of the party; but it is very difficult, in an interior town, you know, to draw the line."

"Yes," observed Madame Powell, "one can't associate with all; and so many people are forcing themselves among the aristocracy, that we are compelled to be very strict."

"Aristocracy, dear aunt! You are not speaking of England, are you?" said Edward, drily; for he had a sensible and hearty contempt for that affectation of exclusiveness which characterises too forcibly a large portion of society in his native country.

"We are or ought to be aristocratic here," said Miss Clifford. "As we have no titles to distinguish us, it is the more necessary to draw lines to keep off the common people!"

"The common people?" repeated Edward.

"I mean nobodies. You understand me, Custis, though you pretend not to!" she said, with a brilliant smile, that made him forget, for the moment, everything but her beauty.

"If you please, I will run over your list," he said.

"Oh, yes! I dare say most of the women you will remember as those of your school-boy days."

"Yes—a good many of them," answered Edward, looking over the list. "Most of them are new, and some of those that I recall to mind are not here!"

"Great changes have taken place," observed Madame Powell.

"Yes. I see the name of Peter Leverell, lady, and daughter. He was a shoe-dealer when I was a boy! How does he come within the orbit of your aristocratic world, aunt?"

"He has grown rich since then!"

"Yes, very rich indeed!" reiterated Miss Clifford, with particular emphasis on the magic monosyllable rich.

"Oh—ah! that alters the case!"

"He keeps a carriage!"

"And gives elegant parties!"

"It is enough, Caroline. There is a name left out here that ought to be here, unless the family are dead or removed," resumed Edward, as he carelessly ran his eye down the list.

"Whose is that?" asked Madame Powell, eagerly.

"Yes!" exclaimed Miss Clifford; "for we wouldn't forget anybody of consequence, for the world."

"I mean Doctor Brandon and family."

"Doctor Brandon has been dead six years," responded Madame Powell, with a look like one very much relieved to think she had not left out any person "of consequence."

"He died miserably poor," said Caroline. "His widow has all gone down!"

"Gone where?"

"How amazingly dull you are!" she said, laughing. "I mean she is nobody now. They don't go into society!"

"She was once a very beautiful woman, and an ornament to society."

"Yes, I believe so," answered Miss Clifford, with a slight sneer of contempt; but nobody visits them now. They are very destitute!"

"But that should only, it strikes me, be the reason why they should be visited!"

"You don't understand me; I mean visited in the way of social calls and invitations to parties!"

"And why should not Mrs. Brandon be still visited in this way, even if she is poor? She is the same Mrs. Brandon in calico, that she was in silks!"

"Are you in earnest, Edward?" inquired Caroline Clifford, opening her large, hazel eyes, and fixing them upon him with a look of haughty surprise, through which struggled a propensity to laugh.

"Yes, indeed I am!"

"You are wonderfully practical in your republicanism, Edward!" she said, pleasantly. "Your father told us you were a very great patriot."

"That is as it may be. Has Mrs. Brandon any daughters?"

"Yes, one; a girl about eighteen."

"Then, for her sake, her mother ought to be visited. Suppose, now, you break through the trammels of fashion, Caroline, and invite Miss Brandon!"

"Invite Miss Brandon!" repeated Caroline Clifford, with an angry glow on her cheek.

"And why not, if the only reason why you do not invite the mother is that she is poor? Young ladies—nearly all of them—are poor till they are of age, or get married, for that matter. Like Miss Brandon, they are dependent."

"How strangely you talk, Mr. Custis!" said Caroline, quickly, quite vexed and annoyed. "Miss Brandon has disgraced herself. She has taken a step that will for ever shut her out of society!"

"Indeed! I am deeply pained to hear it! I thought she was a person of good character, or I would not have said a word!"

"You misunderstand me," replied Miss Clifford, colouring deeply. "I do not mean to say anything against her character. I mean to tell you that she takes in work!"

"And is this all?" inquired Edward, laughing, and looking very much relieved to find that the lovely girl whose part he had been advocating, was still good and worthy. "I esteem her more for her noble efforts to support herself and family. Is this all?"

"All!" repeated Miss Clifford, in a proud tone, and with an air of ineffable contempt. She then haughtily added: "We will speak upon a pleasanter theme, Mr. Custis. I am not in the habit of thinking upon such low persons, much less inviting them to my fashionable parties!"

"Caroline," said her aunt, when they were alone, "you will offend him by this imprudence. Don't let him see your feelings. Keep them down, and hold a rein on your spirit till you get married. Afterwards, you may cast it loose upon the mane. You will lose him if you don't be cautious, for he is a young man who has plain, practical views of things!"

"Do you think he was really in earnest? Do you believe he would like to have me invite the Brandons?"

"He seems to be wholly indifferent to the distinctions of fashionable life! I shouldn't be surprised if he should like them invited!"

"Then he must have seen Alice Brandon!" cried Miss Clifford, her brow darkening with feelings that she could hardly analyse herself. She experienced all at once emotions of the deadliest hostility to the humble and lovely sewing girl; and while she felt it, her pride was stung that she should condescend to feel at all in reference to one—to use the language of her own thoughts—"so much beneath her!"

The evening of the party, Edward quitted the gaiety, splendour, and hollow happiness of the close, festive rooms, to breathe the fresh air of the calm, starry night. His heart was not in unison with the festive mirth within. Caroline Clifford was indeed there! She who had thrown about his senses the chains of a bewildering enchantress was present, the queen of beauty, and the cynosure of all eyes.

But Edward did not gaze upon her with the fascinated eyes of yesterday. He had discovered that her beauty concealed a proud, selfish, unfeeling heart! He had detected beneath the smile of an angel, the most finished duplicity. Not only by means of his conversation about Alice Brandon had he gained this knowledge, but in many other ways. It had gradually been opening upon him, and slowly enlightening his soul, like the progressive growing of the dawn. Reflection, combining, analysing, and comparing what he discovered in her, led him wholly to reverse his opinion of her. He saw through her, and despised heartily the character which was revealed through her assumed one. He had tried her as soon as he began to suspect her goodness, and in every trial and test she fell! Had she known she was undergoing judgment before her lover, she would have been on her guard. But she did not suspect it, and so he proved in his own eyes her charity to be ostentatious; her amiability, hypocrisy; her artlessness, art.

It was a sad conviction for him to come to, but it was irresistible. He kept from her his discovery, and outwardly extended towards her courtesy and kindness. Yet her quick eye and sensitive love detected and felt the coldness: for where there is no warmth in the eye—warmth from the heart—it will look coldly.

She saw the change in his manner at the ball. She was wretched, in all the glory of her beauty. At length she missed him from the rooms.

He was weary of the mockery of happiness there, and tired of assuming that tenderness towards his cousin that he did not feel. He assumed only for the evening—for if he treated her as he felt, she would have left the rooms and broken up the party, perhaps with a scene! To avoid this, he resolved to let the evening pass off, and determined the next day to take his departure. As he had not yet offered his hand to Miss Clifford, he felt he had perfect liberty to leave without any explanation. Indeed, he hardly knew how to give any, without unfolding to her in detail the dark features of her own character, as discovered by him.

He walked down the avenue, his thoughts dwelling upon this subject. He opened the gate and passed along the walk, which was a broad and smooth gravel promenade, all the way into the town. He was walking on, hardly conscious of having passed out of the gate, and wrapped in his painful thoughts, when he saw half a dozen females standing together, looking towards the brilliantly illuminated windows of the hall, watching the dancers, and listening to the swelling waves of music.

He merely glanced up at them, and passed slowly on. In a few steps he came to two others. They moved quickly aside on perceiving him, as if to escape observation. But they did not retire so soon but that Edward detected the sweet face and sylph-like figure of Alice Brandon. The glare of light from the scene of festivity was sufficiently strong for him distinctly to see and recognise her. Leaning upon her arm was a lady of maturer years. Edward conceived that it must be her mother. Obeying some uncontrollable impulse, he approached them as they were hurrying away, and said, in a polite tone:

"Miss Brandon, I believe?"

Both ladies stopped for an instant, and Alice Brandon bowed and slightly smiled, as she said, apologetically:

"My mother thought she would walk out a little way, it is so pleasant, and we have been stopping to listen to the music for a few moments."

She then moved on with her mother.

"Mrs. Brandon, you probably do not recollect me?" said Edward, walking by the side of the still fine-looking widow; "I am the Edward Custis who was here when a lad, and lived with Madame Powell."

"I remember you, sir," answered Mrs. Brandon, with the gentle dignity becoming a widow with a fair, blushing daughter upon her arm; "I have seen you pass the house, and Alice told me who you were."

"Indeed! then I am so happy as to have been known to you, Miss Brandon?" said Edward, feeling at heart flattered that she should have thought so much of him as to find out who he was, though but once they had met.

"I saw your name, sir, written upon the letter which I picked up," answered Alice, without lifting her eyes.

"Yes, that is true. Let that letter be one of introduction between us, Miss Brandon," he said, with a sincerity of tone, and an air of frankness, that caused her to look up into his face, and then drop her eyes, while the most pleasing and sweet emotions that ever fluttered in a maiden's heart filled her own.

He walked on with them slowly, and in agreeable conversation, until they reached the gate. Here, he hoped, in his soul of souls, that the widow would enter, and that Alice would linger, and let him converse with her alone; for he felt that, disguise the truth from himself as he would, he had lost his heart to the lovely sewing girl, having only lost his senses to Caroline Clifford.

"Will you walk in, Mr. Custis?" said the widow, with hospitality.

"Thank you; perhaps you would be so obliging as to permit Alice to walk with me a little further, if she will herself consent?"

"You are very kind, Mr. Custis," answered Mrs. Brandon, with a little embarrassment. "Alice is a sewing girl only, and her fair fame is all that she possesses. To be seen with you, a young man of fortune, who is also reported to be engaged to Miss Clifford, would make fuel for idle gossip, and perhaps Alice might be the sufferer. I know, Mr. Custis, that you are a person of too good character for me to fear you; and you are also too sensible to take offence at what I have said!"

"On the contrary, dear Mrs. Brandon, I respect your solicitude for your daughter, and commend you for your motherly care over her! You have done right to speak as you have!"

"I am glad you feel so, Mr. Custis. We should be very happy to have you walk in."

"I will go in and stay a few moments, with pleasure. I am quite fatigued with the noise and crowd at the ball. A quiet conversation with you here will refresh me. I wish to hear the history of your family, and of the doctor's death."

In a few minutes, Edward was seated in the neat little parlour, feeling perfectly at home with his new friends. If he thought Alice beautiful in the street, he now thought her almost a seraph in loveliness and wisdom. How the evening passed he hardly knew, save that it was the happiest of his life hitherto. It was late when he left the house. The sweet "good night" of Alice was echoing in the deep well of his heart, like music, when he reached the mansion. He had been absent two hours. Many of the guests were gone, and others were leaving. He entered the rooms with the careless air of one who was not conscious of having strayed. Miss Clifford saw him; and, although she was engaged in receiving the parting courtesies of her retiring guests, she broke from the side of her aunt, and, with looks pale and flushed by turns, and much excited, she came up to him.

"I am so glad to see you, sir, sir! I feared some accident had befallen you!"

Edward pitied her as he gazed on her. He knew how false she was, and felt for her as a generous man would. He could not help contrasting her with the gentle, pure-hearted, artless sewing girl. It was with difficulty he could answer her civilly. He made some reply in a cold tone, he hardly knew what. She stared at him wildly, and then, bursting into tears, rushed from the drawing-room.

The next day Edward left the mansion. He took leave only of his aunt, having previously addressed a note to the beautiful Miss Clifford, in which, in as delicate and kind a manner as possible, he made known to her that he had decided to withdraw himself for ever from her presence! This decision, in substance, he also made known to Madame Powell.

"What reason do you give?" demanded the surprised and grieved lady.

"Incompatibility of characters. I was pleased, enchanted with Miss Clifford, and believed she would make me a good wife. But I have studied her character. I know my own; and there is no common ground of union. Tell Caroline I shall always think of her with kind regard!"

"This is a strange freak, sir!"

"It may be so. I cannot think of marrying Miss Clifford!"

"Your father will be angry and pained, sir!" answered the lady, trembling with disappointment and rage.

"I must risk his displeasure. Good morning, madam! Give my final adieu to Miss Clifford!"

To describe the grief and wild despair of Caroline Clifford at this result, would be impossible. If she had not loved him, her wounded feelings and disappointed ambition would have found shelter in her pride. But she passionately loved, and this desertion overwhelmed her. She was angry with herself, too; for she saw that he had seen through her character, from her want of watchfulness and art. She saw now how he had drawn her out, and how she had betrayed herself unwittingly to his inquisitorial penetration.

On his way past the humble abode of Mrs. Brandon, he stopped and went in. He was absent an hour, which was strange, as Alice was not at home, being out that day sewing for hire. The widow came to the door, and as she took leave of him, her face wore a look of calm joy. He pressed her hand respectfully to his lips, and left for the inn.

The week following, it was known throughout the town that the widow Brandon had left, where, it was said, Alice was to have a place in a school.

The rumour was not, however, quite exact. Instead of keeping school, Alice was placed in a school—the first school for young ladies in the city.

A year passed, and Caroline Clifford had recovered, in some degree, from her disappointment. She was soled by hearing that her recreant lover was still unwedded and unengaged.

Another half-year passed. Miss Clifford resolved to go to the city and live. Her aunt yielded. Caroline had heard that Edward still remained single, and she was seized with the hope that he had repented, and might be recovered if she was on the ground.

The morning she was to leave, the last Saturday's Courier was handed to her fresh from the office. She opened it and looked, as had been her custom since Edward ran away from her, to the hymeneal heading.

She read, shrieked, and fell senseless to the floor. Her eye had caught and comprehended the following:

"Married, last Thursday morning, in Christ Church, by the Rev. Dr. D—, Edward Custis, Esq., of this city, to Miss Alice Brandon, daughter of the late Dr. Charles Brandon, M. D."

We were about to add a few lines by way of moral; but the story speaks it. We will, however, append a short but homely one for lovers of written morals, viz:

"It is no disgrace to take in sewing."

F A C E T I Æ.

AUCTIONEER'S MOTTO.—Come when you are bid, and bid when you come.

FISHERMEN must possess extraordinary medical powers, for they never attempt to cure a fish till he is dead.

A youth with a turn for figures, had five eggs to boil, and being told to give them three minutes each, boiled them a quarter of an hour altogether.

AMONG the list of penalties for the regulation of Queen Elizabeth's household, was the following: "That none toy with the maidens, on pain of four-pence."

A NOVEL MOUSETRAP.—A person named Jerome, in St. Martin's, Haverfordwest, purchased a small quantity of oysters, which he placed in a back room; in the course of a quarter of an hour he went into the apartment, and there discovered that two mice had been actually caught by one oyster, and their heads broken by the shells, when attempting to purloin the fish.—Carmarthen Journal.

"GO MARRY," is written on everything beautiful that the eye rests upon—beginning with birds of paradise, and leaving off with apple blossoms. Again we say, listen to the linnet, and fulfil the ends of your creation.

IN the French translation of "Paradise Lost," "Hail horrors, hail!" is rendered thus: "Comment vous portez vous, les horreurs—comment vous portez vous?" that is, "How d'ye do, horrors—how d'ye do?"

AN Irishman fights before he reasons; a Scotchman reasons before he fights; an Englishman is not particular as to the order of precedence, but will do either to accommodate his customers.

PLEASURES come like oxen, and go away like post-horses.

A LAWYER'S OPINION OF LAW.—A learned judge being once asked how he would act if a man owed him ten dollars, and refused to pay him: "Rather than bring an action," said he, "with its costs and uncertainty, I would give him a receipt, in full of all demands;" and after a little rumination, he added: "Ay, and I would send him, moreover, five dollars to cover all possible costs."

The Springfield Gazette tells a good story about a clergyman, who lost his horse one Saturday evening. After hunting, in company with a boy, until midnight, he gave up in despair. The next day, somewhat dejected at his loss, he went into the pulpit, and took for his text, the following passage from Job: "Oh, that I knew where I might find him!" The boy, who had just come in, supposing the horse was still the burthen of thought, cried out: "I know where he is—he's in Deacon Smith's barn!"

"THIS tenement to let, inquire next door." The place was in a wretched state of dilapidation; but Bannister inquired the rent, &c. These particulars gained, he asked: "Do you let anything with it?" "No!" was the reply; "Why do you ask that?" "Because, if you let it alone it will tumble down!"

"COME here, my dear—I want to ask you about your sister. Has she got a beau?" "No! the doctor says it's the jaundice she's got."

HOW TO GET IN.—Allspice informs us that the surest way to fill a private apartment, whether in a printing-office, a cotton factory, or a sausage shop, with visitors, is to place over the door a placard, bearing the inscription: "No Admittance." He asseverates that no person ever read that prohibition over an entrance, without being instantly attacked by an ungovernable desire to rush right in.

A TAX ON BACHELORS.—According to an American paper, the following bill has been recently introduced into the Indiana legislature: "By Mr. McDonald, bill to compel old bachelors of thirty years of age, to marry, or pay fifty dollars a year into the county treasury, to go to the benefit of the first lady who marries after the 1st of January. The provisions of the bill apply to widowers of one year's standing."

A HARD DRINKER.—"I understand," said a deacon to his neighbour, "that you are becoming a hard drinker." "That is a slander," replied the neighbour; "for no man can drink easier."

CHINA.—The Chinese at one time measured the irritable feelings of the English nation by the quantity of china broken in a year. A Chinese historian observes: "The merchants of Canton make the sale of their brittle ware the barometer of European passions, and as often as the sale augments, they say: 'The last year has been a passionate one in England.'" China is not imported to the extent it was some years ago: our own manufactured articles, and those of the continent, have superseded the demand for the brittle ware of Asia, and the wise men of the Celestial Empire now say: "The English have subdued all their anger: they have no matrimonial strife, and seldom break cups and saucers."

PROMPTING THE PROMPTER.—One of the principal actors at the Comedie Française, stopped short in a tragedy, at this passage: "I was at Rome——" It was in vain that he began the passage several times—he never could get farther than Rome. At last, seeing there was no help for it, and that the prompter, as embarrassed as himself, was unable to find the place, or to give him any assistance, he turned his eyes coolly upon him, and said, with an air of dignity: "Well, sir, what was I doing in Rome?"

AN AMERICAN STORY.—There is a good story told of old Meolraj, the native East India general. His followers stole from the English a lot of hermetically sealed provisions in tin cases, and, not having seen anything of the kind before, he mistook them for canister shot, and fired nothing from his guns for three days but fresh lobsters, pickled salmon, and other delicacies, supplying the British camp with a shower of the freshest English provisions.

PATIENCE EXHAUSTED.—The celebrated Dr. Brown, of London, paid his addresses to a lady for many years, but unsuccessfully; during which time he was accustomed to propose her health in company, when called on for a toast. Being observed one day to omit it, a gentleman reminded him that he had forgotten to toast his favourite lady. "Why, indeed," said the doctor, "I find it all in vain: since I have toasted her for so many years, and still cannot make her Brown, I am resolved to toast her no longer."

A very pretty young woman went to the post-office lately, with a letter and no direction, and said to the postmaster: "Send that to my sweetheart!" The postmaster took it, looked at it, and said: "What is his name, and where does he live?" The girl replied: "Ah, that is the very thing I don't want any one to know!"

WRITTEN after going to law:

The law, they say, great Nature's chain connects,
That causes ever must produce effects—
In me behold reversed great Nature's laws,
All my effects lost by a single cause.

THE Northern Journal states that a boy was caught in the act of stealing dried berries in front of a shop, the other day, and was locked up in a dark closet by the grocer. Then the boy commenced begging most pathetically to be released, and, after using all the persuasion that his young imagination could invent, proposed: "Now, if you'll let me out, and send for my daddy, he'll pay you for the berries, and lick me besides!" The grocer could not withstand the appeal.

"I generally," says Hans Christian Andersen, "found the jovial Alexander Dumas in bed, even long after midnight; here he lay, with paper, pen, and ink, and wrote his newest drama. I found him thus one day; he nodded kindly to me, and said: 'Sit down a minute; I have just now a visit from my muse; she will be going directly.' He wrote on; spoke aloud; shouted a vivat, sprang out of bed, and said: 'The third act is finished!'"

MONKEYS.—The imitative properties of the monkey tribe are well-known. Two monkeys of the larger sort, kept by a naturalist, became perfectly tamed, and were the familiar companions of the gentleman's household; one of these, the female, used to enter the kitchen at a certain time of day, take the broom down and sweep the kitchen, put coals on the fire, and set the tea-things in as good order as any servant-maid could do. This exceeds the sagacity of the dog or elephant, and as the monkey tribe have large developments of the organs of imitation, it also proves the truth of phrenology. Another small monkey, kept by a British consul in this country, once at a large consular dinner-party entered the room, and, jumping into the consul's shoulder, took off his wig, and put it into the fire, to the great amusement of the company.—Brussels Herald.

"ALONE IN HIS GLORY."—The Carpet Bag tells a story of a preacher who delighted in long sermons, and who once exchanged with a brother preacher who always delivered short ones. At the usual hour for closing the services the people became uneasy, and, being inspired with the love of warm dinners rather than long sermons, went out quietly, one by one, till the preacher was left alone with the sexton. The preacher, feeling that he must do his duty, still continued to blaze away; till that functionary, seeing no prospect of a close, walked deliberately up the pulpit stairs, and, handing him the key, requested "he would lock up when he got through, and leave the key at his house as he went along."

An auctioneer was selling a lot of land for agricultural purposes. "Gentlemen," said he, "this is the most delightful land. It is the easiest land to cultivate in the county—it's so light—so very light. Mr. Parker here will corroborate my statement; he owns the next patch, and he will tell you how easy it is worked." "Yes, gentlemen," said Mr. Parker, "it is very easy to work it, but it's a plaguy sight easier to gather the crops."

A LADY OFFICER.—Jean Paul says that a lady officer, if she wanted to give the word "halt," would do it in this strain: "You soldiers all of you, now mind, I order you, as soon as I have finished speaking, to stand still, every one of you on the spot where you happen to be: don't you hear me? Halt I say, all of you." Upon this a lady in an American paper makes the following comment: "Now, Monsieur Jean, it was an unlucky day you wrote that sentence. May you never hear anything but that little concise word 'No', from every rosy lip you meet between this and your tombstone! May you 'halt' wifeless through life; may your buttons be snappish your strings knotty, and your stockings holy. May your boot-jack be missing, your feet corned, your shaving-water be cold; your razor dull, your hair stand up, and your dickies lie down; may your beard be porcupine, your whiskers thinly settled, and your moustaches curl the wrong way; may your coffee be muddy, your toast smoky, and your tea be water-bewitched; may you dream of Paradise, and wake in some other place! And, with a never-dying desire for affection, may you crawl through creation a meek, miserable, nasty, forlorn, fidgetty, fussy, ridiculous, ruined, dejected, ragged old bachelor. Amen!"

THE ADVERTISEMENT DUTY.—The following ingenious plan of evading this duty is given in some of the Lancashire papers: "A Mr. Lea, of Liverpool, makes the following proposition to the authorities: he wished to purchase the sole right of fixing advertisement boards to the lamp-posts throughout the borough. There are about 3000 lamp-posts in the town; and Mr. Lea proposes to give for the privilege—or rather monopoly—asked for, a sum of £600 for the first year, £800 for the second year, and £1000 for the third year. Upon this, a tradesman gives notice: 'In the event of Mr. Lea obtaining a monopoly of the lamp-posts, I intend to apply for the privilege of affixing business notices on the back of each policeman in the place.'"

ON hearing a lady praise a reverend gentleman's eyes:
I cannot praise the doctor's eyes,
I never saw his glance divine;
For when he prays he shuts his eyes—
And when he preaches he shuts none.

A JUDGE CAUGHT NAPPING, AND AFTERWARDS SENT BY POST.—Mr. Justice Williams was the other day on the Great Western Railway, bound for Oxford. His lordship, possibly fatigued by the forensic eloquence so lavishly displayed by learned gentlemen when on circuit, very speedily surrendered himself to sleep: the potency of which may be imagined, when we state that he did not awake till the train reached Steventon. This was an awkward affair. His lordship was wanted at Oxford; and thither he must proceed—but how? Post-horses have not been known since the rail opened,—and there was no conveyance but the mail-cart. Stern necessity knows no law, and judicial dignity, accustomed to state processions, powdered footmen, and luxurious carriages, had to be content with the rough trap of a country postman. Jehu, ignorant of the rank of his travelling companion, indulged his gossiping propensity to a great extent; so it happened that a recent assize trial, in which he had been concerned, was fresh in his recollection, and, as the decision was contrary to his views, he took his revenge of judge, bar, and jury, in no measured terms, expressing the utmost contempt for the institution of trial by jury, and giving it as his well-grounded opinion, that all lawyers were rogues,—the biggest of the R's always having the most luck. The judge doubtless enjoyed the fun; but the poor postman was paralysed when he afterwards learnt the name and profession of his distinguished passenger.

STRENGTH OF BAD HABITS.

PROFESSOR MILLER advertising, at a meeting at Edinburgh a short time ago, to the strength a bad habit sometimes acquires, narrated the following story, for which the learned professor must alone be considered responsible: A respectable clergyman had long failed in an attempt to give up snuff-taking, and at last he preached a sermon against it, but was miserable all the week after. When Sunday came round, he found he was getting on very languidly, and, to make the thing worse, an honest man of an elder, sitting immediately under the eye of the minister, took out his "mull," tapped it on the lid, and with the utmost gravity took a comfortable "sneeshin." The minister could stand this no longer—he stopped abruptly in his sermon, and said: "John, for shame upon you, sir! how dare you do that?" The elder looked up in amazement. The preacher continued: "Don't you remember what I said to you last Sabbath?" But the elder could not yet fathom what he had done to cause offence. The minister's passion for snuff had in the interim grown to such an intensity, that it was a case of life or death—he could restrain no longer, and so, addressing the elder, he said: “I will not pollute my lips by mentioning what you did, but I will show you what it was: hand me up that box.” Having got the box, he gave it a certain number of taps on the lid, and went through the other forms of snuff-taking, in imitation of what he observed the elder do, saying, as he went on: “That is what you did, sir—and what is more, you taking a pinch) did that, too!”

TWO LAWYERS SWINDLED.—Two lawyers, at Brussels, were lately swindled out of a small sum of money in a curious manner. One of them was at dinner, when a young man came in, and, presenting the card of one of his acquaintances, also a lawyer, stated that the owner of the card was in a shop in the neighbourhood, and, being short of 10*fr.*, requested him to lend him that sum until the next day. This the lawyer did at once. The next evening, the two lawyers happening to meet at a soirée, one said to the other: “I will play you the 10*fr.* of yesterday at a game of écarté.” “Agreed,” said the other. The gentleman who had sent the 10*fr.* having lost: “That squares our account.” “You mean,” said the other, “that you owe me 20*fr.*” How can I owe you 20*fr.*,” said the other, “when I sent you 10*fr.*” This brought on an explanation, from which it resulted that each party had given 10*fr.* to the messenger for the other. After the first moment’s surprise was over, the two gentlemen could only laugh at the trick played on them.—Galignani’s Messenger.

ALARMING ELEVATION OF SPIRITS.—Brandy has just risen twenty five per cent. !—Punch.

THE OLD HOUSE AND THE NEW.—Before the Reform Bill, the influence of the aristocracy in boroughs was the thing complained of. Now—as the revelations before the Election Committees have demonstrated—it is the influence of the Sovereign.—Ibid.

AS IT SHOULD BE.—In one of our weekly contemporaries, we observe the “Railway Intelligence” is inserted next to the “Obituary.”—Ibid.

MOTIVES FOR GOING INTO PARLIAMENT.

“I would have been very grateful for some small appointment, and all have their motives for going into Parliament I suppose.”

Such was the avowal made before an Election Committee the other day by a too candid candidate. He would have gone into Parliament for the sake of a “small appointment” for himself, at the risk of no small disappointment to his confiding constituents. “All have their motives,” no doubt, for becoming members of the House of Commons, but all are not so very forward in avowing their motives as the individual to whom this blunt declaration is attributed.

We might certainly be puzzled to find out what motives some people could possibly have had in going into Parliament, for they get no appointment, and are in every way “out of place” in the House of Commons. Some probably enter the legislature with “patriotic motives,” but there are many who, if they but knew their country’s true interest as well as they think they do their own, would, from the purest “patriotic motives,” keep out of Parliament altogether.—Ibid.

THE TOILETTE OF THE EMPRESS.

The Journal de l’Empire has the following article upon the toilette of the empress:

“The jewellery and toilettes of the empress will be very magnificent. M. Lemonnier, the jeweller, is preparing a parure of white pearls and rubies, of a beautiful design, consisting of a small closed crown, to be placed on the back of the head, of bracelets, and of a necklace à plaques; and another parure, in very rare black pearls, consisting of a bracelet, ornamented with three large pearls, a necklace fitting close to the neck, in the Louis XV. style, with, in the centre, an enormous pearl pendent, and a brooch, with four black pearls pendent. He is also preparing a bracelet, consisting of precious stones of all colours, and a brooch in diamonds of oval form, the centre of which is formed of a very thin, large diamond, which is destined to cover the portrait of the emperor, and a pure diamond is to be pendent from it. This brooch will be of exquisite beauty.

The marriage coin is to be of massive gold, with the rim in diamonds. On one side are to be the initials of Napoleon III. and Marie Eugénie de Guzman; on the other is inscribed, in diamonds, the date of the marriage of their majesties.

M. Fossin, another jeweller, has been intrusted with the arrangement of the diamonds of the crown; and he is to make a crown similar to that of Charlemagne, of great beauty. He is also to supply some very fine bracelets and brooches. It is he who has prepared the ornaments of the prayer-book of the empress. The book is bound in white velvet, with silver ornaments; and on one side is an eagle, surmounted with the imperial crown, in diamonds; on the other, the initials of her majesty, surmounted with an imperial crown, also in diamonds.

Two dressmakers have been charged with the dresses.—Madame Vignon with those for the morning, and Mademoiselle Palmyre with those for the evening. The former is making thirty-four of exquisite beauty. Amongst them are three morning peignoirs, richly embroidered, decorated with Valenciennes and Mechlin lace, and lined with silk of a rose, blue, and white colour; two robes de chambre—one in black velvet with facings of watered silk, of a sky-blue colour, the other in gros de Navarre, lined with white silk; a full dress of rose-coloured watered silk, with very long basques, ornamented with fringe and lace and one of green taffeta, with flowers, ornamented with plumes frisées.

Mlle. Palmyre is making twenty full dresses: one is in white brocade, with flowers of silk and gold, ornamented down the front with flowers of different colours; another has three flounces embroidered with silk and silver; another, of velvet, is ornamented with flounces of blond-lace, decked with bees and crowned eagles, in gold; one of blue velvet, ornamented with Alençon lace; one of black velvet, with flounces of gold guipure; one of pearl-grey satin, with nine flounces of Brussels lace; three court mantles of silk, watered with gold and silver—rose, blue, and white in colour, &c., &c., &c.

GEMS OF THOUGHT.

A wise man stands firm in all extremities, and bears the lot of his humanity with a divine temper.

COUNTRIES are not cultivated in proportion to their fertility, but to their liberty.

FRIENDSHIP.—Though most of the friendships of the world fill deserve the name of friendships; yet a man may make use of them occasionally, as of a traffic whose returns are uncertain, and in which it is usual to be cheated.

THE NIGHTINGALE.

CHARMING, charming Nightingale,
Happy, free, and all alone—
From the myrtle in the vale
Echoes forth your dulcet tone.
Tremble lest perfidious hand
Snatch you from your soft retreat:
In the foliage where you stand
Meshes may ensnare your feet!
Yes—though thickly round you spread,
Waves the ever-verdant screen,
Danger hovers o’er your head:—
Hope is typified by green!
Kind’s the warning that I give—
Charming Nightingale, beware!
In the world in which we live
Hope itself is but a snare!

POLITENESS is the outward garment of good-will; but many are the nutshells in which, if you crack them, nothing like a kernel is to be found.

MISCELLANEOUS.

CAPT. WRIGHT, of the 91st Foot, has been granted a pension of £100 a year, for his noble conduct during the wreck of the Birkenhead.

THE operatives in the cotton trade at Stockport have got up a memorial to their employers, stating that in 1848, they (the workpeople) submitted to a reduction of ten per cent. in their wages because trade was unremunerative, and requesting their employers, now that trade is more prosperous, to return to full prices.

BYRON’s fair and loved Countess de Guiccioli has become a senatoress of France—her husband, the Marquis de Boissy, having been just nominated to the Imperial Senate.

THE PLEASURES OF A GARDEN.—We are continually told, by certain sapient economists, that they do not care for a garden, and do not possess one, because they find it cheaper to buy their fruits and vegetables. Who doubts it? The pleasures of gardening depend not upon economic considerations. The fascination is in the very arts of cultivation—in the very growing of your own fruits and flowers. Is there no pleasure in tending flowers, and watching their opening blossoms—in nursing the sickly, and rejoicing over the strong—in culling a well-chosen bouquet for the adornment of your cara sposa? Is there no pleasure in being able to send well ripened grapes or peaches to a sick neighbour who has them not—in bestowing a capful of rosy-cheeked apples on a rosy-cheeked boy—in inviting the children of the village to partake of your gooseberries—in sending, at the close of a severe winter, a hundred cauliflower plants to the minister of the parish? Is there no pleasure in exchanging rare flowers—in getting and giving floral gifts? Does your heart not leap up when the first snowdrop—bold child of lingering winter, and adventurous invader of his icy reign—shows its welcome face on the green? Is there no transport when the seedling hollyhock bursts on your astonished vision in unexpected beauty? Thousands there are who are doomed by dire necessity never to have a garden of their own; but those who can and ought, and yet have not, for the sake of cheapness and from motives of a mean economy, ought to be banished to some desert wilderness, where the green earth and nature’s flowers may not waste their sweetness on them.

POWER OF MUSIC.—“A clergyman,” says Mrs. Signoriny, “possessing much knowledge of human nature, instructed his daughters in the theory and practice of music. They were all observed to be exceedingly amiable and happy. A friend inquired if there was any secret in his mode of education. He replied: ‘When anything disturbs their temper, I say to them, “Sing!” and if I hear them speaking against any person, I call them to sing to me: and so they have sung away all causes of discontent, and every disposition to scandal.’ Such a use of this accomplishment might serve to fit a family for the company of angels. Young voices around the domestic altar, breathing sacred music, at the hour of morning and evening devotion, are a sweet and touching accompaniment.

GENERAL HAYNAU’s sudden decease has not much surprised those who know what his habits were. He was a great eater, and the large quantities of strong wines and coffee which he drank, kept him in a state of unnatural excitement.

GOSSIP.—Eighteen years ago, the Emperor Napoleon III. then twenty years of age, offered his hand to a beautiful English lady of noble birth, and was haughtily refused. “Mademoiselle,” said he, “you have thrown away a crown!” A fantastic speech, no doubt, for a young adventurer with nothing but great hopes, a high heart, a few thousands, a great name, and exile! On the 29th of January, 1835, it is said that Louis Napoleon, irritated, or at all events disappointed, by the refusal of a lady who now boasts one of the highest names in England, went to Lady Blessington, and told her of her rejection, but not of his fine speech, which immensely amused the world of London when it was known. That day eighteen years, Mlle. De Montijo, was Empress of France, and the twenty-five quarterings of the noble Spanish senora will be emblazoned on the shield of the new dynasty.

BACKWOOD AFFAIRS MATRIMONIAL.—Soon after the arrival of Ujbazy on the banks of the Thompson River, when he and his party had hardly pitched their tent, a young backwoodsman came on horseback up to them, and said: “Which is the daughter of the Hungarian general?” Miss Ujbazy, who spoke English, asked him what he wanted. “I reckon it’s time for me to marry,” was the reply, “and I came to propose to you!” The young lady began to laugh; but her novel suitor declared that he was in full earnest, that he did not live far off, and that he would assist her father in every way. But when he saw that his proposal was not accepted, he rode off to his business, without having alighted from his horse during the conversation. The Hungarians afterwards learned that in the backwoods not much time is wasted in courting young ladies, or paying them attention before marriage. The pioneer visits a neighbour who has grown-up daughters, and asks, “How do you do?” places himself on a chair before the chimney, chews, spits in the fire, and utters not another word; after awhile, he takes his leave; and when he has paid a couple of such taciturn calls, he says to the young lady: “I reckon I should marry you!” The answer is commonly: “I have no objection.” The couple, without further ceremony, proceed to the justice of the peace, and make their declaration; and when the missionary Methodists happen to come in their neighbourhood, the civil marriage is solemnised religiously.—White—Red—Black.

WORTH HEEDING.—If men gave three times as much attention as they now do, to ventilation, ablution, and exercise in the open air, and only one-third as much to eating, furnishing, and late hours, the number of doctors, dentists, and apothecaries, and the amount of neuralgia, dyspepsia, gout, fever, and consumption, would be changed in a corresponding ratio. Mankind would rapidly present the aspect, not only of a far healthier and thriftier, but a far more beautiful and more virtuous race.

FANNY KEMBLE says: “I firmly believe that we must not look for the real feelings of writers in their works; or rather, that what they give us, and what we take for heart-feeling, is head-weaving—a species of emotion engendered somewhere betwixt the bosom and the brain, and bearing the same proportion of resemblance to reality that a picture does: that is, like feeling, but not feeling; like sadness, but not sadness; like what it appears, but not indeed that very thing. And the greater the man’s power of thus producing sham realities, the greater his main qualification for being a poet.”

FACTORY LIFE IN RUSSIA.—I will begin with the masters. They are generally slaveholders, and can buy or sell any number of slaves. They are obliged to feed them, but that is all. They can please themselves whether they give the slaves any wages, and if they ask for any, they can flog them for doing so; they have no alternative but to submit. Some of the slaveholders, who have no manufactories, will give their slaves a passport to work elsewhere, but they must pay him so much per year for that privilege, and he can call them at any moment he may think proper, and they are bound to obey. The food for the slaves is black bread and salt, with soup three times a day; but I have been told that the officials, or the men who are placed over them, will eat the beef and skim the fat from the top of the soup, and the slaves dare not complain. If you go into a shop and ask the price of any article you may wish to purchase, they will ask you three times as much as they intend to take, and if you are a foreigner, they will cheat you if they can. I come now to the workpeople. It is the custom here to work day and night. I have had an opportunity of seeing the French and Belgian workpeople, but I must say that one Russian will do as much work in the same time as any two of the above-mentioned countries. They do their work most cheerfully, and appear contented; but I do believe that if the people were free to-morrow, there would be nothing but bloodshed. They must first educate the people; most of them can neither read nor write. They are generally very badly clothed, having little more than a coat made of sheep-skins. Since I have been with them, they have been very civil and kind. It is customary here to have soldiers at the mills—some four and some six—their duty being to examine every one of the workpeople before they leave the mill. It is also their duty to flog any one with a birch rod. If a person has to be flogged, there is a man to each leg and arm; he is laid on his belly upon the ground, and receives his quota on his bare flesh; and if the flogger does not do his duty, he gets the same number.—Letter from an Artisan.

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

IGNORAMUS.—Gentlemen do not wear what are called "engaged" rings.

E. L. N.—The consumption of wheat in Great Britain has been estimated at one quarter per head for the whole population. This estimate is exclusive of the quantity taken for other purposes.

VERITAS.—On the eve of your marriage, you wrote your intended a letter, to which you required an immediate answer. She did not reply, the match was broken off, and now you want to know what you are to do, for you really love the girl. It was foolish to write the letter—you ought to have gone yourself. Letter-writing is too cold and business-like for love. However, perhaps it is only a girlish tiff. Present yourself before her, and if she loves you, all will be smooth again. A repentant lover at the feet of a loving but offended maiden, soon thaws her into a genial humour. March ice does not long hold out against the beams of a spring sun.

R. S. D.—A country like England, that pretends to have the most liberal institutions, and when tried by its highest constitutional test, is found not to possess them, is placed in the awkward predicament of appearing to have asserted what was not true. It is humiliating to us, as a nation, to have this picture so constantly before our eyes; but its extreme fidelity ought to secure for it the deepest attention, because, before a national wrong can be redressed, the people must be thoroughly imbued with the conviction that it is wrong. They must first be drilled to recognise the evil, and then drilled to set about its abatement. In these matters the press is the drill-sergeant, and a very martinet it is in the performance of its onerous duties.

GENEVRA has been engaged to a young man for seven years, but, for the last two years, she has heard nothing of, nor received any communication from him. She cannot assign any reason for this silence, having parted with him on excellent terms. If alive, which may not be the case, he has evidently forgotten the engagement. As people, nowadays, unless they go on expeditions to Central Africa, are not held in captivity, the probability is that the man has gone to Australia, and married there. Emigration is destructive to all home-ties, home-feelings, and home-duties. Genevra would be justified in receiving attentions from, and ultimately wedding another.

W. M.—The rules of a building society, which do not state the time within which members withdrawing shall be paid their money, are defective, and you had better apply at once to J. T. Pratt, Esq., barrister, appointed to revise the rules of friendly societies. But as you entered the society with your eyes wide open, you ought to have been aware that you did not propose paying your money into a savings bank.

S.—Redness of the nose, in both sexes, is produced by inattention to the common rules for preserving health. With men the bottle is the predisposing cause; with women, and especially young ones, tight lacing. An unnatural pressure on the waist and chest obstructs the circulation, and causes stagnation of the blood, in that prominent and important feature, the nose. A young girl with a red nose, is a very melancholy spectacle. The ill-natured shrug their shoulders, and whisper; those who know better, regard her with deep concern, for they know she is rapidly hastening to an untimely grave.

.*.—You sign yourself "A Subscriber;" don't do so again, for a similar letter will not be noticed.—It is disputed who was the first Pope of Rome. Roman Catholics say St. Peter was; Protestants, some less spiritual personage. Such a question can scarcely be settled, because, in the ages before printing came into vogue, the highest historical testimony to refer to is a few scattered manuscripts and countless traditions, all jumbled together in inextricable confusion. It would be quite safe, because quite natural, to believe that St. Peter was the first Roman pontiff.

GRACE DARLING thinks it sinful, as well as ridiculous, for a person verging on sixty years, to be ashamed of her grey hairs, and dye them black. We do not subscribe to the censure, as regards the sin; for, as the logicians say the moral quality of the action resides in the intention, we do not see anything sinful in an old lady wishing to appear younger than she really was. The practice is certainly ridiculous, and, among the sensible, loving-old ladies who know more of the mysteries of home-happiness than of the insipid elegancies of the drawing-room, more honoured in the breach than the observance. If grey hairs were not natural, nobody would ever have them.

L. H.—The following will effectually destroy bugs, &c.: Take half an ounce of oxyuriate of mercury, two ounces of muriate of ammonia, and two pints of water, mixed together. Apply this wash to the bedstead, thoroughly. By rubbing wood with a solution of vitriol, insects and bugs are prevented from harbouring therein.

THE LOVER OF FAIR PLAY.—We must abide by our opinion, that a married woman is helplessly trammelled as regards ownership over any property that, in moral right, she may call her own. As a learned judge once remarked, almost any wife may be kissed or juggled out of the protection of the strictest marriage settlement. But, as to will making, she is almost helpless; for, if personal property be left to her, for her sole and separate use, she may dispose of it without the assent of her husband, but not without the intervention of a court of equity, and the aid of trustees. Indeed, it seems to be pretty well established among lawyers, that a married woman is so entirely under the control of her husband, that she cannot make what can with propriety be called a will. All that she can do is, under certain circumstances, to make something which operates like a will after her death, which is termed an appointment, and which may be altered or revoked during her life. Her competency in this respect, however, depends entirely on the declared intentions of the person who was the donor of the property to her.

ANNA AND MARTHA.—Exaggeration is common to all classes of people—the rich, the intelligent, and the non-intelligent; and with all of them it is a fault in degree. The uneducated more frequently indulge in comparatively an innocent magnification of objects and circumstances, which is not falsehood, although it may look like it. They exaggerate simply for want of ideas to supply conversation. But with the educated the habit is a vice—a very mischievous vice. The kind of exaggeration you complain of is very common. It is prompted by a frantic straining after notoriety, and its indulgence is a downright exhibition of falsehood. Your male acquaintance talks of lords, professors, politicians, and other distinguished personages, at home and abroad, as if he had been admitted familiarly into the highest and most accomplished society—when you know he has never been twenty miles from his native country town, except on the solitary occasion of his coming to London to visit the World's Fair, in Hyde Park. You must let the unfortunate man have his own way, but silently treat him as Mr. Burchell did the fine ladies who dazzled the simple daughters of the Vicar of Wakefield. All people, whether male or female, who trade in false pretences, are sure to ultimately find their proper level. Habitual liars generally meet the fate of Alcides—they are consumed on the funeral piles they themselves have raised. But, as a matter of moral economy, terrible exaggerations are as useful in their ugly way as drunken slaves were to the children of the Spartans. They teach sensible men and women how much better, more noble, it is to be simple and true, than deceptive, inflated, and offensively braggadocioal.

DORRE.—Neither Moore nor Wellington ever saw Napoleon, much less went to school with him.

R. D.—Hair dyes are all of them more or less dangerous—inasmuch as silver caustic, the foundation of all the nostrums vended for this purpose, acts as a depilatory. We would rather not recommend anything of the kind. Medical men discountenance the practice, and recommend those who are unable or unwilling to discontinue applying some kind of dressing to the hair, to content themselves with a simple, yet good material. The best olive oil, scented with otto of roses or bergamot, is the most suitable for the purpose. The same scents may also be used for pomatum, which should be made of perfectly pure lard, or marrow.

MARY asks us, what is "a cure for a flirt?" Nothing but reproaches and contempt. A flirt is a woman who, having no respect for herself, never receives any, either from her own sex, or the other she treats so vilely. Mary is playing a dangerous game—she is always in danger. Her modesty is tarnished, and if she can blush at all, it is only the blush of audacity; or, if terribly insulted, that of shame, self-humiliation, and bitter regret. The carnation of pure innocence never visits the cheek of a practised flirt. The men know this full well, and that is the reason the best shun her, and the worst pursue her only to torment and devour her. "Will you walk into my parlour?" said the spider to the fly.

A. C. Z.—As the present government have no declared policy, but say they will go with the times, they may do a great deal, or they may do nothing at all. They are pledged to introduce a reform bill of some kind, but what it will be they themselves don't know, for they have not made up their minds. The bill on the franchise, introduced by Lord John Russell, last year, may afford some clue to their intentions. He proposed that the qualification in boroughs should be reduced from £10 to £5; in the counties, from £50 to £20; and in the case of copyholders, from £10 to £5; leaving the forty shilling voters in possession of their privilege. He also informed the House that all adult males paying forty shillings of direct taxation, no matter how levied, should be entitled to vote for a county or a borough. In addition, he stated that the small boroughs should be enlarged to constituencies of not less than 500.

BRAHMA.—The impression that some terrible convulsion in the political world is about to happen, is pretty general in Europe. In France the likelihood is popular—in England ugly and repulsive. We don't like war; but when forced upon us by circumstances beyond our control, it would only be a matter of duty towards ourselves, not only to be forewarned, but forearmed. 'Tis wise precaution is warranted by the aspect of affairs. The Austrian empire hangs together by a few threads, Turkey is very shaky, Italy is fierce for revolt, Prussia quivers like the aspen, and the whole of Germany is as ready to rise and overturn her numerous petty governments, as her hosts were, in the last days of the Roman empire, to march on the capital, and exterminate the throne of the Caesars. In every quarter there may be perceived indications of troubles and sanguinary hostilities, and it will be well for England and her mighty interests, if she exerts herself so as to be prepared for the first shock of the tempest. An awful responsibility rests on the shoulders of the government, of whatever materials it may be composed. After the Emperor of the French has been crowned, probably the curtain will be raised a few feet, so as to afford a glimpse of the first scene in the tremendous drama that is to be played on the wide stage of the wide, wide world.

HUM-NITAS.—Our national greatness is dimmed by the awful SHADE by its side. In one way or another, there are in this country about two millions of paupers, the great mass of whom—human beings, like ourselves—are pent up in gloomy buildings, where they grin and mock at the dispensation which has subjected them to the horrors of hopeless, incurable indolence. The remainder rove about the country in bands, fester in the hearts of the large cities, die in holes and corners, like dogs and cats, or wither away in gaols, crammed to the topmost storey with the sons and daughters of crime. And this miserable agglomeration of idleness and vice blights every fair and good thing that comes within its reach, and in its blackness serves to bring out in bold relief the richly decorated column of Britain's wealth and glory. But the paupers and mendicant tribe are a legacy from the past. Every generation has treasured them up as heir-looms, and transmitted them to posterity untouched in their revolting integrity. Their "darkness visible" has fascinated the men of every period. In one age they were the protégés of the barons; in another, of the Church; and now, as if to raise the ignominy to its loftiest distinction, the middle classes, by strenuously insisting on an unadulterated poor-law system, have taken a million of them under their protection, and thrust them under the nose of the nation as an unabatable nuisance, an everlasting infliction of unproductive, mischievous dependence on the industry and moral intelligence of the nation at large.

CAROLUS JOHANNES.—Your dedication to the "British Lion" might win the applause of a convivial party; but as, in the event of an invasion, the toppers would not be the fighters, we cannot say we admire your effusion. The allusion to Louis Napoleon is ridiculous. He won't come to England—he has something better and safer in view. The two first verses and the last would not be a bad song, especially to the air, "The Shamrock and the Lily."

Oh, Albion, my island,
Though all the world, though all the world
Should join against thee, my land,
With flags unfurled, with flags unfurled

In true men's hearts there never Could creep a fear, could creep a fear,
But that such vain endeavour
Would cost them dear, would cost them dear

Then Albion, my island,
We'll drink to thee, we'll drink to thee;
The only piece of dry land
Where men are free, where men are free.

B. AND D.—We never interfere in mere political discussions, for we have a thorough contempt for what, par excellence, are termed politics. And for no class of politicians do we entertain a very flattering opinion. One set want to keep all they have got, and another hanker after popularity, through the medium of an advocacy which has borrowed its tone from what were called the reformers of thirty years ago. Their views of this latter party are narrow, their ideas antiquated, and their mental ability exceedingly poor; in heart, they are as crabbed and dry as a set of politicians above them. Their distinguishing peculiarities are rant, cant, fustian, and mulish intractability. The people, in the true sense, are their own leaders—when they were not, they were always in some trouble or another. There is nothing like independence, but there is no independence in being led by the nose by a newspaper writer, or a frantic platform orator. Politics are made by the people, not for them; and when a change of any moment is imperatively demanded, talking and scribbling does not bring it about. It is the national head that does it all. When conviction has once entered that splendid temple, its high priest, the national intelligence, has but to order, and it is obeyed. Mere politicians have too mushroom-like an existence to make a durable impression on such a mighty institution.

G. C.

I'm a bachelor, fair ones, in want of a wife,
Who would be constant and true to the end of her life.
I am tall and genteel, and very well made,
And passingly handsome (so people have said).

My hair is jet black, and my eyes the same hue,
And my heart, I will vouch, is both faithful and true
Five thousand pounds is my annual fee,
And I should like a companion to share it with me.

If these lines a young lady's approving eyes meet,
A bachelor's heart will be laid at her feet:
Then husband and wife for ever we'll be;
So without hesitation, pray address to G. C.

LETTERS RECEIVED.—Sheffield (An apprentice is bound to obey his master in all lawful and reasonable things)—J. Read (A creditable first attempt)—Handel (We have seen "The Treasury of Knowledge, or the Seven Wonders of the World," on the old book-stalls)—John Richardson (Declined, with thanks)—J. M.J. (Write to the editor of the Shipping Gazette)—Thomas Prescott (We never made any such promise)—Musician (Purchase some work on vocal music)—Experience (Most of the savings banks are considered safe enough, but we could not undertake the responsibility of recommending one in particular)—Laura St. Clare (The Great Napoleon was uncle to the present Emperor of the French)—A. D. F. (Declined, with thanks. We are inundated with such compositions)—Sydney Stock (Will be pleased to accept the same answer)—Leeds (Fulfil your engagement, instead of taking unfair advantage of an accident)—Thos. Watkins (Order the number from your news-agent)—T. Crossley (Wombell was the name)—F. G. (See the ship advertisements in the newspapers)—H. Montague (Her Majesty is about five feet two inches in stature, Prince Albert five feet ten inches)—R. W. S. (Apply to a solicitor)—Frederick Bramstone (Such cases are skillfully treated in the metropolitan hospitals)—D. B. H. (Too late)—C. (The salaries of under clerks in the Custom House vary from £75 to £150 per ann.)—Superstition (The so-called "Science of Astrology," is an imposture)—F. W. "Minnigrey" was concluded in No. 397 of this Journal)—Miss T. (On receipt of six postage-stamps, the number will be forwarded through the Post Office. We are surprised and offended at the agent's negligence)—Genevra (Address your letter, "The Registrar, Herald's Office, London")—E. M. T. (Not destitute of merit)—S. Smith (Order the "Herbals Guide," or "Companion," from a bookseller)—John B. Gill (We never, under any circumstances, undertake to return manuscripts. As yours was not used, it, of course, was not deemed admissible)—J. R. Watson (You will only be entitled to a dividend on the net amount of your claim)—Pocket Book (The certificate of bankruptcy is a complete answer to all claim on your father. The surety is liable, unless the Statute of Limitations bars the claim)—Sussex (The custom of excluding the eldest son from the inheritance, took its origin as you have surmised. In after times it was qualified by the presumption, that the father, in his life-time, had provided for his eldest son)—A. Mackie (A soldier or soldiers may be billeted on tavern-keepers, as often as is necessary. Read your licence)—R. H. D. W. (Both wrong. No picture in the National Gallery can be copied, without the special permission of the trustees)—W. H. B.—Florence and Kate—Bona A. Z.—J. A. C.—Gog—Shakespeare—Miles de Cogan—Pater Noster—Un Jeune Homme—Alfred—J. B.—Violet—Lonely—Eliza Ann Watson—Worthy—William C.

EBENEZER ELLIOTT.—Since penning the memoir of this distinguished Englishman and poet, given in another portion of this Journal, our attention has been directed to the following lines, eulogistic of the memory of the "Corn-law Rhymer," by Walter Savage Landor:

Glory to those who give it! who erect
The bronze and marble, not where frothy tongue
Or bloody hand points out; no, but where God
Ordains the humble to walk forth before
The humble, and mount higher than the high.

Wisely, O Sheffield, wisely hast thou done
To place thy Elliott on the plinth of fame
Wisely hast chosen for that solemn deed
One like himself, born where no mother's love
Wrapt purple round him, nor rang golden bells,
Pendent from Libyan coral, in his ear,
To catch a smile or calm a petulance;
Nor tickled downy scalp with Belgic lace;
But whom strong Genius took from Poverty,
And said: "Rise, mother, and behold thy child!"
She rose, and Pride rose with her, but was mute.

Three Elliots there have been—three glorious men
Each in his generation. One was doom'd
By Despotism and Prelacy to pine
In the damp dungeon, and to die for Law,
Racked by slow tortures ere he reached the grave.
A second hurl'd his thunderbolt and flame,
When Gaul and Spaniard moord their pinnaces
Screaming defiance at Gibraltar's frown,
Until one moment more, and other screams
And other writhings rose above the wave,
From sails a-fire and hissing where they fell,
And men half-burnt along the buoyant mast.
A third came calmly on, and asked the rich
To give laborious hunger daily bread,
As they in childhood had been taught to pray
By God's own Son, and sometimes have pray'd since.
God heard; but they heard not: God sent down bread
They took it, kept it all, and cried for more,
Hollowing both hands to catch and clutch the crumbs.

I may not live to hear another voice,
Elliott, of power to penetrate, as thine,
Dense multitudes; another none may see
Leading the Muses from unthrifty shades
To fields where corn gladdens the heart of Man,
And where the trumpet, with defiant blast,
Blows in the face of War, and yields to Peace.
Therefore take thou these leaves—fresh, firm, though scant
To crown the city that crowns thee her son.
She must decay: Toledo hath decayed;
Ebro hath half-forgotten what bright arms
Flashed on his waters, what high dames adorn'd
The baldrick, what torn flags o'ruing the aisle,
What parting gift the ransom'd knight exchanged.
But louder than the anvil rings the lyre;
And thine hath raised another city's wall
In solid strength to a proud eminence,
Which neither conqueror, crushing braver men,
Nor Time, o'ercoming conqueror, can destroy.
So now, ennobled by thy birth, to thee
She lifts with pious love the thoughtful stone.
Genius is tired in search of Gratitude:
Here they have met; may neither say farewell!

London: Printed and Published for the Proprietor by GEORGE VICKERS, at the Office of "THE WEEKLY TIMES," 354, Strand, in the Parish of St. Clement Danes, in the County of Middlesex.—May 14, 1853.

THE LONDON JOURNAL.

And Weekly Record of Literature, Science, and Art.

No. 430.—VOL. XVII.]

FOR THE WEEK ENDING MAY 21, 1853.

[PRICE ONE PENNY.]

[TERROR OF SUSAN AND THE WIDOW BARNES ON SEEING THE CHEETAH AT LIBERTY.]

THE WILL AND THE WAY.

BY THE AUTHOR OF

"THE JESUIT," "THE PRELATE," "MINNIGREY," ETC.

CHAPTER LXXXVIII.

Hope springs eternal in the human breast.
Man never is, but always to be blest.
The soul uneasy and confined at home,
Rests and exults in a life to come.

POPE'S ESSAY ON MAN.

It was astonishing the change which a few days of quietude and repose produced in the health and appearance of Ellen. Her cheek gradually lost that pale, sickly hue which generally follows the attack of fever; and although the traces of severe suffering were undoubtedly visible, they had not that character of indelibility which the future cannot efface.

Being no longer subjected to the power of her enemies, both her heart and mind were comparatively at peace.

Her great anxiety—and we doubt not but our female readers will think it a very natural one—was for the return of her lover, of whose fidelity a suspicion had never entered her imagination. She trusted to him with all the confidence of woman's nature, ere bitter experience has broken the promise of her dreams, and taught her that the words which fall like a spell upon the ear, when uttered by the lips we love, can be breathed only to deceive.

She attributed his silence to illness, or to the probability that Meeran Hafaz and her unprincipled uncle had intercepted her correspondence; but to change or indifference, never! The testimony of an angel to such a tale would scarcely have been credited by the confiding girl.

The knowledge that the warm-hearted Dr. Orme had set out for Italy, in order to discover his young favourite, was an additional consolation: she prayed daily for his success and speedy return.

The return! There is both music and poetry in the word. Like dew to the faded flower, it brings strength to the pining heart—it implies the re-knitting of affections which absence too long has tried—it speaks of home, of the fulfilment of hopes and dreams, of the smiles and tears which welcome the wanderer back. How often do the lips of woman, in solitude and suffering, breathe the prayer, whose burthen is comprised in that one word—return!

Ellen loved to dwell upon the word, and the bright sunny pictures of the future to which it was the key. She would sit for hours in her chamber, absorbed in dreamy thoughts, which did more to recall the rose of health to her cheek, than all which medicine could achieve.

At such times, her faithful attendant, Susan, seeing that she desired to be alone, would leave her, to assist in the household duties of the place, which were considerably augmented by the presence of her young mistress and herself in the solitary residence of the renegade.

The Widow Barnes, the only domestic of the Khan, was a simple, faithful creature, whose fidelity no bribe could corrupt; but, unfortunately, like most ignorant persons, she was both credulous and superstitious.

The retired life which her master had hitherto led, joined to the circumstance of her being excluded from the largest room in the house—the door of which was kept carefully locked, and the shutters closed—disposed her to listen to the idle gossip of the neighbourhood. Some said that her employer was a coiner; others hinted that his pursuits were of a yet darker nature. The old woman inclined to the latter opinion herself, for she had frequently been startled from her sleep by strange noises, resembling—as she expressed it to Susan, whom she admitted to her confidence—the roaring of a lion, more than anything else; and all from the mysterious chamber where the Khan passed the greater portion of his time. Never having seen the cheetah, or hunting leopard, no wonder she was at a loss to account for them.

"I don't believe a word of it," replied the village girl—whose countenance, however, belied her assertion, for it was deeply impressed with awe and terror. "Your master is too good to have anything to do with the powers of darkness."

"He is good!" said the old woman, forgetting for a moment her superstitious fears, and listening only to the promptings of her gratitude; "he has been kind to me and mine!"

"And yet you accuse him of —"

"I don't accuse him of anything," interrupted the Widow Barnes; "I only repeat what all the neighbours say of him. He speaks with no one."

"Perhaps he is not fond of conversation?" observed Susan.

"He does not look like a Christian."

"I have yet to learn that a man's Christianity depends upon his looks!" added the girl. "I see how it is," she said; "you have listened to the tales of a set of idle gossips, who would rather speak ill of their fellow-creatures, than admit they know nothing about them."

"That won't account for the noises I have heard!" answered the widow—who, although a very worthy person, began to feel piqued that her judgment should be doubted.

"But the wind might!" was the reply.

"Or the voices which I heard myself!"

"Voices!" repeated Susan, with a look of incredulity.

Drawing her chair closer towards the one on which the speaker was seated—the usual prelude to confidence or scandal—Mrs. Barnes informed her new friend how, being startled from her sleep by the fearful cries which she heard in the room below, she had descended the stairs, and listened at the door of the forbidden chamber, where she distinctly heard the Khan threatening some one that some person, or thing, should tear him in pieces, if he resisted; that the menace was followed by a deep growl, and then a supplication for mercy.

It is scarcely necessary to inform our readers, that this occurred on the night of Dr. Guyot's visit to the renegade, when he so incautiously placed himself within the spring of the cheetah.

"And what followed?" demanded Susan, pale with terror; "do speak!" she added, as her companion shook her head mysteriously; "you almost frighten me!"

"I returned to my bed more dead than alive!" said the widow.

"And this stranger—perhaps some visitor?"

"Till you came, my master never had any visitors: at least, I never let any in; and I am still more certain that he did not let any out—for I laid awake all night, and must have heard him!"

Susan did not know what to think—the tale of the old woman was so circumstantial: she resolved, at all events, to consult her sweetheart, Joe Beans, upon the subject, upon his return: she had more faith in his judgment than her own. Unfortunately, he had that very morning accompanied Red Ralph to Mortlake, in order to liberate the warren, as narrated in the preceding chapter. The Khan, too, was absent, and, except her young mistress, they were left in the house by themselves; a fact which did not tend to increase her courage, after the severe trials to which it had so lately been exposed.

Not willing to let the old woman perceive the effect which her tale had produced upon her, she turned it off by observing that she must have been dreaming.

At that moment, a cry so loud and unearthly, that there was no possibility of mistaking it for human, came from the mysterious chamber, adjoining the room where they were sitting—it lasted for more than half a minute. At first it consisted of one prolonged note—then broke into a howl like that of rage; after which it sank into a whine, and then died away.

Had either Susan or Mrs. Barnes ever been in India, they would at once have recognised the cry of the hunting leopard, when weary of its chain and inactivity.

There is a fear whose very intensity, paradoxical as it may seem, imparts a kind of desperate courage. Although her heart trembled at her words, Susan declared her intention of ascertaining the cause of the cry which had startled them both: that it proceeded from nothing human, she felt assured.

"Where is the key of the room?" she demanded of her companion.

"My master has it," replied the old woman.

"Is there no other?"

The widow Barnes hesitated; but her own womanly curiosity got the better of her terrors, and she confessed that there was a second key, which she had found in clearing out one of the closets, and which she felt assured would open the door of the mysterious chamber.

"But don't, for the love of heaven, be rash!" she added, "I should never forgive myself, if harm should come to you, or to my master! Let him be what he may, he has been kind to me and mine!"

Despite her remonstrance, the poor girl, doubly excited by curiosity and fear, took the key from the speaker, and, lighting a candle—for she knew that the shutters of the apartment were closed—advanced fearlessly along the passage to the door: as she reached it, a low, suppressed growl struck upon her ear.

"God help us!" said the widow, "but it must be something awful! Let us return before it is too late!"

"No!" answered Susan, firmly; "were I alone concerned, I question if I should have fortitude to persevere; but the safety of my dear young lady is at stake, and it is necessary that we should know the real character of the man in whom we have confided."

The key turned in her hand as she spoke, and the door slowly opened. The scene which met her gaze might have appalled a stouter heart than the simple village girl's: for several moments she stood incapable of speech or motion, transfixed with horror.

Our readers are already aware of the nature of the Khan's pursuits—the purpose for which he had procured from the hospital, the poor-house, and the grave, so many heads to operate upon.

Several of these ghastly remnants of mortality were scattered on the ground: having served the experiment for which they had been originally obtained, they were of no further use. One, still fresh and bleeding, was fixed on the frame which we have before had occasion to describe: its glassy eyes were turned towards the door—as Susan and the widow imagined, directed towards them.

On quitting the house that very morning, the renegade had forgotten to feed the cheetah; and the hungry animal, excited, no doubt, by the odour which the sad relics of humanity exhaled, had broken its chain, to reach the disgusting banquet. The cry which had alarmed the females, was uttered by the brute as it made its last successful effort to release itself.

At the sight of living prey, the graceful creature, whose ferocious instincts were now thoroughly roused, crouched upon the ground, like a cat before it makes its spring, and began lashing its flanks with its tail. The lips were drawn tightly over its jaws, displaying fangs which were almost as sharp as lancets; and the pupils of its eyes dilated, till they flashed like two orbs of fire upon the intruders.

Susan was fascinated with terror—as the poor, fluttering bird is supposed to be fascinated by the gaze of the Indian rattlesnake. The Widow Barnes, who was standing behind her, was the first to recover her self-possession. She saw the cheetah, slowly drawing nearer, gliding upon its belly. Just as it had measured its distance, and was about to spring on the defenceless girl, she dragged her into the passage, and dashed to the door. Another moment, and it would have been too late. They heard the bound of the animal—its fall against the door—its savage growl of disappointment—and they shrieked with terror.

Half mad with fear, even Ellen was forgotten: they rushed from the house, and ran down the narrow lane, they knew not whither—anywhere, to escape from the horror of the scene.

As they left the place, Lady Mowbray, with two female keepers, whom she had engaged from a noted asylum, for the carrying out of her cruel purpose, drove up to the cottage. The artful woman had represented that her niece was mad: not that she feared any hesitation to execute her bidding from them—they were hardened to cruelty, and willing to lend themselves to any act, provided they were paid. If such a thing as conscience existed in their callous hearts, they only knew it from its marketable value. Besides, the order of the Chancellor relieved both their employer and themselves from all fear of responsibility.

Ellen, who had heard the shrieks of the widow and Susan, as they fled from the house, although still weak and suffering, hesitated not an instant, but descended to ascertain the cause. At the bottom of the stairs, she encountered the female keepers.

"What seek you?" she inquired.

"You, most likely!" was the reply.

"Me?"

"It is my niece!" exclaimed Lady Mowbray, who had alighted at the door, and recognised the voice of her victim. "Be speedy!" she added, fearful lest any unexpected succour should mar the success of her enterprise.

Without a word, the two women laid violent hands upon Ellen, and commenced dragging her towards the carriage.

"What mean you?" exclaimed the terrified girl. "I will not be forced! Help! I have friends, who will punish this outrage!"

"So they all say!" observed one of the keepers, with a grin. "Bring her along—never mind her prating!"

"Of course not!" replied her companion; "I have had too much to do with mad people, to pay attention to their ravings!"

"Hear me!" exclaimed Ellen, trying to appear calm. "I am not mad! You have been deceived by my enemies! Indeed I am not!"

"Of course she knows better than the doctors!" observed one of the keepers.

"Or the Chancellor!" added her companion.

"Or her aunt!" resumed the first speaker, "who has taken such pains for her—poor young lady!"

Despite her resistance, the two furries succeeded in forcing the suffering girl into the carriage, where Lady Mowbray was already seated. A cold, satirical smile passed over the countenance of the heartless woman of the world, as she eyed the victim of her persecution: it was thrown away, however, upon Ellen—the poor girl had fainted.

As a precaution, she drew down the blinds of the carriage—and it was well she did so; for, at the end of the lane, the vehicle was passed by Joe Beans and the Khan: either of whom would have heeded the danger of contempt of Chancery as little as she did the reproaches of her conscience, or the opinion of the world.

Joe had just been relating to the renegade the affair with the warren—his rescue from the rats, at Mortlake, and committal at Bow Street, upon a charge of an attempt at murder.

"Attempt at murder!" repeated his companion.

"Yes!" replied Joe; "as the man was there himself to press the charge, I could not be said that he had committed it, had as he is!"

"Ah! you mean the lawyer?" observed the Khan, in the tone of one who suddenly recollects himself.

"Who else should I mean?" demanded Joe.

The old man remained silent.

"Do you know whether he has committed any other murder?"

Still not a word.

"I can't make thee out!" continued the speaker; "thou beest a strange being: I sometimes think there be as much evil as good in thee!"

"More," said the renegade, with a sigh; "much more! I must live many, many years, before the good actions of my age can atone for the evil ones of my youth! Strange," he murmured, in an under-tone, "that the best impulses of the heart should spring from it only after it is withered!"

Joe was not much of a philosopher, but he perfectly understood the drift of the old man's speech. There was a bitterness of self-reproach in the tone in which he uttered it, that gave the rustic confidence in his honesty.

"It be the case with all of us, I suspect!" he answered; "I ha' heard parson say that repentance is the fruit, and that sin be the blossom of the tree. For my part, I don't much care to have either blossoms or fruit in my garden!"

On reaching the house of the Khan, they found a group of twelve or sixteen persons collected at the door, with whom Susan was vainly disputing admission. The faithful girl, after yielding to the first natural impulse—which was to fly from the place, on making the discovery above related—recollected that Ellen remained behind—unprotected and alone. Despite the remonstrances of her companion, she returned to share the danger of her young mistress, and, if necessary, to defend her; but nothing could induce the Widow Barnes to follow her example. She continued her flight till she reached the cottage of her nearest acquaintance, where the exaggerated account she gave of the horrors of the mysterious chamber, were swallowed by open-mouthed credulity.

The consequence was the assembling of the knot of persons, who, confident in the presence of each other, and eager to gratify that morbid love of the horrible and strange which is the characteristic of ignorance, were demanding admission of the terrified Susan.

"No nonsense, young woman!" exclaimed a stout, bluff-looking man, whose rubicund cheeks and carbuncled nose proclaimed him a worshipper of the purple god; "we must come in: I am beadle of the parish!"

"And I constable!" added another.

"And we are here to assist!" chorussed the rest.

"But there is a lady in the house, who is ill—very ill!" urged the poor girl, imploringly; "your presence will terrify her!"

"Terrify her!" repeated the beadle; "a likely story—as if a respectable parish beadle could terrify any lady! It's far more likely, poor thing, that she will hail us as her deliverers from this fearful den!"

"Of course she will: we must come in!"

This was added by the constable, who, like his brother official in the parish, was a stout, active man. Smiting the action to his words, he ascended the steps which led to the cottage; and, taking Susan in his arms, attempted to remove her from the door, but without using any unnecessary violence in so doing. It was at this moment that Joe Beans and his companion drew in sight of the house.

No sooner did the former perceive his sweetheart in the grasp of her assailant, than he sprang to her assistance. To release her, and pitch the constable headlong down the steps, was the work of an instant.

"What is that for?" demanded the fellow, as soon as he had recovered his breath, which Joe's vigorous attack had all but driven out of his body.

"To teach you manners!" replied the rustic; "first lessons are always difficult—you'll take 'em easy in time. Don't be frightened, Susan!" he added, pressing the terrified girl, who clung to him, yet closer to his manly breast. "I am here to protect you! Where is Miss Ellen?"

"In her chamber," was the answer; for she was not yet aware of the visit of Lady Mowbray in her absence, and the consequent abduction of her dear young mistress.

The appearance of the Khan did more to dissipate the crowd, than even the stout arm of the rustic. There was a cold dignity in his manner—a singularity in his semi-oriental physiognomy, which awed them. As he advanced to the house, they slowly made way for him. He passed without a word, and closed the door of the cottage.

"Sorcerer!" muttered the beadle, as he disappeared.

"Worse than that!" added a cobbler, whom curiosity had drawn to the spot.

The first speaker stared, as if to ask what could be worse.

"He is a murderer!" added the man, who had heard from the Widow Barnes's own lips an exaggerated account of the scene she had witnessed in the hitherto carefully locked chamber.

Drawing a little to the side of the road, he related to the curious mob all that the old woman in her terror had stated, with such poetical additions as his own love of the marvellous suggested. On hearing his tale, the constable and beadle decided upon applying at once to a magistrate, for a warrant to apprehend him; the rest of the crowd promising to remain at a respectful distance, to watch that no one left the house.

The Khan judged, from the ill-concealed horror and fear with which Susan regarded him, the nature of the discovery which had taken place. It required all his eloquence and reasoning to dissuade her. Joe, upon his invitation, accompanied him to the room where the cheetah, now rendered furious by hunger and disappointment, was committing sad havoc amongst the scientific preparations and apparatus of its master.

If anything could have increased his companion's veneration for the renegade, it was the calm courage with which he approached the animal, whose roars subsided to low growls as its master advanced, with his eyes riveted upon him. Without the least hesitation, he seized it by the collar, and, despite its struggles, dragged it to the broken chain, to which he once more fastened it. That done, he next proceeded to explain to the awe-struck Joe the meaning of the ghastly heads scattered about the apartment. When the young man perfectly comprehended his purpose, his countenance brightened with intelligence and hope.

"And do you really think," he said, "that you can restore poor old Martin to his senses?"

"I have no doubt of it," was the reply. "My only fear has been lest it should be at the expense of life. But that danger," he added, thoughtfully, "may be avoided."

Although perfectly satisfied with the explanation, Joe wished to leave the place; the grim skulls exercised a horrible species of fascination over him—he could not withdraw his gaze.

"Come," he said, "let us return to the kitchen, where we have left Susan."

No sooner did they make their appearance, than the agitated girl threw herself upon the neck of her lover in a passion of grief, and exclaimed, with tears and broken sobs:

"Forgive me—oh, forgive me!"

"Forgive thee, Susan!" said the young man. "Forgive thee! for what? for being frightened?"

"Ellen—poor Miss Ellen!" she whispered.

Joe's countenance became as pale as death.

"Do speak," said her lover; "anything is better than doubt!"

"She is gone!" she faltered; "fallen into the hands of her enemies!"

"Gone!" repeated Joe; "and through my fault! I ought not to have left her side for an instant. Gone—and Master Harry on his way back! Harry—who trusted to me to protect her, to watch over her—the truest friend man ever had! I shall never be able to look him in the face again!"

In the bitterness of his disappointment, he buried his face in his hands, to hide the tears which, despite his manhood, marked how bitterly he felt.

The Khan appeared scarcely less overwhelmed than himself; a painful struggle seemed to be taking place within his breast; in a few moments, however, his countenance became calm and settled. Placing his hand upon the shoulder of his companion, he bid him hope.

"Come what may," he said, "I will yet restore her to you!"

"You?"

"I! You have the word of one who never promised lightly, or failed to keep the pledge he gave!"

CHAPTER LXXXIX.

There is a bond between us, sir, which makes One common danger or one common safety: For the same roaring sea which wrecks my bark, Ingulfs yours, too. OLD PLAT.

It had been previously decided between Meeran Hadaz and his unworthy accomplice, Colonel Mowbray, that in the event of Ellen being once more in their power, they should, without further delay, proceed to Carrow Abbey—the last place in which her defenders would expect to find her. The secluded situation of the old mansion, and the evil reports believed by the superstitious country people, rendered anything like unpremeditated intrusion improbable. Against legal interference they were guarded by the order of the Chancellor—and open violence they were equally prepared to meet.

The two confederates were seated in the library of the colonel, anxiously awaiting the arrival of the messenger who was to bring them intelligence of the success of Lady Mowbray's scheme. The countenance of the young Indian, once so calm and passionless, bore traces of the violent emotions of jealousy, doubt, and disappointment which had lately agitated him.

"Once more mine," he murmured, "and I will trust to no other eyes to watch, or arms to guard her! I have been weak, colonel—weak as a child—and suffered foolish pity to unman me—henceforth she shall find my resolution cold as her own heart—firm as its prejudices against me!"

"She has indeed been most ungrateful," observed his convenient friend, "as well as blind to her own interests. Such a brilliant match! such very liberal settlements! I scarcely know a name in the whole peerage which would have refused them!"

"Perish such considerations!" exclaimed the young man, indignantly; "it is the very disinterestedness of her nature which adds such fuel to my passion—I never yet valued the smile that gold could buy!"

"Dreamer!" muttered the colonel, with a sneering smile.

"If I am a dreamer," continued Meeran, "let me dream on still! I have a faith in woman—call it idolatry, if you will—peculiar to myself. Even the love of Ellen would cease to attract me if my wealth could purchase it! I pine for it," he added, "as the adventurous traveller pines to explore the cloud-capped tops of the lofty mountains of my native land—on account of the glory and the difficulty. I would win—not buy her!"

"And falling to win?" interrupted his friend.

"Will take by force," replied the Indian, gloomily, "that which is denied to entreaty! I must place a bar between her and this accursed peasant slave, who has crossed my heart in the only hope it ever framed! When next we meet, the fate of Ellen and my own will be decided!"

A servant entered the room with a note upon a silver, which he handed to his master, who hastily broke the seal, and, having cast his eyes over the contents, handed it, with a triumphant air, to his visitor.

It contained only a few hurried lines from her ladyship, informing her husband of the success of their plan—that Ellen was once more in her power, and that both were on their way to Carrow, whither the writer recommended the colonel and Meeran to follow as quickly as possible.

"You may leave the room, James," said the master of the mansion, addressing the servant; "there is no answer."

The man hesitated.

"What is the matter?" he added.

"Nothing, sir; only that another messenger has arrived from Newgate, and wishes to see the rajah."

Although Meeran Hafaz was not entitled to that rank, it was the name by which he was generally spoken of in the household of Colonel Mowbray.

This was the second application which the warren had made for an interview with his employer.

With muttered curses, wrung from him by impatience, Meeran Hafaz directed the domestic to inform the messenger that he would visit the prison that very day.

"Will you accompany me?" he demanded of his friend, as soon as the man had left the room.

"Perhaps I had better not."

The young Indian looked offended by the reply.

"I neither know, nor do I wish to be informed," continued the colonel, "of the nature of the tie between you and my late brother's servant; doubtless you have found him useful, and if it lies in your power to serve him in any way, I would counsel you to do so."

"As useful as you did," observed the young man, bitterly, "when you and Captain Lucas employed the rascal to spread the report of the late baronet having killed a political opponent in a duel, and being compelled to fly to France for his life—which falsehood induced the deceived and unhappy wife to intrust herself and infant to the care of a false friend!"

The colonel turned very pale, and muttered something about Will Sidelier being a worthless villain.

"Come, come," continued Meeran, "rail not against the poor devil! Men, after all, are what necessity, and the virtues or vices of those above them, make them. I will soon return from my visit to Newgate, and then we will start at once for Carrow Abbey: there I shall triumph over my rustic rival, and reap the rich reward of my long-enduring passion and perseverance!"

"Or of thy crimes!" muttered his confederate, as the door of the apartment closed between them. I am tired—galled by the lordly airs of superiority this fellow gives himself, and willingly would—but, no!—no!" he added, with a shudder, as he recollected the fatal confession he had signed, in which he acknowledged himself a cheat and a swindler; "he would blast my reputation, and render even the wealth I have sinned for worthless! I have paid the penalty, and will not, like an idiot, forego the enjoyment!"

With this resolution he rang for his valet, to give orders for his departure for Norfolk; for, convinced by reflection that it would be useless to struggle with the toils in which, at the commencement of their acquaintance, Meeran had bound him, he felt only anxious to complete the price of his redemption, by forcing the unprotected orphan to his arms.

Will Sidelier had not been many hours an inmate of Newgate—to which prison the magistrate had committed him, upon the charge of robbing and attempting to murder Mr. Elworthy—when he began to entertain those uneasy sensations which indicate a conscience ill at ease. Great as the terrors were which he endured in his subterranean den at Mortlake, the mental ones which now came thronging upon him were yet greater; and more than once he asked himself the question, which one half of mankind ask only when too late—whether honesty, after all, is not the best policy, even in this world. True, for a man in his position, he was rich, possessed of more gold than at one period of his life he dreamed was in existence. He could buy land—houses, waving corn-fields, and woods might call him master. Every enjoyment his gross, sensual nature could desire was within his means; but there was a drawback to this reflection—a dark and terrible one—that the possessor of this gold was a prisoner within dark stone walls, with an accusation affecting his life suspended over him.

His first feeling was of anger that he had not completed his work, and really taken the life of the lawyer; his second, of regret that he had ever undertaken the task at all.

"Would he were anything but a lawyer!" he thought; "lawyers are like priests—they never forgive! This fellow, whose brain-pan I could crush with a blow of my fist, will never rest till he has brought it home to me! The judge will be a lawyer—I shall have hard work to escape between them!"

In his danger he remembered Meeran Hafaz: he knew his vast wealth, and standing with those who could save him; and as his yielding to his temptation had brought him into difficulties, he determined that he should find the means to save him.

"He must," he said, "or we both swing together! I was always of a sociable disposition, and should not like to hang alone!"

Such were the feelings with which he twice sent to request an interview with the young Indian. Disappointment at his not obeying his first summons, added to his recent sufferings, made him ferocious and sullen—in fact, so much so, that he scarcely deigned to notice his visitor, when he entered the cell in which he was confined.

"So you are come at last!" he muttered, savagely.

"Ruffian!" said the young man; "is this your gratitude for my condescension in visiting you in prison?"

At the words "ruffian" and "condescension," the eyes of Will Sidelier flashed fearfully upon the speaker: perhaps he remembered whose temptation had placed him in his present danger—or still writhed under the recollection of the severe chastisement he had received.

"Ruffian!" he exclaimed. "Well, I suppose I must not quarrel with the name, since we bear it equally from the same godfather! But as for gratitude: I feel no gratitude for your doing that which I could have compelled you to do, whether you liked it or not!"

"What means the insolent?"

"Insolent!" interrupted Will; "there are a pair of insolents! and, since you feel so little for the position to which your bribes, temptations, and crimes—ay, sir, crimes, for they were yours even more than mine—have reduced me, I'll tell you what I'll do: I'll send, the first thing in the morning, to Mr. Elworthy!"

"Well?"

"Confess everything to him!"

"Go on!"

"Even to the death of Sir William Mowbray!"

"And then hang like a dog!" quietly observed Meeran Hafaz, without betraying the least alarm at the threats of his confederate.

"No matter—I shall not hang alone!"

"There, again, you are mistaken!" continued the young Indian; "there is not one jot of evidence against me, except your word, which no one will believe! I am rich, have friends high in power, and instruments ready to swear to anything I may suggest; so you see, after all, Will, the probability is that you must hang alone!"

It was curious to observe, whilst the speaker was thus addressing the instrument of his crimes, how the bold and insulting look of the ruffian gradually changed to one of cringing servility and utter hopelessness, as the conviction took possession of his mind that the wily tempter was beyond his power.

"No matter!" he said, trying to put a bold face upon the difficulty; "at least, such an accusation will blast your reputation!"

"Not in the least, my good man!" coolly answered Meeran.

"Detain you in London, at the very moment you are desirous of quitting it, to accomplish your purpose against Miss De Vere! I wonder," he added, with a shudder, "how you can bear to look upon her!"

Although his visitor had affected to treat the menaces of the prisoner as unworthy of the slightest consideration, he was secretly moved by them: he had been long enough in England to be perfectly aware that the law, in certain cases—such as murder—struck the strongest in its might, and was not to be tampered with; that, even if he eventually escaped the penalty of his crime, it would only be after trial and imprisonment; and he gradually suffered himself to relent.

"Sidelier," he said, "were I the heartless man you think, I should leave you to your fate! Me you cannot assail; and I naturally felt indignant at your conduct, after having resolved to risk everything to insure your safety."

"At the word 'safety,' the eyes of the warren began to brighten.

"Yes," continued the speaker, "had your conduct been such as I had a right to expect, in three days you would have been at liberty; but, as it is —"

"You will not abandon me," interrupted the wretch. "For a hardy word, spoken in despair? I fancied you had forgotten me! Could you not feel for one hour the horrors of captivity—the fearful thoughts which crowd upon the inmates of these walls, as they count the weary hours of sleepless night—the terrible dreams which haunt them, when worn-out Nature at last takes refuge in a broken sleep—you would pardon my impatience—pity, and not upbraid me!"

"I do pardon you!"

"And you will save me?"

"And I will save you!" replied Meeran; "but not, as you suppose, from any personal considerations—I have already told you that I am above them. In three days you shall be at liberty, but you must consent to quit the country!"

"Willingly!"

"For ever?"

"For ever!" repeated Sidelier; "I have little to love or to regret in it: I don't believe I have even a dog to care for me!"

"Enough!" answered Meeran, rising to depart; "tomorrow you will receive a visit from your father!"

"My father!" repeated the captive, with astonishment.

"One, at least, who must pass as such: follow the directions which he will give you, and trust to me to accomplish the rest. Once at liberty, you must traverse France till you reach Marseilles, where you will find a ship bound for India!"

"India, or any other land!" sighed the wretch; "all countries are to me alike indifferent!"

Drawing out his purse, his visitor inquired if he wanted any money.

For once the yellow idol had lost its influence upon the heart of the captive.

"Gold!" he exclaimed; "it has been my bane—my curse! My conscience is loaded with it! I would give it all—all that I possess—for one calm night of peaceful sleep!"

Finding that, in his present state of his mind, his visit could be of no further use, the tempter left him to himself.

"Will he keep his word?" thought the prisoner, as soon as he was alone. "He must—he dares not break it: despite the pride and defiance with which he listened to my threats, 'tis plain he feels their force! I was right—quite right!" he added; "either we will both be saved, or swing together!"

With this resolution, he seated himself upon the stool, near the window of his cell, and became buried in reflection.

When Meeran Hafaz returned to the residence of the colonel, he found everything in readiness for their journey to Carrow Abbey. To the surprise of his friend, he informed him that he had changed his intention.

"Changed it?" exclaimed his confederate, with astonishment.

"Yes. In three days I shall be at liberty to accompany you; but I cannot quit London till then."

The colonel inquired no further, but gave orders to unpack the carriage: knowing his visit to Newgate, most probably he guessed the nature of the business which detained him.

CHAPTER XC.

The sword is tempered to the soldier's hand;
The drug is mixed to arm a woman's weakness;
The law hath quibbles for the miser's gain;
And every crime its ready instrument.

HERMIONE.

THERE are hundreds of men in London, calling themselves agents, who would be much puzzled to give an account of the nature of the business they transact. They neither buy nor sell—and yet they live. Some profess to be lawyers, although they never prepared a single brief; others, bill-brokers, who profess their readiness to cash the acceptances of thoughtless heirs to any amount, without having the means, perhaps, of paying the rent of their scantily-furnished offices.

The only stock in trade of the greater part of the class of men we allude to, consists, like the spider's, of their web—spun from the venom of their brain—as that of the insect's is from glutinous resources, provided by nature for that purpose, in their bodies. They are a race of beings to whom honour is a forgotten name—who consider crime only in proportion to its risk, and, provided the insurance be large, are ready to risk everything to obtain it.

One of the most celebrated of this class was an old man, of a most venerable appearance, who was generally supposed to have made a considerable fortune—how, it would have puzzled an honest trader to tell; for William Davids kept neither books nor merchandise, was particularly careful in discounting, and had never been seen upon 'Change.

The old deaf woman, who, for more than thirty years, had kept his chambers in Clement's Inn, when questioned upon the subject by his curious neighbours, used to declare that he seldom had more than one or two visitors per week. It was known that he seldom went out: so the inquirers naturally concluded that those one or two customers were good ones.

If paying well made them good ones, they were not much out in their calculation.

To this person did Meeran Hafaz resolve to address himself, and, on the evening of the day on which he had visited the warren in his prison, he set out, alone and on foot, to visit him.

The old man was seated at a small round table, in the dismal little room he called his office, examining, by the light of a solitary candle, various papers and memoranda, written partially in hieroglyphics, scattered before him. They were the reports of the instruments he employed in the various transactions in which he was engaged. A wiry-haired, red-head looking man was standing by his side.

It was his confidential tool, known by the name of Tyburn Ned.

"What has become of the infant?" demanded his master.

"Safe in the workhouse."

"And no suspicions?"

"None. I took care to change its clothing of lace and cambric for the coarsest rags."

"Right!" said his master, making a note; "that affair is settled!"

"And the captain?"

"Over the water!"

"At last!" sighed old Davids, with satisfaction. "That fellow has given me more trouble than profit. Let him know that if he returns, it will be useless to expect any further assistance from me—a bungler! He may hang or starve, for aught I care!"

His observations were cut short by a ringing at the bell.

"See who is at the door," said the speaker; "but do not open it!"

Ned left the room, and in a few minutes returned, after having reconnoitred the visitor through the little iron grating in the door.

"Well! who is it?" demanded the old man, sharply.

"Don't know," replied the fellow; "but you had better see him. He is no ordinary visitor: he might be a prince, from his air."

"How is he dressed?"

"In a large Spanish cloak, drawn closely round him. I could see upon the hand with which he held it, partially to conceal his face, a diamond as large as that which —"

"Enough!" interrupted the agent, hastily; probably not wishing to hear anything more about the diamond which the speaker particularly alluded to. "You may admit him."

The next minute, Meeran Hafaz was ushered into the dimly-lighted apartment. Ned officiously placed a chair, but before the young man condescended to sit upon it, he abruptly demanded of the old man to dismiss his servant.

"Go," said Davids, mildly, to his confederate, "and attend to the shipping of those goods!"

This was a cant phrase agreed upon between them, when Tyburn Ned was to dog the steps of any visitor, and bring word back where he resided; for many who sought the assistance of the old man, cared little to leave either their names or addresses.

"Now sir," he continued, as soon as they were alone, "your pleasure?"

Had the young Indian not been well aware of the real character of the man with whom he had to deal, he would have hesitated before he replied to him; his appearance was so truly venerable, and everything around him bearing the impress of respectability.

"Is your name William Davids?" he demanded.

"It is."

"An agent?"

"A general agent, at your service," observed the man with a smile.

"I have heard of you, Mr. Davids!" resumed his visitor; "of your skill and determination in conducting the affairs of those who place themselves in your hands. I have heard that there is no difficulty, no matter how grave or delicate, which you will not undertake to arrange?"

"Provided the payment equals the risk and trouble, none."

"And what payment," inquired Meeran, in the blandest tone of voice imaginable, "would you conceive sufficient to undertake the escape of a prisoner from Newgate, within three days?"

"Three days! The time is short!" said the agent, musingly.

"I am aware of that!"

"Of what is the man accused?"

"Of murder."

"Of murder!" slowly repeated the old man, with the air of one carefully weighing the risk. It will be difficult!"

"Had the thing been easy," observed his visitor, "I should not have required the assistance of so experienced a person as yourself. The station of the man for whom I interest myself, is humble in the extreme; but that is not the question. Perhaps," he added, "it may lessen the difficulty, when I inform you that the murder was only attempted—not completed?"

"Not in the least, sir," replied the man of many secrets; "the proceedings will not only be difficult, as I before observed to you, but expensive."

"I am prepared to meet it."

"So many risks to run!" added the agent, who was mentally considering how much he might venture to ask.

"Your price, sir—your price?"

"Five thousand pounds!"

No sooner had the old fellow named this sum, than he fixed his little, ferret-like eyes upon his visitor, with an anxious look, to watch the effect his words produced.

"It is yours," said Meeran, coolly.

Instead of feeling rejoiced at the acquisition of so important a client, the wretch secretly cursed himself for having asked so little.

"Here," said the young man, drawing a note for five hundred pounds from his pocket-book, "is an earnest. I will call at the same hour to-morrow night, when you will report progress—your plans and means; if I find them feasible, the present sum shall be doubled. Is the arrangement understood between us?"

"Perfectly sir," answered the agent, eagerly clutching the note, which he held close to the solitary candle, to assure himself that it was a good one. "I will have all my plans matured by then; but before I take any steps, it is positively necessary that I should know the name of the—hem! did you say gentleman?"

"I thought I told you," observed the young man, "that his station was humble?"

"You did—I had forgotten."

"His name is Will Sidelers!"

"Will Sidelers!" repeated the avaricious old wretch, with a look of surprise; "dear me—how very extraordinary!"

"How, extraordinary?"

"I have already had an inquiry respecting him."

The speaker, in fact, was the very person to whom Captain Elton had confided the will of Sir William Mowbray, in order to get it copied.

"Some time since," continued the agent, "a client of mine placed in my hands the will of the late baronet, as security for a large sum of money."

"The name of this client?" eagerly demanded Meeran Hafaz.

"Captain Elton."

"And the sum?"

"One thousand pounds."

The wretch eagerly watched the countenance of his visitor, to note the effect produced. He was fearful of asking too much—and still more so of losing the chance of augmenting his ill-gotten store by demanding too little.

"Have you the document by you?"

"I have not," replied the agent; "but I can easily procure it."

This was a lie; but he knew by experience there was nothing so likely to insure the success of his scheme as exciting the impatience of the young man by pretended difficulties.

"When can you procure it?" inquired Meeran.

"To-morrow."

"Have it ready, and the sum you name is yours!"

A quiet, sly smile illuminated the countenance of the agent; he had made a good night's work of him.

A few such clients would have made any man rich.

(To be continued in our next.)

THE REMEMBRANCE.

BY EMMA A. B.

WILD thoughts come o'er me of the days gone by,

Dreams I had fancied in oblivion cast;

With quivering lip, and trembling tear-dimmed eye,

I gaze upon the shadows of the past.

Thy presence is the spell that calls them back,

To stand once more upon my life's lone track!

Oh early loved! I see thee once again;

I meet thy glance once more, and I forget

All the estrangement, all the years of pain

That darken o'er our path, since last we met,

For in my inmost soul, severed apart,

Thy memory lives, lost idol of my heart!

How thou wert loved, bear witness, bitter tears;

And even now that love is lingering on,

Unquenched by absence, and unchanged by years,

Surviving still though every hope be gone!

And thou perchance may'st vainly, too, recall

The one true heart, that loved thee best of all!

And there is gloom upon that well-known brow,

And sorrow in that soul, I must not share,

And yet the thought will come, ay, even now,

How blest I were only to soothe thy care.

It may not be, we meet on earth no more,

The vision's past! the idle dream is o'er!

Oh worse than idle, yet the heart is weak,

And love will cling around the chords of life:

Our steps are failing, we have need to seek

Some higher hope, to cheer us in the strife,

The hope to meet, amidst a world of bliss,

Those we have loved, and lost, and vainly wept in this!

SCIENCE.

NEW INVENTIONS, ETC.

THE LONGEST STRAIGHT LINE IN THE WORLD.—The Illinois Central Railroad is 700 miles in length, and has 626 miles in a straight line, which prepares the road for a speed which no other road in the United States is capable of.

WHITTINGTON'S STONE.—On paying a visit recently to the above, we were sorry to see it out of condition: the inscription is almost illegible, and in a short time will be wholly so. It appears to us that it has been recently moved from the edge of the road farther in, on account of a new street forming at the foot of Highgate Hill.

SEA-SAND FOR MORTAR.—Has the following method ever been tried for making sea-sand usable in building? Washing the sand in dilute oil of vitriol, so as to separate the salts from the siliceous particles, pouring off the fluid, and washing again, twice or more, in fresh water.

GAS FROM WOOD.—A dentist has taken out a patent for generating gas from simple wood. A correspondent says: "This is no idle fiction; we examined the works, and saw the light burning in a juxtaposition with that created from the Scotch coal, and it was equal to it both in purity and brilliancy. The inventor has entered into a contract with a company in Wilmington, to light up that town with this material. Pine wood, with which that country abounds, is preferred to any other, and the gas generated from it costs comparatively nothing. The apparatus for generating this gas is extremely cheap and simple, and we expect in a few years to find it in universal use—accessible alike to the poor as well as rich."

A RARE FISH.—At a meeting of the Belfast Natural History and Philosophical Society, the president exhibited a fish, taken in Belfast Lough, called the Leptocephalus Morisii. It is so very transparent that it is difficult to detect it in the sea-water, when living; its eyes only are the most conspicuous parts, being opaque, and very beautiful. It is about five inches in length; and, when preserved in spirits, its opacity is increased, so as to be then distinguishable.

THE PARISIAN EXHIBITION BUILDING.—The "Palace of Industry," in course of erection in the Champs Elysées, is to be composed of a hall 192 metres in length, and 48 metres wide. It will be surrounded by a double gallery 24 metres wide. The roof is to be supported by light columns, and the whole length of the building will be 254 metres, and the width 103 metres. The height is to be 35 metres. The building is to have four grand entrances—one at each side, with four smaller ones at the angles. The exterior wall will be made of cut stone, with arcades, 360 in number, the principal entrance facing the avenue of the Champs Elysées. All round the building will be inscribed the names of men celebrated in arts and manufactures. Also along the front of the principal entrance will be sculptured medallions destined to receive the busts of men who have been an honour to France. About 20,000 persons will be able to circulate with ease at the same time in the building. The roof is to be of iron and zinc, the top being of glass, like that of the Crystal Palace of London.

NEW DESCRIPTION OF STEAMER.—A new description of steamer, called "Rotatory," has commenced to ply on the Clyde, between Glasgow and Dumbarton. The peculiarity of her construction lies in her compactness, her paddles being much lower than the bulwarks; and, as her engine is on the rotatory principle, it likewise occupies very little space. The inventor, Mr. David Napier, thus describes her: "The advantages these engines have over others are, that they are more compact, consume about one-fourth less fuel, and require no engineer; the steersman, by a peculiar valve moves the vessel ahead or astern, without communicating with any one. The furnace bars contain water, consequently the hot ashes, which are destructive to the common furnace-bar, in this case tend to the production of steam. There is also a simple application of the fan to assist combustion. Such steamers would be invaluable on crowded rivers like the Thames or Clyde: as running down could scarcely ever happen, the steersman standing before the funnel, and there being no paddle-boxes to interrupt his view, he sees every object ahead, and can stop or reverse the engines in an instant, without leaving the wheel, or applying to any second party."—Glasgow Courier.

NEW MOTIVE POWER.

A company, just established in New York, have issued a prospectus of a new power, and claim for it the most extraordinary and marvellous qualities. It is called Salomon's carbonic acid gas engine; and the projectors represent their belief, that it is destined soon to surpass the highest anticipated performances of Ericsson's calorific engine, as much as Capt. Ericsson believes his power capable of eclipsing all previous efforts. The proprietors call it the "crowning work of motive-power," which is about to consummate and characterise the meridian glory of the 19th century. Carbonic acid gas is generated in any desired quantities, by the action of diluted sulphuric acid upon chalk. At the ordinary temperature and pressure, carbonic acid attains the gaseous state; but when subjected to the pressure of 36 atmospheres, or 540 lbs. to the square inch, at a temperature of 40 deg. Fahrenheit, it has a pressure of 1080 lbs. to the square inch. Its expansibility by heat, therefore, will create a motive-power of unlimited capacity. Mr. H. W. Adams, a practical chemist, made such experiments in 1850, with this gas, in its generation, its reduction to a liquid by a pressure, and also to a solid, that he feels justified in reporting on the value of the invention, and in testifying to its immense power as a mechanical agent.

The practical operation of the new engine is as follows: "The gas is generated, in the first instance, as before-mentioned, and is forced from the generator, under a pressure of 540 lbs. to the square inch, into a reservoir of small copper tubes, all united so as to form but one conduction main for the liquid, and so bent that a considerable length of this tubing is placed in an air-tight box, whose temperature is kept at 32 deg. by an exhaust-pump, worked by the engine. Upon entering this copper tubing from the generator, the gas is reduced to a liquid, and the condenser is thus charged. The pressure upon this copper tubing is now 540 lbs. to the square inch. A force-pump, worked also by the engine, is connected to one end of the copper tube, and at every stroke forces a given amount of carbonic acid gas into a gas-holder, or substitute for a steam-boiler, whose temperature is kept at 45 deg. When the liquid enters this reservoir, it is at once expanded into gas, and exerts a pressure of 1080 lbs. to the square inch. Under this pressure, a valve opens its communication with the piston, which is worked by the gas; then an escape valve opens in communication with the other end of the copper tubing, or condenser, while, at the same moment, the first-named egress valve closes, and another opens at the other end of the piston. The result is, that the piston is forced back into the cylinder under a pressure of 1080 lbs. to the square inch, while the gas at the other end of the piston is forced out into the copper tubing and condensed to a liquid by an instantaneous reduction of temperature to 30 deg., and under a pressure of 540 lbs. to the square inch. Thus a perpetual circuit of power is kept up."

This new power is said to be comparatively inexpensive.

[ANCIENT BUILDINGS NEAR FEROZE SHAH'S COTILLA, DELHI.]

TALES OF THE BRAHMINS.

Our English traveller, in the course of his desultory wanderings, visited the city of Delhi, still the seat of a phantom imperial authority, but looking as if it had fallen never to rise again. Its ruins, however, attest its former grandeur, for they extend over a surface as large as the whole of the British metropolis, and amply sustain the assertion, that when Delhi was the capital of Mahomedan India, under the Affghan or Patan dynasties, its inhabitants numbered upwards of two millions. At present they are probably not a tenth of that number, although Delhi is considered the most important British station in north-western India.

The inhabited part of Delhi is about seven miles in circuit, seated on a rocky range of hills, and surrounded with an embattled wall, strengthened with bastions, a moat, and a regular glacis. The houses within are many of them large and high. There are a great number of mosques, with high minarets and gilded domes, and, above all, are seen the palace, a very high and extensive cluster of Gothic towers and battlements, and the Jumma Musjeed, the largest and handsomest place of Mussulman worship in India. The chief material of all these fine buildings is red granite, of a very agreeable though solemn colour, inlaid, in some of the ornamental parts, with white marble; and the general style of building is of a simple and impressive character. It far exceeds anything at Moscow. The Jumna, like the other great rivers of this country, overflows, during the rains, a wide extent; but, unlike the Ganges, does not confer fertility. In this part of its course, it is so strongly impregnated with natron—extensive beds of which abound in all the neighbourhood—that its waters destroy, instead of promoting vegetation; and the whole space between the high banks and the river is a loose and perfectly barren sand, like that of the sea-shore.

Bishop Heber says, in his lively volumes, that:

"From the gate of Agra to Humayoon's tomb, is a very awful scene of desolation; ruins after ruins, tombs after tombs, fragments of brickwork, freestone, granite, and marble, scattered everywhere over a soil naturally rocky and barren, without cultivation, except in one or two small spots, and without a single tree. I was reminded of Caffa, in the Crimea; but this was Caffa on the scale of London, with the wretched fragments of a magnificence such as London itself cannot boast. The ruins really extended as far as the eye could reach, and our track wound among them all the way. This was the seat of old Delhi, as founded by the Patan kings, on the ruins of the still larger Hindoo city of Indraput, which lay chiefly in a western direction. When the present city, which is certainly in a more advantageous situation, was founded by the Emperor Shah Jehan, he removed many of its inhabitants thither; most of the rest followed, to be near the palace and the principal markets; and as, during the Mahratta government, there was no sleeping in a safe skin without the walls, old Delhi was soon entirely abandoned. The official name of the present city is Shah Jehan-poor (city of the king of the world); but the name of Delhi is always used in conversation, and in every writing but those which are immediately offered to the emperor's eye.

"In our way, one mass of ruins larger than the rest, was pointed out to us as the old Patan palace. It has been a large and solid fortress, in a plain and unornamented style of architecture, and would have been picturesque, had it been in a country where trees grew and ivy is green—but is here only ugly and melancholy. It is chiefly remarkable for a high, black pillar of cast metal, called Feroze's walking-stick. This was originally a Hindoo work; the emblem, I apprehend, of Siva, which stood in a temple in the same spot, and concerning which there was a tradition, like that attached to the coronation stone of the Scots, that while it stood, the children of Brahma were to rule in Indraput. On the conquest of the country by the Mussulmen, the vanity of the prediction was shown; and Feroze inclosed it within the court of his palace, as a trophy of the victory of Islam over idolatry. It is covered with inscriptions, mostly Persian and Arabic; but that which is evidently the original, and probably contains the prophecy, is in a character now obsolete and unknown, though apparently akin to the Nagree."

It has been remarked that the Patans built like giants, and finished their work like jewellers; yet the ornaments, florid as they are, in their proper places are never thrown away, or allowed to interfere with the severe and solemn character of their edifices. The breadth and excellence of their style may be attributed to the examples of Hindoo architecture which they had constantly before them, and which they scarcely ever failed to imitate, adapt, and improve upon. The picturesque mass of ruins shown in our very fine pictorial embellishment, exhibits something of the severity and simplicity of the manners of the early Mahomedan invaders of India; but we believe it has not yet been determined to what period the buildings belong. The probability is, that they owe their erection to Feroze Shah—the monarch whom Heber alluded to—who flourished about the middle of the fourteenth century, and is said to have built forty mosques, twenty caravanserais, five hospitals, a hundred palaces, ten baths, a hundred tombs, and a hundred bridges. But all his building could not save his throne from the invasions of the Moguls, under Timour and Baber, and the ultimate ruin of the whole of his posterity, under Akbar, the celebrated grandson of the latter. Nor could the building mania, which subsequently seized upon the Mogul emperors, prevent the like catastrophe befalling them at the hands of rebellious vassals, brigand Mahrattas, and hard-fighting and incorrigibly-intriguing British. The Mahomedan empire in India, both in fact and sentiment, is utterly ruined and destroyed, and all that remains of its several brilliant phases, are magnificent ruins like those shown in our illustration, scattered over the face of the country.

Some such conviction as this must have seized upon the mind of our English traveller; for, after gazing upon those remains of a once splendid Patan palace, he remarked to the Brahmin who acted as his guide, that he thought not only the political power, but the very monuments of the Mahomedan rulers of India, were rapidly hastening to oblivion.

"It is so decreed," remarked the Brahmin; "empires founded by the sword, melt away just as snow-flakes on the hills of Cashmere melt in the beams of the noon-day sun. The dust of battle has scarcely cleared away, eye the victorious rider and horse fall prostrate on the plain. Nothing is eterna but Brahma."

"If I mistake not, my friend," said the Englishman, drily, "the swords of Bala Rama and Krishnu had a good deal to do with overturning Buddhism, and seating Brahma on his throne."

"The Prophet Brothers," replied the Brahmin, "founded kingdoms and bequeathed them to their posterity; but the kingdom of Brahma they could not found, for it was before them, after them, and is eternally. Still I am free to admit that the earthly monarchies of Rama and Krishnu have disappeared; but they endured for more than two thousand years, and their monuments still survive. Moslem rage in vain has attempted to extirpate them. Behold their power, and its evidence. The Great Mogul is a phantom in the hands of your mighty Company, and these buildings, founded by his race, which in this part of India do not take back beyond two centuries, are already crumbling to dust."

"So I perceive," said the Englishman. "Delhi, although, in its architecture, comparatively a modern city, is nothing better than a pile of ruins. Yet some of the Mussulmen monarchs were great men. It would be difficult to find, in the long roll of European kings, one that excelled Baber, the most eminent and accomplished prince that ever adorned an Asiatic throne. Akbar was also a great emperor. The vast empire of the Moguls was never more flourishing than under his rule. History tells us that he established schools, in which both the Indian and Arabic languages and sciences were taught. Translations of works of taste and art were made at his express desire. Under his mild and equitable government, agriculture flourished, commerce revived, arts prospered, and his subjects enjoyed the fruits of their increased industry, free from those apprehensions of insecurity to which they had been so long exposed. Truly Akbar was a great king, as well as a great warrior!"

"He had many solid as well as shining virtues," said the Brahmin, sententiously; "but he failed to transmit any of them to his posterity. His grandson, Shah Jehan, the last Great Mogul who resided in the palace of the Patans, the ruins of which you so much admire, could not rule his own family; his sons were perpetually in rebellion against him, and while his wife Noorjean lived, she possessed absolute sway over his actions as well as affections. When she died, Aurungzebe, the third son, seized upon the throne by force and treachery, after massacring his brothers, and placing his father in prison, where he ultimately died, not much lamented by any class of his subjects."

"His affection for his queen must have been remarkably strong," said the Englishman, "to have induced him to erect over her ashes such a magnificent pile as the Taje Mahal, in Agra. But what induced him to abandon a palace founded, like our Windsor Castle, or the Kremlin in Moscow, by monarchs of his own creed, if not of his race?"

"The cause was romantic," said the Brahmin; "and it you are not disinclined to listen to a story, I will tell you."

The traveller willingly assented, and, in view of the sombre memorials of a past age, looking hoar and surly in the dawning light of an early morning sun, the Brahmin, with much comment and circumlocution, which has necessarily been omitted, related the following narrative.

THE SULTANA'S SACRIFICE.

In the summer of 1740, the imperial city of Delhi was in mourning. Shah Jehan, "The Lord and Conqueror of the World," "The Sun of Wisdom," "The Star of Islam," "The Light of the Universe," "The Puissant Emperor of India," lay on a bed of sickness. The mosques were filled with the faithful, offering up prayers for his speedy recovery; the shops were closed, to the great grief of all the tradesmen of Delhi, and the houses, as well as the people, wore a melancholy, apprehensive appearance. Some of the latter, congregated in groups in the squares and open places, were performing a ceremony dear to Mussulmen as well as Jews. Each one in turn waved his turban and shawl thrice round his head, as he besought the intercession of the prophet and all the saints, on behalf of his sovereign. Many of them made presents to each other, with the same ceremony; and a few, consisting of the most devout, revolved within themselves the necessity of a pilgrimage to Mecca.

Near one of these groups, closely observing them, stood a man in the prime of life and of distinguished appearance, who, although he wore the oriental costume, from the fairness of his complexion, was evidently an Englishman. By his side was a shrewd-looking old Mussulman, whose long white beard descended to the pit of his very ample stomach. The former was an English physician, named Boughton, one of those energetic men who, two centuries ago, by their tact, skill, and courage, obtained from the Mogul court concessions which served to lay the foundation of the British empire in India. Boughton had proceeded from Surat to Delhi, to negotiate with the emperor in person, for a licence to trade within his dominions, and establish a factory on some advantageous point on the sea-coast. But just as he had found Shah Jehan inclined to concede some trifling privileges to the company, the negotiations were interrupted by the latter's illness; and the English adventurer had nothing to do but wait patiently until the light of the world was permitted to shine again in public. His mission, conciliatory manners, and, it must be added, convivial habits, had gained him the acquaintance—friendship it could scarcely be termed—of Shere, the court sage and poet, who had good-naturedly assigned him quarters in the part of the palace where he was permitted to reside. Shere had taken a fancy to the young and dashing Englishman, and frequently accompanied him in his rambles in the town and through the adjacent country. On the present occasion both were rather taciturn, for the bulletin of that morning had been more dismal than usual. The emperor had passed a very bad night indeed. Boughton would have tendered his professional services, but, as he knew such a step would provoke jealousy, perhaps compromise his safety—for failure in a medical man in the East, is the last offence that is forgiven—he hesitated. Shere very much approved of his determination—indeed ventured obscurely to hint that the recovery of the emperor was not very ardently desired by his sons.

"That is very shocking!" observed the frank Englishman.

"Hush!" replied the wily poet-laureate, drawing him away from the edge of the crowd, so as to be beyond hearing; "the very stones of Delhi have ears!"

"In the event of the emperor going the way of all flesh," inquired Boughton, "what chance do you think I shall have?"

"The prophet guide us!—what a question!" replied the poet; "but as you seem so anxious, I will tell you all I know of their mightinesses the royal princes. Like all the children of the house of Baber, they are well versed in the learning of Persia and Arabia, and have deigned to cultivate some of the infidel Hindoo lore of Hindostan. Dara, the eldest, is handsome, generous, and rash. He is a very great favourite with everybody. The women sing his praises morning, noon, and night. Sujah is more prudent; but when in the pursuit of pleasure, he is a perfect tyrant. Aurungzebe, the third son, is a mystery: he affects the austere habits of a fakir, but I suspect his religion is but used as a cloak for his ambition. Morad is a very violent and impatient youth—quite a cub at present—but disposed to spurn all control."

"I should think the Prince Dara the noblest of the brothers," said Boughton; "and he would be the one to whom I ought to apply."

"Not so!" replied the poet; "he detests foreigners, but is too magnanimous to do them a wanton injury. Do you go to Aurungzebe—his star is the brightest; besides, I have heard him approve of the Portuguese settlements, and say that trade and commerce were the best mines from which the imperial treasury could be replenished."

While thus conversing, they reached the poet's residence. The chambers were numerous enough, but the furniture was very scanty; and Boughton was much inconvenienced for the want of a seat like what he had been accustomed to in Europe. Squatting on the ground like a tailor, offended his notions of dignity; but, as he could not avoid it, he endeavoured to make himself at home. The etiquette of the court of the great Mogul did not prohibit clandestine tipping. The poet was fond of his bottle, and as Boughton found the emperor's wine by no means disagreeable, he exerted himself to do honour to his entertainer's hospitality, sang him some French and English songs, and actually moved the old man to tears, by the pathos of his Scotch and Irish ballads. While they were thus engaged, a messenger summoned the poet away; and Boughton, glad of the opportunity, hastened to pay a visit to the zenana. Don't be alarmed, it only contained one lovely girl—the daughter of Shere.

The Englishman had discovered her one day, while rambling about the rooms in search of amusement. She had often seen him before, and heard him, too—for his singing resounded through the empty rooms of that portion of the palace. She was rather startled, but Boughton calmed her fears so gently, that she spoke to him; and as he understood both Persian and Arabic very well, they could converse with fluency. Her father had given her an instruction far superior to that generally received by the daughters even of the Mogul nobility; and as he regarded her extreme beauty and fascinating manners, he was not without hopes of pushing his fortune at court, by means of marrying her to some distinguished personage. Baba herself was totally ignorant of these ambitious views, and as she was artless and innocent as a child, it is not surprising, in a climate in which love at first sight is the rule instead of the exception, that she should from the first have been charmed by the handsome exterior, and manly but fascinating manners of her father's guest. On his part, it would be difficult to describe his sensations. He was young, ardent, and bold; and he could not disguise from himself that the lustrous oriental eyes of Baba had in them an inexpressible attraction for him. But he never returned from one of these stolen interviews without some misgivings as to its propriety. His English notions of honour were rather shocked at his abuse of the confidence of his entertainer. But as his passion rather increased than diminished after every visit, his scruples gradually softened in tone, and he submitted to what he deemed an irresistible impulse.

On this occasion he found Baba magnificently attired, for the daughter of a literary man. A circlet of diamonds crossed her pale, open brow—she had inherited a fair complexion from her Persian mother—and several jewels flashed in the coils of her raven hair. In person she was tall, with a fine figure, and a face of ecstatic beauty. Her lineaments were like those which delirious poets coin in their dreams or cups—for such inspiration comes as frequently from the latter as the former; and in her bewitching exterior she combined all the graces, as well as virgin freshness and modesty, of that rare style of beauty which seems a combination of the Greek and the broader-featured daughters of the north. She had only one attendant—an old woman, whom a trifling present of money and opium had easily bribed to secrecy.

She received the Englishman with a deep blush, and his bronzed countenance became deeply suffused, as he carried her jewelled hand to his lips, and then seated himself at her feet.

Perhaps, owing to his being heated with wine, he pressed his suit with more than his customary ardour; and among his soft whispers there was one which hinted at an elopement and a disguise.

Baba was alarmed: although unsophisticated, she had been educated in such strict notions of female reserve and restraint, that the proposal jarred upon her sensitive nature.

"Would you ask me to leave my kind old father?" she softly said.

"Father!" cried Boughton, carried away by his headlong passion; "what is a father to a husband? A father calculates, orders, and disposes; a husband, on the contrary, loves and entreats: he shelters his beloved one from every storm, from every danger; ever by her side, she is pressed to his bosom, rooted in and twined round his very soul; and while invoking heaven to shield her from harm, he puts forth his strength and his wisdom to build up for her a house, and provide for her a happiness which never ends but with the grave. A Christian husband, Baba, cherishes only one wife: fly with me, then, to the sea-side, where I have friends, companions, wealth; and if fortune should not smile on us in this land, I have my own dear native one, and a mother who will receive you as kindly as the second father of mankind did the timid dove when it returned to his ark."

"My father has said that your country is cold, that it is beaten by perpetual storms; and that to arrive there, one would have to sail from one extremity of the world to the other!" said Baba, gently repulsing him.

Boughton strove to combat her fears, which he partially succeeded in doing; but he had no sooner commenced renewing his frantic solicitations, than Baba hurriedly started to her feet, uttered a shriek, and fled.

The old woman uttered an unearthly exclamation, and speedily followed her example. Boughton was bewildered; but, on hearing a voice—a stern, sonorous one—saying:

"Miserable slave!—are you weary of life?"

He turned rapidly round, and beheld a sight which caused the blood to roll back on his heart in frost-touched currents. The figure of a tall, swarthy, but fine-looking man, blocked up the doorway. He wore a breastplate, inlaid with gold, and on his head a helmet, from which nodded a plume of feathers. The Englishman immediately recognised the Prince Dara.

"Explain this scene, Frank?" said he, sternly.

Boughton stammered forth some excuses, the weightiest of which was, his ignorance of the customs of the country, and his regret if he had committed any offence.

The prince eyed him for a moment in disdain, and then peremptorily gave him to understand that he had fixed his princely regards on the lovely Baba, and only waited for her father's consent to transfer her to his zenana.

Boughton looked the indignation he felt, but, not daring to reply, made a stiff inclination of his head, and seemed to await any further injunctions the prince had to lay upon him.

At this juncture Shere himself made his appearance, evidently in great perturbation.

"The emperor!—the emperor!" he gasped.

"What of my father, the emperor, the wise Shah Jehan?" asked Dara, turning pale.

"The angel of death has spread his wings over him," said the poet, "and nothing can save him but a sacrifice! There must be a life as dear as his own freely given to save him!"

Dara was not superior to the superstitions of the age; but in this particular one he lacked faith, and, after a few moments' reflection, he turned to Boughton, and, with a less severe countenance, said to him:

"I came hither to see you concerning my father, when I—, but let it pass; Dara knows how to pardon as well as condemn! I have heard that you are skilled in medicine?"

"I am a physician, and, in my own country as well as the neighbouring one of France, had acquired no slight reputation for skill," replied Boughton, boldly—for he felt that in his present position it would be better to show confidence than hesitation.

"Will you adventure the cure of the Shah-in-Shah, my illustrious father?" demanded the prince.

"I will!"

"Follow me!"

And the pair, without another word, disappeared from the presence of the astounded poet, court seer, and astrologer.

The prince led the way in silence, through numerous long corridors, and across splendidly adorned courts, all rigidly guarded by the élite of the emperor's guards, until he came to a large hall lighted by a hundred lamps. This was the threshold of the zenana, a place into which the prince dared not penetrate without the express permission of the empress. Having given the customary signal, the door was cautiously opened, and the prince was admitted. In a few minutes he returned, and beckoned the Englishman to accompany him. The latter unhesitatingly complied; after traversing several gloomy passages, he was ushered into a room hung with red cloth, and, like all the others he had seen in this portion of the palace, lighted by artificial means. On a couch of silk, above which was suspended the red umbrella of state, lay the monarch, moaning and tossing feverishly from side to side. Close by the couch knelt the figure of a woman, veiled from head to foot, and at some distance from it stood Aurungzebe, with his hands clasped and his eyes raised, as if in the act of silent devotion.

"Empress," said Dara, softly; "the Frank doctor."

The empress quietly rose to her feet, and, slightly putting back her veil, gazed at Boughton with an expression of deep scrutiny. The glimpse, passing as it was, enabled him to see a pair of deep-blue eyes, and a face of much sweetness, blended with dignity. She was young, having only borne the emperor one child, and justly celebrated for her personal charms as well as mental accomplishments.

Being as passionately fond of her husband as he was of her, his illness had roused all her woman's energies; and, as all the emperor's medical advisers had failed to restore him to convalescence, she had resolved, although contrary to court etiquette, and in defiance of the deeply-rooted prejudices of her husband and sons-in-law against foreigners, to consult the Englishman, of whose professional skill she had heard something from the rumours spread abroad by his attendants.

Stepping, without even a rustle of her robe, to the spot where he stood, she seemed to gaze into his very soul, as she said to him:

"Does thy knowledge of the healing art enable thee to practise it on kings?"

"It does," replied Boughton, touched by her sorrowful aspect; "I have studied in the first schools of medicine in the western world, and have had much experience in various countries."

"You seem honest," said the empress, thoughtfully; and then, addressing herself to the two princes, added: "Dare we trust our lord the king of kings in the hands of this stranger?"

"Let it be on peril of his life if he fails!" replied Dara, who, with all his reputation for magnanimity, had an inveterate dislike and suspicion of foreigners.

"In the name of the prophet, let him try!" answered Aurungzebe, covertly fastening on the Englishman a look as glittering as a serpent's.

The empress hesitated an instant, and then touchingly said:

"Frank, my lord has been a good lord to me—his hand has ever been gentle, his voice has ever been soft to me, his only bride and empress—judge, then, how deep is my love for him, and how bitter my sorrow would be, should he be wafted from my side, even to Paradise! Essay thy skill, and the prophet and the saints direct thy judgment!"

Boughton then was permitted to approach his patient, who, after a brief examination, he found was labouring under unmistakable symptoms of poison; but he prudently kept this discovery to himself, and, retreating from the couch, declared that the emperor was in no immediate danger, and would most likely be restored to health in a few days, if he took a draught prepared solely by himself, and administered by no other hands save those of the empress.

"Why only the empress?" said Aurungzebe, sharply. "The hands of those well beloved lend a charm and a potency to the most powerful medicine," answered Boughton, quietly.

"It shall be so!" said the empress, decisively, as she commanded Dara to place the Englishman in an apartment by himself, and furnish him with whatever he desired to have for his great experiment. The princes conducted him to a neighbouring apartment, where they left him, after placing a strong guard at the door; but before Dara had threatened him with instant death in case of failure, and Aurungzebe had cast upon him a look which shook even his well-tempered and long-trying iron nerves.

His medicine chest having been brought to him, he prepared the draught, which he intended to be a powerful counter-agent to a slow vegetable poison; and, having been conducted by the princes to the door of the zenana, delivered it to the empress, who received it trembling, and in silence. He was then led back to what in fact was his prison, to indulge in whatever meditations he might, in such a peculiarly perplexing position.

Thoughts of home, and country, and friends poured in upon him; and he began to consider that being head physician to a monarch who was then considered the greatest potentate on the earth, was by no means a sinecure.

While thus pondering, Aurungzebe entered, and abruptly inquired the real cause of the emperor's disease.

"Fever!" said Boughton.

"Produced by what?" demanded the prince.

"That I cannot say precisely; probably from over-exertion in the affairs of state, or a cold caught when last out hunting," replied Boughton, cautiously.

Aurungzebe eyed him closely and curiously for a few seconds, and then said:

"Will his majesty of the universe be worse before he recovers?"

"He will be nigh unto death's door!"

"Ah! When?"

"On the third day from this!"

The prince mused for a little while, and then said to Boughton:

"You wish to trade in my father's dominions, and build a factory on the coast: to what nation do you belong?"

"England, your highness!"

"I have heard of it. In the reign of my grandfather—the magnificent Jehanghire—an English ambassador was presented at court. The coach he presented is still in the royal menagerie. * Well, I perceive you are discreet, but upon your further discretion depends the success of your mission. I am going away, but the walls of this palace are not too thick for my ears!"

Boughton understood him, and shuddered as he imagined that he saw a premeditated parricide before him. Aurungzebe repeated his caution, and, after bestowing upon him a massive chain of gold, he left the room, and soon after the palace, to put into execution some of those crafty schemes which subsequently conducted him to the throne, over the bodies of his brothers, and at the expense of the perpetual imprisonment of his father, who in his old age was to learn the bitter lesson, that filial ingratitude was the basest of crimes, and that, for his rebellions against his father, he was retributively punished in the daring usurpation of his third and last-loved son, Aurungzebe.

While Boughton was pondering over the cold-blooded atrocities practised even at a fiery Asiatic court, the door of his room was again opened, and this time the Prince Dara entered. His inquiries were bold and straightforward, and he appeared satisfied with the assurances he received; but in one matter it pleased him to be exceedingly angry.

"Infidel!" said he.

"I am a Christian, and an Englishman!" retorted Boughton, indignantly.

"Thou art a Nazarene!" said the prince, unmoved, "and therein art an infidel; so, touching thy audacity with the Lady Baba, I have to tell thee that if thou darest lift thine eyes but to her scandal-tie, I'll have thee torn to pieces!"

"Have you forgotten that I am a prisoner?" said Boughton, looking him full in the face.

The prince blushed, and, without saying another word, turned upon his heel.

Two days passed away without his seeing any one but the guard; but on the morning of the third he was awakened from the uneasy slumber into which he had fallen, by hearing the hollow murmur of voices, and the clank of arms. The whole palace was in commotion. The Englishman smiled: he guessed the cause, and was about to congratulate himself on his captivity being near at an end, when Dara, transported with fury, and followed by a band of armed men, burst into the room, and loaded him with every species of reproach, in Arabic, Persian, and Hindostanee.

"Dog—murderer—poisoner!" he exclaimed; "thou hast extinguished the 'Light of the World,' and shalt die!"

"The Light of the World will burn brighter than ever before sundown!" said Boughton, calmly. "The emperor, I presume, is in the swoon I had anticipated!"

Dara gazed at him with a tiger-like expression of countenance, as he muttered an oath, and half drew his sword. Boughton saw that his life was scarcely worth a minute's purchase, so, instantly recollecting the incident between Louis XI. and his astrologer, he quickly said:

"If you slay me you slay your father! He dies within an hour after my murder! The spell will not work without the breath of him who prepared it!"

Dara was awed but not subdued by this threat, and ordered the officer by his side to throw the unfortunate physician into one of the dungeons beneath the palace. This was speedily obeyed, and as a reward for his endeavour to prevent the "Light of the World" being snuffed out by a poisoned hand, he found himself in a damp, musty, and dark dungeon, containing not a single article of furniture; indeed, nothing but a pitcher of water.

To account for this disaster, we must return to the chamber of the king, and also mention that Prince Dara, the day before, had been repulsed by Baba, and received but slight encouragement of his suit from her father. The poet loved his child too well to give his permission that she should enter the harem of a prince who already had the number of wives allowed him by the law of Islam. Dara had too much savage pride either to stoop to entreaty, or disclose the particulars of the scene he had witnessed between Baba and Boughton. In a few hours he thought he should be emperor, and then who dared dispute his will? But he had resolved to sacrifice the physician to his resentment; and what occurred in the imperial chamber afforded him a pretext for gratifying it.

On the third day Shah Jehan became much worse. His mind wandered more, his pulse beat quicker, and after a few convulsive throes he fell into a swoon, which the empress and her attendants at first imagined was the sleep of death: hence the alarm which had led to Boughton's catastrophe. But gradually his lineaments became more composed, and after awhile assumed the placid expression of simulated death. The empress remained by his couch, absorbed in prayer, except when she kissed the clammy brow of her husband, and gave way to a passionate burst of grief, mingled with the most endearing exclamations.

As the day wore on, and the emperor remained in the same condition, the empress became more composed; but it was the composure resulting from a desperate resolve, founded on the most implicit faith in the efficacy of the expedient she was about to adopt. Summoning Shere to her presence, she asked him whether a great sacrifice would not be acceptable to the Almighty under the present deplorable circumstance.

"It would, O empress!" answered Shere; "and, as I had the melancholy honour of informing your majesty two days ago, the Almighty sometimes vouchsafes to receive the most valuable thing possessed by one friend, as an offering in exchange for the life of another."

The empress threw herself on her knees, and, in a transport of conjugal love and fervent pity, exclaimed:

"My life is dearest to my lord as his is to me, and next to the life of my lord my own is the most valuable thing I possess: so, in the name of the most holy prophet and the saints in Paradise, I here devote my life to heaven, as a sacrifice for my lord's!"

The ladies in attendance on the empress set up a loud wail at hearing this determination, and entreated her to retract the rash vow.

"Your sublime highness!" stammered Shere, "has offered too much! The ancient sages have said that it was the dearest of our worldly possessions alone that were to be devoted to Heaven! The 'Mountain of Light,' that priceless diamond, taken by your great ancestor, the invincible Baber, at Agra, is the most valuable thing on earth. Let that, O empress, be the sacrifice for the life of the 'Ornament of the World,' 'The King of Kings!'"

"Not so!" answered the empress, solemnly; "no stone, of whatever value it might be—no, not even all the precious stones and jewels of the earth—can be put in competition with his life! I am resolved! my life for my lord's! had I a thousand, I would sacrifice them in return for the unbounded love he has given me!"

Summoning the Prince Dara, who was a great favourite with her, also the great officers of state, to the zenana, she appeared before them attired in her imperial robes, and wearing a crown of gold, inlaid with sparkling gems.

The couch of the dying emperor had been removed to the centre of the room, and the empress, after declaring, in a loud but musical tone of voice, that her sacrifice was free and voluntary, walked three times round it, and while doing so, fervently prayed heaven to take her life in exchange for the emperor's. After she had performed this solemnity she retired behind a screen, and continued praying aloud, so that all in the chamber could plainly hear her. After some time she was heard to exclaim:

"It is accepted—it is borne away—it is borne away!"

While these exclamations were ringing through the chamber, to the great terror of all present, the emperor opened his great black eyes, and murmured:

"Oh, my beloved, Paradise without thee is a dreary blank! My love, my light of lights, my beautiful, come—Shah Jehan calls!"

The sound of his voice brought back to the heart of the empress all her womanly feelings, and with a sob of joy she rushed to the couch, and kissed his hands, his cheeks, his mouth, his eyes, his forehead, the very pillow on which his head reclined.

The Prince Dara, after assuring himself that his father really lived, and was likely to live, ordered the chamber to be cleared, and went forth himself to command prayers to be said in all the mosques in Delhi, and throughout the empire.

The physician, who had really wrought this wonderful cure, meanwhile lay in his dungeon, unheeded and neglected. No, not quite neglected—for on the morning of the second day of his imprisonment, the dungeon door creaked on its hinges, and when it closed again, Boughton could hear the light breathing of some one who had been admitted.

"Another miserable wretch!" he thought; and at the same instant the idea flashed across his mind that his executioner had arrived. At this surmise he fairly groaned. To die a violent death at thirty, and in the hideous darkness of a dungeon, was too much for even the stoical philosophy of an Englishman in difficulties. We say he groaned, and then, convinced that he was to be put to death like a beast, he resolved to die after the fashion of

* There are similar incidents to be found in the course of Mahomedan history. Baber, when in the prime of life and vigour, offered his life in exchange for that of his son, who then lay sick; and it must be accepted as at least a singular coincidence, that as the son progressed towards convalescence, the father's health visibly declined, and he gradually sank until he died, without ever rallying.

a brave one when driven into a corner. Drawing a long hunting-knife, which he wore in his belt, he prepared to spring upon his assailant the moment he approached. The breathing every instant became louder; some garments rustled, and, even in that moment of terrible excitement, he detected a rich perfume in his cell, and concluded that the assassin was a noble—perhaps the Prince Dara himself. Nearer and nearer the object came, and just as he was preparing to take the fatal spring, he heard his own name pronounced by a musical and well-known voice: the next moment the knife was dashed to the ground, and he was clasping the sobbing Baba to his heart. She had neither forgotten nor neglected him. Inspired by love, she had bribed the guards—not a difficult matter in an Asiatic palace—and prevailed upon them to allow her to visit the prisoner.

"Baba—dear Baba!" exclaimed the delighted Boughton, as, in despite of his boasted manhood, hot, scalding tears rushed to his eyes; and he added to himself, "may heaven fail to forgive me if I ever wrong a woman with an evil thought or a suspicion again!"

Baba could not speak—her emotion was too deep for utterance, but she had sufficient presence of mind to place a stone bottle full of the emperor's wine to his lips, and a rich pasty in his hands.

The Englishman—after satisfying his hunger and quenching his thirst—inquired the news; and was rather astonished when Baba told him that the emperor's recovery had been caused by the sacrifice of the empress. It is reported that he swore terribly; but while he was cross-examining Baba on the delicate subject of Prince Dara's attentions, the door of his cell once more opened, and he was informed that an order had arrived from the empress to set him free.

"Heaven bless her!" thought the Englishman; "she at least has more wisdom than to believe in the efficacy of her mummery!"

Hastily snatching a kiss from the lips of Baba, while under cover of the darkness—for the guard had told her she must vanish like a flash of lightning—he bade her an affectionate adieu, after obtaining from her a promise to meet him again; he was then conducted to the gate of Sultan Khosroo, and dismissed with a friendly hint that he had better leave Delhi at once.

Shere received him warmly—almost kindly—and Boughton, who was naturally frank and honourable, confided to him the secret of his attachment for Baba. The old man was more astounded than displeased; but as he revolved in his mind the insidious designs of the heir-apparent, and was himself by no means a strict follower of Islam, he did not view the disclosure with that indignation which it would have excited in a rigidly orthodox Musliman.

"The Emperor Jehanghire, my never-to-be-forgotten and illustrious patron," he muttered, "was more of a Deist than anything else! He saw good in the followers of Brahma, and Zoroaster, and Christ—and why should I not see good in this handsome Nazarene? Besides, his people take only one wife, and his star, next to that of Aurungzebe, is the brightest in the horoscope!"

The next day Boughton was summoned to court to administer to Jehanara, the favourite daughter of the emperor, whom grief for her father's illness had thrown on a bed of sickness.

A week's assiduous attention served to restore her to her wonted health, and the physician—whose fame, despite the wonderful sacrifice of the empress, began to be noised abroad—was honoured by an audience with the emperor and the empress. Shah Jehan was a munificent monarch; but Boughton, when offered some most costly presents, only asked for the privilege of carrying on a free trade in his majesty's dominions. The emperor, amazed at the modesty of the request, complied with it cheerfully, but insisted on his accepting what had been offered him.

"And thus," observed the Brahmin, as he drew towards the conclusion of his narrative, "commenced that tremendous power which you British now wield in India. The emperor recommended the English physician specially to the favour of the Nabob of Bengal, in whose service his professional abilities enabled him greatly to distinguish himself; and Boughton, who must have been a patriotic, self-denyng man, obtained an extension of the privilege given to him personally by Shah Jehan, to all his nation. On the payment of 3000 rupees, a licence was given for an unlimited trade, without payment of customs, and a factory allowed to be established at Hooghly, by the Company's servants at Surat.

"And what of Baba?" inquired the traveller, whom the story had interested.

"She married the man of medicine—turned Christian, I believe, and became a happy wife, and the mother of a numerous family. Her descendants are now among the most opulent of the merchant princes of Calcutta."

"And the empress?"

"Sickened and died. As the emperor began to recover, in proportion her health and strength visibly decayed. The emperor, distracted, removed her, during the sultry summer months, to the cool and beautiful valleys of Cashmere—but all in vain. In the ensuing winter she breathed her last, in his arms, at Agra—the sacrifice was completed. Shah Jehan, after her death, became an altered man. Instead of having only one wife, he adopted the custom of the East in this respect to its fullest extent. He became extravagant, undertook expensive wars, and finally so alienated the affections of his subjects, that he was easily dethroned and imprisoned by his own son, Aurungzebe, who subsequently proved himself to be a man of the most consummate talent. Shah Jehan had abandoned the ancient Patan Palace, which you now behold in ruins before you; but after the loss of his umbrella, he petitioned his son that he might reside in it during his remaining years, in order that he might chasten himself by constant familiarity with every object that would remind him of his beloved empress, and her unexampled sacrifice to conjugal affection. His request was complied with, and his body is believed to be reposing under the centre of that great white dome which you see crowning the hill in the rear of Feroze Shah's once gorgeous palace. Most certain it is that he was not buried at Agra, where he interred his wife, and built for her a tomb which, to this day, is one of the most beautiful pieces of architecture in the world.

* Sir Thomas Roe was sent as the first ambassador from England to the Emperor of Hindostan. He presented a coach to Jehanghire, from James I, and obtained permission to establish a factory at Surat.

ESSAYS.

NO. CLXXV.—MORALS IN TRADE.

No greater mistake is conceivable, than the common one of excluding the principles of high-toned morality from the calculations of business. There are thousands ready to ask, with astonishment: "What possible connection can there be between a man's moral principles and character, and his success in business matters?" Nor is this all. Not a few are in the habit of imagining that a very strict and conscientious adherence to moral principle is not only no help, but a very serious hindrance to prosperity in trade; and that a man, to get ahead in the world, must at times stretch his conscience a little, overreach his neighbour occasionally, or take advantage of his ignorance or inattention.

Now, without wishing to assume the position of lecturer on morals to mercantile readers, we must be permitted to doubt not only, but deny utterly, the expediency, in a business view merely, of disregarding any of the dictates of sound morals in the conduct of business affairs. We not only deny the necessity of any resort to over-reaching, any violation of the strictest rules of integrity, or any violence to our own conscience, in matters of business, but we are prepared to maintain that every kind and degree of dishonest dealing with our fellow-men is a positive, and serious, and often fatal impediment to ultimate success. We believe that a large proportion of the failures of individuals and associations are owing to bad moral principles, or a deficient rule of integrity. The late Gideon Lee himself—one of our most upright, and at the same time most successful business men—was accustomed to predict the ultimate failure of those whose strict uprightness he had seen reason to doubt. On one occasion, an individual dealing with him boasted that he had overreached him in a particular transaction. It came to the ears of Mr. Lee, who simply remarked that he regretted it for the individuals' sake; for, with such principles, he could not fail ultimately to overreach himself, and get into straits. The event proved the sagacity of the prediction. In a few years, the individual in question, from being a man of handsome property, became a penniless dependent upon charity, and applied to Mr. Lee, among others, for assistance.

It is seldom, indeed, that the revolutions in trade which disturb the general prosperity are attributable to physical, providential influences. It is not the earthquake, the pestilence, the famine, or the failure of natural causes to work their results, that is chargeable, in most cases, with the decline of a people's prosperity—but the silent, sure operation of moral disorder; and so it is with individuals. Most men fail in business, not through overwhelming physical misfortune—such as loss of health or reason, or the destruction by fire or flood of their property—but generally through disregard of the simplest principles of morals. In most cases, we suspect, it would appear, were the truth known, that the ruined man has brought his affairs into hopeless condition by his grasping spirit involving him in ruinous extensions and speculations; or by his overreaching disposition, which, becoming notorious, has driven off his customers; or by his meanness, which has disgusted them; or by some other bad ingredient in his moral mixture.

The same principle operates in the case of corporations; for, notwithstanding the adage that "corporations have no souls," there is a public sentiment at all times surrounding them, which holds them to a rigid moral responsibility, and dooms them if they disregard it. We see the fragments of broken institutions—banks, for example—floating down to infamy, simply because they had not the wisdom to fulfil honestly the purposes of their existence; and we see others rapidly tending to the same inglorious destiny, not because there is not profitable business enough for them, but because they are not held by a strong sense of moral obligation to the path of their duty, and because, like grasping individuals, they are not content with legitimate and reasonable gains. Morally corrupt in their internal administration, they not only insure their own ultimate decline, but involve in it the community they were bound to serve; for there is a prodigious force in the corrupting influence of a bankrupt bank upon mercantile morals. A bank that sets at naught its solemn promises to pay its obligations, opens the flood-gates through which individual honour and responsibility are swept away. To be as good as the bank, is the climax of mercantile credit, and few men care to be regarded as better. The bank is the standard, and when that falls, those who were regulated by it fall also, and a common and promiscuous corruption reigns.

It is bad enough when physical calamity overwhelms a community—such as the great fire, when many millions of property were in a few hours reduced to ashes, and the monuments of industry and enterprise had reared, tottered and fell in vast blackened ruins. But from such calamities we can recover. Under such afflictions we gather strength, resolution, and buoyancy; and, like the fabled Phoenix springing from her ashes, we rise in brighter forms. The memorials of destruction are effaced, the warehouses of commerce are restored, and the labours of enterprise resumed with four-fold energy. Such calamities do not unmake, but make us. But when the lofty tone of mercantile honour, integrity, and stern morals, is lowered—when the craft and cunning, the shrewd overreaching, and the inordinate grasping of the pedlar, usurp the spirit and principles of the high-minded merchant—when trade becomes a trick, and mercantile enterprise a game, in which the parties only aim to circumvent each other, and sweep the gains into their own coffers—then are we ruined indeed, without hope and beyond remedy.

We make these remarks because the keen encounter of competition, in this day of intense activity in all mercantile pursuits, tends constantly and powerfully to blunt the moral sense, to deteriorate the better feelings of our nature, and to superinduce a narrow, selfish, grasping, immoral sentiment, than which no greater evil can befall us.

AN ESCAPE.

I was among the English who were detained in France at the breaking out of the war, in 1803. My rank, as an army physician, enabled me to be of much service to many of my countrymen at Verdun; whilst the fees I obtained from the wealthier individuals supplied all my necessities. My medical character likewise introduced me extensively into French society; and I must confess that I was always treated with kindness and delicacy. Though many of the military, the employés, and even the rich householders and landholders had risen, as the English phrase is, from "the dregs of the people," by the conflicts of the revolution, I almost always found them polite, liberal, and sincere. Good manners are really of very easy acquirement by people of intellect; witness the stage, and revolutions, which always give the ascendancy to talents. It was long before our splendid victory of Trafalgar, and the supplementary victory of Sir Richard Strachan, were known by the English prisoners at Verdun. At length a Morning Chronicle got amongst us, heaven knows how, and the joy of our countrymen was extreme, nor was it expressed in terms very flattering to the French. This I rather regretted, for the better classes of that nation were, I thought, peculiarly delicate in communicating to us the victories of Napoleon. They always softened them to our feelings, by considering the emperor at war with the English government, and not with the English nation.

Whilst our exultation was at its zenith, I went to dine with the Count de —. I had determined to avoid the mention of Trafalgar, and of all belliciferous or national topics. This was my invariable habit. However, on entering the room, which was excessively crowded, particularly with ladies and military men of rank, I found a strong reaction against us. The countess, forgetting, I thought, her usual urbanity, said to me:

"Ah, Doctor —, so Providence has given you English a great victory at sea!"

I knew the whole value of her emphasis upon Providence. If the English gained a battle, it was the work of Providence, distinct from their merits; if the French obtained a splendid triumph, it was attributed to the genius of the emperor, and to the native bravery of the French soldiers. Resolved that the lady should not make me the dupe of such egregious national vanity, and in the presence of so many who were enjoying the triumph, I coolly replied, that I was far from a sceptic as to the interference of Providence, but I could never mix up a Providence in the destruction, carnage, cruelties, and ferocious passions of a battle.

"Madam," I added, mildly, "I must confess I could never form any idea of a fighting Providence, and least of all can I appreciate a Providence so inconsistent, not to say treacherous, as to fight on both sides; for whilst she gives us the victory at sea, she as invariably gives the triumph to Napoleon on shore. Trafalgar comes between Ulm and Austerlitz."

My triumph over my hostess was evident in the faces of the company, and the conversation changed with the grace and facility peculiar to the French.

It was two years after this, that I had a singular opportunity of escaping from Verdun. I had ceased to be on parole, and a combination of circumstances, advantageous to my escape, was offered to me by friends. My plan was to go to Paris, and from thence to travel to Bordeaux as an American merchant, returning to Baltimore.

In the diligence to Bordeaux, was a vivacious and loquacious little Frenchwoman—very pretty, and of most insinuating manners. Another compagnon de voyage was a captain of the Cuirassiers of the Imperial Guard. He was the beau idéal of a military hero—young, tall, of a powerful frame, with an open, noble countenance, and a profusion of jet-black whiskers and moustaches.

We became almost confidential even at the outset of the journey; and what did not a little surprise me was, that he spoke to me by my assumed name as if we had been old friends, though I felt convinced I had never set eyes on him before. So superb a Murat-like figure of a military officer was not easily to be forgotten.

Arrived at the little town of —, about twenty English miles from Bordeaux, he took me into the recess of the window of the house where we changed horses, and informed me that he was on a visit to his uncle, who had a small estate and chateau just off the high road; and he first invited, then pressed, and at last insisted that I should accompany him, and stay two or three days with "the good old man." In vain I urged the necessity of my mercantile affairs, and my anxiety to get back to my counting-house at Baltimore. The officer repeated, mysteriously:

"I am a gentleman and a soldier; accept my invitation, or you'll repent it!"

I was at last reluctantly overcome, and the officer sent a boy off to his uncle with the news, loudly delivered, that he and his old friend had at length arrived at the inn, and would be with him in an hour.

I was very hospitably received by a venerable old lady and gentleman, in a house of some grandeur. One fortnight elapsed, nor could I get away from my kind hosts, in spite of my palpable and uncontrollable anxiety to depart, and my incessant fear of being detected. At last, at night, after the old lady and gentleman had retired to rest, my friend, pouring out the last glass of a bottle of fine old claret, said, without any preface or apology:

"You must go to Bordeaux to-morrow—I have ordered my uncle's carriage and horses for you precisely at six."

"Shall I not take leave of the family?"

"Decidedly not. My uncle and aunt are invalids, and cannot be disturbed so early, and they will dispense with the ceremony; so good night!"

I was bowed out of the room and lighted to my chamber in a very summary way; and I was much perplexed and not a little annoyed at so much kindness, mixed with a singularity which became almost insulting.

The next morning, at six, I found an open carriage at the door, with my friend's horses and liveries, and my friend himself awaited me in the hall.

Taking me into a little boudoir, he briefly and abruptly said, in the style of his master, Napoleon:

"You have been perplexed at the singularity of my manners—at my taciturnity—and vexed at your detention from your counting-house at Baltimore! My friend, you are not an American returning to your country; in plain terms, you are an English prisoner, escaping from Verdun! Do not start or turn colour—I presume you are Dr. —. You were not on your parole when you escaped, but two of your countrymen, who had their parole, have shamefully violated it, and they escaped from Verdun eight-and-forty hours after you left it. The emperor was vexed at this dishonour, and the police on the coast were using their utmost vigilance. That pretty woman in the Diligence, with whom you seemed so much inclined to become intimate, is the wife of a police agent at Bordeaux. The only way to save you was, to treat you as my old familiar friend, travelling with me to my uncle's chateau—now all is explained. Entering Bordeaux in this equipage, and with a passport from this house, you will excite no suspicion. I need not say the injury I shall suffer, if you betray the service I have rendered to you. But, no—you cannot—you are a man of honour; and now, my friend, do not imbibe the vulgar prejudices instilled into your countrymen by your press, that the French officers are ferocious canaille. We fight for military glory, whilst the personal malignity of your officers against us strips war of all its pride and magnanimity. Farewell, and let us exchange these snuff-boxes as a memorial of this scene; but I have one favour to ask of you: Do you know an English town called Reading?"

"Intimately; it lays on the high road between the metropolis and my little paternal property. I pass through it five or six times every year."

"Then do me this sacred office of friendship. I have a young brother, a Lieutenant de vaisseau, who was badly wounded and captured by one of your ships of war. He is a prisoner at Reading; I have never relieved his necessities, partly from the want of means, and partly from my absence with the emperor, at Austerlitz, Wagram, and Jena. Take these seventy napoleons; deliver them to my brother, and console him by what you know of me and of his kind old uncle and aunt."

We parted: I was but eight-and-forty hours at Bordeaux, when I obtained a passage on board a ship bound to Charlestown, South Carolina. In the night, when out of sight of land, the captain put the helm up, and steered due north. On my expressing my astonishment, he frankly told me that his American papers were all forged, and that he was bound to the port of London, adding:

"You need pay me nothing for your passage, since I was obliged to deceive you; and from London you may get a passage to Baltimore any day in the week."

I became equally confidential, to his equal astonishment.

In three days we had passed through the English Rochefort squadron and Channel fleet, and I went on board the Ville de Paris, where I had a long interview with the Admiral in Chief, the Earl St. Vincent.

I had been but a few days in London, when I went to Reading on my friend's mission. I found his brother had died about six months before, partly of his numerous wounds, and partly of the melancholy of his sensitive temper, at his neglected, impoverished state. He had died in great distress.

I had an opportunity of sending the seventy napoleons to their owner, by a gentleman going to Paris. However, to my great grief, in about three months I received from this traveller a bill of exchange for the same amount, with a letter saying, that my friend had been killed in a charge upon the Russian Cuirassiers at Friedland.

Travelling for amusement in the south of France, in 1815, I repaired to Bordeaux, and visited the chateau of my friend's uncle, who was dead; but the widow, though extremely old, recognised me, and was bitterly afflicted with the recollections I occasioned of her nephew. Into her hands I put the seventy napoleons; and I remained two days under her roof, consoling her with merited eulogies of my generous friend—the captain of Cuirassiers.

[THE KREMLIN, MOSCOW.]

THE PROGRESS OF RUSSIA.

RUSSIA is the largest territorial empire in the world. And, if we except Great Britain, whose colonial dependencies form so vast a portion of its bulk—also the Chinese empire, about which we know very little—Russia has the largest, and, next to the United States of America, the most varied population. The Roman empire at its zenith was equal only to the European portion of Russia: its greatest length, from the Euphrates to the Western Ocean, was 3000 miles; its greatest breadth, from the Wall of Antoninus to the Pillars of Hercules, 2000 miles. From Riga to the haven of Peter and Paul, the length of the Russian empire is 11,434 miles. The possessions of the Romans did not exceed thirty-two degrees of latitude; those of Russia exceed thirty-five degrees. The parallel, however, is not maintained when we contrast the climate, fertility, and consolidated population of the Roman empire—which extended over the magnificent regions of the temperate zone—with the excessive cold, the sterility, and the scanty and barbarous population of a very large portion of the Russian territory.

But Russia is a Colossus. It stretches over 170 degrees of longitude, and its extent from north to south, in some places, embraces nearly thirty-four degrees of north latitude. Its population, according to the last census, was sixty millions, which comprehend a great variety of races. First, there are Russians and Poles, who are of Slavonic origin, and who comprise about two-thirds of the inhabitants; then there are Germans—all the nobility and middle classes of Finland, Livonia, Esthonia, and Courland are Germans, as well as most of the colonies in the interior and south of the empire; with these, as of the same Gothic race, may be enumerated the Swedes who inhabit Finland, and the Danes who occupy two of the Baltic isles belonging to Russia.

Next in order are the Fins, the Laplanders, the Parmians, and the Ostians; then there are the Tartar race, who inhabit the Crimea and the southern districts of the Volga; afterwards the Georgians, Caucasians, and Circassians; then the Mongol race, comprising the Calmucks and Bourjats; the Turks and Armenians in Moldavia and Bessarabia; and, lastly, various nomadic tribes in Siberia and the borders of the northern realm of perpetual ice.

All these races are subjected to the most stringent military regulations; and, owing to the sound organisation of a militia similar to our own, it is said that Russia could send into the field an army of six millions of men. So tremendous a force could probably never be brought to bear on one point; but when it is considered that this power is wielded by one man, and that man a traditionist of the very worst character—viz., an hereditary lover of conquest—it is not surprising that other nations should regard it with jealousy, not unmixed with awe.

At this juncture the Emperor of Russia holds the balance of power in Europe. With one wave of his hand he could pour armies over the face of all Southern Europe, march to the gates of Constantinople, and, by means of the formidable fleet always kept in a state of high efficiency in the Black Sea, force the passage of the Dardanelles, and contend with France and England for the mastery over the waters of the Mediterranean. It is this apprehension that makes the Turkish question always such an important one to France and England. Neither of them, although their ministers and writers talk and pen a good deal about the integrity of the Turkish empire, have the slightest desire to see it perpetuated, except as a barrier against the encroachments of Russia. The sway of the Turks has had nothing in it to recommend it to the sympathy of Christian nations. It has always been coarse, brutal, and cruel. Having been won by the sword, it has been ruthlessly maintained by the sword; and when we reflect on their barbarous treatment of the Christians under their authority, and their frequent unprovoked invasions of Christian countries during the last four centuries, with the lover of freedom and of human development, they have, in their decline, placed themselves beyond the pale of pity, and their enforced fall can only be regarded as a just and proper termination to a career of rapine and cruelty.

But moral considerations of this nature have little to do with politics. It is felt throughout Europe—and no nation ought to feel it more acutely than Austria—that Russia is already too great, too threatening in her aspect; and that, were she to obtain possession of the European provinces of Turkey, she would be in a position to menace the vital interests of France and England, on the shores and among the islands of the Mediterranean; and, by becoming a leading maritime as well as military power, seriously injure the manufactures of both France and England, and impose terms which would probably not only disturb, but violently change, every existing territorial arrangement. A savage war would be the inevitable result: so that the existence of Turkey as an independent kingdom, is looked upon as some guarantee for peace. Her fall is dreaded as a calamitous and irreparable event, and this serious apprehension for her safety accounts for the agitation that always pervades political and moneyed circles, whenever Russia, as at present, gathers armies on her frontiers, and dispatches an ambassador to Constantinople, to make the most peremptory demands. The last one was on the subject of the Holy Shrines.

The Emperor of Russia, as head of the Greek Church, wishes them to be placed under his protection; the Latins—that is, the people of the Roman Catholic or Western Church—prefer the same claim: so that Turkey is placed between two difficulties, and seems likely to realise the truth of the adage which refers to such a precarious existence.

Those mad enterprises, the crusades, are being revived. With Greek and Roman the deliverance of the Holy Sepulchre is deemed a sacred mission; but this time with this difference—that each are separately contending for its possession as a mark of supremacy over the other, and ultimate complete ascendancy as a church.

To England, as a sentiment, the dispute is immaterial: she can afford to smile at the unseemly struggle for some bits of stone; but, in a political sense, she cannot unconcernedly perceive the head of the Greek Church aggrandising himself in a quarter where he is already too powerful, and might use his conquests hereafter to further his cherished designs on India and; British interests throughout the East. Let Russia once obtain possession of Constantinople, and she will make it the capital of her empire; for St. Petersburg, although a city of palaces, was only built to approach as nearly as possible to the civilisation, wealth, and politics of Europe, and would readily be abandoned: because Constantinople would afford infinitely greater facilities of this kind, besides placing in the hands of the emperor the key, as it were, to the gates of the whole of the eastern hemisphere.

England and France have therefore a joint interest in resisting this encroachment; and as at the present moment, all eyes are turned to the leviathan of the north, we have thought our readers would like to know more about Russia than they do; and by way of illustration, have some of its architecture presented to them in a pictorial embellishment.

Our trade with Russia is very extensive. She supplies us with tallow, hemp, and hides; but probably there is no country in the world we are so little acquainted with. It is not our intention to indulge in a long dissertation on her people, manners, and customs; but we may be allowed to observe, that Russia in the east holds a position relative to that of the United States in the west. Both are aggressive; although one is a republic, the other a despotic monarchy. Russia is pushing her way towards the south and south-east; the United States are doing precisely the same; so that a very great analogy exists between them. They are advancing to meet each other, and probably in the course of two or three centuries, the amalgamated British and American power will dispute for the empire of the world on the plains of Hindostan or at the very gates of Peking; while their rival fleets will determine the sovereignty of the seas in the vicinity of some of the beautiful islands of the Pacific Ocean. There is nothing improbable in this conjecture; for, in principle, the Russian, like the Englishman, is, in politics and disposition, a true descendant of those ancient Scandinavians, whose sea rovers founded so many powerful empires. England received its first impulse from the Normans. The Conquest, as it is called, infused life, vigour, purpose, design, and the spirit of conquest into a people emasculated by the weak rule of the drif-velling Saxon kings. Had it not been for the Normans, there would have been no modern England, holding authority over a sixth of the people, and, with her children in America, over half the surface of the habitable globe. The history of modern England commences with the exploits of the Normans, and, as if further to sustain the analogy above alluded to, they commence the history of Russia. A Northman or Norman laid the foundation of the present vast empire of the czar.

The first time the name of the people of Russia was divulged, was in the tenth century. It appears that about the middle of the ninth century an embassy was sent from Theophilus, Emperor of the East, to Louis, the son of Charlemagne, Emperor of the West. In the train and under the protection of this embassy were some Russians. These Russians, who were envoys of the Great Duke, having traversed many hostile nations in their journey to Constantinople, were desirous of regaining their country by a safer route; and they accordingly requested the French monarch to send them to Russia by sea, which he did, in the year 839.

About twenty years after that event, the foundation of the present kingdom of Russia was laid by Ruric, a Scandinavian chief. At the head of some Varangians, or Corsairs of the Baltic, he invaded the eastern shores of that sea, and reduced the Finnic and Sclavonic tribes that inhabited the neighbourhood of Lake Ladoga. His descendants held the sceptre above seven centuries. In the tenth century, the Russians made themselves masters of the spacious province of Moscow—the Baltic Sea and Prussia formed their western frontier. They had pushed their conquests to the sixtieth degree of north latitude, and towards the south, following the course of the Borysthene, they had approached the vicinity of the Euxine Sea.

Such were the limits of the Russian territories in the tenth century, as laid down by the Emperor Porphyrogenitus—for even at that early period they had become formidable to Constantinople.

Within less than two centuries they had made four attempts to plunder the treasures of that city; and it was even then asserted and believed that an equestrian statue, in the square of Taurus, was inscribed with a prophecy, that the Russians would eventually become masters of Constantinople. At this day this is the belief of most Russians and Turks; and, we apprehend, of Frenchmen and Englishmen as well.

No permanent result followed from these piratical invasions; but the friendly relations between the Russians and the Emperor of the East, which seem to have been scarcely injured by their wars, led gradually to the civilisation of the former. The baptism of Olga, the wife of Igor, the son of Ruric, may be fixed as the era of Russian Christianity. She had assumed the sceptre on the death of her husband, and in A.D. 935, sailed from Kiev to Constantinople, where she was baptised. Her family and nation, however, adhered for some time to the idolatry of their fathers; and her son and immediate successor, Sviatoslaw, was more disposed to gain the confidence and applause of his companions and subjects by his rude and undaunted bravery, than to expose himself to their scorn and ridicule, by introducing and countenancing a new religion. By his valour, the nations between the Volga and Danube were subdued and repelled; Bulgaria was conquered, Adrianople was taken, and Constantinople itself was threatened. His further progress, however, was checked by John Zimisces; and, after repeated defeats and losses, he was glad to accept the liberal terms offered by the conqueror—a safe passage to the mouth of the Borysthene. Vladimir, his third son, devoted his youthful zeal to multiply and adorn the monuments of idolatry; but the efforts of the Greek missionaries, aided by his desire to marry Anne, sister of the Emperor of Constantinople, converted him to Christianity. All Russia followed his example, and in the next generation the relics of Paganism were extirpated.

In the twelfth century, the Tartars began their invasions of Russia, and continued them, frequently destroying the capital, Moscow, until 1462, when Ivan III. mounted the throne, and by his talents and good fortune restored union, consistency, and independence to the Russian states.

Russia thenceforward increased in size; but the history of its doings is a barbarous record of brutal wars, the vices of its monarchs, and the wrongs of its people. But all the czars who are distinguished in Russian history, largely added to its territory. Ivan IV. tripled the extent of his dominions. Peter the Great extended his empire 280,000 square miles. The Empress Anne, treading in the same path of augmentation, left behind her a realm of above 324,000 square miles in extent; and while the renowned but infamous Catherine II. held the sceptre of the north, the territory was increased to 335,000 square miles. In the reigns of Paul and Alexander, the empire was enlarged to no less than 345,000 geographical square miles. And we might prophecy that, if this system of aggrandisement be persevered in, the Emperor Nicholas may bequeath to his successor an empire of 400,000 or even 500,000 square miles.

Such is Russia—that Gog and Magog of the modern world—that vast, heterogeneous empire which, stretching over more than a third of the circumference of the globe, and from the Arctic Sea southward beyond the latitude of Rome, touches on one side Sweden, Prussia, and Turkey; on the other side, Persia, China, and, by means of her colonies on the north-west coast of America, Mexico and the United States. It should, however, be borne in mind, that a great portion of the Russian territory is but the waste land of the civilised world; and that, throughout its huge extent, the pulse of thought and the circulation of commercial and moral energy is so feeble, as scarcely to give the semblance of life to its various parts. The great majority of the people are, as yet, but little removed from the uncivilised and brutal state in which they were left by the Rurics and Vladimirs of other times. There are but two classes—the noble and the slave.

The government is a despotism of a strictly oriental character administered by a military police; the word of the emperor, if not his will is his law—for his will may be controlled by his vizier or his janissaries. The religion, literature, and commerce of Russia are all exotic. Her sacred language is Greek, her polite language French, her vulgar tongue a compound of Greek, Latin, German, French, and Sclavonian. Her literati are Germans; her mechanics, and, to a great extent, her merchants, British; and her bravest officers are Poles and Cossacks. Her future must not only be great, but calamitous for the rest of the world—for her greatness has in it all the elements of mischief. A warlike emperor might—like another Jenghis Khan, or Timour—pour his legions over Europe, and desolate the fairest provinces.

Even should France make a dash at Italy, it is almost certain that in half a year the Russians would be watering their horses in the Rhine, or, as in 1814-15, bivouacking in the boulevards of Paris.

She is the Great Behemoth of our day, and whenever it shall please her to upheave her vastness, society throughout the world will undoubtedly be convulsed and shaken to its centre. In the meantime, as we are in the crowd of lookers-on, it would be as well if we were more familiarly acquainted with the features of this dreaded exposition of war on the largest scale. Having sketched a few of her antecedents, we beg to present to our readers a view of probably the finest royal palace in the world—the Kremlin, Moscow.

The city has been called Tartarian Rome—for it is a mixture of the grand and the squalid. Wretched hovels are blended with large palaces—cottages of one story stand next to the most superb and stately buildings—many brick structures are covered with wooden tops—some of the wooden houses are painted, others have iron doors and roofs. In fact, Moscow may be considered as a town built upon the Asiatic model, exhibiting, even after its renovation subsequent to the great fire, a motley mixture of discordant styles of architecture. The Kremlin, which strictly means fortress, is a large walled circle, containing many old churches, as well as the public offices and apartments of state; and hither almost every traveller wends his way first. Our view shows the terrace which overhangs the walls towards the River Moskva, at the extremity of which, to the left, is a curious structure of the Trinity Church, and the awe-inspiring portals of the Holy Gate, through which every passenger walks bare-headed. At the other end, a cluster of domes rises from the church of St. Nicholas, that of the Assumption, and the chapel and palace of the czars, with the lofty temple of Ivan Veliki, which towers far above them, and reflects the beams of the sun from a globe of gold. The palace of the czars does not boast of an antiquity of more than two hundred years, but it is an edifice raised with princely costliness, and much artistic taste.

It is one of the most showy examples of the gorgeous architecture of the Kremlin; the entire circle presents an assemblage of bright, dazzling colours, and a display of richness that calls to mind the wealth of Ormuz and of Ind. The cupolas and roofs are gilt, or stained green or red, the walls and towers covered with glazed tiles of blue and white and yellow; in other parts adorned with storied paintings from Holy Writ; while on every side may be seen a melange of pear-shaped domes, Tartar battlements, Gothic tracery, Grecian columns, the star, the Crescent, and the Cross. Below, the stream of the Moskva winds its course amidst the streets and houses of the town, interspersed with glittering steeples; cottages, gardens, and palaces being intermixed, and offering to view the endless variety of a Russian city.

The origin of Moscow is involved in some obscurity, but it is supposed to have been built about the middle of the twelfth century. It derives its name from the river which flows by the Kremlin. Its history presents a singular series of disasters. It seems to have been subjected to periodical visitations from the sword, fire, and pestilence. Its first enemies were the Tartars, who burnt it repeatedly; then, at least once a century, it was visited by the plague, succeeded by a conflagration; the Poles set it on fire several times; but the invasion of Russia by the French, in 1812, followed by their occupation of Moscow, the burning of the city, and their consequent disastrous retreat, have connected its history with some of the most momentous and influential events in the progress of modern Europe.

Few of our readers but are acquainted with that extraordinary event—the voluntary destruction of Moscow, in order to insure the certain ruin of the finest army that ever was led to battle by the first general and the ablest man ever intrusted with the destinies of a people or a time. The French took possession of the Kremlin on the 14th of September, and before night Napoleon himself arrived at the gates of Smolensko, “where he waited, expecting a deputation from the municipality, as he had been wont, whenever he entered any captured town—but none came.” On sending to inquire the reason, he was told Moscow was deserted. What a chill must have fallen on his soul at the announcement. He sent one of his generals to make further search and inquiries. “Not a Muscovite was to be seen, not the least smoke rose from a single chimney, not the slightest noise issued from this immense and populous city; its three hundred thousand inhabitants seemed to be struck dumb and motionless by enchantment. It was the silence of the desert.”

Napoleon’s star waned from that time. In the course of the night the fire broke out, and speedily 21,000 buildings were in ashes. Napoleon was paralysed; he wasted time in attempting to negotiate, and it was not until the 19th of October that he quitted Moscow, leaving orders to blow up the Kremlin—which, however, in the hurry of departure, were only partially obeyed.

The retreat was the most dreadful on record; and although we have not had a touch of the Napoleon fever, we can fervently regret the loss of the magnificent army which the Emperor led into Russia. The Russians were invariably beaten whenever they showed fight, but King Frost and Queen Snow were irresistible. Before their breath the finest troops that ever marched to battle melted, as did the host of Sennacherib, on that fatal night when the Israelites were fearfully avenged.

Napoleon’s celebrated exclamation when he arrived at Warsaw, after he had deserted his army—a trick he practised more than once in his time—“There is but one step from the sublime to the ridiculous!” was a heartless but fitting comment on the last scene of the horrors of his unnecessary and unskillfully conducted Russian campaign. Had he conquered the Russians and baffled the weather, his triumph could not have resulted in any solid advantages to France—for he could only have levied a tribute, or, perhaps, have patched up the kingdom of Poland again. Had he not gone to Russia at all, but marched straight to Constantinople, the aspect of the world would have been very different from what it is now. Russia would have been a third-rate instead of a first-rate power, and neither England nor France have been under the necessity, as they are now, of watching her movements with a nervous anxiety, not unmingled with dread. But it was not to be so. Destiny drew the great Emperor to Moscow, and there it folded him in a mantle of snow; and he hurried back to Paris alone, shivering, and humbled.

Moscow will ever be associated with his downfall; and although it is unlikely it will ever again be the capital of Russia, or regain its former importance, its name will go down through untold ages, as inseparably linked with the fate of, as Byron designated him:

The greatest, nor the worst of men.

SENSE, COMMON AND UNCOMMON.

CHAPTER I.

If we were about setting out upon a long and somewhat perilous journey—one that would tax all our powers, and in which many a traveller had been sore beset—the most obvious dictate of prudence would be to procure maps, charts, guide-books, records of former voyages, and whatever might in any way promise benefits from the attempts—successful or otherwise—of those who had gone before. We could not be satisfied with mere directions and cautions from friends at home: their knowledge might be traditional, or imperfect, or obsolete. The freshest intelligence, brought by clear-sighted observers, must be ours, that we might proceed on our way in full strength and courage, with leisure to enjoy the journey, and no occasion for painful care or solicitude.

It is on this principle, we cannot doubt, that many young ladies spend so large a portion of their time, after leaving school, in the study of those instructive and veracious histories of the world and its doings, called novels. Feeling the importance of a thorough and impartial survey of the delicate ground on which they are about to enter, they apply themselves assiduously to results of reflective wisdom and experience, and store their various memories with cases and precedents, maxims and views, calculated to render that mortal career, which has sometimes been compared to a labyrinth, perfectly plain and easy to the simplest comprehension. What days of application and nights of vigil do these fair debutantes devote to study; and such is their zeal, that not a complaint is heard.

One of these devotees to study, called Constantia—for the love of some heroine whose especial whereabouts in the land of fiction the historian is unable to point out—was bred in a great city, in the choice atmosphere of a fashionable boarding-house, where her pretty little face and gentle manners made her much a favourite, especially with the young gentlemen who, escaped from shops and offices in town, passed a good many evenings in the great drawing-room, lounging on sofa or ottoman, or leaning over the veteran piano, then and there thrilling to the touch of young ladies whose curls, descending, swept their youthful breasts, while the entire atmosphere breathed Cologne and Patchouly. Constantia was a pretty girl, and a good girl, too, as well as uncommonly sensible; and her knowledge of life could hardly be surpassed—for there was not a novel of the day that she had not read, spite of double columns and dingy paper. She knew perfectly well how very apt young ladies of amiable character are to be run away with against their will, and all the snares laid for heiresses—not of vile pelf, but of the unpurchaseable treasures of rosy lips and bright eyes. Her mother, a graduate of the same school, was so full of sage cautions to her, moulded especially on the high reputation which her daughter enjoyed of being so very sensible, that it was rather a disappointment to Constantia when she found herself seventeen without a single attempt at abduction, or even a proposal to run away. Far from exulting in such ignoble quiet and safety, she looked scrutinisingly into the glass, to ascertain whether she might not have over-rated her charms. But, no! There they all were, fresh as ever—real and unmistakeable as ugliness or ill-nature; and the compliments of her friends and admirers upon her sense, had in no respect fallen off. What could be the reason of such neglect? Obviously the tame and prosaic character of the society in which she lived.

What in the way of romance could be expected of young lawyers, physicians, and merchants, anxious only to get business, and settle down as comfortable citizens? It began to be fearfully evident that poor Constantia, in spite of her charms, was doomed to be asked and married, in the common way, with cake and bridemaids—and not a heart-quake or a speck of anguish about the matter.

We dare not say that this conviction, mortifying as it was, wore upon our young friend alarmingly. Her fair cheeks lost none of their roundness; her eye danced about and sparkled, as it could not help doing, at whatever was pretty or funny; and when sly compliments were launched at her by the common-place young gentlemen in white cravats, who had quite a trick of lounging about her in the evening conversazione, quick-flitting dimples rippled about her rosy mouth, and little blushes came and went, not at all after the manner of a pining heroine. Our life is twofold; and while the Constantia of the ideal world was impatient and nearly discouraged at so much happiness, the Constantia of ours was as gay and light hearted as health and compliments could make her the only outward effect of her secret expectations being a perfect immunity from love, so far as the habitudes of the fashionable boarding-house were concerned.

So were along the smooth days, leaving little trace on the face or mind of our heroine, until destiny (as we speak), brought to town for a few weeks a heroic-looking specimen of that boundless region called the West: a young man who might have been supposed a patron of every Tricopherous and Patho-Capline in the country, so luxuriant were his dark locks, his shadowy beard, and his somewhat exuberant moustache. Besides these advantages, he was at least six feet high, and carried himself with an erect yet careless grace that was very bewitching; and his whole air was that of a man of action rather than study. He spoke in a clear, cheerful voice, and now and then said a gallant thing in a modest way, which the young ladies felt to be more respectful than the downright compliments with which their more hackneyed beaux expected to propitiate them.

This was the nearest approach to the expected hero that Constantia had yet encountered; and, strange to say, of all the arrows launched at the new-comer, hers was the very one of all others to take effect. Occupied as was Mr. Darley—busy from morning till night, and coming to tea so tired that he declared he was not fit company for anybody—he always contrived to make himself very agreeable in the evening; and in no instance could he be detected in the least flagging of the spirits, or forgetfulness of the duties of the moment. But while all voted him charming, it soon became evident enough who it was that he felt to be so; and before anybody suspected it, and while the fair chosen one was herself still in the first confusion, flutter, and doubt of the reality of his preference, he had asked her of her mamma, and laid siege to her pretty little self, with an ardour and business-like determination quite in keeping with all that he had been able to manifest of his character.

"It is providential!" said the mamma, as Constantia, half smiles half tears, consulted her on this momentous matter. And with this she dismissed all prudential concern as to the past of her future son-in-law. To be sure, he was his own voucher; for there are people to whom nature is so truly bounteous that doors and hearts fly open at their approach, and we feel neither keys nor cautions to be necessary where they are concerned. Mr. Darley told his own story, and when he did this, full belief was natural. He gave references to his far-off home, and spoke of ample means of living; but somehow nobody thought it worth while to take any trouble about things so obvious; and after a six weeks' acquaintance, our heroine and her chosen, with youth and beauty, and good spirits and amiable tempers secured to them, if nothing else, departed for the West, where Constantia's mamma was to visit them as soon as the fashionable touring season should arrive.

CHAPTER II.

WHETHER any mortal mixture of earth's mould ever came up to a novel-reading young lady's ideal of a lover, may perhaps be questioned: so that we shall only say that Constantia's admiration of Mr. Darley suffered no perceptible diminution when she saw him in the character of a most gallant travelling companion—so well acquainted with all the exigencies of such a position, that no accident ever took him unawares, and no fatigue ever vanquished his good humour. Perhaps it was hardly to be dreaded that a bridegroom should become cross on his wedding-tour; though we believe such things have happened—there being plenty of objects besides the lady on whom to vent their pent-up irritation. But Mr. Darley had such a fascinating bonhomie about him—took everything so gaily—and, in short, showed so much of the light-hearted kindness of a genuine Westerner—that his bride, accustomed to more constrained and guarded manners, was delighted with his bold, manly air, and grew every day more in love with her hero. All that had been left unsaid, through lack of time, during their short courtship, was now brought forward and discussed: Constantia's goodness and her mother's kind confidence in trusting a stranger; the chances of some disappointment consequent upon an introduction to the dozens of new relations who were anxiously expecting the bride from the great city; the probability of Constantia's liking her new home—her new mother—a country life. All these were again and again talked over, among other matters—so that the time seemed very short, and passed so pleasantly, that our bride almost dreaded the termination of the journey; although she had no fears for her new position, except those which grew out of a modest estimation of her own claims, and some dread of the critical judgment of the friends whom she was about to see for the first time.

"I cannot help feeling a little anxious," said Mr. Darley, "lest you should be disappointed, at first, at least. Your views and habits certainly differ a good deal from those of my family; and though there will doubtless be a sufficient assimilation in time, you are very likely to be shocked at many things you will see and hear. My mother is a plain old lady—has lived all her life on a farm; and although she has good sense and great kindness of heart, her manners are simple in the extreme, and her education no better than that of western women of her age generally."

"Oh, I know I shall love her if she will let me," said Constantia; "it is so easy for me to love good people!"

"My mother is warm-hearted—rather impetuous," was the reply; "her love for me is unbounded, and her over-estimate of my character and abilities in proportion. How this may operate upon her appreciation of my wife, I don't know; but you will have patience, I know, even if she should think no woman on earth could be good enough for me—because by-and-by you will show her that somebody can be more than that."

"I will take care not to expect too warm a reception," said Constantia, "and to bear patiently any looks of disappointment, such as will be very natural at first. But, Edward, when are we to go into our own house? Will it take long to make it ready?"

"I hope not. I have sent some directions, but I preferred that all should be arranged to suit your taste, which I could hardly hope my sisters would succeed in. They would gladly have assumed the necessary trouble and responsibility, but feared that New York bred eyes would discover mortifying errors. So it is left entirely to yourself to decide what shall be the style of your home—which will have some rural charms, for the house I have chosen is a little out of town, so as to be nearer my mother's, which is almost in the woods, on a large farm managed by my elder brother, who is a bachelor."

"Oh, that will be delightful! Do they have cows, and sheep, and pretty little lambs there? and can they hear the wolves howl at night?"

"I can't answer for the wolves," said Darley, laughing, "but the other matters are all right. You can learn to make butter, if you like."

"I shall learn to spin, certainly!" said the bride, with a resolute air; "I have seen a beautiful picture of a lady sitting in the midst of her maids, spinning on a little ebony wheel, inlaid with ivory; and her lord, just returned from the wars, coming in, delighted to find her so well employed."

"My wars are in court, dearest, and our western wheels are not of ebony and ivory; but you will find ways and means of making pretty pictures out of such material as we shall have, I don't doubt. But I forewarn you, that you will be shocked at our plainness. At L—," continued Mr. Darley, "we shall be within less than half-a-day's travel of our home. I think it will be well to remain there to-night, that you may recruit a little after the fatigue of so long a journey; and to-morrow we can easily reach mother's in time for her early dinner."

To this Constantia gladly consented; for her trepidation at the idea of a first appearance had not been lessened by Darley's account of the aspect of things at home.

"I will be as plain as myself," she thought; "and of all things take care that they do not fancy me proud and 'stuck up,' which Edward says is a mortal offence at West. I shall soon learn, I dare say. I staid a fortnight, last summer, at Nyack, and know very well what country people are."

CHAPTER III.

A COUNTRY TAVERN—bare floors—no parlour without a bed in the corner—a table which required a chip under one foot to make it stand steady—very fat ham, the only viand to behold—warm milk—yeast bread—an atmosphere of old tobacco-smoke—no spring-water that did not taste of sulphur. Who that has travelled much in the West, has not, now and then, in out-of-the-way places, found all these things?

Our bride, weary and almost dispirited, had no better fortune.

"Try an egg, love," said Darley, anxiously; "eggs, at least, are better here than in New York."

Constantia could not help feeling this a gentle reproach, and she really made an effort to swallow something, lest her husband should feel hurt.

"I believe I am too tired to feel hungry," she said; "I am really fit for nothing."

"You shall lie on the sofa, and I will read to you," said Mr. Darley, kindly.

"We have read all our books!"

"Oh I dare say we can find something."

As he was leaving the room on this rather hopeless errand, he was met with the intelligence that two men wished to see him below.

"How vexations!" he exclaimed; "I was in hopes to have reached home before anybody pounced upon me! But I am so well known in this neighbourhood, that somebody has found me out!"

"Found you out?" said Constantia.

"Yes; some rascal on a business matter, I don't doubt! But have patience, dear; I will get rid of these fellows as soon as possible, and we will have a nice quiet evening!" And he ran off, gaily as usual.

The short time seemed very long to Constantia. What could it be? Vexation and curiosity combined, were turned, by utter weariness, into a presentiment of evil. The thought—"What can it be?" recurred so often, that her mind seemed sore with it.

Edward returned—but not with comfort. He looked a good deal perturbed, for him.

"I shall be obliged to leave you awhile, love," he said, with an effort at his natural cheerful tone.

"Leave me, Edward!"

"Only for a short time, I hope. The business on which these men came cannot be deferred, and I have not a moment for explanation. Here is a tolerable sofa, and I will try to send you some books. Perhaps you can sleep. Don't be low-spirited (seeing tears that would not be kept down), I will tell you all about it when I get back, and we'll have our quiet evening yet. See what a glorious sunset we're going to have! Good bye! I'll come or send to you very soon!" And the young husband ran off, leaving his wife half vexed, half frightened, at being left alone in this strange sort of way. Soon after the women of the house brought in some tattered volumes, and Constantia tried in vain to interest herself in their dingy pages. An hour wore on—no Edward blessed her weary eyes. Again she opened one of the books, and read with fascinated attention that melancholy tale, "The Forgers;" and now the heart of the young bride found relief in tears, called forth by sympathy for the desolate survivor of husband and son. Perhaps she was not sorry for an excuse for tears—for she had become gloomy and despondent as the sun neared the western horizon. "Yet why this weakness?" she asked herself; "necessity alone could have induced Edward to leave me thus; and when he returns, I shall be ashamed to own how like a silly girl I have felt!"

CHAPTER IV.

A SCRAP of paper was brought her, containing a line or two in pencil from her husband, telling her that he found himself prevented from returning as soon as he had hoped, but that he would come or send before dark.

Still further puzzled, Constantia looked at her watch—it wanted a quarter of six. To remain in this painful uncertainty till dark, seemed an age of cruel suspense. She thought of a duel—only because she could think of nothing else; for at a calmer moment she would have been sure that Edward was no duellist. Seeking the master of the tavern, she inquired whether he knew the person with whom Mr. Darley had left the house. Then, recollecting the impropriety of such a question, she added, that she had become uneasy at his stay. The man hesitated a moment, and then said:

"Squire Montgomery came for him in his carriage, ma'am, and I see Grabbins get in after 'em."

"And pray who is Grabbins?" she inquired.

"The constable, ma'am."

"Oh, it is professional business, then!" said Constantia, as she dismissed the man; and she endeavoured, as she repeated this to herself, to calm the flutter which still agitated her nerves. But every moment grew less and less supportable; and when the last ray of the setting sun had disappeared, she took her station on the piazza upon which the room opened, hoping thence sooner to be aware of the return of her husband. As she cast her eyes below, a plain light waggon drove up to the door, and a rough-looking man asked if there was a young woman there.

"Her husband has sent for her," he added, giving his whip an impatient crack, while he awaited the answer to his question.

"Yes, yes!" exclaimed Constantia, without a moment's reflection; "I will be ready in a moment!"

"Oh! you're the one, be ye?" said the man, looking up; "we'll be a joggin' for it's gettin' late!"

And in an instant the bride appeared below, equipped for a drive.

"But have you no note or letter for me?" she said, before she descended the steps.

The man felt in his pockets, took off his hat, and, after extracting therefrom a dirty cotton handkerchief, and exploring the crown with a reflective air, replied:

"Wal, I had a kind of a billet, but I must ha' dropped it out of my hat. But never mind, I guess we'll find it as we go back, for there ain't many passers on that road."

With this comfort Constantia resolved to content herself; and, allowing the stranger to help her into the waggon, they drove off—the poor bride's heart misgiving her sadly; yet the thought of rejoining her husband putting down all less agreeable anticipations.

No time was lost on the way. The waggon banged over the new-made forest-road at so furious a rate, that Constantia begged her escort to drive more moderately; and, when he complied, she took the opportunity to ask to what place she was going.

"Oh, not far!" he replied; "it can't be above three miles from that tavern where you put up!"

"And shall I find Mr. Darley there?"

"Find who?"

"My husband, Mr. Edward Darley," said the perplexed Constantia.

"Wal, I don't know; Ned 'll be there if he can, I dare say; but he's obleeged to steer pretty close just now!"

Then, in answer to Constantia's look of speechless, terrified surprise, he added:

"I see he hasn't told you as much as he ought to; but never mind—this may blow over; we've weathered many a black-looking a squall as this!"

Trembling and agast—her confidence in her beloved Edward still firm, yet a sense of danger and distress weighing on her heart like a millstone—the now wretched bride attempted to extract more definite information from her conductor, who, though rough, was far from seeming devoid of feeling. But he declined entering into the particulars.

"I must leave Ned to tell his own story," he said; "he's played gentleman so long, that he's mighty uppish, and I don't want to have a quarrel with him! It's pretty dangerous, as more than one can tell!"

As he spoke, he turned from the travelled road, and struck into a devious path, which led into the depths of the wood. So thickly were the branches interlaced above, that daylight was almost entirely excluded; and here a new fear seized poor Constantia. She thought of robbery and murder, and all those accumulated horrors which are apt to present themselves to the imaginations of novel-reading young ladies. But ere she could give voice to her new fears, her companion drew up before a small house which she had scarcely observed, and which seemed to have no cleared land near it, except a small garden, and a courtyard inclosed by a picket-fence. Here, leaning over a little gate in front, stood a portly, red-faced woman, who hailed Constantia's driver with:

"Hilloa, Jerry! is that you?"

"I guess so!" was Jerry's reply; "and here's Ned's gal!"

"Why, do tell!" said the old woman; "well, I'm glad you're come, for all we're in trouble! It's plagney lonesome here!"

Constantia sat paralysed. Could that coarse, vulgar being be the mother whom she was to love—first for Edward's sake, and then for her own? Could this diminutive dwelling be that which her husband had represented as the pleasant home of his boyhood? Impossible!

"I believe—I think there must be some mistake!" she faltered out; "this is not Mr. Darley's mother?"

"Mr. Darley!" said the old woman, with a knowing look at the man. "Why yes I be—aint I, Jerry? Come along in; tea's all ready, though if I'd a known you'd been a coming, I might ha' slicked up a little more!"

"I see Ned down yonder," said Jerry, pointing with his thumb over his shoulder, as he prepared to assist the trembling girl from the waggon; "and he told me I was to go to the tavern after her!"

"And where's your trunk?" said the old woman.

"I left the baggage in charge of the landlord," Constantia replied. "I did not know—"

"That's a pretty go!" said the old woman, with another look of intelligence at Jerry. "I should ha' thought Ned might have learnt you better than that! You'll never see that again, I can tell ye, and it'll be well if that's the worst of it! I'll warrant you had some real handsome things, too; for Ned's always open-handed when he's got anything!"

"Light come, light go!" muttered Jerry, as the old lady went to the fire to replenish her tea-pot.

The terror-stricken bride, with a death-sickness at her heart, sat gazing, first at one and then at the other of these speakers, with a conviction of their utter villainess, and a wild fear, often indignantly repelled, yet gradually gaining ground in her mind, that her own dear Edward must indeed be of their crew. Then she would strive to collect her scattered senses; to recall the proofs of her husband's refined education and highly delicate and sensitive mind; the various testimonies to his excellent reputation at home, which had come to her knowledge during their brief acquaintance; and then his tenderness, the almost worshipping fondness with which he had dwelt on the anticipation of introducing his fair prize to his mother and her friends. Had he deceived her? If he had, it was love alone which prompted the wrong. To have acknowledged poverty like this, would have rendered their union impossible. But then that horribly vulgar woman and her associate, between whom there seemed so familiar an understanding. "Oh! it can never be—never be! There is some horrid mistake, after all!"

And, starting up, she entreated Jerry to drive her back to the hotel. She offered him any price he should demand. She wept—she prayed: Jerry and the fat woman laughed immoderately.

"Why, now, you do act real silly!" said the latter. "I told ye he would come as soon as he could; but he darsent come till it's darker than it is now. So make yourself easy, and behave like a gal of sense! There won't nobody hurt ye!"

"But I am convinced there is some mistake, and I must go! I shall set out on foot," said Constantia, wildly, and darted from the door.

The couple made no effort to detain her; but the next moment a shriek from the unhappy girl called them to the gate. They found her extended lifeless on the ground, a white silk handkerchief faintly grasped in both hands.

"Well, this beats all!" said the woman. "Ned said she was city-bred, and very delicate-like, but if she's going to act like this here, the house 'll be too hot to hold her and me together a great while! Well, I s'pose we must carry her in, for Ned 'll swear like anything, if he comes here and finds her lying on the damp ground!"

So saying, with Jerry's aid, Constantia was borne to an inner room, laid on a bed, and brought to her recollection by the reviving odour of burnt feathers, held sufficiently near her nose.

When she opened her eyes, it was to look round, and then fall into a fit of the most immoderate weeping, and inquire for the handkerchief.

"Here it is," said the woman; "and I should think you'd want half a dozen on 'em if you're going to cry that way!"

"This is my husband's handkerchief!" said Constantia.

"Like enough!" said the agreeable mother-in-law; "I don't doubt he's got a plenty of all sorts of good clothes while he's been gone!"

The poor girl closed her eyes in despair. She had found the handkerchief only a few paces from the gate, and recognised it at once as the one her husband had used that day. And to make the sad assurance doubly sure, she could distinguish, by the twilight, his initials in the corner. It was in vain longer to doubt the identity of her Edward with the "Ned" of the odious woman, and the last ray of hope gave way to the intolerable certainty. But with despair came the appearance of calm at least; and she remained perfectly quiet, while the hostess proceeded to recount the expense and trouble which had been bestowed upon the room she then occupied, in order to fit it for her reception. The floor was carpeted, and the bed curtained; and the few articles which found room within the narrow walls were new, and of better quality than those in the outer apartment. Of these the whole history and prices were set forth in many words, and the recital concluded with the triumphant question:

"There! aint it fit for any lady in the land?" She paused for a reply, and Constantia tried to say:

"Oh! certainly!" and with this faint encouragement, the oratress proceeded.

"Oh! Ned knows a thing or two! He ha'n't been all over the States for nothing! He knows how to do things like a gentleman! You needn't ha' been so down-hearted at seeing things look kind o' poor like! We don't put everything on the outside, I can tell ye!" Then getting up, and cautiously locking the door, she drew from under the bed an elegant travelling-case, well guarded with plates and rivets on every side, and, unlooking its intricate inclosures, she displayed to Constantia's bewildered eyes several large packages of new bank notes.

"There! it isn't every bride that can have the handling of such stuff as that! and there's a sight of it real, too! Ned's been a travelling this two months, and he's put off a good deal. He does the most of that, because he's so much of a gentleman that nobody ever suspects him where he aint known. He always takes some great name or other, and I s'pose when he was in York he called himself Squire Darley?"

Constantia might have hoped that this swindling, forging miscreant had only assumed her husband's name; but then the handkerchief—she knew that too well, even without the initials; and her mind remained a chaos of doubt and misery, where no connected train of thought could find place. Every moment her opinion varied. Now hope—now despair—now love—now indignant detestation swayed her. Could this be the evening of that day whose morning and noon had been so blessed? Was she to share the fortunes of a felon, and become the companion of his guilty associates? And yet could she endure the idea of forsaking the man to whom she had willingly given her affections, and for whom she felt that she could, even at that moment, yield up her life? Either alternative seemed insupportable, and she groaned bitterly, in the anguish of her heart.

The old woman was about to resume her remonstrances, when the sound of a step, entering the outer room, called her from the bed-side. Constantia followed her to the door, which was left ajar, and listened eagerly. It was Jerry.

"Where's Ned?" said the old woman. "I wish he'd come and look after this fine lady of his'n; she takes on like everything!"

"Ned's nabbed!" was the laconic reply.

"You don't—"

"Yes! I must bury the boxes, for it's like enough they'll be here again. They were off the scent, but the foolish fellow went to look after his wife: he'd got a notion that I was shamming him when I told him she was here, and so he fell into the trap. He's gone now, sure enough!"

The sound of Constantia's fall, as she sank under this dreadful intelligence, drew their attention to the wretched inmate. They ran to raise her, and even the hardened natures of these guilty creatures, familiar as they were with crime and its attendant miseries, melted into pity for the hapless girl, who, they plainly saw, had only now discovered herself to be the wife of a felon. They made some rough attempts to console her; but she recovered her senses once more, only to weep and moan in tones which must have touched any human heart.

"Go, Jerry!" said the woman; "be about what you're got to do! I'll do what I can for her, poor thing!"

As Jerry disappeared, the sound of wheels became audible in the distance.

"Yes drive!" muttered the woman, turning to listen; "ye're mighty chirk when ye're going to get anybody into trouble!" Then, to Constantia, trying at the same time to raise her face from the pillow where she had buried it: "Look up, dear! keep a good heart—he may get off yet; and whether or no, you'll come to no harm, for anybody may see you're as innocent as a baby!"

CHAPTER V.

Hark! a hurried sound of many steps entering the outward room.

"Where is she? Constantia! Constantia!" exclaimed a voice that would have roused the poor girl from any stupor but that of death; and the next moment she was clasped in her husband's arms.

"Constantia, my love, what does all this mean?" was Darley's inquiry, as soon as he could command himself sufficiently—for the dishevelled and wretched appearance of his wife struck him to the heart.

"Ah! what, indeed, Edward!" she said, faintly. "Is it all a frightful dream, or are you—are you—" She could not proceed—sighs and tears choked her voice, and she sank sobbing on the beloved bosom.

"Can it be possible, my dearest girl, that you have allowed yourself to be made so wretched by a mere inadvertence? I was requested so urgently to lend my aid in securing a notorious counterfeiter, who had been tracked to his haunt in this house, that I consented, without hesitation, under the expectation that an hour or less would accomplish the desired end; and I did not dare to tell you my errand, because I knew you would torment yourself with fears for my safety. The many doublings and windings of the experienced scoundrel have kept us riding through this wood ever since. It is easy to explain my absence; not so easy to forgive the thoughtlessness which has caused you so much cruel distress. But you will own that my feelings, on inquiring for you at the inn, may have been some punishment at least!"

"Ah! I see!" said Constantia, beginning to understand the cause of her perplexities; "it was my own fault, after all! How could I allow my impatience to blind me so far? I might have known you would not send for me in that way! I have read too many novels, Edward!" and smiles, shining through the tears which still flowed plentifully, once more lighted the sweet face of Constantia, and cheered the heart of her husband.

"Come, I will tell you all about it as we return," said Darley. "My mother, with a whole party of friends, has come over to L—, to meet you, and they will be anxious until we return, although we had some intelligence of your whereabouts from the people of the tavern, who knew your amiable driver, and ought to have interfered to prevent his carrying you off. You will not be very ready to run away from me again, I think!"

To think that so much study of life beforehand should have produced such very ludicrous results! We need not say that the study of living men and women, and plain, common things, proved much more profitable to our fair bride, under her husband's tuition.

Perhaps severe judges may say that this was far better than Constantia deserved, for marrying after six weeks' acquaintance. We can only reply, that there are some people who are their own letters of recommendation so unmistakably, that even in this wicked world it is impossible to doubt them.

Still, we are far from desiring to establish a precedent

THE DEATH OF THE WARRIOR-KING.

BY CHARLES SWAIN.

THERE are noble heads bow'd down and pale,
Deep sounds of woe arise,
And tears flow fast around the couch
Where a wounded warrior lies;
The hue of death is gathering dark
Upon his lofty brow,
And the arm of might and valour falls
Weak as an infant's now.

I saw him mid the battling hosts,
Like a bright and leading star,
Where banner, helm, and falchion gleam'd
And flew the bolts of war:
When, in his plenitude of power,
He trod the Holy Land,
I saw the routed Saracens
Flee from his blood dark brand.

I saw him in the banquet hour
Forsake the festive throng,
To seek his favourite minstrel's haunt,
And give his soul to song:
For dearly as he loved renown,
He loved that spell-wrought strain
Which bade the brave of perished days
Light conquest's torch again.

Then seem'd the Bard to cope with Time,
And triumph o'er his doom—
Another world in freshness burst
Oblivion's mighty tomb!—
Again the hardy Britons rushed
Like lions to the fight;
While horse and foot—helm, shield, and lance,
Swept by his vision's sight!

But battle shout and waving plume,
The drum's heart-stirring beat,
The glittering pomp of prosperous war—
The rush of million feet—
The magic of the minstrel's song,
Which told of victories o'er,—
Are sights and sounds the dying king
Shall see—shall hear no more!

It was the hour of deep midnight,
In the dim and quiet sky,
When, with sable cloak and broder'd pall,
A funeral train swept by:
Dull and sad fell the torches' glare
On many a stately crest—
They bore the noble warrior-king
To his last dark home of rest.

WOLFISH LETTER CARRIERS IN THE ARCTIC REGIONS.

LASTLY, we carried out—more, I believe, from amusement than from any idea of its being useful—a plan which had suggested itself to the people of Sir James Ross's expedition, when wintering in Leopold Harbour, in 1848-9—that of inclosing information in a collar secured to the necks of the arctic foxes, caught in traps, and then liberated.

Several animals, thus intrusted with despatches and records, were liberated by different ships; but, as the truth must be told, I fear, in many cases, the next night saw the poor "postman," as Jack facetiously termed him, in another trap, out of which he would be taken, killed, the skin taken off, and packed away, to ornament, at a future day, the neck of some fair Dulcinea.

As a "sub," I was admitted into this secret mystery, otherwise I, with others, might have accounted for the disappearance of the collared foxes, by believing them busy on their honourable mission. In order that the crime of killing the "postmen" may be recognised in its true light, it is but fair that I should say, that the brutes, having partaken once of the good cheer on board or around the ships, seldom seemed satisfied with the mere empty honours of a copper collar, and returned to be caught over and over again. Strict laws were laid down for their safety—such an edict, that no fox taken alive in a trap was to be killed. Of course no fox was, after this, taken alive; they were all unaccountably dead, unless it was some fortunate wight, whose coat and brush were worthless: in such case, he lived either to drag about a quantity of information in a copper collar for the rest of his days, or else to die a slow death, as being intended for Lord Derby's menagerie.

The departure of a postman was a scene of no small merriment. All hands, from the captain to the cook, were out to chase the fox, who, half-frightened out of his wits, seemed to doubt which way to run; whilst loud shouts and roars of laughter, breaking the cold, frosty air, were heard from ship to ship, as the foxhunters swelled in numbers from all sides; and those that could not run, mounted some neighbouring hummock of ice, and gave a view halloo, which said far more for robust health than for tuneful melody.—Osborn's Stray Leaves.

[THE PRINCESS ELIZABETH CONVEYED TO THE TOWER.]

LIVES OF THE QUEENS OF ENGLAND.

BY J. F. SMITH, ESQ., AUTHOR OF

"AMY LAWRENCE," "ROBIN GOODFELLOW," ETC.

ELIZABETH,
QUEEN REGNANT OF ENGLAND.

CHAPTER XX.

Ye towers of Julius—London's lasting shame;
With many a foul and midnight murder spread.

GRAY.

ELIZABETH passed, as may be supposed, a most unhappy night. The cruel uncertainty of her sister's intentions towards her—joined, perhaps, to the secret consciousness that she had unwisely permitted herself to be drawn into a conspiracy against her crown and authority—naturally alarmed her for the result. The example which Henry VIII. had set, of shedding the blood of royalty upon the scaffold, had familiarised the nation to the execution of princes. In her own time she had seen the unole of the reigning king, and the beautiful and accomplished Lady Jane Grey, led to the block, and she bitterly regretted her imprudence. During this, the most trying period of her life, she evinced much firmness and tact; she hoped much from her letter to the queen, who, with all her bigotry and harshness, was a strict observer of her word—and Mary had promised that she should not be condemned unheard.

At an early hour the following morning, she was again waited upon by the lords of the council. Although she augured ill from the repetition of their visit, and the insulting air of her bitter enemy, Gardiner, she maintained a bold face, and received them with the same statelyness of demeanour as on the previous occasion.

"Madam," said the bishop, bowing with mock humility; "your grace will pardon us! We are the messengers of our sovereign's will; and that will, we regret to say—"

"My lord—my lord!" hastily interrupted the princess; "there needs no hypocrisy between us: we can guess the nature of your errand, from the messenger! You have ever been our enemy, though God wot for what reason! Perhaps he may one day requite you!"

"We regret," replied Sussex, answering for his colleague—whose evil disposition, he feared, would render the commands they were intrusted with yet more harsh, by the tone in which he delivered them—"that it is the pleasure of her majesty, your grace should forthwith remove from the Palace of Whitehall, and take up your abode in the Tower."

The countenance of Elizabeth became deadly pale.

"The Tower," she said, "is the abode fitted for traitors—not the sister of your queen! O, Sussex—Sussex!" she added; "is this the result of your promise and intercession?"

"I have performed it!" your grace, replied the peer respectfully "I placed your letter in the hand of her majesty!"

"And she read it?"

"Yes!"

"The reply—the reply? Quick, man—quick!" exclaimed Elizabeth, fixing her eyes upon him, as though life and death hung upon the words he was about to utter.

"The queen was not pleased to make any," continued the nobleman; "doubtless you will receive it from her own hand: her orders were, that your grace should at once take water for the Tower; and so peremptory were they, that we dared not disobey them. These noble lords," he added, pointing to the members of the council, "are here to attend your highness in all honour!"

"Honour!" repeated the royal maiden, scornfully; "say rather to my death, my lord! I have not studied the pages of our history so carelessly, as not to remember that the Tower is an abode fatal to princes! I must see my sister!"

"Impossible, your grace!" said Gardiner, moving towards the door, towards which the speaker had advanced, as if with the purpose of putting her design into execution. "The queen has decided upon not admitting you into her presence, till the present unhappy obscurity which rests upon your loyalty shall be cleared—till—"

"Till mine enemies have triumphed!" interrupted the prisoner, passionately; "till lying and false-swearing have done their worst to blacken me in her judgment and affection—till I am condemned!" she added, with a shudder; "then it will be too late!"

"This admission," observed Lord Paget, "proves—"

"That I know my foes, and the means whereby they hope to crush me! Perjured, disloyal knaves are they who try their strength against a woman's weakness; but no matter—God and mine own innocence will shield me!"

"Heaven grant it, your grace!" answered Gardiner, with a slight sneer. "He at least is a judge who cannot be deceived: He reads the hearts—man can only investigate the words—of His creatures!"

It was in vain that the captive entreated of Sussex and the other lords of the council to return to St. James's, and entreat the queen in her behalf. Not one of them dared undertake to disobey the sovereign, by delaying the execution of her strict commands. Finding her solicitations vain, Elizabeth tried the effect of obstinacy.

"What," she said, "if I refuse to obey this injunction? ye have no warrant for this act!"

"Does your grace deny the authority of the queen?" demanded Lord Paget, one of the most bitter of her enemies.

The princess was silent.

"Or suppose," added Gardiner, "that these noble lords and myself would venture upon such a step without fitting orders?"

Sussex advanced to the royal maiden, and respectfully reminded her "that resistance would prove not only useless, but injurious to her cause, by incensing the queen yet more strongly against her. Force us not," he continued, "to use harsh means!"

"Mean you violence?"

The frank-hearted nobleman remained silent.

"I see," said the prisoner, with sudden determination, "that for awhile the malice of my foes prevails; but a time may come when it shall be otherwise! To the love and justice of my sister, I can trust better than to your deeds: therefore, while protesting our innocence, we submit to the pleasure of her majesty! My lords, we are ready to attend you!"

The only person who heard this decision with real pleasure, was the noble-minded Earl of Sussex. He knew that Whitehall was surrounded by a party of the guards—not only to serve as an escort, but strong enough to bear down any opposition which the friends of Elizabeth might make, even had she been mad enough to encourage such an attempt.

"Your grace has decided wisely!" he said.

Whilst the barge was being prepared, the future Queen of England was permitted to retire to the inner chamber of her lodging, to make the necessary arrangements with her women. No sooner were the doors of communication closed, than she fell upon her knees, and offered up a mental prayer. Lady Tyrwhit, who was weeping by her side, whispered in her ear:

"There is some one in the chamber!"

Her mistress looked upon her with an inquiring eye—for she saw no one save themselves.

"A friend!" added the speaker.

"God help me!" sighed the princess, "I have but few!"

The faithful attendant hastened to the doors, and drew the massy bolts: no sooner had she secured against all intrusion, than a portion of the arras was drawn aside, and Cecil, who was disguised in the dress of one of the halberdiers, made his appearance: the sight of so tried a friend was doubly welcome.

"Cecil!" said the princess, "never was a counsellor more needed, for I am in sore strait—mine enemies prevail! Mary has forgotten her promise never to condemn me unheard, and I am a prisoner, on my way to the Tower! None to serve me—none to assist me in my need!"

"Your grace is wrong: intelligence of what has been designed is rife in the City. The Protestants are indignant—the leaders of the party are ready and armed!"

The eyes of Elizabeth began to brighten.

"Many are gathered near the Tower. They have consulted with me: a word, and they would have attacked the escort!"

"Well! and you—"

"Refused to speak it!" replied the statesman.

"Traitor!" exclaimed Elizabeth, in a tone of disappointment. "You, too, have deserted me!"

"Say, rather, that I have saved you!"

"Saved me?"

"By whom, think you?" continued the cool-headed politician, "that the intelligence was permitted to transpire? I will tell your grace—by your enemies!"

"My enemies?"

"Yes! and their motive is so clear, that I marvel your grace does not see through it! An attack upon the authority of the queen would be considered rebellion—treason; and afford a pretext, no matter whether just or not, for your death. Sir Thomas Gage has already received orders to march into the City, at the head of five hundred men. The Tower is filled with soldiers from the north—the men most devoted to the Catholic cause. It is a trap laid for your undoing! For hours I have been labouring to convince your friends that you stand in greater danger from their well-meant zeal, than from the machinations of your foes. Thank heaven, I have succeeded!"

"Right, Cecil—you are right, my true and faithful friend!" replied Elizabeth, after a pause; "henceforth I shall mistrust my judgment when opposed to thine; and yet—"

She hesitated—it was not without good reason that she trembled at the thought of taking up her abode in the Tower.

"You are safe," whispered the statesman, "even there; for, without proof, they dare not condemn you: you have more friends in the peers than your grace has been led to imagine!"

"Proofs," murmured the princess, doubtfully, "they have none, and yet I fear the stability of Courtney!"

"He is a fool, but an honourable one," answered Cecil; "he will lay his head upon the block, rather than compromise you; besides," he added, "his interests are allied to yours!"

"To mine?"

"Yes! he aspired to your hand, and, through you, to the crown matrimonial of England. Mary once favoured his pretensions to her own hand—more—she once, I believe entertained something like an affection for him: he relies on that to save him!"

"He will trust to a broken reed, then!" observed the royal maiden, scornfully; "she has the blood of our father in her veins, and more than a share of his nature in her heart: she will never pardon any one who lays his hand upon her crown! The Tudors," she added, "have ever been a jealous and unforgiving race: they may pretend to pardon, but they bide their time!"

Never, perhaps, had a greater truth been uttered by royal lips, in conversation with a statesman. Cecil smiled as he heard it: doubtless he remembered it in after life, when the fate of Mary Stuart was debated in the councils of the speaker.

There was a gentle tap at the door of the chamber. Elizabeth silently extended her hand towards her counsellor, who kissed it with as much reverence as if it had been that of his actual sovereign; then hastily retired to his place of concealment behind the arras. At the same moment, Lady Tyrwhit threw open the folding doors, and exclaimed aloud:

"The Lady Elizabeth!"

Gardiner secretly smiled at the display of state in one who was already a captive, and destined, as he trusted, to end her days and royalty upon a scaffold.

His companions were struck with the calm air of the royal maiden, as she entered the apartment: there was neither defiance nor hesitation in her look or manner.

"My lords," she said, "we are ready to attend you!"

CHAPTER XXI.

Is guilt so bold? or innocence so trusting?

HERMIONE.

THE rain was fast falling, for the day was overcast as the present fortunes of the heiress of the crown. Still, the inclement state of the weather did not prevent a number of persons being assembled as close as possible to the Traitors' Gate: many were in small boats, which, despite the repeated warnings of Bridges, the Lieutenant of the Tower, would press nearer than his ideas of military etiquette permitted, to the fatal portal at which so many noble victims had been landed. Several citizens and gentlemen were standing on the summit of the broad steps which led from the water. Curiosity was blended with pity and interest in the countenances of most of them.

"Back, my masters—back!" exclaimed the Lieutenant, who was surrounded by his warders: "You press too near! one would think the bears were about to be baited in the Tower, instead of the arrival of a prisoner!"

Still he gave no orders for dispersing them. Many of the partisans of Elizabeth regretted that they had listened to the advice of Cecil, and come unarmed, when so fair an opportunity presented itself for rescuing her; but the more clear-sighted approved of the sagacious judgment of the future minister, for they saw that the attempt was not only foreseen, but wished for and provided against.

"Shall this iniquity be permitted, father?" demanded a young man, in an under-tone, "and we call ourselves Englishmen?"

This was addressed to an aged citizen, whose garb, as well as that of the speaker, although rich in materials, was of that plain fashion even then affected by the professors of the reformed religion.

"Silence!" said the old man; "it is too late!"

"Not too late!" urged the youth; "many of our friends have not yet laid aside their arms! Numbers are gathered upon the hill and the inner ramparts: only give the word, and —"

"You will be shot down like fools!" interrupted the second speaker mildly. "I feel as indignant as you can do; but, fortunately, anger has not yet deprived me of my reason. I tell you, boy, there are five hundred noblemen in the Tower, besides the regular guard; the guns are all shotted; they are prepared—nay, anxious for the attempt!"

His son—for such was the relation between the speakers—looked surprised; still he urged that it ought to be risked.

"More," said the old man; "the scaffold on which that blessed martyr to our faith, the Lady Jane, mounted to heaven, is still standing in the Tower, and I know that Hendrée, the headsman, has been sent for. Now can you comprehend?"

The ardour of the young man was instantly cooled, and he made no further attempt to shake the resolution of his parent, who was ostensibly a merchant of considerable standing and wealth in the City, but in reality a minister of the reformed religion, and an agent of the Evangelical Church in Holland, for the distribution of Luther's Bible and works.

From the excitement of the crowds in the boats upon the river, it was evident that the barge with the royal prisoner and the lords of the council was fast approaching the fortress. On a signal from the lieutenant, a party of the warders lined the steps even to the water's edge, whilst others kept back the crowd of people.

At the sight of the Traitors' Gate, where it was intended to land her, the pride of Elizabeth returned. She felt the outrage keenly, and demanded of the lords who had charge of her the meaning of such an insult.

"Your grace must land," replied Lord Paget, "where it has pleased her majesty to direct! Prisoners have no choice!"

It was useless to contend—the royal maiden was compelled to yield. As she rose from the barge, the speaker offered her his cloak of velvet and minever—for the rain was falling in torrents. Although a bigot and her enemy, he was a gentleman. Elizabeth, however, dashed it hastily aside, and set her foot upon the stairs, exclaiming, in a firm tone:

"Here lands as true a subject, being a prisoner, as ever landed on these stairs! Before Thee, O God, I speak it—having no other friend but Thee!"

The lords were astonished at her firmness, and Gardiner satirically observed, "that if it was so, it was the better for her!"

All present were struck by the courage and dignity of the royal prisoner. As she reached the top of the stairs, many persons fell upon their knees, and prayed aloud for God to preserve her grace; but not the slightest attempt was made to rescue her.

"The heretics seem overawed!" whispered Paget, in a tone of disappointment, to his colleague the chancellor.

"Or forewarned!" replied Gardiner, bitterly; "no matter—they cannot fail to compromise her! Rebellion will out, despite their prudence! The serpent cannot change its nature!"

On the summit of the landing-place was a large, square stone, entirely unsheltered from the falling rain. Upon this the future Queen of England seated herself: her features were pale, but stern—her flashing eye resembled more that of a lioness at bay, than a captive about to be consigned to the tender mercies of a gaoler.

"Madam," said the Lieutenant of the Tower, who stood bareheaded before her, "had you not better retire to your lodgings, which I have commanded to be prepared for you?"

"Better sit here than in a worse place!" she replied; "for God knoweth, not I, whither you will bring me!"

Many, at the sight of her disconsolate state, began to weep and pray for her, and her gentleman usher was so moved that he burst into tears.

"Beshrew thee for a weak knave!" exclaimed the lion-hearted daughter of Henry VIII.; "although a kind one! wailing like a girl, instead of comforting me! None know better than thyself that I have done nought against my allegiance, that man should lament for me!"

At the request of the lords of the council, who began to tire of the scene, Master Bridges, the lieutenant, conducted the captive to her chamber, where the nobles took their leave of her with many outward demonstrations of respect.

No sooner were the bolts of her prison-door drawn upon her, than the spirit which had hitherto sustained her gave way, and she wept bitterly. Gradually, however, she calmed her passion of grief, and had recourse to prayer. There is little doubt that the danger which Elizabeth ran at this period of her life, taught her extreme prudence. Pity that her sufferings did not inculcate that nobler virtue—mercy.

The instructions of the lords of the council were of a most rigorous nature. No person, however high their rank, was to be permitted on any pretence to have access to her. She was to be compelled to attend daily at the mass. The two or three attendants who remained with her, were on no account to leave the precincts of the Tower, or hold communion with any one within the walls. She was to be subjected, in short, to all the restrictions usually exercised towards a prisoner of state.

"And pray, Master Bridges," said Gardiner, "what may be the condition of the fortress?"

"Strong enough, your lordship," answered the lieutenant, "to keep the enemies of our gracious sovereign from either breaking in or out of the walls!"

"And the disposition of the men?"

"Loyal, my lord. I will answer for them as for myself: there are no traitors within the Tower, unless as prisoners!"

"Would I could say the same for those without!" observed the prelate; "but watchful eyes are on them!"

"Chancellor," said Sussex, "let us not be too harsh with this unhappy lady! Let us remember that she is the daughter of him who was our king, and so conduct ourselves that we have not to answer for it hereafter!"

Gardiner smiled: he had no doubt of that future to which the speaker alluded; for he had already resolved, in the recesses of his subtle mind, a scheme for the destruction of Elizabeth. But heaven watched over her. He permitted his colleagues to depart without him—alleging, as an excuse for remaining, that he had certain orders to attend to on the part of the queen.

"Bridges," he said, as soon as they were alone, "is the scaffold of the Lady Jane still standing?"

"It is, my lord!"

"And the block?"

"Remains."

"Tis well!" said the crafty statesman, with a gloomy smile; "see that they are not disturbed; and, further, that the headsman does not absent himself one instant from the Tower! If any attempt should be made to rescue your prisoner, how would you act?"

"As a soldier, my good lord!" replied the officer. "I know my duty—I would defend it to the last!"

"But should you fail to keep the place?"

"It can only be with my life, then," said Bridges.

"It will not come to that," said the churchman, in a low whisper, "if you act wisely! I will give you the means to hold the place against a host of traitors!"

"How, my good lord?"

"Strike off the head of your captive," deliberately uttered the chancellor, "and cast it to the rebels from the walls!"

The Lieutenant of the Tower shuddered, and remained silent.

WHEN LOVE WAS A CHILD.

WHEN Love was a child, and went idling round,

'Mong flowers, the whole summer's day,

One morn in the valley a bower he found,

So sweet, it allured him to stay.

O'erhead, from the trees, hung a garland fair,

A fountain ran darkly beneath;—

'Twas Pleasure had hung up the flow'rets there;

Love knew it, and jumped at the wreath.

But Love didn't know—and, at his weak years,

What urchin was likely to know?

That Sorrow had made of her own salt tears

The fountain that murmured below.

He caught at the wreath—with too much haste,

As boys when impatient will do—

It fell in those waters of briny taste,

And the flowers were all wet through.

This garland he now wears night and day;

And, though it all sunny appears

With Pleasure's own light, each leaf, they say,

Still tastes of the Fountain of Tears.

FACETIÆ.

If you would enjoy your meals, be good-natured. An angry man can't tell whether he is eating boiled cabbage or stewed umbrellas.

What difference is there between forms and ceremonies? You sit upon one and stand on the other.

An obituary, very eulogistic of a lady, says: "She was married twenty-four years, and in all that time never once banged the door."

THE COW AND CALF.—A dandy who wanted the milk passed to him at a country tavern, thus asked for it: "Landlady, please pass your cow this way!" To whom the lady thus retorted: "Waiter, take the cow down there where the calf is bleating!"

TRUTH BY TELEGRAPH.—A telegraph report has contrived to speak unvarnished truth for once. It says that "rumours are abundant, facts scarce."

A bachelor friend of ours has left a boarding-house, in which were a number of very plain-featured women, on account of the miserable fair set before him at the table.

A man in New Bedford, who had backed out from a promise of marriage, was prosecuted and imprisoned by his intended. The injured fair one paid his board in gaol for two weeks, when he surrendered, and they were married. Other damsels similarly situated, might adopt this method with equal success.

MARBLE-OUS.—Dan Marble is delighting the English with stories like this: He says he once partook of a rooster so old that he was bald headed.

If you please, Mr. Sugarcoat, ma wants to know if you will have the kindness to send her one halfpenny worth of starch and a farthing's worth of needles by the boy, in a basket. Please send the bill with the goods, and she will call and settle with you on Saturday.

A "RUN" FOR GOLD.—The horse, West Australian, is the favourite at Tattersall's, for the Derby. No wonder, when the run for gold to Australia has been so general and durable!

COMPLICATION OF DISORDERS.—The Medical Gazette and Journal of Health has this "hit" among its brevities: "What did Mr. — die of?" asked an acquaintance. "Of a complication of disorders," replied his friend. "How do you describe a complication, my good sir?" "He died," rejoined the other, "of two physicians, an apothecary, and a surgeon."

RATHER DRY.—We heard the other day a good anecdote of a clever fellow, who was a passenger on the mail boat some time since. He is not in the habit of "indulging," but on this occasion he found himself somewhat under the influence of "old King Al." Being asked how in the world he came to drink so much, he replied: "Why, the fact is, gents (hic), the river has got so low, (hic), that the Captain has forbid the use of water as a beverage—there's none to spare."

ASTRONOMICAL FUN.—When Sir William Hamilton announced to the Royal Irish Academy his discovery of the central sun—the star round which our orb of day and his planetary attendants revolve—a waggish member exclaimed: "What! our sun's sun! why, that must be a grand sun!"

A BULL.—A local newspaper says: "On Wednesday we shall issue a second edition, but no first edition." This reminds us of an honest Hibernian, who called at the Weekly Times office with an advertisement, the price of which, he was told, would be nine shillings for the first time, and seven and sixpence for the second. "Faith, then," said he, "I'll have it in the second time, and not the first at all!"

REPORTED PROMOTION.—Rumour insinuates that the Master of the Horse to her Majesty has recommended Mr. Braidwood, of the London Fire Brigade, for promotion, for his services at the late fire at Windsor. The title to be "Master of the Hose!"

THE "GUARDS" IN THEIR ELEMENT.—The household troops have been officially complimented for their good behaviour while extinguishing the late conflagration at Windsor Castle. This is as it should be, as the Guards ought to conduct themselves well and steadily under fire!

A CARPENTER'S DEFINITION OF THE INCOME TAX.—"Tin tacks! (tax)."

A "TWISTER" FOR THE COTTON TRADE.—At New Orleans, 18,000 bales of cotton have been consumed by fire—a consumption anything but what the manufacturers contemplated. Thus, the owners of the said cotton have been seriously worsted in their speculations.

SOMETHING NEW ON FOOT.—We'll tell the ladies a pretty secret, an' they will promise faithfully not to say anything about it—except to their particular friends. A new style of dress and evening slipper is coming in vogue, which will decrease the apparent dimensions, while it will greatly add to the invisible fascination of all the pretty feet in the metropolis. The new slipper is made of black or bronze satin, with three or four light bands of India rubber running around the top, and the instep ornamented with a good sized rosette, of the same colour as the slipper. Isn't it charming and quite refreshing, after the dull monotony of square toes and plain quarters?

THE YANKEE AND THE GRAND DUKE.—An American traveller in St. Petersburg, went out on foot in March, when the snow was melting after a sudden rain. The streets presented the aspect of extensive puddles, separated at the crossings by a ridge of more solid snow, over which the foot passengers worked their telltale way. The American was lost in the midst of such a snow bridge, when he suddenly recognised the Grand Duke Constantine, in plain clothes, followed by his aide-de-camp, coming from the opposite side. The footpath between the two puddles was not wide enough to let two persons pass by, and Mr. — did not wish either to turn his back uncourtously to the prince, by returning from whence he came, nor to step servilely into the water; he therefore, pulling out his purse, presented it to the grand duke, and asked: "Odd or even?" "Even," answered the astonished prince. "You are right, imperial highness—I have lost, and must give way," said the American, and stepped into the water. The prince was highly pleased by this proceeding, and the American received on the next day an invitation to dine with the emperor.—Pulasky's White—Red—Black.

TRITE AND TRUE.—"I am now about to do for you what the devil never did by you," said a quaint parson, in his valedictory address to his flock; "that is, I shall leave you."

SOMETHING "LIKE."—Louis Napoleon's embracing the Countess "Theba" as his wife, was decidedly rather a Spanish affair!

SOMETHING NEW.—The Registrar General, in his report on the health of London, talks about "the sleeping capacity" of a room! This is the first time we ever heard of an apartment having any capacity for sleep; but possibly we are not sufficiently gifted with the power of clairvoyance to see the Registrar's meaning very clearly.

GOVERNMENT AT SCHOOL.—The Aberdeen ministry are just now obliged to mind their P's and Q's, in consequence of Lord John Russell's proposed Educational Bill!

"RED" MOROCCO.—We are told that the expected death of the Emperor of Morocco will cause sanguinary civil war. The only question will be, which of the Moroccan chiefs will get the worst leathering!

SUSPENSION OF THE "GRAPE" SHOT.—Now that the Kaffir war is supposed to be terminated, it may reasonably be expected that the people at the Cape will cease to cry out for fresh troops. Thus we shall have no more Cape whine!—(wine.)

A DRUNKEN ASS.—An old lady in Knaresborough lately placed her "brewing" in the street in a cooler, and it caught the eye of a drouthy donkey, who took an opportunity of drinking it up. Poor Cuddie! he found even four legs incompetent to hold him up respectably straight, and reeled about the town, a delightful text for teetotallers.

DIFFICULTY WITH A NEEDLE.—A new difficulty has arisen with respect to the arrival of "Cleopatra's Needle" in England, to be exhibited at the Crystal Palace, at Sydenham. The needle is stuck so firmly into other works as to render the point as to its eventual extraction doubtful; therefore those who have an eye to a sight of this wonderful piece of antiquity, as described by polished travellers, will probably be disappointed.

TOO DEAR.—A pair of rustic lovers had resolved to make a match of it, and the prudent bridegroom went about the parish, asking the cheapest road to wedded bliss. The conclusion to which he came was complimentary to the church. The registrar's charge was so substantial that he thought he might as well employ "a real parson" at once, and then "the job would be sure to stand!" So off he went to church with his bride, and made her his own "for better for worse." The knot tied, he asked for the "reckonin'," and was thunderstruck by the announcement of "fourteen shillings." He proposed seven. Heads were shaken:—"no half-price" was the rule. "Then," said Hodge, handing over the full sum in a fume, "I'm blow'd if ever I get wed here any more!" The priest could no longer maintain his gravity—the man's threat was too droll to be resisted. He thought it so good, that he rewarded its author by returning the fees, and making him a present of his first wife gratis.

WHO OWNS IT?—The young ladies who have had occasion to visit the Glasgow sub-post-office recently, have noticed that the Postmaster in every instance regarded them with a curious look, and the matter has been made the subject of a large amount of chat among the fair denizens of the place. "Jane, have you been to the post-office within a day or two?" "Yes!" "Didn't the postmaster scrutinise your countenance as if he was about to make an inventory of your features?" "La, yes! Now I think of it, I remember that he looked at me very hard!" "There, there, Antoinette, it's just what all the girls say! What does it mean, I wonder?" This was the conversation for a week; but at length it was ascertained that a letter was lying in the post-office which bore this inscription: "To the handsomest girl in Glasgow." The postmaster, who claims the privilege of deciding upon the matter, has not yet come to a decision.

HOAXING THE YEOMANRY.—The following hoax was played off on the Weston Zoyland troop of Somersetshire Yeomanry, lately. Some would-be wit transmitted to the members of the corps the following circular: Bridgewater, March —. Sir,—The Bridgewater troop will meet tomorrow (Thursday) morning, at half-past ten, when it is particularly requested that every man will punctually attend in full marching order. There would have been more notice given, but the news only reached Bridgewater this evening, that Napoleon and his troops are already in the channel.—By order of Colonel Tynte, Bamberie.—P. S. Any man's non-attendance will be at his peril." In consequence of the intimation, several of the Yeomanry met, when the hoax was discovered, and they returned, much annoyed at the trick played on them; though doubtless greatly relieved at finding the alarm was a false one.—Dash and Cheltenham Gazette.

[APPROPRIATE.]—A cargo of emigrants recently left England for Melbourne, in the ship John Bunyan. Of course this was the "Pilgrims' Progress."

A DISTINCTION WITHOUT A DIFFERENCE.—Although Billingsgate Fish Market has been remodelled and rebuilt, yet, from the fact of the old site being retained, it will have much of the common-place about it.

A large majority of the Carlton Club—all lawyers—wishing to get clear of an obnoxious member, O. P. Clifford, agreed recently to dissolve, for the purpose of reforming without him; but he unexpectedly took the stand that, as they had left the club, he was the sole possessor of the property: and so it proved; and they were obliged to buy him off.

THE INQUISITIVE INNKEEPER'S REVENGE.—The American orator, John Randolph, being at an inn in Virginia, was about to leave, when the master of the house inquired which way he was travelling. "Sir!" said Mr. Randolph, with a look of displeasure. "I asked," said the landlord, "which way are you travelling?" "Have I paid you my bill?" "Yes." "Do I owe you anything more?" "No." "Well, I'm going just where I please; do you understand?" "Yes." The landlord was somewhat excited, and Mr. Randolph drove off; but to his surprise, in a few minutes sent one of his servants to inquire which of the forks of the road he should take. Mr. Randolph not being out of hearing distance, the landlord spoke at the top of his breath: "Mr. Randolph, you don't owe me one cent—just take which road you please."

ALL THE BERRIES.—A celebrated comedian arranged with his greengrocer—one Berry—to pay him quarterly; but the greengrocer sent in his account long before the quarter was due. The comedian, in great wrath, called upon the greengrocer, and, labouring under the impression that his credit was doubted, said: "I say, here's a pretty mul, Berry; you've sent in your bill, Berry, before it is due, Berry; your father, the elder Berry, would not have been such a goose, Berry. But you need not look black, Berry—for I don't care a straw, Berry—and shan't pay you till Christmas, Berry."

A KEEN RETORT.—An English gentleman, possessing a keen wit, was at a brilliant assembly of the élite of Vienna, where a distinguished lady of that city frequently amused herself and immediate circle of friends, by saying smart and uncourtous things to annoy him. "By the way," added she, "how is it your countrymen speak French so very imperfectly? We Austrians use it with the same freedom as if it were our native tongue." "Madame," retorted he, but with the blandest manner possible, "I know not, unless it be that the French army have not been twice to our capital to teach it, as they have been at yours."

HOW WAS IT?—At Bristol there is an almshouse for "Old Maids," and relative to one of its inmates the following story is told: Some years since an old maid, belonging to the Almshouse, went out one very fine evening to tea with a friend in College Street; but whether she sat too long over what followed—namely, chat—or whether she was guided by the cathedral clock, which seldom was right, I cannot say, but she did not get home till after the gate was locked; and, after sundry raps and a host of palpitations, she was told she couldn't lodge there that night; so, finding the sour old bachelor inexorable, she at length grew sour and exceedingly fiery, and, giving the gate a tremendous blow with her umbrella, exclaimed: "I only wish as how my son Bill was here—he'd let 'ee know whether you wouldn't let I in or not!"

NEWS FOR THE LADIES.—Serjeant Wilkins, in a recent case of breach of promise, laid it down that no lady's heart was ever broken after she was twenty years of age; but we have the testimony of many excellent spinsters of a "certain age," that they cannot agree with him on that score.—Diogenes.

"A BIRD THAT CAN SING, AND WON'T SING, OUGHT TO BE MADE TO SING."—The public like the airs sung by Simms Reeves, but they don't like those that are shown by him. Although Mr. Allcroft becomes his apologist, they think Reeves's repeated affectation of colds—all craft. He should face his audience, if he only sneezed at them.—Ibid.

THE FIRE AT WINDSOR CASTLE.—We have heard of the boy who cut open the bellows to see where the wind came from. And, judging from the reports in the papers—this being torn up, and that being dragged down—Windsor Castle is to be pulled to pieces, to find out how the fire originated. Prince Albert attempted a witticism, saying, he had no doubt that some spark had to do with it. And the Standard, emulating the waggery of the prince, and justifying the spoliation of the castle, says: "The subject is one which comes home at least to every one's heart." It would be better to say grate at once, for there the subject may be stirred with safety, and probably a useful light be obtained.—Ibid.

A QUESTION FOR LAWYERS.

The following extract from the Paris correspondence of the Republic, is decidedly French. It starts an interesting question for lawyers: "To whom does a broken pane of glass belong? If you can decide, under the circumstances of the case I am about to relate, you will set a vexed question at rest. The other night a carriage, badly guided, dashed upon the sidewalk, and the pole passed through the window-pane of a shoemaker's shop. It went through as clean as a bullet, making a round O in the pane—and letting in a streak of cold air as smooth as a musket-barrel. If the pane had been cut up by cracks like the rays of the sun, or the spokes of a wheel, it would have possessed no earthly value, of course; but, as it was, sundry amateurs of curiosities who passed by, declared it to be worth ten thousand francs at least.

The shoemaker thought he had made his everlasting fortune, and, naturally enough, claimed the broken square. But he had counted without his host, or, as I should say, without his proprietor. The owner of the house claimed the smashed window-glass as his own by right of possession. The shoemaker was only his tenant. It was in vain that the latter reminded his landlord that he had never offered before to replace the window-panes that he had the misfortune to break or to have broken. The landlord insisted—but he had not foreseen a certain difficulty. The insurance company that had insured his house, not only against fire, but against tumbling to pieces, against earthquakes, and against window-breakage, claimed, in its turn, the right to mend the pane and take the old one. But the insurance company had forgotten a slight circumstance in their way. The glazier claimed the broken pane as one of his traditional, immemorial perquisites; never, he said, had any one yet made any objection to his removing the splinters and the old putty, and doing what he pleased with them. So here are four claimants, and I am not sure that the adroit driver will not put in his claim, too, as the original cause of the breakage, and the lawsuits which threaten to grow out of it."

INTEMPERANCE IN THE EAST.—Turkey is not much of a country for drinking; but it appears that France and Russia have been very nearly quarrelling over their Porte.—Punch.

HOW TO FIND OUT WHEN IT IS HIGH WATER.—Go into the cabin of one of the Australian Mail Steamers.—Ibid.

FEMALE INFALLIBILITY.—A man frequently admits that he was in the wrong, but a woman, never—she was "only mistaken."—Ibid.

POLICE REGULATIONS

FOR THE BETTER BEHAVIOUR AND ELEGANT DEPORTMENT OF CABMEN.

EVERY Cabman is to wear a white neckcloth.

No Cabman is to open the door without first putting his gloves on.

Every Cabman is to have a bottle of Eau-de-Cologne in his vehicle, for fear of accidents.

Every Cabman is to shave at least once a day, and to wash his face and hands not less than three times: viz. 8 A.M.—1 P.M.—and 4 P.M.

None but the best Windsor soap to be used on all al-luvial occasions.

Any Cabman detected reading a letter on his box, and afterwards tearing it up, and flinging the pieces about the street, will be instantly taken into custody.

On all levees, and drawing-room days, every Cabman is to wear a nosegay in his button-hole.

Every Cabman is expected to touch his hat only every time he sees a gentleman or lady pass, but if he is spoken to, he must take it off, and remain uncovered until the gentleman or lady leaves him.

Every Cabman must possess a certain knowledge of French and German—sufficient to make himself understood—and, if he can add to the above a small smattering of Italian, his merits will not be overlooked.

Every Cabman must be provided with a silk umbrella, in the event of rainy weather.

No Cabman, whilst on his box, must read, or yawn, or sleep, or sing, or whistle, or talk too loud, or make pantomimic signals with his hands, or keep them in his pocket, or sit with one leg crossed over the other, under any pretence whatever.

Any infringement of the above regulations will be visited with the very severest punishments the legislature can inflict—the lowest being a month's imprisonment, with hard labour. (Signed) COMMISSIONER MAYNE.

—Ibid.

MISCELLANEOUS.

TRANSPORTATION OF A WEALTHY MAN.—Andrew Saulsbury, a Leicester pawnbroker, occupying his own property, and reported to be worth £10,000, has been sentenced to seven years' transportation. He had palmed upon his dupes, as "unredeemed pledges," articles professing to be gold, which were merely gilt.

THE DYING SOLDIER.—In the heat of the Battle of Neerwinde, gained by the French in 1693, the Marshal of Luxembourg, who commanded them, seeing a soldier of the guard quitting his corps, said to him, in a threatening tone: "Where art thou going?" "Sir," replied he, opening his coat to show his wounds, "I am going to die, a few paces from this, happy to have exposed my life, and to have lost it, for my country, in fighting under so great a general as you."

NOTE ABOUT ARAB HORSES.—Whenever a horse falls into the hands of an Arab, his first thought is how to ascertain his descent. If the owner be dismounted in battle, or if he be even about to receive his death-blow from the spear of his enemy, he will frequently exclaim: "O Fellah! (such a one) the mare that fate has given to you is of noble blood. She is of the breed of Saklawivah, and her dam is ridden by Awaith, a sheikh of the Fedhan" (or as the case may be). Nor will a lie come from the mouth of a Bedouin as to the race of his mare. He is proud of her noble qualities, and will testify to them as he dies. After a battle or a foray, the tribes who have taken horses from the enemy, will send an envoy to ask their breed, and a person so chosen passes from tent to tent unharmed, hearing from each man, as he eats his bread, the descent and qualities of the animal he may have lost.—Layard's Remains of Nineveh.

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

M. R. D. AND EDWARD JONES.—Vol. XV. of this Journal is in print, and may be had at the Office, 334, Strand.

C. F.—Unstamped publications may publish anything but news. The question can only be definitely settled by the repeal of the obnoxious duty.

EDWIN H.—In 1848, Louis Napoleon volunteered his services, and was sworn in, as a special constable. During his residence in England, his means of subsistence were derived from the estates and money he inherited from his parents. We believe he had at one time estates in Switzerland, Italy, and the United States of America. He has been all his life—that is, from twenty until he was elected president—what is called a “fast man.”

J. H.—It would not be safe for an executor, although he had the consent of the persons interested, to sell, convert into money, and distribute the estate of a testator, before the time prescribed in the will. Under such limitations, no executor—not even an astute lawyer—can tell what other interests may be involved before the prescribed time has elapsed. In all monetary transactions, anticipation is a great evil.

SWEET-TOOTH.—Eating sugar rather preserves than injures the teeth. It is the villanous compounds called “sweetmeats” that do all the mischief. One ounce of highly-coloured gingerbread, or one pennyworth of the pellet rubbish called “Scotch Mixture,” will do the teeth more injury than a whole hoghead of sugar would. But too much sugar injures the digestive powers.

LUCY wishes to be an actress, but her friends will not consent. Her friends are wise. The life of an actress is very perilous—it is worse than a soldier's. In time of peace, the latter is sure of good clothing and lodging; and in the event of war, he can only be killed outright. But an actress is never sure of anything, and if she be young and pretty, she is every day exposed to the base attacks of the base among the opposite sex. Men don't respect unmarried women who have been in the glare of the footlights. But Lucy is only sixteen—the age of feminine dreams. When she is a little older—perhaps in a year or so—her sympathies and aspirations will assume a more womanly complexion. At present she has no right to, and cannot, judge of what is best for herself.

A. C.—A man may wear his beard and moustache, and yet be considered a Christian—as you term it—in appearance. Formerly these appendages were generally worn, and as men are necessarily more exposed to the weather than women, we think the disease of them has not been attended by any beneficial results. Catarrhs and consumptions are more prevalent now than they were in the days of beards and moustaches. Besides, men ought to be as unlike women as possible. Shaving is an effort to reduce the sexes to something like a facial equality. If the shaving principle goes much further, the whiskers won't be spared. But in the absence of a general rule, wearing the hair on the lip and chin looks singular. No reason can be assigned for the custom, as partially adopted, unless some civilians wish to be thought military; others artists, others Frenchmen, Italians, Turks, or Kaffirs. It is nothing more than hanging out a sign-post, just as a tradesman or publican does. But, as a matter of health and manly adornment, we should not object to every man wearing his beard and moustache.

TALLY-HO.—The Metropolitan Interments Act is not, nor can it be in operation: for the simple reason, that the commissioners appointed to carry out its provisions have no power given them to raise money to provide extra-mural burial-places. They are empowered to purchase land, but not empowered to raise the money to purchase it with. Such bungling is more than disgraceful—it is criminal; and should the cholera visit us again this summer, it is to be hoped the bunglers won't escape so easily as they did in 1849-50. Such mistakes are wifull.

JOHN JONES.—A will may be proved twenty years after the death of the testator. Indeed, there is no precise time within which the Ecclesiastical Courts will cite an executor to prove a will. Our opinion is, that, as far as these lumbering tribunals are concerned, the proving is not compulsory, but for the sake of the revenue arising from the stamp duty on probates and letters of administration. The Act of the 55 Geo. III., c. 184, sec. 37, imposes a penalty of £100 on any person who shall take possession of or administer the personal estate of any deceased person, or any part thereof, without obtaining a probate, or letters of administration, within six months from the date of the deceased's death.

ADRIAN.—Russia is the only country in the European confederacy which promises anything like an example of permanent dullness. There the pulse of thought is as still as the grave. Throughout the rest of Europe, it beats high and hopefully. The intellectual and popular mind is saturated with principles that will have elbow-room. The third act in the drama of revolution cannot be much longer postponed; but when the curtain does rise, depend upon it the struggle will be dreadful. Society has outgrown its veneration for vested interests; and the only thing to be regretted is that, in political convulsions, many good institutions are dragged down with the bad.

W. B.—Among some ancient nations, the face of the dying was concealed, in order that the death agony might not be witnessed; but the practice does not prevail among any of the modern civilised nations. The last looks of those loved or known in health, are too precious to be lost. Besides, there was excessive cruelty in the practice. Would you wound the heart that in a few moments will be cold and pulseless, by shutting out from the eyes the last glimpse of dearly-loved faces—the last look at the blue heaven above—or the still dearer gaze in which smiles and tears mingle in sweet, immortal harmony? No. Remember that your own death-hour is at hand, and think. It is only selfish people that would draw the curtain on such a solemn scene. Besides, if it be true, as contended—and we have no reason to doubt it—that the mind has volition long after the body—that is, every part but the brain—is cold—dead—only imagine the agony—the excruciating, unutterable agony—of that last mental trembling on the brink of eternity! No—no; let the faces of the dying be uncovered. The life God gave should never expire in a corner. Its last flickerings are as hallowed as its noon-day brilliancy.

VICTOR.—When you address letters to a person of rank, give the title in full. The necessity for this rule would be apparent, if, in writing to ladies of high rank, you were to write “Lady,” &c.: as you would be confounding their rank with the inferior one of baronets or knights. The term Esquire is a title of mere courtesy, but custom has awarded it as a right to all persons above the rank of shopkeeper, especially to professional men; and the safest rule is, to be courteous to all men, and remember that it is extremely vulgar to attempt to display your own importance by affecting to underrate the pretensions of others. In the army, captain being the lowest grade which a military man chooses to acknowledge, in writing to subalterns, do not address them as “Ensign,” or “Lieut.,” &c., but simply, “H. W., 52nd Regt.,” &c., as the case may be. The term “Professor” is about as valuable as that of “Esquire” for, of late years, it has been so much abused, that it carries with it no intrinsic respectability. It is safer to address an eminent man as “J. F., Esq.,” &c. Real talent, being simple and true itself, admires simplicity and truth in others.

W. W. E.—1. Cousins, according to the law of England, being strangers in affinity, a legacy from one to the other is chargeable with a duty of ten per cent. 2. Legacies are not payable until the expiration of one year from the testator's death.

JAMES BODKIN (Hinckley), and his five sisters, would only be too happy to hear from, or very grateful to learn something respecting their brother, George Bodkin, who was induced to emigrate to Lake Shore, Canada West, North America, about six years ago.

J. O. T.—In gilding on glass, after the latter has been well cleaned, there is thinly applied a size prepared by dissolving a quantity of amber or copal, in its own weight of boiled linseed oil, adding a sufficient quantity of oil of turpentine.

EMMA MAY.—All wills, to be valid, must be supported by the presumption that, at the time of making, the testator was a free agent. A will that has been made through fear, restraint, or importunity, may be set aside. In a case on record, where it appeared that a man in his last sickness was obliged to make his will to procure quiet from the extreme importunity of his wife, it was held to have been under restraint, and was set aside. But in all such cases it is left to the discretion of the court to determine, upon consideration of the circumstances, whether or not such persons could be supposed to have had a free will to dispose of their estates.

F. W. and F. D.—In these cases—which, for obvious reasons, we will not particularise—the ecclesiastical law would allow a divorce a mensa et thoro: that is, a divorce which amounts to a separation—not one enabling the parties to marry again. A complete divorce—that is, a divorce a vinculo matrimonii—can only be obtained through an Act of Parliament. As the commissioners appointed to inquire into the law on the subject have recommended “that a new tribunal shall be constituted, to try all questions of divorce,” our correspondents may give their injured lady-relatives ample room to hope that, ere long, they may obtain some measure of justice at a cheap rate. People of limited means cannot afford to appeal to the law: and that is the reason, we think, why some husbands are so barbarously tyrannical, and some wives are driven, against nature and conscience, to seek revenge in the only retributive retaliation they can command. But what a revenge! The lash of the domestic Legree had better be borne than it attempted.

P. R. H.—We are not among those who view with alarm the extraordinary increase of the United States of America. On the contrary, we consider it would be more advantageous for the South American States if they were added to the union; but that at present is simply impossible; and even if it were effected, it would be only a temporary arrangement. The vast continent of America would never submit to the political supremacy of a congress and president located at Washington. Local interests, climate, passions, necessities, and inventions, would divide America just as Europe is divided. Indeed, we don't think the American Union, as at present constituted, will hold together another half century. Like all giants with disproportionate bodies, it is already rickety. The north and the south are in a state of antagonism, and the election of General Pierce, as president, may be considered a fortunate event for both.

ISHMAEL.—We could not publish anything that related to the clandestine marriage of the daughter of any house or anybody. The feelings of a nobleman ought to be as sacred from intrusion as those of a person in any other class of life. Remember the superb declamation of Shakespeare—“Hath not a Jew hearts?” &c. The last place to discuss family affairs is in the press, and then it only takes cognisance of transactions that have acquired notoriety—such as that afforded by a court of law. We like the gentleman's little song very much.

THE EVENING STAR.

Star of love, star of hope,
Ever gentle and bright,
I remember thee well,
With thy silvery light;
How my heart thrilled with joy
As I gazed upon thee;
For I knew that my darling
Was waiting for me.

She has left me alone,
And thy beams from above
Now glisten through tears,
Where they sparkled on love.
But my heart can still hope,
As thy brilliance I see;
For I know that my darling
Is waiting for me.

SLAVERY.—We are prepared to denounce slavery, in any form, with all the eloquence, zeal, and consistency of a Christian moralist; but we are, at the same time, also prepared, not only to look at every side of the inquiry, but to refuse our assent to the selection, for reprobation, of a wrong perpetuated in a foreign country, in preference to one out of the number of glaring ones that stare us in the face at home. If the ladies of England desire to undertake the hard work of philanthropists, let them begin their labours among the poor of their own country. Our institutions, as regards the suffering classes, are deplorably imperfect; and, until they are reformed, no portion of the British community, however influential or pious, can with any propriety appeal to another nation on the subject of any social abuses: as a lawyer would say in such a case, they would be put completely out of court. Holding this opinion, we were not at all surprised at the tone of the ladies of America, in replying to the address of the ladies of England on negro slavery. Both were weak, and therefore they could each be bitter and telling in their cross accusations. It was a sentimental tilt from each side of the Atlantic; and, as Englishmen, we grieve to think that our countrywomen had decidedly the worst of the encounter: thus affording another instance of the utter powerlessness of mere sentiment to bring about any permanent good. Freedom is naturally of slow growth, and it has hitherto been more indebted to necessity than anything else for its progressive development. A condition for the legitimate enjoyment of freedom has always been created before the dispensation itself became a fact. Sentiment contributed nothing to the process, and we warn our young readers not to allow their imaginations to be overwhelmed by it. If sentiment could work practical wonders, it ought to have delivered the Holy Sepulchre from the grasp of the infidels; for Peter the Hermit preached a sentiment that thrilled through the heart of Europe; but the Holy Sepulchre is not yet delivered, and never will be, through that agency. It is the same with negro slavery in America. It is bomb-proof against the attacks of all the Mrs. Stowes and Duchesses of Sutherland in the world. Nevertheless it is doomed—for the fair earth will not always endure the burthen of a living curse. But it will only fall just as serfdom fell in England. When America becomes so densely populated that slaves will be rather an incumbrance than otherwise, the negro race will be emancipated—not before. The analogous case of England supports us in this argument. Our boasted freedom was not obtained by the sword, or by Act of Parliament, or by the enchantment of sentiment; but simply came as a matter of course. When labourers multiplied, it was found cheaper to hire labour by contract, than have it always on hand, as a property which had to be fed lodged and clothed.

W. WILSON.—Unquestionably Wellington won the Battle of Waterloo before the Prussians entered the field. The Prussians themselves admit the fact. But on this point you would do well to consult our Tenth Volume, where you will find it unanswerably proved that the Prussian army assisted only in the pursuit, and of course materially contributed to render the victory complete.

THE TWO BROTHERS.—History, as a science, is still a mere infant; but an infant vicious and rickety. It has been criminal, as well as weak, glossing over the truth and exaggerating falsehoods, to the utter destruction of the characters of the periods it has attempted to represent. Probably not many have suffered more at its hands than what are called the “middle ages,” or, according to the prejudices of history—the “dark ages.” They have been not only enveloped in obscurity, but presented to us through the mist of representations swollen and distorted to suit a particular purpose. The ten centuries following the advent of Christ, every historian seems to have exerted himself to view with abhorrence. The most contradictory qualities have been brought together to add to the long catalogue of their faults. They are supposed to have joined all the profligacies of refinement to all the coarser vices of barbarity. All distinction of right and wrong seems to have been rooted out of men's minds. The people of those times, we are told, were wicked for the sake of being wicked. Virtue and knowledge had hidden adieu to the earth. No sacrifices were offered but on the altars of ignorance and vice. The historians would fain make us believe that, in the outset, the peace and harmony inculcated by the Christian religion were unfavourable to the happiness of the human race; that, at the approach of the messengers of Truth, the arts and sciences fled from the dwellings of men; that the mild lessons of the Gospel only the more disposed them to violence, and war, and bloodshed. Indeed, if we place implicit reliance on the assertions of history, we must believe that the heathens greatly surpassed their Christian successors in all the attributes which add to the dignity of man; whilst the early followers of Christ were only distinguished by brutality and ignorance. All this, when fairly examined, will be found to be a tissue of gross perversions and omissions—not to say of numberless inventions of men too prone to dwell with complacency on the fruitless studies of antiquity. Scanning verses and turning periods was not an employment of the middle ages—and hence a great portion of the obloquy heaped upon them by mere lovers of finely-strung words. Authors and poets dealt unmercifully with the ages in which they were not adequately represented.

JENNY is just eighteen, and has not yet met with a suitor. She is what the world calls pretty, having a fair complexion, blue eyes, and dark hair, and being tall and graceful. She dances, plays the piano beautifully, and is very domesticated. On the day she is twenty-one, Jenny will have a very nice little sum of money.

WALTER, a retired officer of the army, aged thirty-one, and generally considered good-looking, having regular features, light-brown, curly hair, high forehead, an open countenance, and a moustache, wishes to form a matrimonial engagement. He is descended from a very old Irish family, and has an income of about £2000 per annum.

ANGLO CELT, a native of the Emerald Isle, feeling tired of a bachelor's life, submits his case to the kind consideration of some of the fair readers of this Journal. He is above six feet high, with dark hair and whiskers, thinks he has a good temper, and could make a rational woman happy. Money not so much an object as a happy first-aid. He is a member of the Established Church, and aged twenty-seven.

MRS. G., having contracted a second marriage, is anxious to see her two daughters comfortably settled in life. She flatters her self one of them may suit “A. B. C.,” or any young gentleman accustomed to good society. They have both received a highly-finished education, and have moved in the first circles. “Annie” is twenty-one, tall, very fair, with blue eyes and good teeth. “Julia” is nineteen, rather above the middle height, with hazel eyes, dark-brown hair, and good teeth. They are considered very good-looking. She will not name what fortune they will have, but content herself with saying that they are amply provided for.

LETTERS RECEIVED.—A Schoolboy and Others (You have guessed rightly—the answer to Catherine Sinclair's Rhus, in No. 423, is “New Brighton”)—L. E. L. (Under no circumstances whatever do we forward letters from one correspondent to another. All such letters are destroyed. When we have obliged our young friends by making their communications public, we refer them for any consequent results to the sentimental column of the daily Times)—J. Underwood (a shilling of George II.'s reign is of no value whatever, except as old silver)—J. S. K. (Purchase Mrs. Skill's little treatise on “Modelling in Wax”). Fifty (Gentlemen or ladies who indulge in facetiae are rarely correct in their quotations)—Anna (We never answer questions about contemporary periodicals. It would be a breach of etiquette, and without the lex non scripta of honour, the press would not be what it is, the most sensitively honourable institution in the realm—ay, in the world)—Henry M. (The proper—indeed the only safe method of getting rid of superfluous hairs, is to have patience, and pluck them out with tweezers)—G. H. E. (We thank you, but really the “Uncle Tom” stanzas have been pouring in too fast. We cannot afford even to read them)—R. R. (The work never appeared in this Journal—and what is more, never will)—David G. (Search the newspapers of that State)—Thomas W. Arthur (Order from the agent in Carlisle)—Une Panvre Veuve (Our arrangements in that department are completed)—Holland (We do not know the gentleman. The handwriting is so obscure that we cannot read your poetry. As far as we can read, the “Sword Song,” with some correction, would be very good)—Fitz-Horace (“Remorse” is well written, but the theme is hackneyed). Udolphus (Consult a medical gentleman)—Dyce (The “Will and the Way,” commenced in number 398 of this Journal) Hopeless (We do not see any moral in your verses)—Dunce (“The council,” is singular when referred to as a body, but plural when the members are designated)—A. W. H. (Learn nothing by rote—not even the rudiments of a language)—J. Haskins (Imperfect. The sentiment is good)—Hugh Henderson (You are one of those who think only of self. We never made any promise of the kind. Read the notice carefully)—Dilemma (The method you refer to is not correct. More we cannot say, without giving offence to a large class of persons)—W. X. (Advertise the “antique copper-plate” for sale)—William Little (Is worthy of his name. He is very little indeed. He says we have no right to give the opinion that the wife should be younger than the husband. Did he pen his epistle at the dictation of Mrs. Little?—M. S. N.—Blandford—John, of North Shields—E. T. A.—J. H. J.—Annie and Alice—H. W. G.—Chemist—Clamates—George—Amicus P.—Pharmacopœia—J. G. S.—Emiline—Walter St. Clare—Maria—T. F. E.—F. S.—William—S. B. C.—Honey-Bee—Rose—F. Brayshaw—James Huntley—Caractacus—Lyman E.—K. C. L.—George A.—Miss Ann Dobbs—Francis Tennyson—John Firth—J. Wakelin—Thomas Baron—Frank—R. P. A.—Edith—Scribo—Madelina St. George—Emily Watson—J. T. G.—Gog.

London: Printed and Published for the Proprietor by GEORGE VICKERS, at the Office of “THE WEEKLY TIMES,” 334, Strand, in the Parish of St. Clement Danes, in the County of Middlesex.—May 21, 1853.

THE LONDON JOURNAL:

And Weekly Record of Literature, Science, and Art.

No. 431.—Vol. XVII.]

FOR THE WEEK ENDING MAY 28, 1853.

[PRICE ONE PENNY.]

THE AYAH PROTECTING ELLEN FROM THE VIOLENCE OF LADY MOWBRAY.]

THE WILL AND THE WAY.

BY THE AUTHOR OF

THE JESUIT," "THE PRELATE," "MINNIGREY," ETC.

CHAPTER XCI

A den of common villains—men who sell
Their very souls for bread—whose cheeks have lost
The blush of honest shame—crime's agents,
And its victims.

OLD PLAY.

WILKES, of North Briton notoriety, made one observation which, from its profound philosophy as well as humanity, deserves to be remembered, when the party struggles in which he bore so prominent a figure are forgotten—it was:

"That the worst use you can make of a man is to hang him."

Modern legislators seem gradually awakening to a sense of the force of this important truth; prison discipline is reduced to something like system: the chaplain and schoolmaster have been introduced, and it is to be hoped that in time they will supersede the necessity for the turnkey.

Thirty years ago, Newgate presented a far different aspect to the orderly, well-regulated establishment of the present day. The rich felon was permitted to pass the brief space which intervened between committal and trial, in the most degrading debauchery—reason and conscience were alike drowned in the wine-cup. The poor one, on the contrary, found in prison, as in the world, that poverty was considered as his greatest crime.

The gaolers, who made considerable additions to their incomes by selling or conniving at the introduction of beer, spirits, and tobacco for their prisoners, fawned upon those who had money, till their last guinea was spent. Blows, oaths, and harsh treatment were reserved for those who lacked the means of gratifying their avarice: they were considered as vulgar, petty-larceny rogues—fellows without spirit, or prudence to provide against a rainy day.

The felons' day-room resembled more the parlour or tap of some notorious tavern, than a place of confinement for criminals. Singing, gambling, and drinking were the order of the place. The chair and vice-chair were generally taken by some expert burglar or highwayman, whose reputation—for even crime has its aristocracy—entitled them to such an honour. The turnkeys, when off duty, shared their orgies; and blasphemy and revelry were often heard, where penitence alone should breathe the prayer which, from the stricken, contrite heart, is never breathed in vain.

Till the visit of Meeran Hafaz to the prison, Will Sideler had remained a voluntary inmate of his cell. The enormity of the crime of which he was accused, made him an object of interest with his fellow-prisoners, and a fit subject of speculation to the rapacious turnkeys. Although several times invited by the president of the society to join them in the day-room, he had sullenly declined. The shadow of the repenting angel's wing was over him. The presence of his tempter, and the promise he held out to him, had scared it—he began to tire of the companionship of his thoughts: to get rid of them, he descended to the felons' yard.

Amongst the inmates of the place was a thin, wiry, iron-featured, bilious-looking old man, who was generally known by the name of Mike. It was never properly understood whether he was a prisoner awaiting trial, or one serving out his time. The turnkeys evidently attached but little importance to his safe custody—for they permitted him to pass from the common yard to the porter's lodge without a word; he came and went as he pleased: some supposed him a spy, others a superannuated officer of the prison.

Everybody seemed to know him; even the governor, as he made his daily round, would occasionally nod to him—which was considered an act of condescension from so important a personage, who seldom deigned to notice his subordinates.

Mike was no less singular in tastes and manner than person—generally speaking, he shunned rather than sought society: in the day-room he appeared more as an observer than a guest; and if ever he did unbend, it was in favour of some notorious criminal, whom justice had already marked for a last terrible example.

Another peculiarity was, that every Tuesday—which, in the days of George III., was the regular hanging-day—the old man seldom made his appearance in the yard or day-room until late, and then he seemed more taciturn than usual. The governor, on such melancholy occasions, it was understood, permitted him, as an especial favour, to be present in the press-room.

In fact, he was one of those beings in whom humanity had very little sympathy or part—like Cain, it seemed to have rejected him; he lived and moved amongst his fellow-men alone.

Mike was walking close to the wall, on the sunny side of the prison-yard, when Sideler descended; a short pipe, from which at irregular intervals he puffed the sedative weed, was firmly stuck between his discoloured, mummy-like lips.

The dress of this peripatetic philosopher—for Mike was a philosopher in his way—consisted of a rusty suit of black, not one article of which, apparently, had been made for him. The cuffs of the tight-fitting sleeve of the narrow, swallow-tailed coat scarcely reached the wrist: this gave an additional length to his thin, long, bony hand, whose fingers reminded one of the claws of a vulture—there was a sort of natural crook in them. The waistcoat had evidently been taken in under the delusion that it could be made to fit him; and his breeches, which buckled considerably below the knees, over a pair of coarse, speckled worsted stockings, were, as Shakespeare expresses it, "a world too wide for his shrunk-shanks."

A broad-brimmed hat, with a band of faded crape round it, drawn closely over his bushy brows, completed the old man's costume.

Many had been the speculations amongst the prisoners, when they noted the crumpled bit of crape around the hat of Mike, who such a being could possibly mourn for.

As these two men passed each other in their walk, the warren observed that the smoker eyed him with peculiar interest. His manner at last became so marked, that the ruffian began to feel offended.

"What does the fool take me for?" he murmured to himself. "No matter, I'll soon put an end to his staring!"

With this intention, the speaker, the next time they met, suddenly stopped, and, fixing his eyes upon Mike, scowled menacingly upon him: an action which seemed rather to amuse than irritate the old man, who noticed it merely by a cold, cynical smile, and a scarcely perceptible drawing-down of the corners of his thin lips, which gave them a mocking expression.

Sideler shuddered: he thought he had never seen so terrible, so menacing a smile before, and his insolent gaze sank beneath the serpent-like eyes fixed upon him.

The very silence of the encounter made it the more oppressive—and he determined to break it.

"Do you know me?" he said.

"Not yet!" answered Mike, his countenance instantly losing its peculiar expression; "but no doubt we shall become more intimately acquainted!"

"I think not!" observed the ruffian, with affected carelessness; "my stay in Newgate will be very short!"

"True, true!" quietly assented the old man; "the session is near at hand!"

"Then I shall be the sooner at liberty!" exclaimed Will.

His new acquaintance looked incredulous.

"I tell you," continued the speaker, "that I am here through a mistake! A rascally old lawyer, who got more frightened than hurt, imagines that I am the man who attacked and robbed him! It's my belief," he added, "that the old fool was never robbed at all, and that he has only trumped up this charge to spite me! Fortunately I can prove an alibi!"

"It's bad dealing with lawyers!" said Mike, after a few moments' reflection. "I scarcely ever knew a gentleman escape, when once they fairly got him into their clutches; and Lawyer Elworthy is uncommonly shrewd!"

"Elworthy!" repeated the villain, with astonishment.

"Ay! the man you robbed, and all but murdered—at least as he asserts!"

"And how the deuce did you know his name?" demanded the ruffian, unable to conceal his surprise.

"Read it in the charge-book, in the lodge," was the reply.

"Then you are not a prisoner?" observed Sidelers.

"But I am, though!" answered his acquaintance; "only, as my time is nearly up, they pay no attention to me, but let me run about the place as I like: they know I have no temptation to quit it!"

His hearer looked very much as if he had, and a very strong temptation. Newgate was not at all to his liking: not that he thought the place so bad in itself; it was the mode of exit which troubled him.

"Can't you return home?" he said.

"Home!" ejaculated the man in rusty black; "it is many a long year since I knew the meaning of the word! Home implies friends, relations, children, wife. Now I have not a living being belonging to me. I have lived so long in prison, that I should like to die here—be buried here! I should never feel at my ease anywhere else!"

These singular feelings and opinions puzzled the warrener: he could not comprehend them, and naturally felt curious to ascertain the nature of the crime which had made the speaker for so many years the inmate of a prison.

"Oh, nothing—a mere trifle, scarcely worth speaking of!" answered the old man; "the fact is, it occurred so long ago, I scarcely remember it. Hark!" he added, as a loud burst of merriment broke from the prisoners in the day-room; "the captain is at his old jokes again!"

"And who is the captain?"

"One of the most successful and daring forgers of the day. He has passed as many bank flimseys as would have made the fortune of any moderate man; but, as the saying is, 'light come light go.' A girl whom he promised to marry has sold him. He is sure to swing at the next session."

Sidelers shuddered, but could not avoid expressing a desire to see the man who, with such a doom impending over him, could still find mirth and jest to set the table in a roar. Upon expressing this desire to his companion, Mike offered to accompany him to the day-room, adding, by way of recommendation, that it would prevent the time from hanging heavily upon his hands.

The offer was accepted. The prisoner had got over the first sensation of repugnance which he felt towards his new companion; in fact, he almost began to like him.

The day-room was a long, narrow apartment upon the ground floor of the prison, which received light from four narrow, grated windows in a line with the door. The walls, which had originally been whitewashed, were discoloured by smoke, and names celebrated in the annals of Newgate were written with the smoke of a candle upon the ceiling, or scrawled with charcoal.

At a long oaken table in the centre of the den, between twenty and thirty men were seated, of various ages and physiognomies—from the abashed stripling, who had made his first step in crime, to the hoary-headed ruffian whom habit had made familiar with it. Two of the turnkeys, who were off duty, were present.

At the upper end of the table was a tall, gentlemanly-looking man, about forty-five. His countenance was flushed with the wine he had been drinking—probably to drown reflection; for occasionally recollection would bring to mind the dark and hideous future—the impending trial—the condemned cell, and the execution. At such moments the expression of his eye became wild and fearful, and he had recourse to the intoxicating draught which drowns memory in insanity.

The arrival of the new-comers was received with a shout of welcome.

Sidelers and his companion would have quietly seated themselves at the lower end of the table, but the president prevented them.

"This way, gentleman!" he exclaimed, accompanying his words with a graceful flourish of the hand. "No false modesty, if you please! Pickpockets and petty-larceny rogues—fellows in status pupulari—below the salt; masters of arts above it!"

The point of this allusion was lost upon the wretches present, but it proved that the speaker had at least been trained with the prospect of better things than ending his career upon the scaffold.

The coarse songs, wit, and humour of the scene exactly suited the disposition of the warrener, who began to feel a degree of pride in the distinction which the enormity of his crime procured him. His eye glanced freely round the board, and he began to return the nods and winks the felons with an air as reckless and a spirit as light as their own.

"Who is the captain?" he demanded, in a whisper, of his companion, who seemed perfectly at home in the place.

"His name is Forbes," replied the old man. "He was educated for the church, but took to the road; then became a forger. His career is nearly run."

"He will die game!" observed the warrener, with a look of admiration.

"Humph!" ejaculated Mike, doubtfully; "can't say: I generally find the quiet, sullen ones die best!"

"You find them!" repeated Sidelers, eyeing him as if an unpleasant suspicion had crossed his mind.

"Yes," observed his companion. "I get into the press-room at every execution; it's the only amusement I find in the place!"

At the word "amusement," an involuntary shudder ran through the veins of Will Sidelers, and the feeling of repugnance which he experienced when he first encountered his strange companion, returned.

This private conversation was interrupted by the president calling upon Mike for a song.

"You know I seldom sing," observed the old man, meekly: a declaration which was received with vociferous laughter, and loud calls for "The Ravens."

"The Ravens!" repeated Sidelers; "I never heard it: what sort of a song do you call that?"

"The song of the gallows-tree," replied his companion, giving two or three preparatory "hems," by way of clearing his throat. "I suppose I must comply: I shouldn't like to disoblige either the captain or you!"

There was a leering expression, half mocking, half-cynical, on the countenance of the speaker, which set the warrener thinking: his suspicions, if he entertained any, were dissipated by the song of the speaker.

A raven was perched on the gallows-tree,
The wild storm howled o'er the blasted heath,
As the fiends were keeping their revelry—
A partridge swung in chains beneath.

The raven's beak and claws they were red
With the dotted gore of the sinful dead
"Ho! ho!" said the bird, and the deep words broke
With a chuckling sound 'twixt a laugh and a croak;
"They cry we shall soon lack our dainty cheer—
'That food will grow scant and scantier here!"

I am old, I am wise—and heed not what they say—
That the raven and gibbet will e'er want their prey!"

Two ravens were perched on the gallows-tree:
"Say, son," said the first, "where thy course hath been?
What tidings of mankind bringest thou me?
And what hast thou heard, and what hast thou seen?"

"Of religion I heard the parson preach,
Of justice and law the schoolmaster teach.
I laughed, for I saw that their task would be vain,
Whilst they hated each other like Abel and Cain."
"Fear not," said the old bird, clearing his throat,
With a chuckling sound 'twixt a laugh and a croak,
"While they each, like two fools, pull a different way,
That the raven or gibbet will e'er lack their prey!"

Three ravens were perched on the gallows-tree:
"Say, son," said the first, "where thy course hath been?
What tidings of mankind bringest thou me?
And what hast thou heard, and what hast thou seen?"

"I've seen," groaned the bird, "their task in the land,
The priest and schoolmaster pursue hand-in-hand:
Since they ceased acting by contrary rules,
Prisons are turning, I fear, into schools."
"Ho! ho!" cried the raven; but this time there broke
No chuckling sound, but a mournful croak;
"I am off—I am off—for heed well what I say—
That the raven and gibbet will soon lack their prey!"

A round of vociferous applause followed the conclusion of the song. The singer received it with that modest confidence which intimated that he felt it to be his due; and Will Sidelers, in his turn, was called upon—as the vice-chairman, a prig of low degree, observed—to promote the army of the evening.

"It must be when he comes back, then!" said a stout, burly-looking personage, who made his appearance in the day-room; "his father wants to see him!"

The information was received with a shout of laughter.

"His venerable father!" repeated a pickpocket at the lower end of the table; "I thought he was a horfian!"—an observation which provoked a broad grin from those who, like the speaker, sat below the salt; those above it condescendingly noticed it by a patronising smile.

"Tibbs," said the chairman, who was a great stickler for etiquette—"it strikes me that you are inclined to grow familiar!"

The warrener knew too well the importance of the interview, to delay for an instant following the messenger. Instead of the shame and humiliation with which a son, under such circumstances, would be supposed to meet his parent, a smile of triumph lit the flushed countenance of the speaker, and he left the room with a firm, confident look.

Mike, who had been closely observing him, muttered to himself as his new acquaintance left the room, that the visitor was not the prisoner's father.

When the warrener followed the turnkey to his cell, he found an old man of most venerable appearance, whose dust-covered shoes and travel-stained garments denoted that he had arrived from a long and weary journey. The face of the impostor—for such he was—was deeply furrowed with wrinkles; silver locks were thinly scattered over his sunburnt brow. Any one, to have gazed upon him, would have taken him for some simple rustic, whose life had been passed in the fields, in honest labour—far from the world, its strife and passions.

Thirty years at least had elapsed since the sanctified old rascal had seen a green field, or quitted the purlieus of London.

The heart-broken parent, so cleverly got up for the occasion, was no other than William Davids, the general agent.

"My son—my son!" exclaimed the old wretch, with a well acted burst of grief, at the same time throwing himself upon the neck of the warrener; "you will bring my white hairs with shame and sorrow to the grave! Alack—alack!" he added, looking round the cell with disgust; "to think that after so many years of separation, we should meet in such a place!"

"It's no use crying after the funeral is gone!" observed the prisoner, with difficulty repressing a grin.

"You expected me?" whispered Davids, as he pressed the robust form of the warrener still closer to him.

"All right!" replied Sidelers, in the same under-tone.

It was one of the prison regulations, although imperfectly observed, that one of the turnkey's should be present at the interviews between the prisoners and their friends. The man who had conducted the agent to the cell of his pretended son, foreseeing that the interview would most probably be a tedious one, drew a short pipe from his pocket, and began to smoke.

"I must speak with you alone," said the agent, in an under-tone.

"Shall I bribe him?"

"No—no!"

"Send him for liquor?"

"It would not do!" replied his visitor, in a whisper

"I have it! leave him to me!"

"What do you intend to do?"

"Pray!" said the wretch, with a twinkle of his small, grey eye, which denoted how much he enjoyed the joke; "there is not one of them can stand that!"

Sinking upon his knees, the arch-hypocrite began a long supplication to the Divine Being—whose majesty he was impudently mocking—to touch the heart of his son: from the fluency with which he proceeded, it was evident that he had either previously studied his part, or was gifted with no ordinary command of language.

The turnkey, at the commencement of the prayer, slowly sauntered towards the door of the cell, and looked down the long, dark corridor with a listless air. His indifference, as the agent proceeded, gradually changed to impatience, which he expressed by smoking violently, and uneasily shuffling with his feet.

Still the visitor showed no symptoms of concluding.

"Hang the fellow!" muttered the officer; "he is more tedious than Holy Joe!"—the cant name of the chaplain. "It is bad enough to be compelled to listen to his drawling tones on a Sunday! I may as well drop into the day-room, and see what is going on there!"

With this conclusion, the speaker sauntered to the end of the corridor, and crossed the yard.

The instant Will Sidelers heard his receding step, he attempted to start to his feet, but the hand and expressive glance of Davids restrained him: the fellow continued in a yet louder voice, till well assured that the man was out of hearing.

"Don't be impatient," he said, rising from his knees, "or you will spoil all! slow and certain, is my motto! Is this your cell?"

"It is!"

"Is the door at the end of the passage barred at night?"

"And doubly locked," answered the warrener.

The agent reflected for a moment: the difficulty did not appear to have much weight with him, for he alluded to it no more.

"In this packet," he said, thrusting a small parcel into the hands of the prisoner, "you will find instructions how to proceed. There are four spring-saws: I suppose you know how to use them?"

The warrener smiled, as he concealed the packet in his bosom, at the simplicity of such a question.

"I should think I did!"

"I shall come and see you every day," added the old man, "and give you further instructions. One word of advice—trust no one: as long as you remain the master of your secret, it is your servant; once reveal it, and you become its slave."

In the hurried conversation which followed, the agent detailed his plan for the escape of the prisoner, which, as it must necessarily be developed in the action of our tale, it is scarcely necessarily to relate here: enough to say that it was bold and feasible.

"You understand?" he said.

"Perfectly!"

"And think your courage will not fail?"

"Not if the gallows were erected," replied the ruffian, with insolent bravado, "and the rope about my neck!"

Mr. Davids gazed upon the speaker with a look of admiration: like most men who, from want of physical courage, rely upon stratagem for the accomplishment of their designs, he had a profound veneration for brute force.

"You must have many friends?" he observed.

The warrener nodded, as much as to say that he was already aware of that important fact.

"And rich ones—eh?"

"Pretty well for that: some of them," added the ruffian, with a cynical expression, which elevated him yet higher in the opinion of his visitor, "are so fond of me, that they would not let me even swing alone!"

The low chuckle which followed the observation of the speaker, assured him that it was properly appreciated.

When the turnkey, who had been absent nearly an hour, returned, he found the pretended father and son seated together, each clasping the other's hand. They had heard his heavy step in the stone-paved corridor, and purposely arranged the tableau.

Both had an eye to the picturesque.

"Time to leave!" said the officer.

The old man was apparently overwhelmed with grief, and, after piously exhorting the prisoner to repentance and reflection upon his awful state, prepared to follow his conductor to the outer lodge.

"Take my arm!" said the turnkey, who began to grow impatient, and was fearful, perhaps, of another homily.

The proffered kindness was humbly and thankfully received, and rewarded by the agent, as he left the gate, by slipping a half-guinea into the hand of the gaoler.

"Humph!" said the man, as he turned the keys; "he is not such a bad un after all—only too much giving to preaching!"

It would have been as good as fifty pounds to him, if he had overheard the sermon which the old countryman preached.

That same evening, when Meeran Hafaz sought Mr. Davids, at his office in Clement's Inn, he found the old man, as on the first visit, seated at a table, reading his memoranda, but this time he was alone.

"Now," said the young man, impatiently, "have you succeeded in seeing the prisoner?"

The agent nodded, to intimate that he had. He was a man of few words upon occasions.

"And the result?"

"Promises fairly," said the subtle, experienced rogue; "the fellow, I find, neither lacks nerve nor presence of mind. I answer for his escape!"

The tone of perfect confidence in which this was uttered reassured his visitor.

"Within the time you promised?" he demanded.

"Within the time."

Satisfied with this assurance, the Indian next proceeded to inquire whether the agent, according to his orders, had succeeded in procuring for him the will of the late Sir William Mowbray. The respectable Mr. Davids, who had had it in his possession all the time, drew it from a drawer in the table, and placed it in his hands. Meeran read it hastily over: when he came to the part in which the deceased baronet gave his formal consent to the marriage of Ellen and Henry Ashton, and left her to the guardianship of the worthy rector of Carrow, a bitter smile curled his scornful lips. He was about to tear it into a thousand fragments, when the hand of the agent restrained him.

"Not till it is paid for!" quietly observed the man.

"Do you doubt me?" laughingly demanded Meeran.

"No—no; but it is not business!" was the reply.

The young man cast upon the table the stipulated price, which the wretch eagerly seized, and began to count. Before he had finished, the parchment was thrust into the fire, where it crisped and curled, and finally was reduced to ashes.

"Are you satisfied?" he said, as the last guinea chinked as it fell from the hands of the agent.

"Perfectly!" he answered with a sigh; for he could not avoid mentally calculating the riches of the man who so readily parted with such vast sums. Perhaps, also, he speculated upon his past and present designs.

After giving the man a further instalment of five hundred pounds, to enable him, as he stated, to carry out his schemes for the liberation of Will Sidelar, Meeran took his leave. He longed to be free—to quit London, which began to be irksome to him, and hasten down to Carrow; but prudence whispered him that it was better to remain till the fate of the warren was decided.

Strange that the destiny of two such beings should have been linked in the same chain; but the headstrong indulgence of the passions makes us acquainted with odd confidants.

"For the expenses of releasing the prisoner!" slowly repeated the old man, with a chuckle, as he placed the money in an iron chest, carefully concealed behind a panel in the wall of his office; "as if I should be fool enough to bribe, when wit will do as well! I have no confidence in others, but I can trust to myself. Expenses!" he iterated, with yet increased complacency; "let me see: the four spring saws, twenty shillings; turnkey, half-a-guinea—out of a thousand pounds on account! No bad day's work! I must employ some one the last night to assist me. I have not the strength, I fear, to throw the ball of twine over the prison walls: perhaps I could—perhaps I could!"

Not being assured, however, that such was the case, he generously resolved to expend a guinea or two, in order to insure success—it was not much out of five thousand!

Having relieved his mind and conscience by this decision, he resumed the employment which the visit of Meeran Hafaz for a few moments had interrupted.

Let it not be considered that the portrait we have drawn of Mr. Davids is either dark or too highly coloured: there are many such men in London, ever ready for gain to assist in the most nefarious schemes, and accomplish the most unheard-of enterprises. We question if there are not several old residents of Clement's Inn still living who will recognise the original of the sketch, in the miserly old rascal who for so many years had his chambers at No. —, — court.

We are certain that the porter still remembers him.

CHAPTER XCII.

It is my home, but no familiar face
Is here to welcome me: desolation's breath,
Like the hot Simoom, hath passed over it,
Marking its path by death.

HEIR OF THE SEPT.

At the end of the second day's journey, the carriage of Lady Mowbray, with Ellen and the female keepers, drove along the shady avenue of Carrow Park, and stopped in front of the mansion, which presented a lonely, deserted appearance. The shutters were all closed—no outward signs were visible of the place being inhabited.

The orphan sighed deeply, and hid her face in her hands, to conceal the tears which, despite her resolution, would flow, when she remembered the difference between her present and former reception. There was no kind Mrs. Jarmy to receive her—no Sir William to welcome her; a chill fell upon her heart as she entered the great hall. The poor girl felt as if she had crossed the threshold of her tomb.

The ayah, and two men-servants upon whom her ladyship could rely, were the only inmates of the place.

The bronzed cheek of Zara became of a yet deeper hue, as her eyes encountered the reproachful glances of her foster-child. They seemed to ask her if such was the recompense she merited for having preferred the life of her nurse to her own safety. Despite her apathy, the Indian woman was moved.

"She does not know me yet!" she murmured.

Whether this proceeded from any sudden feeling of repentance, or resolution she had formed in favour of the being she had hitherto so cruelly persecuted, time will show.

The prisoner—for such the orphan again was in the hands of her persecutor—was conducted to the chamber, at the end of the picture-gallery, which she had formerly occupied. Well did she remember the first night she took possession of it—the affectionate kindness of her murdered uncle—the grateful attentions of the worthy old housekeeper: and the change to her present desolate state became doubly painful from the contrast.

"This is your chamber!" observed her aunt, in a supercilious tone; "you will not quit it, till you renounce your disgraceful attachment to this Henry, and yield to the wishes of your natural guardian!"

"I shall quit it before the period which you so vainly hope for!" was the calm reply.

"When?" demanded the heartless woman.

"When I am taken forth to be laid in the same vault with him whose arm is now powerless to protect me!" answered Ellen. "If the spirits of the dead are permitted to watch over those they love while living, I feel assured that my uncle is at this moment grieving over my injuries! There is strength and consolation," she added, "in the conviction!"

"Perhaps," said Lady Mowbray, "you may find yourself removed to a worse place, should you continue obstinately blind to your own good!"

Her niece looked as if she felt that no place could be worse than her present prison—no guardian more hateful to her than her unfeeling relative.

"The mad-house!" continued the speaker.

"I am not mad!" exclaimed the orphan, mournfully; "or if I am, the cruelties you and my guardian have inflicted upon me have made me so! Your persecutions may make the grave my only refuge; but even you cannot deprive me of that—it is a sad, but sure one! Aunt," she added, willing to make a last appeal to the womanly nature of her ladyship, "how have I wronged you, that you should bring the light of my young days to darkness so profound, no ray of hope can penetrate it? You have a child—one whom doubtless you love. What would you feel to see her thus oppressed and trampled on—tortured till reason is almost shaken from its throne? Mercy—mercy!"

"You know the price at which my affection will return to you!" said the cold, artful woman.

"And at that price," exclaimed Ellen, proudly, "I would scorn it! Weak and friendless as I am, I would not break the word I had given to the meanness of God's creatures—much less to the noble, generous being whom it is my pride to love! By what right," she continued, warming with indignation, "do you presume, madam, to exercise such an authority over me? You are neither of my blood nor kindred! My very soul revolts at such barefaced oppression!"

"Insolent!" said her ladyship.

"Insolent!" repeated her victim; "impossible! since language has no words sufficiently strong to characterise your baseness!"

"The authority of the Chancellor!"

"He has been imposed upon!"

"The opinion of the physicians!"

"They have been bribed or deceived! the very means you have taken to obtain possession of my person—the precautions to secrete me here—prove that you are aware of the infamy of your purpose; but it will be baffled yet! The hand of heaven will rend the mask of seeming virtue from your treacherous visage, and expose you to the contempt and scorn of the world—a degraded thing, who meanly descended, for a hireling's pay, to pander to the passions of a villain!"

"Ellen!"

"A murderer!" added the almost frantic girl. "Yes, in the sight of heaven, I accuse him of the murder of my uncle; and you, madam, in heart, if not in act, as his accomplice!"

The countenance of Lady Mowbray turned deadly pale, and her features absolutely became distorted with rage, to find herself thus braved by one whom she regarded as a mere child. The evil passions of her vindictive nature were roused—her pride was enlisted in the contest; and she mentally vowed that no human power should prevent the accomplishment of Ellen's union with Meeran Hafaz; so bitterly at that moment did she feel towards the persecuted girl, that she absolutely raised her hand to strike her.

At the sight of the outrage offered to her foster-child, the hitherto impassible Zara interferred: her capricious disposition could lead her to plot against the happiness of her charge herself—even to destroy it—but it revolted against permitting violence from another.

"Back!" she exclaimed, calmly, but resolutely; "the child I nurtured at my bosom is not a slave! Do not fear, Ellen!" she added, in a voice slightly broken by emotion; "I am here to protect you: this degraded woman shall not harm you whilst I have life!"

"Degraded!" repeated her ladyship, with mortification and rage; "such words from the servant of Meeran Hafaz!"

"We are both his servants!" observed the ayah; "since he pays us both! My wages consist of kind words and looks—of the confidence he reposes in me, and the happiness I feel in serving him—me he respects! Your wages are the gold which his prodigal hand has heaped upon you—the gems which glitter on your withered neck! Trust me, our master knows the value of such service—he recompenses, it and despises you!"

"Turn that woman from the house!" exclaimed Lady Mowbray, transported beyond all self-command by the bitter taunts of the speaker.

The two female keepers advanced to execute the order they had received; but, although accustomed to have violent contests with their patients, and strong of limb and courage, they were like infants in the grasp of the resolute Zara, who dashed them from her as coolly and unconcerned as a tigress might be supposed at freeing herself from the attack of a couple of wolves.

"She is no woman!" observed one.

"Her grip is of iron!" added the other keeper, rubbing her shoulder, where the ayah had placed her hand.

"No matter!" said their employer; "call up the footmen! Either this insolent creature quits the abbey, or I do!"

"You may do as you please!" answered Zara, with a glance of contempt; "I shall remain! Like most weak minds, anger hath made you mad! Suppose for an instant that you could succeed in removing me from my foster-child—I should but have to go to the village, and declare that the wife of Colonel Mowbray held the niece of their late master a prisoner in the abbey—that she had sold her like a bale of merchandise to Meeran Hafaz: more than a hundred arms would be enlisted in her cause; they would drive you like a leper from the place, and rescue her! But why do I waste words?" she added, with the consciousness of one perfectly aware that her power was unassailable. "Till the future husband of Miss De Vere arrives, I am her guardian! Neither you nor the female furies in your service, shall exercise the least control over her!"

With looks of disappointment and anger, Lady Mowbray and the keepers left the room. No sooner were they gone, than Ellen approached the ayah.

"I cannot thank you," she said; "and yet I feel grateful for the protection you have afforded me! Oh, Zara! why not continue to pursue the path of penitence and virtue? Save me from Meeran and his destroying love! Save me, and the past shall be remembered only as a hideous dream! Save me, and I will bless you!"

The Indian woman seated herself, without a word, upon the pile of cushions which we have previously described as part of the furniture of the chamber.

"Will not pity—will not love for the child you nurtured," continued the fair suppliant, "move you? Will not her returning affection compensate you for the frown of Meeran—to say nothing of the approval of your own heart?"

"Leave me!" murmured Zara, hoarsely. "The Indian woman has given her word. She would die rather than break it!"

With a sigh of disappointment, and a look of pity and regret such as an angel might have cast upon the nature it had failed to move, Ellen retired to the window, apparently to gaze upon the park, but in reality to hide her tears.

"God help me!" she mentally ejaculated; "my last hope is gone!"

The prisoner and her gaoler spoke no more that night. The stone was loosened—not removed.

At an early hour the following morning, the domestics assembled with terrified looks in the servants' hall. Each had a tale to tell of the extraordinary manner in which they had been disturbed during the night.

It seems that, alarmed by the heavy tread of a footstep in the long, gloomy corridor into which their chambers opened, they had ventured to peep out, and beheld a wild, fantastic-looking person, whose head was crowned with a wreath of leaves and flowers, pacing up and down the passage.

The footman—the same who had been so insolent to Joe Beans—declared that the ghost—for such he persisted in calling it—kept muttering something about blood: he distinctly heard the word.

The account of the two keepers was even more shocking: the mysterious visitant had obtained access to their bed-room—although they had, as they declared, doubly locked the door—and made repeated signs to induce them to follow him; they even hinted at their intention of quitting the place—it was too much for their nerves.

Nerves! and yet, in the exercise of their heartless vocation, they had assisted and been instruments in scenes which might have made strong men weep.

"For my part, Tummas," observed the aristocratic footman, "although I have a very great respect for my lady—who knows how to preciate a confidential servant—I shall start!"

His companion remained silent: perhaps he thought more of the promised reward.

At this moment the bell of Lady Mowbray's chamber rang violently. Her ladyship slept in the one lately occupied by the murdered baronet. There was a hesitation as to who should answer it.

"It is not my place," observed Thomas.

"Nor mine!" exclaimed his companion, conceitedly; "My lady should have brought her own woman with her! I am a young man, and the colonel is remarkably jealous it would not be prudent! These ladies," he added, "had better go!"

"The signal was repeated yet more vehemently than before.

"Lord bless us!" said one of the female keepers; "perhaps the black lady is a strangling on her!"

"She is vicious enough!" chimed in the other. This suggestion, which was considered as more than probable, decided them.

All four of the speakers rushed in a body to the door of her ladyship's apartment—not one would go alone. Just as they reached the corridor, the bell rang again.

Barbara Botch, the elder of the two females, with a courage borrowed, most probably, from her morning draught, tapped at the door.

"Come in!" exclaimed a voice.

"I can't, my lady," replied the woman, shaking the lock; "the night-bolt is down!"

A noise was heard like the drawing of the bolt, and the two keepers entered the room. They found Lady Mowbray in a state of great excitement, sitting up in her bed, her features ghastly pale, and her eyes glancing wildly round the room.

"Search the room!" said their employer, faintly; "there is some one concealed in it!"

The women did as they were directed—not a closet was left unexplored: no one was to be seen. They looked at each other in silence. The windows were fastened, and to all appearance there was no other entrance than the one by which they came in.

"There is no one here," observed Barbara Botch.

"Has your ladyship seen him?"

"Seen who?"

"An old man, who looks as if he had just risen from the grave—his features are so pale and death-like—with flowers and leaves about his head. He has nearly frightened the servants out of their wits! I am sure the house is haunted!"

"Haunted!" repeated the lady; "ridiculous! Some such person as you have described certainly did gain admittance to my room, and stood moaning at the foot of my bed—even had the insolence to touch the clothes, as if to awaken me, and motion me to follow him; but I am certain the fellow was human!"

The two keepers shook their heads incredulously.

"How could he get in, my lady?" demanded Barbara.

"Or out?" added her companion. "The night-bolt was down when we knocked, and the windows are fastened still!"

This was exactly what Lady Mowbray wished to know, and was determined, if possible, to discover. Hastily throwing on a loose wrapper, she sprang from the bed, and searched every part of the room. Not content with examining the closets, she sounded the walls, by tapping against them. To all appearance they were solid.

"This is inexplicable!" she murmured, with an air of vexation.

The women looked as if they considered it awful.

"I shall change my room!" added her ladyship, after a few moments' reflection.

Her hearers thought that it would be of little use; they related, in turn, how they had been terrified during the night by a similar apparition, and concluded by expressing a desire to leave the abbey.

It required all the reasoning of their employer, backed by promises of increased recompense, to induce them to remain.

Under pretence of assisting her to dress, Lady Mowbray—upon whom the adventure had made a deeper impression than she chose to admit—kept them in the room till she was ready to descend. Secretly she prayed for the arrival of her husband and Meeran Hafaz—for another such a night, she felt assured, would leave her alone in the mansion with the ayah—whom she already doubted—and Ellen.

By her directions, the doors were kept carefully locked. Not a window was permitted to be opened—that if any of the inhabitants of the village chanced to pass through the park, they might not perceive the house was inhabited. The precaution was an unnecessary one—for, since the murder of the lamented Sir William, few cared to approach the place.

Ellen, who had been prevented from sleeping by the sad complexion of her thoughts, had been equally favoured by a visitation. The same figure had appeared at the foot of her bed, moaned, and invited her to follow him. At first she deemed that her imagination was playing her one of those fantastic tricks with which it sometimes bewilders waking reason: it was not till the phantom, or whatever it was, had disappeared, that she fancied she could trace in it a resemblance to old Martin. Bitterly did she then reproach herself that she had not obeyed its mute invitation—it might have led her to liberty.

To her astonishment, the ayah—whose sleep was generally so light that a breath would break it—had not once stirred: a spell seemed to be upon her.

By the light of the moon, which partially illumined the old panelled chamber, the orphan noticed something glittering upon the ground, at the foot of the pile of cushions upon which her faithless nurse was reposing. She recognised the long, keen knife which Zara, like most of her countrywomen, invariably wore: to steal from her bed and secure it, was the thought and act of an instant.

No sooner was the orphan in possession of the weapon, than a fearful calm—a repose like that of death—fell upon her spirits. She felt that she was mistress of herself and destiny. It seemed as if it were no longer in the power of her enemies to make her false to her plighted faith; even the idea of Meeran Hafaz became less terrible.

Carefully unfolding the instrument in her handkerchief, she placed it next her heart—resolved that it should become its sheath, rather than another head than Henry Ashton's should e'er be pillowed near it.

A sad change had come over the inhabitants of the Home Farm. Matthew Ashton still drove his team and sowed his fields. The world went prosperously with him, but his heart was heavy—he missed our absent hero. It seemed as if he had no longer an object to toil for. As for his dame, she was even more changed than her husband. Her temper had become sour, fretful, and peevish. Her dairy, once a model for the wives of the neighbouring farmers, was neglected; her butter no longer quoted as the best in the market.

"What's the use of working," she used to observe, "when we are so near the grave? Harry's footsteps," she added, "will never follow us to it!"

This speech was generally addressed to her husband, on which occasion the old man would only smoke the faster.

On the morning after the scene of confusion we have described had taken place at Carrow Abbey, the aged couple were seated in the little parlour, at breakfast, when one of the servants entered, to inform his master that the sexton of the parish wished to see him.

"The sexton!" exclaimed the dame, sharply; "and what can he want with farmer? There be no one dead here! send him away!"

Her husband thought differently, and directed the eccentric old fellow to be admitted. His curiosity was roused: there was something strange in Chettleborough calling upon any one. In fact, it was a rare thing to encounter him out of the precincts of the churchyard; he did not seem at home anywhere else. He was much better acquainted with the gravestones than his living neighbours, and probably liked them better.

As the tall, gaunt figure of the earth-digger stalked into the room, Mrs. Ashton thought she had never seen a more ill-favoured visitor.

"I have come to you, farmer," he said, "because I don't feel quite easy in my mind!"

"Haden't you better go to the doctor?" replied the dame.

"That is not what he means," observed her husband, who understood the speaker's manner better than his wife. "Something has occurred to unsettle him."

"He looks as ugly," thought the old woman, "as if he had seen a ghost: not but what he ought to be used to them by this time!"

Our readers will recollect that he lived in a corner of the churchyard.

"What has occurred, Master Sexton?" demanded the farmer; "something respecting poor old Martin?"

His visitor nodded in the affirmative.

"Speak out, man!"

"Can't!"

"Why?"

Chettleborough most ungallantly pointed to the lady.

"Never speak before women!" he said.

"Our female readers, we feel certain, will admit that this was more than sufficient to try the patience and temper of the most amiable of their sex: not that Mrs. Ashton was precisely the woman most entitled to that appellation—for she muttered something in which the word "bear" was distinctly audible.

The farmer took his hat, and invited his visitor to follow him to the little garden in front of the house. As soon as they were standing under the mulberry-tree, beneath which was a well-filled row of bee-hives, Chettleborough stopped.

"Sir William be dead," he said; "Parson is away—Master Harry and Joe Beans gone, the Lord knows where: so I come to you, as the next sensible person in the parish, to tell you that there be strangers in the abbey!"

"Pooh, pooh!" exclaimed Matthew Ashton.

"Old Martin has seen them!"

"How should he get in?"

"He knows more ways than any living thing to enter the house," replied the sexton. "I have several times missed him, but I made my mind easy, for I knew where he was. He returned this morning, after a longer absence than usual, and has been raving ever since about Miss Ellen and a black woman: rely upon it, farmer, I am right—there be some unlawful doings at the hall!"

"It shall be seen to," said the uncle of our hero, after a moment's reflection. "If Miss Ellen be at the hall, villany is at work—it shall be seen to!"

(To be continued in our next.)

DISTINGUISHED SHOEMAKERS.—Linnaeus, the founder of the science of botany, was apprenticed to a shoemaker in Sweden; but afterwards taken notice of, in consequence of his ability, was sent to college. David Pareus the elder, who was afterwards a celebrated professor of theology at Heidelberg, was at one time apprenticed to a shoemaker. J. Prendell, who died some time since, at Gray's Buildings, London, and who was a profound and scientific scholar, pursued through life the trade of a shoemaker. Hans Sachs, one of the German poets, was the son of a tailor, and afterwards served an apprenticeship to a shoemaker. Benedict Baddonin, one of the most learned men of the sixteenth century, was a shoemaker, as was likewise his father. He wrote a treatise on the shoemaking of the ancients, which he traced up to the time of Adam himself. To these may be added Holcroft, and Gifford, for so many years the editor of the Quarterly Review; and Bloomfield, the author of the "Farmer's Boy" and other poems—all of whom were shoemakers. John Brand, the secretary of the Antiquarian Society of London, and author of several learned works, was originally a shoemaker, but fortunately found means to complete his studies at Oxford University.

THE ENEMIES OF THE OYSTER.

The enemies of the oyster are many, and all of them go about seeking what oyster they may devour.

First comes the sea-crab, who seats himself on an oyster and drills a little hole in his back, and makes the poor oyster's back ache, which causes him to open his mouth to take a long breath, when the villainous crab runs a "stinger" down his throat, and the poor oyster is in the sea-crab's stomach. On the sea-shore bushels of shells are found perfectly riddled with holes by the crab. Sometimes the crab files the oyster's nose off, so as to run in his stinger.

Second comes the drum-fish, who weighs about thirty or forty pounds, and is about two feet long; he is large about the stomach, and tapers off toward both ends. He is by no means a modest fish, for, just as soon as his eye rests upon an oyster, he starts towards him, for the purpose of making his acquaintance, and, grabbing him in his mouth, smashes him into chowder, "in the twinkling of a cat's tail," and immediately looks about for his nearest relative: being opposed to have families separated, he is anxious to have them all rest in his stomach at once. It is often the case that two or three pounds of oyster-shells are found in a drum-fish's stomach.

Third, comes the sea-star—everybody knows what a sea-star is, for they look just like a star. These stars have five points, but no legs; and as they do not keep horses and waggon, they find it very inconvenient to go a-foot—not having any feet—so when they wish to travel, they lock themselves fast to each other until they form a large hill, sometimes ten feet in circumference, and permit themselves to be driven about by the waves of the sea, and roll away, they know not, nor care not, whither; but if they happen to roll over an oyster-bed, they all immediately let loose of each other, and hug an oyster, and wrap their five points about him, and hug him closely, hug him dearly, until the oyster desires him to stop, and just opens his mouth to say, "Hold, enough!" when the rascally star runs a little "nipper" down the oyster's nose, and he is a "gonner."

Fourth, comes man, with dredging-irons, with scoop, shovels, and tongs, pulling him, and making him into an oyster-soup, pie, fry, roast, and so on, and so forth, eating him whole, and indiscriminately body and soul, without saving the pieces. Thus it is with poor oyster; troubles upset him on every side, and though thousands desire to have him, yet none wish to be him.—The Naturalist.

THE PURSUIT OF HAPPINESS.

BY PATRICK SCOTT.

The many forms of life he tried

That minister to man's delight,

In soft desire, or sterner pride,

By day or night.

He taught the festal hours to swim

Upon the tide of song and cup,

As pleasure to the goblet's brim

Came floating up.

Each manlier sport he knew, when need

Of nerve was there, or skillful grace;

And fearless upon flying steed

Provoked the chase.

With Science' lore his mind was filled;

He learnt the tongues of other climes;

Or in the poetic fit distill'd

His brain in rhymes.

Fair woman fix'd his fond desire,

Until his foolish heart became,

As brought too close unto the fire,

Burnt by the flame.

But still he found that human bliss,

Though bright when caught, had ready wing,

And felt in Fortune's sweetest kiss

Some bitter thing.

The goblet lost its ruby joy,

And weary Science veil'd her face;

And oft-repeated scenes could cloy

E'en in the chase.

And raven locks grew thin and grey,

And bloom and blossom faded by,

And slowly died the light away

From beauty's eye.

He sought, 'mid shifting grief and bliss,

A bosom strung with answering tone:

Though many friends were round, in this

He was alone.

He met with one who more than men

Reflected both his love and thought;

He link'd his life to hers, and then

Gain'd what he sought.

For there he found, as still he ranged

O'er realms of nature and of art,

An earthly good that never changed,

In woman's heart.

THE LATE DUKE OF WELLINGTON.—On the decease of the late Duke of Wellington, there remained in the possession of his family three Ribbons of the Order of the Garter. The latest worn by the lamented hero has recently been presented to, and graciously accepted by, her Majesty. A second, of very old and historical interest, is retained in the family, and the third has just been sent by the present Duke of Wellington to the Marquis of Londonderry, upon whom, it will be remembered, the garter of the great duke was conferred by the Queen.

[THE LIEUTENANT OF THE TOWER AND THE HEADSMAN.]

LIVES OF THE QUEENS OF ENGLAND.

BY J. F. SMITH, ESQ., AUTHOR OF

"ROBIN GOODFELLOW," "AMY LAWRENCE," ETC.

ELIZABETH,
QUEEN REGNANT OF ENGLAND.

CHAPTER XXII.

Much suspected—of me
Nothing proved can be,
Quoth Elizabeth, prisoner.

LINES WRITTEN BY ELIZABETH WHILE IN PRISON.

NOTHING could exceed the harshness with which the royal captive was treated in the Tower. Her Protestant books were taken from her; she was obliged to attend the mass daily, and her servants were subjected to the most rigorous examination, in order to draw from them some means to criminate their youthful mistress. One of her gentlemen—Edward Tremaine—was even subjected to the torture, by order of Gardiner; but nothing could be extorted from him.

This firmness on the part of her domestics, is presumptive proof that Elizabeth was very much beloved by her household; but that which did most service to her cause, was the generous conduct of Wyatt upon the scaffold. At the last moment he publicly declared that the princess was innocent of all participation in the crime, either by word or cognisance, for which he was about to suffer: a confession which appears to have produced a favourable effect upon the mind of the queen, and rendered the efforts of the Spanish ambassador, Gardiner, Arundel, and the rest of her enemies, who were incessantly urging her execution in the council, ineffectual. They little knew the character of Mary: with all her gloomy bigotry, harshness, and cruelty, she was incapable, unless upon sure grounds, of shedding her sister's blood. Conscious that she did not love the daughter of Anne Boleyn, she still remembered that she was the daughter of Henry VIII., and misdoubted her own judgment.

Elizabeth's examination in the Tower was rather a triumph than a humiliation for her. Sir James Croft, the leader in the late rebellion, on being confronted with her, fell upon his knees, and took God to witness that he never knew anything of her grace's conduct not becoming a true and loyal subject.

The Earl of Arundel, one of the staunchest of the Catholic party, and a former advocate for her death, was so disgusted by the proceedings against her, that he, too, fell upon his knees before her, declaring that he was sorry to see her grace troubled by such matters.

The minutes of this examination, which were duly reported to Mary, produced a favourable effect; for she not only permitted Elizabeth to take air and exercise in the gardens of the Tower, but firmly refused the iterated entreaties of the Spanish ambassador, Gardiner, and her council, to permit her being brought to trial: an act which doubtless saved the life of the future Protestant queen—for religious animosities ran so high at the time, there is little doubt that the Catholic party, then dominant, would have secured her condemnation.

An affecting incident occurred during the imprisonment of the royal maiden. When she walked in the garden, a pretty boy, about six years of age, was in the habit of seeking her, to bring her flowers. The captive found pleasure in caressing and conversing with the child, from which innocent amusement her enemies sought to draw a means for her undoing: they pretended that these flowers were tokens sent by Courtney, also a prisoner in the same fortress, and covered a treasonable intelligence between them.

This child, although so young, was arrested, and underwent an examination before the council; but nothing could be elicited from its artlessness and innocence.

About this time Mary fell into an illness which was considered likely to prove fatal by those about her. The alarm of the Catholic party was great—the joy and hopes of the Protestants unbounded. Most probably they were prevented from making any public demonstration of their exultation by the prudent advice of Cecil, and others of Elizabeth's more prudent friends. There is little doubt that the slightest movement in her favour at this critical juncture would have been the signal for her death.

Gardiner, as the party most implicated in the proceedings against the heiress of the crown, was naturally the most alarmed for his own personal security, in the event of the death of his royal mistress, who never appears to have accorded him her full confidence. He saw that the danger was imminent, and determined by a bold stroke to evade it: this stroke was nothing less than the death of Elizabeth, without the authority or consent of the queen.

The unprincipled statesman, and yet more unworthy churchman, whose profession should have at least taught him justice, if not mercy, was seated, towards the close of day, in a small cabinet adjoining the chamber of the queen. There was a singular expression of triumph and excitement in his usually leaden eye and pale countenance. From time to time he turned his regards towards the door, as if impatiently awaiting the arrival of some one. He had not long to wait—for the door was gently opened, and an aged man, of simple, quiet manners, slowly entered the apartment.

It was Richard Masters, one of the physicians of the queen.

"Your news, man!—your news, man!" exclaimed the prelate, starting from his seat; "What has England and our holy faith to hope or fear from your august patient?"

"Everything, my lord!" exclaimed the man of science; "the excitement the queen's grace has lately been subjected to from the unnatural conduct of the Lady Elizabeth—the rebellion of her subjects, and the delays in the arrival of the Spanish king, have produced a crisis."

"Which may possibly terminate——" said Gardiner, fixing his eyes with a searching expression upon him.

The physician made no reply; for the act was still in force which made it penal for any one to prophesy the death of the sovereign.

"Why do you not answer me?" continued the speaker. "Are you aware that I put the question by order of the council?"

"In that case, my lord, I cannot choose but obey: in four-and-twenty hours the crisis will either terminate fatally, or the danger of her majesty be past!"

"Four-and-twenty hours?" slowly repeated the prelate. Masters bowed in the affirmative.

"And can you not prolong it?"

"No!"

"Not even for a day?"

"Not for an hour!" replied the physician; "with all our science, nature, my lord, is stronger than art: we may aid her minor operations or retard them; but we cannot change her fixed laws; and it is one of the fever under which her majesty is suffering that——"

"Enough, enough!" exclaimed the chancellor, impatiently waving his hand for him to withdraw; "we have not time to listen to such a thesis now—when the safety of the kingdom and the church are alike in jeopardy. Leave me," he added; "the toils of the beast who sweats beneath his burthen, are pleasures compared to my labours; for my burthen is upon the brain!"

No sooner was this bold, bad man alone in the cabinet, than he began to pace the narrow limits of the chamber; he was evidently debating in his own mind some terrible resolve; for the carrying out of which it was not conscience, but prudence, that restrained him.

"Four-and-twenty hours!" he repeated to himself; "the time is short to carry out a kingdom's welfare—but it will suffice; such deeds require decision—not deliberation; when such interests are at stake, I were a fool indeed to listen to the voice of pity or humanity!"

To do the speaker justice, they were the voices the least likely to be heard by him—for his conscience was deaf as the ears of the adder; indeed his whole career proves him to be a man of cruelty and blood—harsh and remorseless. He drew from his bosom a small slip of parchment, and read it twice slowly over. It was an order from the privy council, which he had caused to be privately drawn up, and addressed to the Lieutenant of the Tower, for the immediate execution of Elizabeth; it was sealed with the privy seal, and only wanted his signature to give it force. With a firm hand, he took the pen and wrote his name.

"There," he said, with a satirical smile—"there ends the hopes of the foul traitors who pine to see their idol, Elizabeth, upon the throne—of the heretics who would uproot and trample upon our holy church—of the enemies who predict my downfall and disgrace! That signature secures me a cardinal's hat from Rome—a friend in Spain—and, though last, not least, a Catholic successor to the crown, in the person of the youthful Queen of Scots. The daughter of Anne Boleyn will regret her scorn and insolence towards me when it is too late!"

There was a gentle tap at the door of the cabinet, and a tall, thin personage, dressed in a closely-fitting doublet of black velvet, and wearing the illustrious order of the Golden Fleece, entered the room.

This was no other than Renaud, the ambassador of Spain, and the prime mover of every intrigue against Elizabeth.

"Well, my lord," he said, with a cold, satirical smile. "how long is this child-like indecision to last?"

"It is over, Monsieur l'Ambassadeur!" replied the chancellor.

"Over!" repeated the Spaniard, doubtfully.

Gardiner placed in his hand the warrant for the death of the princess, which he had so lately signed. The saturnine countenance of Renaud flushed with triumph as he perused it: it had been the aim of his imperial master, as well as the end of his own exertions, to compass the destruction of the daughter of Anne Boleyn. Spain had never pardoned the unfortunate wife of Henry VIII., for having presumed to take her seat upon the throne of Catherine of Arragon; and the hatred extended to her innocent child.

"Your eminence!" he said, bowing respectfully as he returned the document, "has acted in this with your usual decision and intelligence!"

"Eminence!" repeated Gardiner, with a glow of pleasure.

We need not remind our readers that the title of Eminence is reserved exclusively for the cardinals of the Roman Church.

"Eminence!" once more repeated the ambassador; "for it cannot be, after having rendered such essential service to the church, that Rome can longer delay the only fitting recognition of your services, or Spain her influence to obtain it. My imperial master, I have reason to know, has already demanded your nomination to the purple of the sovereign pontiff; in fact, that you are named in petto, and will be proclaimed at the very next consistory!"

This probably was untrue; but the speaker had long since discovered the ambition of Gardiner to adorn himself with the ornament of the imperial purple—which Rome has adopted, with other relics of her former Pagan rulers. The ambitious prelate would have sacrificed his soul to have obtained it.

An hour after the interview between these two remarkable personages, a messenger from the privy council was dispatched to the Tower: he was the bearer of the order of the chancellor for the execution of Elizabeth at an early hour the following day.

CHAPTER XXIII.

ALTHOUGH Bridges, the Lieutenant of the Tower, was one of the most faithful partisans of the government of Queen Mary, fortunately for the safety of her unhappy sister, he was a man of honour as well as prudence. On receiving the missive from Gardiner, containing the death-warrant of the heiress of the crown, he showed neither hesitation nor embarrassment, but bade the messenger assure the chancellor that his orders should be strictly attended to.

Such, however, was very far from being his real intention. He knew that Elizabeth had been subjected to no regular trial—in fact, that her late examination before the lords of the council, in the Tower, had produced an impression in her favour; moreover, he was no stranger to the state of the queen's health, and the personal risk to himself, if he ventured to lay violent hands upon the princess, who was generally regarded throughout the kingdom as her successor.

Several times he turned over the warrant, which he continued to hold in his hand: his position, it must be confessed, was a perilous one, since he risked his life and position either way.

"It lacks the signature of her majesty," he said, "and consequently is informal. Who ever heard of a princess of the blood being beheaded on a chancellor's warrant? I must see the queen myself!"

As may be supposed, the worthy officer passed an unquiet night; but, like most men, he had taken counsel from his pillow, and decided how to act on the emergency.

His first act was to cause the gates of the Tower to be closed, and ingress or egress rigorously refused to every person—no matter what his rank—who might present himself. By this means he secured a double advantage: Mary was really dead, he would hold in his hands the destiny of England, and guard her successor from the machinations of her enemies; if living, and bent upon the execution of her sister, he could easily return and conduct the illustrious victim to the block.

Before leaving for St. James's, where Mary then resided, he had an interview with the executioner, who, by Gardiner's orders, had, ever since the imprisonment of Elizabeth, been a resident in the Tower. The wretch came bowing and smiling into the presence of the lieutenant, from whom he was accustomed to receive the orders for the execution of the victims. Unfortunately, during the reign of Mary, they were neither few nor amongst the least illustrious in the land, although her sister, on her succession, far exceeded her Catholic predecessor in that respect.

"Well, Hendrée," said the lieutenant, "is the scaffold still standing?"

"Yes, lieutenant."

"And everything prepared for immediate use?"

"Even to the sharpening of my axe!" replied the fellow. "I take as much pride in it as you gentlemen and officers do in your swords! Shall you require its services?"

"Perhaps."

"To-day?"

"That you will learn upon my return. Do not absent yourself an instant; and hark you," continued the lieutenant; "you will do well to abstain from the wine-pot and the beer-barrel! Your head must be cool and your arm steady, should I require your services!"

The eyes of the last minister of the law glistened with exultation. He knew, from the extraordinary cautions of the commander, that a personage of the highest rank was expected to suffer; and he felt assured that it could be no other than Elizabeth, the fee for cutting off whose head—independent of any gift from her own hand—would amount to six times the sum paid for executing an ordinary person. No wonder, therefore, that he rejoiced.

"Fear not, lieutenant!" he replied, with a grin; "none who pass under my hand ever complain of my want of expertness! Shall I have the black cloth hangings from the vault under the chapel, and the chair?"

"No!" exclaimed Bridges, sternly; for he knew that the sight of such a preparation would cause it to be instantly rumoured that Elizabeth was about to suffer—and he did not wish to alarm her. "And look you," he added, "that you keep your tongue close! If I find, on my return, that you have prated, I'll have your tongue cropped as short as the heads of some of your victims!"

So saying, he left the room, and instantly took barge for Westminster.

That same morning, Queen Mary, contrary to the expectation of her physician and those around her, was sufficiently recovered to receive several lords of the council, as well as the chancellor, in her privy chamber. The crisis, which Dr. Masters anticipated would prove fatal to his royal patient, had taken a favourable turn; and, though still languid, suffering, and weak, she was considered out of danger.

A singular look passed between Gardiner and the Spanish ambassador, when her majesty inquired of the former the news of her sister, the Princess Elizabeth. It was the first time for many weeks that, in speaking of her, the queen had designated her otherwise than as the "daughter of Anne Boleyn," or "my father's daughter."

She repeated her question. There was a general silence: they feared the effect of too sudden a communication of what they considered the fatal truth—that Elizabeth had that very morning laid her head upon the same block which received that of Lady Jane Grey. The Earl of Arundel, who had become from an enemy, a partisan of the royal captive, was the first to speak.

"There is one without, your majesty," he said, "who perhaps can afford you the information these noble lords are fearful to impart."

"Who mean you?" demanded Mary.

"The Lieutenant of the Tower," replied the peer.

At the name of that dreaded officer, the countenance of the queen flushed, and then turned very pale.

"Silence, my lord!" she exclaimed, as Gardiner, who had knelt at the side of the couch on which she was reclining; "not one word till we have heard the report of the Lieutenant of the Tower! Perhaps," she added, sarcastically, "we, too, may have an order to give him! Admit Master Bridges," she said, addressing the Earl of Arundel, "and give orders to the captain of our guard that no member of the council quits the antechamber without our special order, as his head shall answer it!"

All were in consternation: the decided manner in which Mary had expressed herself, proved that the conspirators had gone too far. Arundel alone remained unmoved.

As soon as Bridges entered the royal chamber, the queen fixed upon him a stern glance, and even before he could bend his knee, demanded of him the health of her sister.

"Well, please your majesty, in body; but sorely distressed in mind: as, in spite of my precautions, the rumour has doubtless reached her that she is condemned to die!"

"To die!" repeated Mary Tudor and by whom?"

"I know not, please your majesty, neither is it my business to inquire: all I can say is, that last night I received the order for the execution of her grace; but that, discovering it wanted your majesty's signature, I took upon myself the peril of postponing it, in order that there might be no mistake, and came for further orders. But everything is in readiness," he added; "scaffold, block, and headsman!"

"Keep them in readiness still!" exclaimed Mary, sarcastically. "I may want them for the traitors who would have dishonoured their mistress in the eyes of Europe and the world! What!" she added; "without trial—proof! O shame—shame, my lords!"

Renaud was about to speak, but Mary impatiently waved her hand for silence.

"Prove to me—to the satisfaction of her judges—that Elizabeth has conspired against my crown, and I will sign the warrant for her death without a word! I may consent to an act of justice—but not to a deliberate murder! My lords—my lords! you have acted foully in these proceedings!"

Gardiner shrank back from the side of the couch: he felt that, in the event of Elizabeth succeeding to the crown, not even the promised purple would save him from her just revenge, for his many treasons against her.

Of all present, Arundel and Sussex alone felt at their ease—for they had been purposely kept in ignorance of the design of the rest of the privy council, who had yielded to the threats and insinuation of the chancellor, that they ought to spare their royal mistress, by the promptitude and vigour of their proceedings, the pain of signing the death-warrant of her sister.

"Master Bridges," said the queen, speaking more calmly, "you have our thanks—you have acted like a good and loyal servant in this matter: at a fitting moment we will reward you! Give me that warrant!"

The lieutenant presented it to her, upon his knees. Mary slowly perused it, then tore it into several pieces.

"Send for Sir Henry Beddingfield!" she exclaimed. "I must make an end of these dark plottings! I can confide in him: he, at least, is one who will not deceive me! Go, my lords!" she said, addressing the members of her council; "we have little comfort in your presence, and less support in your wisdom; for the present, at least, we will act without you!"

"With this ungracious reproof—which was merited by all save Sussex and the Earl of Arundel—the lords of the privy council left the chamber of Mary Tudor. As they disappeared, a stern-looking personage, whose thin, grey hair and moustache proclaimed that he had long passed the meridian of life, was ushered into the chamber.

It was Sir Henry Beddingfield, of Norfolk—one of the staunchest adherents of the Catholic cause, but at the same time one of the most honourable. Mary, throughout her short and disastrous reign, found in him a loyal and disinterested friend, and deservedly placed every confidence in him.

After being closeted with his royal mistress for more than an hour, he returned, with a paper bearing the sign-manual. It gave him the command of a hundred men, and the sole authority over the person of Elizabeth; in fact, his power virtually superseded that of Bridges, the Lieutenant of the Tower.

SUCH WIVES ARE SCARCE.

HOFMEISTER, a youth of uncommon understanding and abilities, so long as he continued at the university, distinguished himself above all his fellow-students by his exemplary application. When he left it, he wished particularly to improve his knowledge of the law, and in consequence of his good character was admitted to board in the family of an eminent barrister, under whose tuition he doubted not but he would acquire that learning which was then the sole object of his ambition.

With the above counsellor lived a confidential house-keeper, who, although rather on the wane, was still an agreeable woman. She was born of respectable parents, possessed of an obliging disposition, and had cultivated her mind by reading. Her continual kind offices, yet unasked for, had gained her from Hofmeister sentiments of regard, which increased in the course of a dangerous illness, during which she nursed him, and, indeed, he was partly indebted for his recovery to her particular attention. They subsequently became more intimate, in one respect, notwithstanding love was quite out of the question—at least on the side of Hofmeister—as she was more than double his age.

In this manner some years elapsed, at the expiration of which Hofmeister thought himself competent to appear at the bar; when, in consequence of his known abilities and good moral principles, he soon procured many clients, the number whereof augmented, owing to his integrity and indefatigable activity.

In the midst of his occupations, no wonder if he lost sight of the worthy housekeeper; when one morning she came to pay him a visit. She informed him that, from the confidence she long since reposed in him, she was now come to intrust him with the management of a most interesting and important affair. A near relation of hers had gone to the East Indies, there to try his fortune; and after being most successful in all his undertakings, had returned to Holland, where he had recently died. That his succession amounted to at least one hundred thousand crowns; that she thought herself the nearest kin, and that she had accordingly written to Holland, whence she had received an answer replete with objections. She therefore was come to request of him to examine the various documents she had brought, and to inform her, with his wonted candour, whether her claims rested on solid foundations or not?

Hofmeister examined the papers with proper attention and he gave his opinion that her right was undeniable, and offered to support it. He removed the objection of the good woman, who said she had not the means of paying the preliminary costs, which must be considerable, by offering to make the journey at his own expense, and promising not to demand being reimbursed in case he should not succeed.

He took his departure, and, upon his arrival at the Hague, found matters just as he expected: he had to encounter a thousand obstacles that his skill knew how to remove; he received many proposals which his integrity caused him to reject, and foresaw several snares that his prudence taught him to avoid. After a stay of a few weeks, the business was settled according to his wish; the inheritance was given up to him, and he delayed not to return home.

You may easily imagine the joy of his friend on seeing him the bearer of such happy tidings and of so immense a property. The whole transaction appeared as a dream to the good creature—she could scarcely credit her own eyes. Indeed, she did not then repay the benefactor to whom she was obliged for all she possessed, but only said to him, when he left her in the evening, that she would think the next day of discharging her debt; and they parted without another word being said about it.

On the day following she invited him to come and see her, asked his advice concerning a multiplicity of arrangements, promised to adhere to them, but her embarrassed countenance revealed that there was a something that expired on her lips; at length, however, she summoned her best spirits, and addressed him thus:

"No one can be more sensible than myself, in this sudden transition from mediocrity to opulence, how much I stand in need of a counsellor to advise me, and in whom I can reposit an entire confidence. My present fortune, I know, might procure me a choice amongst men of almost every age and situation in life; but far from accepting their offer, I wish to choose for myself. To you I lay under great obligations, to you I owe all I am worth; and if my hand, with the command of my whole fortune, can prove acceptable, I make you here the offer, and shall think myself happy if it be not rejected."

Hofmeister was not a little surprised at this unexpected proposal. Ninety-nine out of a hundred, in a similar position, would have agreed to it without taking time to reflect. Hofmeister made all possible objections, assured her that he felt the importance of her proposition; that he esteemed her as a friend and a person endowed with a generous mind, but that esteem was not love; that he could rather show her the respect of a son than the affection of a husband; he begged of her to reflect that the inequality of age had often rendered miserable such couples as love had united, and that more fatal consequences still were to be apprehended when benefits alone formed the bonds.

The good lady was not to be persuaded by his discourse; quite the reverse: she replied that she saw with pleasure that no interested motives could actuate him; that no wanton self-love could blind her to the difference in their ages; that it was real friendship that had suggested her proposition; that the latter sentiment was the only one she would demand; and that whatever he might determine, her most ardent wish was to meliorate the situation of him who had rendered himself so deserving of it.

Subsequent to some further discourse of this sort, Hofmeister at last accepted her offer with thanks; and a short time after, they were made man and wife.

They lived as happy as could be expected, considering that friendship alone had brought them together. Hofmeister, on account of his increase of fortune, entirely gave up the profession, but continued upon terms of intimacy with several of his former brethren, who were frequently at his table, and who often returned the compliment.

One of them had lately married a young wife, of superior beauty, uncommon wit, and excellent education. Possessed of such advantages, she necessarily could not escape being noticed by Hofmeister. He always liked to sit by her at table, and when a walk was ever proposed he would always offer her his arm; most of his discourse was addressed to her.

These trifling attentions he was not sensible of himself, but the eye of a wife is often more penetrating than that of a husband. Madame Hofmeister perceived what was going on, and doubted not for a moment but love was the secret motive of these doings. Nevertheless, she always behaved with a mildness that denoted her amiable disposition, and with a prudence that screened her suspicions. She continued to invite the fair lady, on the one hand not to fan a passion that might blaze from opposition; on the other, to avoid being suspected of jealousy, which would only serve to augment what she wished to diminish. Several years thus followed, and Hofmeister enjoyed as much undisturbed happiness as any rational man could wish for.

At last an event occurred which Madame Hofmeister, to speak the truth, had more than once anxiously wished for. The husband of that beautiful young lady, whose name was Landolt, and who was as old again as his wife, died. His forlorn widow wept, as is customary in those cases; and as soon as she was out of mourning, Madame Hofmeister made her husband a proposition that occasioned him still greater astonishment than when she had offered to marry him: she proposed a divorce.

After he had recovered from his surprise, he inquired what motive could prompt so unexpected a resolution, and begged of her to let him know what he had been guilty of that offended her. She assured him that he was the man in the world whom she esteemed most, so far from having to upbraid him; but that it was quite impossible for her to continue living any longer in bonds contradictory to the chief inducement to matrimony: the disparity between their ages threatening to expose her to everlasting censure. Notwithstanding he represented how long their union had lasted—in what good understanding they had lived always together—the bad construction that might be put on so hasty a rupture—she persisted in her determination; declaring, at the same time, that it would occasion no alteration in their domestic arrangements: so that Hofmeister, yielding to her perseverance, finally consented, and proper measures were adopted for the execution of the projected plan.

They still continued in the same house; the divorced wife insisted on acting her former part with respect to housekeeping, although she wished to keep within her own apartment. A few days after, Hofmeister found on his bureau a bundle of papers, which proved to be vouchers to the amount of fifty thousand crowns, with a few lines intimating that sum to be his without any reserve. He went to meet the donor, whom he entreated anew to reveal to him what could have suggested her adopting a conduct altogether so incomprehensible and generous, and to take back her immense present. The last request she rejected in a tone that allowed no objection; with regard to the first, she would, she said, comply with it, as soon as she had brought to bear another project which she had in contemplation.

One day after dinner she ordered her carriage, under a pretence of taking a ride. She generally invited Hofmeister to keep her company; this once, however, she dropped the compliment. For a moment he wondered at it, but business of more serious consequence soon made him forgetful of so trifling a circumstance.

He had in all probability lost sight of her, when the coachman was bid to drive to Madame Landolt's. The widow was at home, and welcomed her visitor with the greatest civility. After the general topics of conversation had been run over, the old lady introduced the subject of widowhood, and inquired, without ceremony, whether it was not attended with many unpleasant circumstances. Being answered in the affirmative, she asked the beautiful widow if she felt any inclination for a second marriage; and, without leaving her time to reply, added, that the object of her present visit was to propose a husband, who was certainly possessed of every qualification to please her, and who united to an agreeable person, a feeling heart and a large fortune; he might also be said to be in the prime of life.

It may easily be conceived that, notwithstanding such a proposition was by no means alarming, the overture, nevertheless, was somewhat so novel, that the widow must have felt no small amazement at it; but to what pitch was it not raised, when, upon asking who that meritorious object might be, her friend informed her that he was no other than her former identical husband, who, indeed, was equally ignorant of her visit and of her proposal; but of whose affection towards Madame Landolt, she had long since a thorough conviction.

In vain would the young widow attempt to postpone giving an answer, under a pretence that it was impossible to decide so hastily on a matter of so serious an importance. She pressed her so obstinately, that the widow at last confessed that, if Hofmeister did really love her, she might perhaps listen to his addresses. The old lady, satisfied with such a reply, bade her adieu in the most friendly manner, and returned home. In the whole course of the evening she spoke not a syllable upon the subject.

The next morning, as they were sitting at breakfast together, this extraordinary woman said to her former husband:

"My dear friend, I have already made you two presents, which you little expected."

"Only two! Excuse me —"

"Patience—patience! my dear Hofmeister—two only: the first when I compelled you to marry me; the second when I wished to unburthen myself, in your behalf, of part of a fortune that was cumbersome to me; what would you say if I were to make you, on this day, a more valuable present still than either of the former two?"

"Most generous of women!" exclaimed Hofmeister, full of admiration.

"Yes, a third, I tell you: the heart of a young and amiable woman, deserving of you, and whom you love!"

"The astonishment which is depicted on my countenance must inform you that I do not comprehend a word of what you mean; that I have not given a second marriage a thought, still less have I made a choice; neither can I conceive how —"

"How I feel concerned, were you going to say? Well, let us see. You have thought of no one yet—not even of the Widow Landolt? I have caught you there! your sudden blushes confirm what I wished to know; but now, without a joke, I must give you an account of my yesterday's afternoon occupation.

She then related the whole, as above-mentioned, and inquired if she had acted right.

"But too right! Yet I am at a loss to conceive —"

"How I have been able thus to read within your heart? Ah! my friend, there I long ago discovered your love, and esteemed, two-fold, the man who, by the side of a superannuated wife, knew how to express his affection for a youthful and beautiful woman, who seemed not to dislike him. The moment Mr. Landolt was no more, if I had neglected executing my plan, I should have eternally reproached myself for having prevented the union of two persons created for each other. My motives now, I hope, no longer can appear mysterious.

The history now draws near its conclusion. The proposed marriage took place, to the extreme joy of both parties concerned. On the day the ceremony was performed, Hofmeister's friend offered him a transfer of the whole property, which he was forced to accept of; neither had she ever occasion to repent her generosity. The new-married couple considered her as a parent, and the mistress of their home. Every one showed her the respect due to her age, and still more to her disposition.

Towards the end of her career, the children of her adoption took all the care of her which the advanced period of her life demanded, and were overwhelmed with her blessings. They finally closed her eyes, and bathed her tomb with their tears.

Beneficent woman, may your ashes rest in peace!

SCIENCE.

NEW INVENTIONS, ETC.

A process for the conversion of the hides and skins of animals into leather, has just been patented by Mr. Charles Augustus Preller; the operation of which is described as remarkable for its originality, and which was likely to be attended with great advantages to the consumer.

Mr. J. W. WILKINS, of London, has issued a prospectus proposing to establish a steno-telegraph, by which messages of twenty words or under may be transmitted a distance not exceeding one hundred miles for one shilling. We hope he may be able to carry out his scheme, which he asserts could easily be made to pay.

LAW OF COPYRIGHT.—In a recent decision, Murray v. Bogue, was involved a point under this act—whether a book, of which the first edition had appeared before that act, required registration of books for protection of the second edition: this has been decided in the affirmative, at least, that if subsequent editions are not registered, the new matter contained in such new edition is not protected, although the matter contained also in the first edition would be so.

The following is the suggestion of a correspondent: "It seems to me that if a very transparent talc (such as they paint costumes, &c., on, in India), can be rendered perfectly colourless, it is preferable to glass for preserving oil paintings. Talc has not the glitter or the extreme brittleness of glass—and even if accidentally broken over the picture, could not, like fragments of broken glass, endanger its safety. Talc would, in fact, be a sort of moveable varnish, and might supersede any other. If you find this suggestion new, and worthy of notice, perhaps you will do me the favour to print it in your Journal."

"I am, &c.

A. H. BROTHERTON."

"Rome, March 24."

NEW MATERIALS FROM WESTERN AFRICA.—The Manchester Guardian says: We have been favoured by Mr. Thomas Clegg, of this town, with samples of two new materials for textile manufacture, which have been recently received from the south-west coast of Africa, and which, if they can be furnished in sufficient quantity, and at a moderate price, will probably become important articles of trade with that country. The first of these is a fibrous substance, sent by a missionary at Abbeokuta, as "red cotton." It is not produced in the neighbourhood of that place, but is brought thither from the Hoassa country to the northward in considerable quantities; and the people who bring it state that the deep red colour which it bears is natural; but the writer of the letter adds, that the chief at Abbeokuta "thinks they lie." The scepticism of the chief is undoubtedly well founded. The material, which is not cotton at all, but an entirely new species of silk, is unquestionably dyed—probably with alkanet root, which we believe is abundant in Africa. If sent in its natural state, it would undoubtedly prove a very useful material for the waste silk spinners. The letter does not contain any information as to the price which this material bears in Africa; but as it is stated to be produced in great abundance, it seems probable that the price will be moderate. The other material to which we have referred is a new and somewhat peculiar description of wool, stated to be brought from Quitta, a town on the coast to the westward of Abbeokuta; but as the climate of the coast must be very unfavourable for the production of wool, we think it is probably brought from some of the mountainous regions in the interior of the continent. Like the dyed silk, it was sent to this country as a sample of cotton, and with it was some yarn, purporting to be spun from it. That, however, is unquestionably an error, as the yarn is made from cotton. The wool seems of tolerably fine quality, of a pale buff colour, apparently natural, and is worth, we are told, about 1s. 3d. per pound. If it can be obtained in quantity, it will prove a very acceptable boon to the woollen manufacturers of this country, whose supplies of raw material have latterly proved very insufficient.

RUSTY IRON.—In answer to the inquiry put by "B. G.," who is desirous of learning the most effectual mode to prevent his 5-8ths rod-iron fence from being entirely destroyed by rust, I beg to inform him the cure for iron sickness is to have it galvanised (which means coating with zinc). The metallic contact between the zinc and iron immediately suspends the destruction going on with the latter, because the zinc is lowest in the scale, and is the more easily oxidised of the two. This plan was well known to Sir Humphry Davy, and has been lectured on by Professor Brande, of the Royal Mint.

FINE-TOOTH COMBS are now made of india-rubber.

GOOD OUT OF EVIL.—A singular discovery has been made in France, by a M. Fabre, a humble gardener of Ayde, but of some local note as a botanist. The herb agilops, heretofore considered as worse than useless, grows abundantly on the shores of the Mediterranean. It produces a species of grain resembling wheat in form, but much smaller. In the year 1839 M. Fabre sowed a quantity of this grain, and he was struck by observing that the produce of it seemed to bear a close affinity to wheat. That produce he sowed the next year, and the yield was still more like wheat. He went on sowing the yield in this way, year after year, and each year found a marked improvement in the produce, until, at last, he had the satisfaction of getting as fine a crop of wheat, and of as good quality, as could wish to be seen. At first he produced his crops in a garden, but his later sowings were made broadcast in an open field. Thus, then, a wild and mischievous herb, which is particularly destructive to barley crops, can be educated into excellent wheat.

BRASS TUBE-MAKING MACHINERY.—A very ingenious machine for making brass tubes without seam, the invention of M. Degrand, has been recently established in France, and promises very excellent results. The tubes are cast in brass, (say) 20 inches long, and of a great thickness. These are then put on steel mandrils, the diameter of which answers to the interior diameter of the finished tube. The tubes on the mandrils are then placed in the machine, and passed between fluted rollers under a considerable pressure. A reciprocating motion is given to the tube on which the mandrils are fixed, and, at the end of each stroke, the tubes are slightly turned round, to expose a fresh surface to the action of the rollers. A continuation of this process swages out the short, thick tube to a long, thin one, of the desired dimensions. A machine, under the same patent, has been set to work in England; and having been constructed after the one above-mentioned, is still more simple and effectual. Under the ordinary system of making brass tubes, the brass is cut into sheets of the proper size, the alternate edges bevelled off in a planing machine, and the plate is then bent on a mandril with the hammer, and brazed, the bevelled edges forming the joint. The rough edges are then cut off in a lathe, and the tube cleaned with acid to finish it.—Artisan.

THE DOME OF ST. PAUL'S CATHEDRAL.—Mr. Parris, the artist, has just completed his floating gallery in the cupola of St. Paul's Cathedral, to carry out the important restoration of the paintings of Sir James Thornhill, which adorn the interior. The paintings, which have long been obliterated, owing to a leakage in the upper part of the dome, represent the principal events in the life of St. Paul, in eight compartments of the cupola. Viewed from the pavement of the cathedral, the construction of the gallery seems the most curious thing imaginable—namely, a leaf-like kind of platform of boards floating in mid-air, some 220 feet high. The great cornice where the paintings begin is 60 feet above the whispering gallery, and the cupola rises 60 feet perpendicularly—altogether 220 feet from the pavement of the cathedral. The light is obtained from 24 windows between the cornice and the whispering-gallery—consequently the paintings are lighted from below. All previous propositions for the purposes of their renovation have been to erect a scaffold right up from the base. These, however, have been uniformly objected to on two grounds—namely, it would interfere with the regular service, and it would leave the artist in darkness, as it would be necessary to cover over the whole surface—a diameter of 100 feet—with flooring. The plan in operation by Mr. Parris obviates these difficulties. It is only on reaching the whispering gallery that its character can be properly estimated. It comprises two galleries—one on a level with the great cornice, and the other some 30 feet above it, in the spring of the cupola. The flooring of each is sustained by poles, firmly secured, one end riveted into ring-bolts inserted into and through the solid masonry of the cupola (two feet and a half in thickness), and secured with iron plates on the outside, while the further end is supported by strong wire ropes secured above through the upper gallery to the frame work of the over-dome. The present platform occupies only one-eighth part of the circumference of the cupola: so that, when one compartment is finished, the gallery is shifted round to the next compartment, and so on till the restoration of the whole paintings is completed. It is said to be the intention of the Dean and Chapter to follow up the ideas of Sir Christopher Wren to the fullest extent.

[MR. SANDS'S PERFORMANCE AT DRURY LANE THEATRE.]

MR. SANDS—THE "AIR WALKER."

Now that witchcraft and ghestercraft have gone out of fashion, and only material novelties will delight and dazzle the public mind, we must confess to a want of surprise when anything new is announced. Mechanical invention is so fertile, and its productions succeed each other so rapidly, that really the expectation gets so attuned to the promise of novelties, that when they come, they are received with a gravity which would excite surprise, were it not well known that the anticipation must have been strangely roused indeed, when it receives the promised realisation with fevered excitement.

People in the present day expect new things as a matter of course. Hardly recovered from the staggering dream of living in the midst of railways, electric telegraphs, photography, mesmerism, and the other numberless manifestations of the age, they are dumbly on the look out for fresh developments, just as mariners are on the look out for the exact position of sunken rocks, or the welcome sight of land, under the shelter of which they can anchor in safety. It was therefore owing, we presume, to this normal kind of feeling, that we heard of an American having performed the seemingly impossible feat of walking across a plain surface, with his head downwards; in fact, by some means or other, overcoming the law of gravity, and affording us the certainly extraordinary spectacle of a man at a respectable elevation, not suspended by his feet, but actually walking, seemingly at liberty, just as a fly walks across a ceiling. We of course went to see him, and our artist has enabled us to lay before our readers a copy of the scene, just as we saw it at Drury Lane Theatre.

First of all we saw a kind of platform in front of the stage, suspended, as we thought, after the fashion in which stage divinities perform their aerial gyrations; but on looking closer, we perceived that it rested on two lofty, well-draped supports, and consisted of a strong and stout timber framing, about twenty-eight feet in length, which on the under side presented a white, smooth surface, giving it the appearance of a marble slab. This was the ceiling on which the feat was to be performed. At each end was a strong seat, and underneath a large net was spread, to provide against, as we considered, the strong probability of an accident. Presently Mr. Sands, who has been an equestrian from his childhood, and is now proprietor of the Hippodrome, at New York, appeared in true athlete costume, and prepared himself by lacing sandals over his boots, to which were attached brass loops; and these were connected by springs with a pair of platter-like soles, in which lay the secret, as we had been told: they were always brought to the theatre in a locked box, and conveyed away with similar caution at the close of the performance. After these preliminaries, Mr. Sands ascended by a ladder to one of the strong seats, and, lying on his back, by the aid of ropes placed his platter-shod feet on the ceiling; then gently detached himself until he hung head downwards, and then passed or walked very slowly across the smooth surface, occasionally poising himself on one leg, until he reached the seat at the opposite end—which having gained, he descended by the latter: and thus, in about three minutes, the performance was concluded, and the audience were left to speculate as to how it had been managed. There was evidently no deception or trickery about it. Mr. Sands fairly went, head downwards, along a smooth surface some twenty-eight feet in length. How he managed it can only be guessed—for of course he keeps his secret locked up in his breast or his box. The most plausible surmise is, that the adhesion to the temporary ceiling is obtained on the same principle as a boy lifts a heavy stone by means of a snucker and string—namely, the exhaustion of the air. The hollow soles are exhausted of air—so that he is, as it were, glued to the surface; but to afford him the power of locomotion, it is supposed that by means of the pressure of a valve the air is re-admitted into one hollow sole, at a time; and when the leg to which that is attached has taken a stride, and the air has become re-exhausted, then the same operation takes place with the other sole. This is the secret of a fly walking upon the ceiling, but evidently does not explain the whole of the secret of Mr. Sands's feat. He acknowledges to have received the necessary instructions from a scientific man in America, and first accomplished it at Auburn, in May last. That it is attended with extreme danger is quite evident; indeed Mr. Sands, in July last, while attempting it, was so much injured that he was ill for some months after. So that the net would appear to be indispensable as a precaution—indeed we rather think that no manager in this country would permit the performance without it.

However, we leave all speculation on the subject to our scientific readers; all that we can say is, that we believe Mr. Sands faithfully did what he proposed he could do, and gave to an admiring British audience a very forcible exposition of the idea our ancestors had of the Antipodes, before the theory of Copernicus was received, America discovered, or the Pacific Oceans opened up to the navigation of Europeans. For some three minutes, Mr. Sands's head literally grew beneath his shoulders—so that he politely presented that valuable portion of his body to the aborigines and English settlers in New Zealand, instead of the soles of his feet: which latter, by the way, to ordinary people an indispensable necessity, is, in some countries in the East—Burmah for instance—considered a shocking breach of etiquette.

We can scarcely pause to criticise this trans-Atlantic contrivance: it is something new—that is all; and of course as that is everything in the present day, its novelty rather than its merit must be looked at. But after Old Drury has been turned into a den for wild beasts, and the exhibition of some beautiful horses, as well as daring horsemanship—to say nothing of some contingent tumbling, rope-dancing, and legerdemain—we ought not to grumble at Mr. Sands and his air-walking; for really he offers nothing objectionable except the danger of breaking his own neck: which we presume ought not to be taken into consideration, seeing that he voluntarily undertakes the risk—and receives money for doing so in advance, it is to be hoped. The truth, however, is, that what is termed the legitimate drama will not fill a house of the size of the theatre in Drury Lane. The public are tired of the heavy didactic drama; and as the time is eminently practical, and affords abundant opportunities for the manufacture of real substantial heroes—heroes in drama, in art, in literature, in politics, in war—in fact, in anything—they do not care much about the heroes in pasteboard armour and tin-pot helmets. They prefer reading the immortal language of the best dramatists at home—abroad, they want to be amused and excited, after the severity of the day's mental and physical toil. Therefore it is that managers are obliged to cater for the public taste; and in so doing, it must be admitted, they frequently offend that old play-going public, who vividly remember the stars that shone five-and-twenty years ago, but seem to be utterly insensible to the fact, that within that period, the world, from one extremity to the other, has been turned completely upside down, and well shaken into the bargain.

THE SHIPS OF ENGLAND.

BY CHARLES SWAIN.

THE ships!—the ships of England!—how gallantly they sweep
By town and city, fort and tower,—defenders of the deep!
We build no bastions 'gainst the foe, no mighty walls of stone;
Our warlike castles breast the tide—the boundless sea's their own!

The ships!—the ships of England! What British heart is cold
To the honour of his native isle, to the deathless deeds of old?
From quenched Armada's vaunted power, to glorious Trafalgar,
From Philip to Napoleon—when set Britannia's star?

The ships!—the ships of England! Where'er the surges roar,
Along the dark Atlantic, by the wild East-Indian shore—
Where icebergs flash destruction down, or sultry breezes play—
The flag of England floats alone, and triumphs on her way!

Where sweeps the wind, or swells the wave, our vessels glad the view;
The wondering savage marks their decks, and stays his swift canoe:
The Greenlander forsakes his sledge to watch each distant sail
Pass, like a spirit of the deep, beneath the moonlight pale!

Oh, wives, that love your cottage-homes! oh, maids, that love the green!
And youths, in whose firm, fearless limbs, a free-born grace is seen,
Give honour to the noble ships, that fame and freedom lend,
And bid your songs of gratitude from hill and vale ascend!

What horrors of the midnight storm our reckless seamen know,
When thunders rattle overhead, and billows plunge below;
When howls the long ferocious blast, like some funeral strain,
And fast and far the vessel drives along the dreadful main!

How oft the cannon of the foe hath struck their dauntless breast,
While ye smiled o'er the social fire, or found the balm of rest!
How oft the shriek of drowning men the startled vulture caught,
When ye had closed your doors in peace, and home's sweet pleasures sought!

Then wake your songs of gratitude to those who brave the sea,
And peril life that ye may live, and still prove fair and free:
Amidst your harvest-fields, oh, bid this earnest prayer prevail:—
"God guard the ships of England, o'er whatever sea they sail!"

THE Italian farmers still plough by the same rude implements that were in use before the Christian era: sometimes two cows, sometimes a horse and a cow, are yoked to a long pole, which is tied crosswise to a crooked bough or trunk of a tree, the fork of which, or the rudest piece of iron, serves the purpose of a coulter. The women still go down to the streams to wash and to fill their earthen jars with water, which they carry home upon their heads: their jars correspond exactly in form and size with the jars of the Etruscans and of the Egyptians seen in the British Museum, and in the Louvre, at Paris. Shepherds clothed entirely in skins, are seen tending their flocks in the fields, and caves, natural and artificial, are visible, in which they take a refuge by night or in a storm.

SAGACITY OF THE HORSE.—Whilst the present owner of the late Major Ringgold's favourite driving horse Jerry, was driving him along the road, about two miles from the city, he halted in front of a blacksmith's shop, and commenced to kick furiously. The gentleman got out and examined the gearing, and could discover nothing wrong. He retook his seat and endeavoured to urge him, but he kicked even more violently than before. The behaviour was a matter of some astonishment, as he had been used for a driving-horse for many years, and never before had committed an unruly act. After looking about carefully to see if there was anything to annoy him, it was perceived that one of his shoes was off. He was taken into the blacksmith's shop, the shoe replaced, again harnessed to the vehicle, when he started off as kind as ever, seeming perfectly satisfied with the restoration of his shoe.

[TRAVELLERS AND GUIDES ASCENDING MONT BLANC.]

THE ASCENT OF MONT BLANC.

EVERY division of the earth is intersected by lofty mountainous ranges, and Europe is peculiarly favoured in this respect. Between France and Spain there are the Pyrenees; in Turkey, the Balkhan Mountains; and between Germany and Italy, the Alps—

The palaces of nature, whose vast walls,
Have pinnacled in clouds their snowy scalp;
And throned Eternity in icy halls
Of cold sublimity, where forms and falls
The avalanche—the thunderbolt of snow!
All that expands the spirit, yet appals,
Gathers around the summit, as to show
How earth may soar to heaven, yet leave vain man below.

This enormous group of mountains extends from the banks of the Rhone in France, on the west, to the rivers Verbas and Narenta on the east; of which the former falls into the Save, a confluent of the Danube, and the latter into the Adriatic. They form a vast semicircular bulwark, which encompasses on the north Italy and the Adriatic.

They are divided into ranges—comprising the Mont Blanc range, the Pennine and the Lepontine Alps. The great range embraces nearly the whole of Switzerland, with its ramifications.

According to Simond, some idea may be formed of the Helvetic geography, by comparing the country to a large town, of which the valleys are the streets, and the mountain groups of contiguous houses. The region of the forests in the Alps extends from 3000 to 6000 feet above the sea level: and here snow in winter, like rain in summer, is very abundant.

To reach Switzerland through France, the traveller will cross the Jura Mountains—a chain of central Europe—and proceed from Chalons by diligence. As he rambles along amid the grandest scenery in the world, he will very likely remember the burst of enthusiasm of one of the most singular men that ever lived. Rousseau said, under such a circumstance:—

“The nearer I approached Switzerland, the more was I excited. The moment when, from the heights of the Jura, I discovered the lake of Geneva, was a moment of ecstasy and raptivism. The sight of my country—of that country so beloved by me—where torrents of pleasure had inundated my heart; the air of the Alps, so healthful and so pure; the sweet air of my native land, more delicious than the perfumes of the east; that rich and fertile land; that unique country, the most beautiful on which the eye of man ever rested! charming residence to which I had found no equal in the circuit of the world! the sight of a happy and free people! the mildness of the season, the serenity of the climate, a thousand delightful remembrances which aroused all the feelings I had experienced: all this threw me into transports which I cannot describe, and seemed to restore to me at once the enjoyment of my whole life.”

At the edge of the summit of the Jura Mountains, the whole of the Mont Blanc range bursts magnificently on the view. The “monarch of mountains” is seen emerging from his stupendous palace of mist and cloud.

Prince of the whirlwind! Monarch of the scene
Mightiest where all are mighty! from the eye
Of mortal man half-hidden by the screen
Of mists, that meet his base, from Arve's dark, deep ravine,
Stands the magnificent Mont Blanc! His brow
Scarred with ten thousand thunders; most sublime,
Even as though risen from the world below,
To mark the progress of Decay: by clime,
Storm, blight, fire, earthquake, injured not! Like Time,
Stern chronicler of centuries gone by.

After passing various places, rich in historical recollections of the great reformer, Calvin, the steam-boat conveys the traveller past Lausanne—where the illustrious Gibben retired to finish his work, the “Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire;” then it touches at the Castle of Chillon, immortalised by Byron; and finally lands him at Geneva, from whence he must take his departure for Chamouni—the celebrated valley at the base of the Mont Blanc territory.

Chamouni is supposed to derive its name from two Latin words, occurring in a deed of gift from Count Aynon of Geneva to a convent of Benedictines, which he founded towards the close of the eleventh century, and around which a village was gradually formed. The Latin words are Campus Munitus, or “fortified field”—in allusion to the lofty mountains and inaccessible aiguilles which on all sides surround the valley as a natural defence. To arrive, however, at the literal word, Chamouni, the Latin words must be translated into French, or into the patois of the country, and their signification will prove equally good: campus becoming champ, and munitus, muni. The term prieuré, or priory, was generally used until the year 1330; but at that time the few cottages surrounding the monastic building assumed the name of Chamouni.

Words fail to do justice to the scene it unfolds to the eye. Every visitor, however, may adopt the language of the poet: “Before me lay the whole panorama of the Alps; the pine forests standing dark and solemn at the base of the mountains; half way up was the veil of mist; above me rose the snowy summits and the sharp needles of rock, which seemed to float in the air like a fairy world. There the glaciers stood on either side, winding down through the mountain ravines; and high above all rose the white, dome-like summit of Mount Blanc. And ever and anon, through the shroud of mist, came the awful sound of the avalanche, and a continual roar, as of the wind through a forest of pines. Then the mists began to pass away, and it seemed as if the whole firmament were rolling together.”

The ascent of Mont Blanc is a most hazardous undertaking. The services of guides are secured, and by means of ropes, chains, hatchets, and ladders, the attempt is made, sometimes successfully, but very rarely so. The difficulties to be encountered may fairly be imagined, when we state that the valley of the Chamouni is 3000 feet above the level of the sea, and the Col de Balme, the first accessible height, is 7200 feet above the level of the sea. From this point, looking to the west, Mont Blanc is seen in profile, from its summit to its base, and its different parts rise above each other in their just proportions. Nearer, and in the same range, are seen the summits of the principal aiguilles, these mountain peaks rising from 11,000 to 13,000 feet above the level of the sea, and in any other situation would be regarded with astonishment; but the effect of their amazing height is diminished by the outpeering magnitude and elevation of

The monarch of mountains.

A lower range of mountains, called, from their red colour, the Aiguilles Rouges, are seen on the north side of the valley. Beyond there is Mont Brevent; and nearer, on the north-west, rise the mountains of the Valorsine. The valley of Chamouni is seen from one end to the other, with the Arve meandering along it. The Col de Balme closes the eastern end of the valley; and the western extremity is shut in by another mountain.

The scene from this eminence, says Dr. Barry, is sublime. The ascent from Martigny, in the valley of the Rhone, was very steep. Nothing was seen, advancing towards the top, besides the rocks that formed it. When suddenly there upheaved itself a scene of Alpine magnificence, long unapproachable and overwhelming; an amazing picture which the eye knew not how to scan, enchaining the beholder, lost in an astonished gaze. The prodigies of nature piled up there, cast other, even Alpine splendour, far into the shade. A thousand towering, dark, and savage peaks, lightning-riven battlements, at whose bases, hardened and heaped up, great depths of ice, bidding defiance to the sunbeams; and glaciers, winding many a league downwards through their own ravines, like belts of brightness ‘flung over a region’ black with pines. Beneath that heaven-high wall of frowning rock and chilling ice, bordering upon the barrier of permanent congelation, and like an oasis in a wilderness of frost, was the green vale of Chamouni, smiling with rural beauty and the abodes of man; the River Arve rising at my feet, and winding its silvery way through the meadows of that vale.

“But for these scenes of softer beauty, the eye was paralysed; it saw them not, save in so far as they made, by contrast, the icy regions towering above them more arctic, chill, and awfully sublime. To these, the eye, spell-bound, ever returned; and yet the one great sorcerer of the mighty scene remains unnamed. Surrounded by these rugged heights of rock, these battlements towering 9000 feet and more above the valley—so vertical that snow rests not upon their sides—there rose, far higher than them all, a snowy pyramid, in proud supremacy, yet placid and serene. It was ‘the father of the Alps,’ Mont Blanc himself, enthroned among and guarded by his dark aiguilles.”

Saussure was the first to attempt the ascent, and succeed. After him, several Englishmen performed the feat; and, we believe, about the last band of adventurous tourists who were so fortunate as to gain the snow-capt summit, was that of which an account has been written by Mr. Albert Smith, and which forms not the least graphic portion of the pleasing Alpine entertainment he is now giving in the metropolis.

Saussure's first attempt to cross the Mer de Glace—the first enormous glacier at which the real difficulties of the ascent commence—was attended by no ordinary peril sometimes he had to slide down to the bottom of little ice-valleys—the intervals of those mountain-waves which look like small undulations from the Montanvert—and then to climb out of them on the opposite side, with immense labour and fatigue. At other times, when he came to crénasses, which were very wide and deep, he had to pass them on very narrow ridges of ice, extending across from the one side to the other.

"The good Pierre Simon, my first guide in the Alps," he says, "repented strongly of having let me engage in the undertaking. He went about here and there, seeking the least dangerous passages, cutting steps in the ice, offering me a hand whenever he could, and giving me at the same time the first lessons in the art—for it is one—of putting down the feet and resting the body properly, and of making use of one's baton, in difficult passages. I escaped, however, without other injury than a few contusions, which I got in sliding down some very steep slopes of ice, which we had to descend. Pierre Simon slid down, standing upright on his feet, his body thrown back and leaning on his iron-shod baton."

Captain Basil Hall, who made the ascent, thus describes a part of it, attended, even in the view of so adventurous a spirit, with "real danger." "At a certain part of our course, the path along which we were struggling came close to the base of the cliff overhanging the Mer de Glace. On its summit there lay a thick coating of ice and half-melted snow, mixed with numerous blocks of granite, cast down by the avalanches. The frequent sound of these cataracts of snow we could hear in different directions among the mountains, and some of the avalanches we actually saw not far from us. The weather being excessively hot, the melting snow caused innumerable cascades on both sides of the valley, which were all very pretty and picturesque, so long as we kept at a respectable distance from the cliff; but, unfortunately, just over the very point where our road happened to touch the foot of the precipice, we were startled by beholding a mass of granite about as big as a mail-coach, barely held up by the ice in which it had probably at one time been completely imbedded, but out of which more than three-quarters of its bulk now protruded."

An anxious conversation now took place on the part of the guides; and the account is thus continued:

"At the end of this parley, during which we began to fear that our expedition must here stop short, two of the guides, without consulting us, or saying more than 'Be silent and steady, or you are lost!' suddenly seized the foremost of our party, and, with the swiftness of chamois goats, dashed along directly under the stone, which they afterwards explained might have been shaken down at any moment, by the mere tremor in the air caused by our speaking."

"As soon as the first of us had been whisked across the point of danger, another was spirited off in the same manner. The guides then returned one by one, stepping underneath the great rock as cautiously as if they had been treading on eggs, and transported the remaining two gentlemen to the safe side. We now begged permission of the guides to set up a shout, in order to bring the stone down, that we might enjoy the crash in safety, and appreciate the full value of our escape, by witnessing the havoc which the avalanche would cause. 'Yes,' said the guides, 'but who knows the extent of these things? How many more such fellows may not be lying further up, ready to topple down upon us—or how shall we be sure that the path, now open for us, may not be so blocked up by the falling stones and ice, that our retreat will be rendered impossible? No, no! let the rock alone; and very thankful we may be if we shall find it sticking where it is now, when we return here some hours hence.'"

After leaving the Mer de Glace, the dangers accumulate fearfully; and here we should mention, that Mont Blanc rises gradually above the surrounding mountains, till it first terminates in the summit called the Dôme de Goutte; beyond this is a valley of snow, from which rises the middle dome; another sweep, still higher, leads to the extreme rounded summit, which is named La Bosse du Dromedaire, from its supposed resemblance to a dromedary's hunch.

The ascent is not completed until this point is reached, and the parties who risk their lives in the attempt, generally bivouac for the night on the Mer de Glace.

The ravines, which are many, but wide, and the glaciers, constitute the obstacles that have to be overcome. The glaciers are streams of ice flowing down a declivity, between banks which are sometimes precipitous. They can easily be walked upon—for the entire surface, except when they are vertical, or nearly so, is covered with gritty particles. The chasms in the glaciers are frightful—some of them are 100 feet deep; and it is to guard against falling into them that the party is always large, and ascend linked to each other by strong cords, in Indian file: so that if the foremost fall into a dreadful abyss, those behind check his fall, and can drag him to the surface again. These chasms are subject to change every day, and almost every hour; and hence the extreme danger of the ascent of these treacherous highways hung in air. The fact that is well known to all the guides, and they are almost as much dreaded as the avalanches.

The glacier's cold and restless mass,
Moves onward day by day,

But supposing all the difficulties to be overcome, and the summit gained in safety and triumph, the scene must be tremendous in its sublimity—the panorama of the Alps, and the golden-tinged clouds beneath, glorious. Well might the banker poet, when he saw them for the first time, exclaim, with a touch of the wizard quill of the mystic Coleridge:

Who first beholds these everlasting clouds,
Seed-time and harvest, morning, noon, and night,
Still where they were, steadfast, immovable;
Those mighty hills, so shadowy, so sublime,
As rather to belong to heaven than earth—
But instantly receives into his soul
A sense, a feeling, that he loses not—
A something that informs him 'tis an hour
Whence he may date henceforward and for ever!"

But, as a matter of economy, the question arises—Is the sensation worth the risk? We will not risk an opinion; for Englishmen will go anywhere, or do anything. But we will complete the sketch given in our illustration, by the following account of the accident which befel the party which accompanied Dr. Hamel, during his ascent of Mont Blanc, in 1820. In proceeding obliquely upwards, they approached a dark rock, deeply imbedded in the snow, when the catastrophe occurred, as thus related by Julien Devousson, one of the guides: "At the moment of the disaster, the leading guide was Pierre Carriez, the second, Pierre Balmat, the third, Auguste Tairraz (these three perished), the fourth myself; then, next to me, Marie Coutet (our captain), then behind were five other guides, with Dr. Hamel, and two English gentlemen. Suddenly I heard a sort of rushing sound, not very loud; but I had not time to think about it, as I heard the sound at the same instant that the avalanche was upon me. I felt my feet slide from beneath me, and saw the three first men falling on the snow with their feet foremost. In falling, I cried out, loudly: 'We are all lost!' I tried to support myself by planting the ice-pole below me—but in vain. The weight of snow forced me over the baton, and it slipped out of my hand. I rolled down like a ball in the mass of loose snow. At the foot of the slope was a yawning chasm, to the edge of which I was rapidly descending. Three times I saw the light, as I was rolling down the slope; and when we were all on the very edge of the chasm, I saw the leg of one of my comrades just as he pitched down into the crevice. I think it must have been poor Auguste—for it looked black, and I remember that Auguste had on black gaiters. This was the last I saw of my three companions, who fell headlong into the gulf, and were never seen or heard of again."

"At this moment I was just falling into the same crevice, and can but confusedly understand why I did not; but I think I owe my life to a very singular circumstance. Dr. Hamel had given me a barometer to carry; this was fastened round my waist by a strong girdle. I fancy that at the moment this long barometer got beneath and across me, for the girdle suddenly broke, and I made a sort of bound as I fell: and so, instead of following my poor comrades, I was pushed over into another crevice, close by that in which they were killed. This chasm was already partly filled with snow; I do not think that I fell more than fifty feet down, alighting on a soft cushion of snow, and a good deal covered with it above. I suppose, before tumbling into the chasm, we slid down 150 to 200 feet; but I cannot tell, for it seemed to be not more than a minute from the time I heard the noise of the avalanche above me, till I found myself lying deep down in a narrow crack."

Coutet replied to a question:

"I should fancy I slid down near 400 feet, and tumbled headlong about sixty feet."

When Julien was asked what his thoughts were during his fall: his reply was:

"While I was rolling, I said to myself, 'Farewell my wife and my children!' and I asked pardon of God. I absolutely thought nothing of the others."

"On coming to myself," continued Julien, "I was better off than I expected. I was lying on my back, heels upwards, with my head resting against the icy walls of the crack, and could see some light and a little of the blue sky through two openings over my head. I was greatly afraid some of my limbs had been broken, but I had sunk into the mass of soft snow, and though bruised by falling against the sides of the ice, yet nothing was broken, and in a few moments I contrived to get up on my feet. On looking up, I saw, a little above me, a man's head projecting from the snow. It was Marie Coutet (our captain): he was quite covered with snow up to the neck, his arms pinioned down, and his face quite blue, as if he was nearly suffocated."

"He called to me in a low voice, to come and help him. I found a pole in the crevice (I think not one belonging to those who perished, but another); I went to Coutet, dug round him with the baton, and in a few minutes got Coutet clear out of the snow, and we sat down together. We remained in silence looking at each other for a minute or two, thinking that all the rest were killed. Then I began to crawl up on the snow that partly filled the crack, and in climbing up I saw above David Coutet, who was crying, and saying, 'My poor brother is lost!' I said 'No; he is here below' (for Coutet was climbing behind Julien, and was not seen at first); and I asked, 'Are the others all up there?' They answered, 'That there were three missing.' I asked, 'Who they were?' and the answer was, 'Pierre Carriez, Pierre Balmat, and Auguste Tairraz.' I then asked, 'if the gentlemen had received any injury?' and the reply was, 'No.' Then the guides helped us to get up about fourteen feet on the solid ice. They threw us down a little axe to cut steps, and put down their poles, and we two got out. We all went to search for the three others: we sounded with our poles, we cried aloud, we called them by their names, and listened—but all was in vain, we heard not the slightest sound. We spent two hours in this melancholy search, and by this time were well-nigh frozen, for the wind was bitterly cold, our poles covered with ice, our shoes frozen as hard as horn. We were compelled to descend; we hurried down in perfect silence, and returned to the inn late at night."

MOTHER AND DAUGHTER.

CHAPTER I.

"TINK—tink—tinkle!" rang the little, silvery-toned bell through the boudoir of Isabel Linn. The white hand of that peerless lady replaced the soft-toned bell upon an antique mosaic flower-table, and she relapsed into her former attitude of elegant repose. The boudoir befitted nothing but the beautiful being who was its mistress. It was a small room of circular shape—looped, like a tent, from the centre of the arched roof, with rich curtains of rose-coloured silk sweeping down the sides, and caught back from the glittering mirrors; lovely statues, soft pictures, slight tables, and rare vases, placed between slender pillars of marble. In every unoccupied recess, luxurious heaps of velvet cushions, of the same soft colour as the drapery, were thrown. The lady herself reclined on a low, yielding sofa, nearly concealed beneath the splendid dress which floated over it, but whose rose colour still softened the dazzling whiteness of the bare arm, and the rich glow of the round cheek nestled upon it. It was evening—and a lamp, tinted with the same softening tinge, flooded the beautiful apartment with a dreamy and eloquent light.

The lady was evidently dressed for an assembly. Her fine form was draped in rich crimson satin, with an overdress of exquisite lace, rare and delicate. Ornaments of gold and rubies caught the lace upon her snowy bosom, and held it up from her exceedingly lovely arms; and from them it waved back and fell around like—like nothing; for nothing was ever so beautiful. Her black hair was twisted with rubies, and wound around her head in magnificent folds. Her style of beauty was so brilliant, that all the jewels upon her hands, and arms, and bosom, and hair, seemed part of her loveliness, and were not misplaced. If the rubies were bright, her lips were as red and her eyes as flashing; and the beautiful contrast of her raven hair, waved back from her high, white forehead and haughtily-curved neck, were still more dazzling. After ringing the silver bell, she sank into her former listless attitude, and, when a servant entered at the door, she said, without raising her eyes:

"When Mr. Cleveland Merefort calls, show him in here."

The servant departed, and she was again alone with her thoughts. That they were pleasant, was shown by the gay smile which broke gradually over her face—the rich lips parting, the fair cheeks crimsoning, and the dark eyes shining like deep waters beneath their drooped lashes. Isabel Linn was not young—she was thirty-five, and looked twenty-five; but she was peerlessly beautiful; more splendidly so than a younger lady could be. A strong will and powerful passions breathed in all her attitudes, glances, and features; the motion of her firm but graceful foot, the curve of her delicate nostrils, the superb turn to her full, red lips, the sleeping fire in her large, slow-moving eyes, made her a fascinating and fearful creature. But she had made it a study through all her life, until she had attained a wonderful degree of self-possession. There was something that breathed of power and passion in the very calmness of her slow, graceful motions. And now, though there were a thousand emotions making her heart throb, she stirred not one of her delicate fingers, nor the small slipper just revealed beneath her flowing dress.

Presently the door again opened softly. Her bosom heaved quickly, a deep flush broke over her cheek; and, with a smile of ineffable brightness, she slowly raised her deep, bewildering eyes towards the door. But she paused in the welcome that rose to her lips, and the flush went back from her face—for it was not yet he who had come.

A young girl stood timidly within the room, hesitating whether to go or remain—for the lady did not bid her enter. She was young and fair—not more than fifteen—with a slight form, and hair like an angel's wing—changing, bright, and golden. There was something in her gentle hesitation very different from the proud repose of the beautiful woman before her. Her dress was of delicate white, and some bright roses laid on her bosom.

"You may come in," at length said the lady. The maiden glided in, and sat down on a cushion by the sofa.

"Effie, my daughter!" said the woman, with unusual tenderness—for she was chary of the affection she bestowed on her only child; but love was busy at the mother's heart—and love softens the manner towards all. Wild, wild dreams of love were waking in her bosom, and changed her cold bearing unconsciously.

"Mother," said the fair girl, hesitatingly raising her sweet face, and then dropping her eyes till the silken lashes touched the cheek, where a delicate glow was wavering out into a blush; "mother"—and her cheeks were crimson—"you know I am but a child—only fifteen; I never yet kept anything from you, and may I not tell you how very, very happy I am, and how my heart is still trembling with its new delight? You know—"

The bashful girl paused, and the mother, wondering if that mere child could have found a lover, laid her white hand on those brown curls, to reassure her.

"You know Cleveland Merefort, mother?"

"Yes—yes! what of him?" suddenly exclaimed the mother, withdrawing her hand, and fixing her burning eyes intently on the blushing face before her; "what of him?"

"Oh, mother! you will not be offended—you cannot be; he is good, and manly, and gifted! I could not think it a harm to love him. He is so beautiful and so gentle, and loves me so earnestly—I am sure he does!" murmured the timid girl, as her cheek grew pale, and the tears sprang instantly to her soft eyes.

"Indeed! Did he tell you this? did he say he loved you?" asked the lady, in a tone of withering contempt; "or are you not guessing at all this happiness?"

"He did tell me that he loved me!" was the proud and earnest reply; "and I knew it was truth he uttered, for his eyes were solemn, and looked into mine so gently, and his lips trembled as he spoke these happy words; and when he drew me close to his heart, I felt it beat so rapidly, and—"

"Effie—Effie—Effie!" almost shrieked the woman.

"You frighten me, mother!—you look so fearful! What have I done? Is it wrong to love him? Tell me, dear mother, is it?" pleaded the quivering voice of the young girl, shrinking from the intense gaze of those dilated and burning eyes. "Do not look at me so!" she continued, as that motionless look, and the spot of livid red on the cheeks of her mother, made her tremble.

"Effie Linn, remember!" was uttered in the distinct tone of deep passion; "you will never marry that man—never! Receive no more vows of love from him! Cast him off—forget him—or you are no child of mine! Remember!"

"Cast him off? Never—never!" murmured the young creature, whom this sudden shock to her sweet happiness, startled from a whole world of life-dreams, to a sense of utter misery; and, with these words she fell from the ottoman, insensible, upon the rich carpet, whose gay lines mocked the pallor of her cheek.

Again the bell sounded a sharper summons than before; and, to the servant who appeared, the lady spoke in a cold, calm tone:

"Summon her maid, and assist my daughter to her room—she is not well!"

The maid came, and they bore the fainting girl from the apartment.

The moment they disappeared, Isabel Linn passed her hand over her forehead, as if to feel if all traces of her passion were smoothed away. The game she had to play was now more difficult, and at this moment required all her skill.

Five minutes afterwards, Cleveland Merefort stood within the room. He glanced around the exquisite boudoir with a look of surprise, mingled slightly with embarrassment. He was a very handsome man, of thirty, with a polished and frank bearing, and a singularly fascinating smile—though he seldom smiled; dignified almost to coldness; evidently gifted—evidently a most perfect gentleman. There was a kind of sadness in his eyes, and reserve in his manner, which told of passionate feeling repressed and hidden; a kind of mournfulness in his smile which went quick to the heart; a kind of pride that mingled with his reserve, which made him deeply interesting: and all these things said that he was evidently a poor man. And this was, perhaps, the reason why he had never loved or married hitherto.

"Mr. Merefort," said the lady, raising her dark eyes slowly, with a sweet smile upon her lips, and holding out her small hand, without rising from the sofa.

As he advanced towards her with slight confusion, her heart told her that this consciousness was not, as she had fondly hoped, an evidence of her power, but was owing to the thought that Effie had revealed the new relation in which he stood to her.

"Sit here!" she said, retaining his hand a moment, and motioning to the ottoman, where Effie had sat.

The gentleman felt grateful and gratified; for he had no doubt now but that she was prepared to receive him as her son-in-law; and previously, notwithstanding her marked kindness to him, he had entertained a fear that his poverty would be an objection to his claiming the hand of the daughter of the rich Widow Linn.

"Is Miss Effie unwell this evening?" he asked, taking the seat she assigned him close by her side.

"A little indisposed—nothing serious," was the reply; "she retired to her room a few moments ago."

"Indeed!" was the remark, in a disappointed tone.

"I have not ordered the carriage for an hour yet," continued Mrs. Linn, sweetly; "and we will have a quiet chat, which will be charming—will it not? By-the-bye, do you fancy the arrangement of my boudoir?"

"It is delightful—a fairy palace!" replied her visitor, glancing through the elegant apartment with a pleased eye. "How very kind she is to give me this opportunity to speak!" thought he; and the beautiful lady, whom he had always admired, appeared doubly brilliant and lovely to him then.

But if he had the opportunity, he had no way to improve it; for the fascinating woman reclining on the sofa before him, in her splendid attire, with the rosy light falling over her, fixed her large dark eyes upon him, and murmured, in a low voice of music, a thousand eloquent things; leading his thoughts even from the subject which engrossed them.

She spoke of beauty, and he felt how very beautiful she was. She spoke of love; and he realised that she was capable of intense love; that passionate emotions throbbed beneath the bosom heaving in those rich folds of satin and lace. Burning words of poetry fell in liquid cadences from her lips; and he wondered at, and then was carried away by her irresistible eloquence. He was a worshipper at the shrine of beauty, genius, poetry, love; and here before him was a lovely—nay, a glorious woman—radiant with one and gifted with another, breathing the third, and glowing and blushing with the last. The ball, and even the sweet Effie in her lonely room, were forgotten. He bent forward, with smiling eyes and heightened colour, to listen; his own eloquence, so often concealed by reserve, was awakened, and he rivalled her in the utterance of beautiful sentiments.

In the midst of all this, the carriage was announced; and the splendid siren, with a gay laugh at their forgetfulness of time, took the arm of her companion, and they were whirled away to the ball; while young Effie lay moaning upon her restless pillow.

It was late when the two entered the brilliant ball. Many eyes were centered upon them. They were certainly the most striking couple in the room.

Mrs. Linn was the leader of the ton, and the handsome Cleveland was even more interesting than usual; something sparkled through his dignity that was very pleasing. He was a fine waltzer, so was the superb widow. They waltzed till every eye was upon them—it was so beautiful. They floated around in the music, perfume, and light. The lace dress waved, and the satin glistened about that lovely form; her cheek was glowing, and her rubies flashing. Cleveland himself was enchanted: it was perfectly entrancing to hold that magnificent creature, and to circle and glide, and float away in that bright atmosphere, breathing with bewitching melody. He felt his companion, dizzy with the motion, press closer to him—and he wished that it was Effie that was sharing this delight; and he whirled on till the bright head sank on his bosom—then he was obliged to seat his beautiful partner. No—no—he did not wish it was Effie, was his after thought—not Effie, with all those eyes upon her, bold and admiring; he was almost sorry it was Effie's mother. But he forgot this presently, and after a time they waltzed again. It was a brilliant party—all seemed delighted. It was late when they drove home, but the spirits of Mrs. Linn were hardly yet fatigued.

"You will call to-morrow?" she said, as Cleveland left her at the door. The flattered man consented, with pleasure, to come to a private tea with Effie and herself in the boudoir—for Mrs. Linn added this to her invitation.

CHAPTER II.

THE lady did not wake her maid when she reached her room, but, unfasting her heavy ornaments, she laid them aside, and threw herself upon her couch: though very weary, she did not sleep. Her feelings were of very mingled character: triumph—for she saw that she impressed Cleveland Merefort; bitterness, that he had not paid homage to her power before, but had dared to pass her by, and bestow his love on a mere sweet child; anxiety, for the result of the game she played; and taxing her ingenuity to know best how to manage Effie, and compel her to resign him of her own consent.

She lay sleeplessly till long past sunrise, busy with her thoughts, and then, throwing on her morning-gown, she sought the chamber of Effie. The fair girl lay upon the bed, dressed in the same attire, and with the same roses lying withered on her bosom, as on the evening previous. She had not undressed, but was now sleeping nervously. Her eyelids were stained with tears, her cheek was feverish, and she moaned and muttered in her dreams.

Her mother sat down by the bed-side, and looked upon her. A thrill of remorse shot through her heart as she gazed; but it was momentary: she herself could not be the sacrifice—her child must be. She reasoned that her love was the strongest—for it was the love of her passionate and developed nature. No!—Effie must be the sacrifice!

The eyes of the maiden opened presently, as if she was awakened by the gaze fixed upon her.

"Oh! mother!" she murmured, pleadingly.

"My darling child, did what I said last night distress you so much? I was afraid that you were suffering, and I have come thus early to talk with you about it."

"You have come to take back those cruel words—to take them all back! I know you have—you speak so kindly!" said Effie, eagerly.

"Not to take them back," said the mother, in the gentlest tone; "but to give you reasons for what I said—good reasons, that will reconcile you to them."

"Reconcile me!" replied the fair girl, mournfully.

"Effie, I will take you into my confidence. You dare not betray the trust of your mother—you cannot rival her! I love Cleveland Merefort as never woman loved! Speak my child! your mother's happiness is in your keeping!"

"Do I not, too, love him, wildly, devotedly? Mother, it would kill me to give him up!—mother—mother—mother!"

"Listen, Effie—I would not be selfish! I do not wish to be selfish; but I am older than you, and know the heart better! I know that with you it is but a school-girl affection—in two years you will smile at the idea of dying for love! But with me it is life, hope, being—all! If I thought that you would suffer in all as I have already suffered since you told me he loved you, I would sooner perish than require it!"

"But, mother, he loves me! and I shall wrong myself and him!"

"Act coldly to him, and he will forget you; only consent, and I can make him love me!"

The young girl hid her eyes, and moaned:

"Mother—mother!"

"Listen again, Effie—I have not told you all—you cannot dream how utterly my hopes are fixed on this! Effie, I will reveal my heart to you—this is my first love, as it is my last! From my infancy till I was married, I suffered the pangs of poverty; I was beautiful—but beauty was a mockery—for I was poor! I longed for the means of gratifying my tastes—for arraying my loveliness in jewels, and silks, and laces. I longed to be a belle—to be admired! Oh, I forgot that there was anything to be prized but wealth! In vain my mother warned me! At your age I married a man whom I could not like—but he was very rich! What mattered it if he was cold, and ugly, and ignorant?—he was rich. I was his wife—I lived in splendour, and was courted, flattered, and envied. I was beautiful and wealthy, but I was miserable. I hated your father—I could not endure his caresses. Yet all the ten long years he lived with me I was compelled to conceal this; for, should he know it, at his death but one-third of his immense wealth would be mine. He was blind to my dislike, and at his death left all to me. At last I was free—free as the wind—with all things at my command. You, Effie, were my child, and everything you asked was yours. You have always been gratified in every wish—but all this time that I loved you, and cherished you, could I dream in what way you were to rise up and crush me?"

Again the young girl moaned helplessly.

"At last I have loved!—with all the intensity of sentiments and passions hoarded up and stifled for long years, I love. To say I love, is an empty term. I find that my very reason is bound up in this feeling. Effie, could you be happy, married to this man; and your mother, perhaps—I feel so!"—and she pressed her hand to her forehead—"perhaps a maniac, or happily in her grave? Never! And I would not have said this—I would have suffered and died—but that I am convinced that your happiness is not really concerned in this. Remember, you are a mere child—just from your books and aprons—it cannot be! But you say nothing—you forget that I am your mother, that my life is in your childish hands! You will marry Cleveland Merefort?"

The woman who had always been so cold, and proud, and calm, that the young girl had almost feared her, was now on her knees before her child. It was enough, and too much.

"Mother, rise! I did not speak, because I could not—but I am resolved. I cannot, after what you have said, marry this man. I only hope that he will love you. Go—go, if you please, mother! I want to be alone!"

"Bless you, my child! my darling, noble child! Of course your own good sense will suggest what is the proper manner for you to observe towards Mr. Merefort. Try and forget this, dearest, and I shall at length be happy!"

She kissed the cold brow of her daughter, and left the room. Well satisfied with the result of her skilful appeal to the heart of poor Effie, and fatigued with all this excitement, she again sought her couch, and slept undisturbed for many hours; while the one whom she had called on to make this bitter sacrifice, was pacing her room with the slow steps of misery.

It was after dinner before she summoned her maid to assist her in dressing.

"Which is the most becoming, Margaret—this green velvet, or this black one?"

"The green velvet makes madame look magnifique—the black very charming; the black makes madame's eyes look very bright, and her lips red!"

"I will wear the black this evening, Margaret, as I do not wish to look magnificent in my boudoir."

So, when the maid had finished attiring her, her mistress was herself pleased with the plain, elegant, black velvet, and with the delicate net-work of gold thrown over the back of her glossy hair, together with plain gold bracelets. She stood long, studying this style in her mirror. Her hair was done up high in folds, and shone blackly through the chaste and glittering network; the bodice of her dress was close and plain; her arms, bare to the dimpled elbow, looked rounder and snowier than was their wont, in the broad circlets of gold which bound them. Her dress gave a pensive, touching air to her brilliant beauty; her eyes did indeed look darker and deeper, their curved lashes longer, and her bright lips fresher and dewier. A crimson thread would almost have destroyed the effect of this simple elegance. She decided that her dress, at least, was perfect.

Mrs. Linn was in her boudoir when Cleveland entered. The two sat down at the little table which had been brought in and set with a dainty repast, in delicate taste. The young man looked anxious, till his hostess informed him that her daughter was still indisposed, and could not appear. He then looked both anxious and disappointed.

"Is she seriously ill?" he asked, earnestly.

"Only a very little indisposed, yet she thinks she had better keep her room to-day."

"She must be really unwell if she will not come down to see me!" thought the lover, and the expected pleasure of his visit vanished. He was silent and grave. In vain the winning woman exercised her powers of fascination: they fell unappreciated upon him, except that he thought that the sweet lady before him was too young and lovely to wear the title of mother to a man of his age—and he smiled to himself at the fanciful thought.

Thinking this, he looked at her more earnestly, and thought her more beautiful than ever—for her brilliant charms were softened into a more pensive style; and the wild, impassioned love she secretly cherished, lent a melting, glowing sweetness to her tones and actions. Her eyes were almost bewildering, but there was something about them that did not, could not, touch his heart like the clear, pure, innocent ones of his soul's sweet choice.

The little tea-party was a failure! Cleveland continued silent and sad, and rose at last to leave. The widow was chagrined, but she did not at all despair.

As Cleveland returned through the parlours alone—having begged of his hostess not to trouble herself to accompany him—he saw Effie half-concealed in the embrasure of a window in one of the apartments. He advanced immediately in surprise, and held out his hand.

"And you are well enough to be standing here, and would not even come a moment to see me at tea?" he said, reproachfully, gazing fondly into her lovely face.

The poor girl could not speak that moment. She had not known he was there, but dared not say so; and, if she had known it, what would it avail? She turned very pale.

"Forgive me, dearest—you do indeed look faint and ill!" continued he, with anxious tenderness. "You are not going to be really so sick? oh, I hope not!"

"I am not very unwell," she said, at length, in a faint, cold tone, withdrawing from the arm he had extended when she looked so white. "I have a slight headache."

It was so unlike her usual confiding sweetness, that he knew that she was ill or offended.

"Oh, my darling Effie! you don't know how I wanted to see you last night! And to-night I was so glad—I thought you would be with your mother, and we should have such a happy evening! I was so anxious, I could not remain—I fear your mother thought I was hardly polite. Oh, dearest! I wished to steal to your chamber and see if you were ill, and kiss your poor forehead, if it ached, before I came away!" and he would have pressed his truthful lips upon her pure brow, but again she shrank away.

Her heart beat almost to bursting—she would have given worlds to have received that kiss. She thought of her mother, and her promise.

"Mr. Merefort!" she said, in a constrained tone.

"Effie!" was the sad and grieved reply. "Effie!" he continued, "have I offended you unconsciously? Believe me, I do not know in what manner! Tell me, that I may atone! You are very much altered to-night, dearest!"

"Not at all, Mr. Merefort; pray do not think I am offended!" she replied, in the same constrained tone.

She did not dare to raise her eyes to meet his look of surprise.

"Good evening, Effie!" he said, in a wounded tone.

"Good evening!" was the chilling reply.

The next moment he was gone, and the unhappy girl sank down upon the floor, and buried her face in her hands. Her heart was almost broken.

And she must still play this terrible part—wound his love, estrange his affections, when her own heart was yearning wildly—and she must see him give that love to another—see him at the altar: it was a martyrdom to her heart more cruel than death. But she had resolved, and promised to play her part; and she would not fail—it must be done.

CHAPTER III.

WEEKS and weeks had passed away. In vain had the lover striven to ascertain the cause of the change in Effie's manner. At first he pleaded to know, when by chance he met her; then his wounded pride and affections kept him silent; and at length he ceased to speak to her except in the most formal way. But he suffered almost as much as she; he endured the agony of suspense, and the torture of her chilling demeanour. She saw that he suffered; and the noble, patient, heart-weary girl would have revealed all to him for his sake, but that her duty to her mother seemed sacred: so she only hoped that he might forget her, and be happy. But she could not look upon his proud but mournful face, without almost betraying herself; and at length she avoided him altogether.

Yet he still visited at the house of Mrs. Linn. He was irresistibly attracted by the syren. At first he imagined that the mother knew of his attachment to her daughter, and sympathised with him in her neglect; then again he concluded that she knew nothing of it, but that he was a favourite of hers—perhaps that she loved him! No, no—he could not think that; but there was something about her that attracted him by her side, and made him wish for her sympathy and gentleness. Not that he was not yet true to his Effie—he was!—he was! He loved her with the intense fervour that a reserved, proud, intellectual man of thirty will love for the first time a sweet, pure, gifted girl. But this very love made him seek the mother: he had a faint hope that through her he might at least discover the cause of this strange falsity on the part of his affianced. She was so soothing, so gentle, so beautiful, so eloquent, that, unconsciously, he was deeply interested in her, and could not pass a day out of her society: it was a balm to his suffering heart.

She saw all this, and acted accordingly. She saw just how far he was in her power, and she had a hope. It was a longer struggle to gain him from his disappointment than she had anticipated—but she did not despair. To her it was happiness to have him come and sit by her, if he only listened to her words—for Effie was out of the way, and he was hers alone—if his mournful thoughts did still wander away after the beloved false one. She stifled all pangs of remorse—she lived but for one thing: to gain the love of Mr. Merefort.

One morning Isabel Linn sat in a beautiful apartment, opening into the conservatory. The room was fresh and pleasant. She was attired with studied carelessness, and looked very lovely. A book was in her hand, which she laid aside with a flush of joy, as Cleveland entered; he came across the rich carpet, and sat down upon a low seat beside her luxurious arm-chair. He was more than usually sad; he sat for some time without speaking, while Isabel looked upon him with tender eyes.

"Do you believe there is such a thing as true and constant love?" he asked, suddenly, raising his dark eyes intently to her face.

Those beautiful orbs of hers seemed to melt away in tenderness, as she looked into his, without answering in words.

"You are sad this morning?" she said, softly. "I would that I could banish that mournfulness from your face for ever!"

"You may perhaps alleviate it!" he replied, slowly.

"Then tell me?" she said, with a sweet smile, bending towards him.

"Let me confide to you the secret of this sadness," he said.

She held out her delicate, fair hand, and he pressed it in both his, as he said, rapidly:

"I loved your daughter, Mrs. Linn—I was betrothed to her; I loved intensely and purely, and thought she returned it. I believed the gentle words that trembled on her lips and the blush on her cheek, when she told me that her love was like to mine. But for many weeks she has slighted me: I have not even seen her recently. The change was so sudden, so entire, I could not but believe that she loved me still as ever, but that some fatal misunderstanding existed. Tell me, do you know aught of this? and, if you do not, will you be so very, very kind, as to learn for me the reasons of this change?"

Mrs. Linn listened with a soft smile, and when he raised his eyes earnestly, to hear the answer to his questions, she smiled still more—yet kindly, gently, pityingly.

"Can it be that a man of your experience and knowledge of life could trust his happiness to a mere child?" she said, with a burst of gentle surprise. "Effie has but just left her studies, Mr. Merefort; and of course the offer of love you made was accepted: young girls cannot know themselves, and are invariably flattered by the first attentions they receive. Doubtless her conduct now is but a foolish caprice—some other admirer has appeared, and you are forgotten. I only regret that your noble and true love was given so carelessly, to such a child. But it would not be manly to let a school-girl make you unhappy!"

Cleveland bit his lips with mortification and agony. Could it be possible he had been such a very simpleton?

"But I would not have a worn-out, second love. So you think there is no such thing in life as earnest, true, unchanging love?" he asked, bitterly.

"How could I think so?" she asked, in a low, sweet tone, and, turning those large, dark, passionate eyes slowly to his, she bent forward still farther, and made no other reply.

Her companion knew not what to say. He was fascinated by that eloquent face—yet his heart was still true to another.

"Yes!" she said, earnestly, after awhile; "I know that there is a love, which is hardly a love—it is so much of worship, thought, life; but it is not the shrieking love of a trifling, timid child. It is the passionate devotion, the wild idolatry, the burning affection of older, stronger, more fully-developed natures. It is the love that comes at the time when the heart knows itself and others; when its thoughts are matured, its impulses strengthened, its gifts cultivated, its affections deepened into steady, fervent, intense power; when the spirit and the beauty and the genius of life are at the zenith of their glory. It is passion—it is hope—it is life—it is all! it is fearfully, madly deep and strong! it does all, dares all, sacrifices all, to its own intensity!"

She bent further forward as she paused, and laid her soft hands on the dark curls of the man before her, and pressed a quick, warm kiss upon his forehead. Then, folding those hands over her bosom, she drooped her head, while a crimson blush burned on her cheek, where the long lashes trembled in drooping confusion.

There was a moment's silence, while Cleveland gazed upon the blushing, beautiful, impassioned creature who had thus revealed her love to him. Had he indeed been mistaken in looking for unselfish love from a very young girl? did this splendid woman love the most devotedly? It would seem so; for, while one would not make a sacrifice of pride to explain the cause of her estrangement—or perhaps had even no pride and no cause—the other had sacrificed pride and more, and now sat trembling and subdued before him. While he still thought, a tear dropped down from those long, jetty lashes, and fell on his hand. The spell was completed. He sank upon his knees, took the small hands from her bosom, and pressed them to his own.

"May I look for that love and devotion from my beautiful Isabel?" he asked.

The superb head was on his shoulder—broken, murmuring words of tenderness fell from her lips—and then, blushing, radiant, smiling, confused, bewildered, she glided from the room, and left him kneeling, entranced and dreaming, by her chair.

"Come to-night," she said, as she left him.

For a long while Cleveland knelt there, with his head drooped upon his hand. His heart beat so violently, that he could not think calmly. When his pulses grew more subdued, he realised that he did not yet love the beautiful creature who had just left him—but he thought he might do so—and for her sake he would try. Of Effie he thought with a curling lip—she was unworthy; yet there was still a desolation and gloom in his heart. It would yet take all the beauty and the skill of Isabel Linn to complete the triumph which had sent her quivering, joyous, blushing, happy, to her chamber, to hide her tumultuous bliss in solitude.

By-and-by the young man arose and stepped out into the conservatory, to soothe his mingled feelings among the flowers. There, close by the door, lying among the bright blossoms, pale and still, was the broken-hearted and devoted Effie. She had seen all that had passed within; and when she heard that, low, earnest question of Cleveland's, and saw him sink upon the floor and clasp her mother's hand, the strong purpose which had upheld her gave way, and she fell, insensible, among the fair flowers—none of them so lovely yet so blighted as herself.

Her lover looked upon her for a moment, motionless. She had grown very slender since he saw her last; traces of heart-suffering were on her transparent forehead, and pale lips, and wasted form. In a moment he felt that he had wronged her—that she was and had been very unhappy—and for what cause? He resolved now to know, if it was not too late. He took her in his arms, and bore her into the drawing-room—took a chased gold bottle of salts from the table, and sat down on the sofa, supporting her head on his breast, chafing her hands, and applying the salts to her nostrils. Still she did not stir, though her pulse beat faintly in her delicate wrist. A glass of wine stood on a small stand near by—some of this he poured between her lips—and after a few anxious moments, she gave a faint sigh, then breathed gently, and unclosed her eyes.

The face of her lover bent above her—his deep eyes were looking with unutterable tenderness upon her.

"Cleveland, is it you? do I rest here?" she uttered faintly, and with a blissful smile, she pressed her head closer on his bosom, half clasped him with her arms, and closed her eyes again. "I did not think I should ever nestle here again—yet you love me still! You have come to me to tell me how entirely I am yours!"

The young man replied to her low murmur with fervent kisses on the sweet brow that had grown so pale and spiritual. She loved him yet—he knew it now; yet, like a sharp dagger, came the remembrance of the past scene! it was that which had taken the breath from the young lips of Effie. What should he do? He was false to her—it was but for a moment—and he knew it; ay, and another knew it, and rejoiced in it. His brow contracted with pain. Oh, how he longed to have this mystery cleared away—for he felt there was a mystery! He awaited anxiously for the fair creature he sustained to gain strength to tell him all.

Suddenly the young girl pressed her hands upon her temples.

"I feel such agony here!" she exclaimed—and, before her supporter could prevent her, she sprang from him, and stood in the centre of the apartment.

Her eyes were now wide open and brilliant, and her cheeks were red, and clear, and hot, and her forehead pale.

"Mother! mother! mother!" she moaned, clasping her hands piteously; "do not be so cruel! See how you lure him away from me! Ah, mother! you look like a beautiful serpent, enchanting him! I see your great eyes burning down into his! I told you I would die, mother, if you took him from me! and look!"—pressing her hands on her heart—"there is such a pain here, that I know I am dying! Dying—dying, mother! and you killed me!"

Cleveland shuddered at the unnaturally brilliant eyes that were fixed upon him with a gaze of reproach and feverish agony; he shuddered at that wild look and burning form—his Effie was delicious! But he would not summon help yet—he wished to hear from her raving lips the whole of this mystery. The young girl now came a step towards him, and the expression of her face changed—her large eyes were troubled, and tender, and pleading.

"My own Cleveland! do not look so coldly upon me! for sweet mercy's sake, turn away that bitter look! I did not mean to be cold to you—believe me, I did not! and when I saw you look so despairing—oh! Cleveland, my heart was breaking—slowly, slowly breaking! But she bade me do so, dearest—she compelled me! I pleaded to the stars, and they did not listen! I prayed to the angels, and they heard me not! Cruel! cruel! cruel! It is terrible, to see you look so—do I not shrink and quiver before your gaze? Oh! Cleveland, I shall shriek out, if you do not pity me and forgive! See, I am at your feet—at your feet, Cleveland!"

The young girl was kneeling at his feet, with her pale, thin hands outstretched to him; her whole face was brilliant with fever, and softened by its pleading expression. It would have touched a heart of stone to have seen that burning, beautiful, mournful face! If the mother had witnessed it, it might have smote her heart! The lover's breast hardly held its bursting emotions. "Oh, curses on that beautiful deceiver! curses on my silly self!" he exclaimed, in the bitterness of anger and remorse.

"You curse me, Cleveland?" said the poor girl, in a reproachful tone, clasping his knees, and hiding her wild, sad face.

"Curse you for my own mad folly? Dearest, look upon me! see! I am beseeching you to listen to me! I love you so tenderly—so dearly!"

He took her up from the floor, and supported her in his arms, trying to soothe her, and make her comprehend him.

"Is it indeed you, Cleveland? have you come to take me from my dreadful mother? Ah! she deceived you so terribly, that it broke my heart! Let us sit down and talk about it!"

They sat down on the sofa, and he held her.

"Hark! I hear the flowers in the conservatory laughing and singing, because you love me yet, and will take me away! I am so happy—my heart is all in a flutter—my brain is burning—do you hear them laugh? Ah! they are moaning—it is not you—you must be my poor mother! Yes, it is you, Cleveland! I hear your deep voice—my mother's voice is sweeter, but it is deceitful! I do not love her—do you, dearest? Now I remember, you told her that you would love her, and it made my heart ache; but we will love her together, and—are you here, dear? it is so dark, I cannot see you!"

Here she sank against him more heavily, and murmured inarticulately. He had heard enough to set his soul on fire; and, very much alarmed at the illness of his Effie, he laid her carefully on the sofa, felt her throbbing temples, and hurriedly rang the bell.

"Call Mrs. Linn," he said, to the servant.

In a short time Isabel came back into the apartment, with a soft blush, and a look of inquiry.

"Your daughter is ill!" he said, almost sternly.

The haughty woman turned pale, and would have stammered out a question, but, passing her with a cold bow,

Cleveland Merefort hurried into the streets, and paced them with restless steps.

Effie loved him yet—oh, joy! but Effie was very ill, and would not probably live—oh, unutterable agony!

CHAPTER IV.

It was the crisis of the fever!

Profound silence was in the marble mansion of Mrs. Linn. In one of the lower apartments, with his face buried in the arms which were folded over a chair, knelt Cleveland Merefort—waiting in intense anxiety for the messenger who should bear the fatal or joyful tidings; moving not—scarcely breathing—in his suspense.

In the chamber above, the sick girl lay sleeping. The nurse, physician, and mother were gathered around her bed. Wasted, and pale, and still, she lay on the white pillow; the breath just trembled on her pallid lips.

The mother sat with her head drooped on her hands, watching the face of her child. God forgive her! but, as she looked upon that sweet but deathly face, there was hope in her heart, which she dared not acknowledge to herself, that the crisis might not be favourable! deeper emotions than those called up by the situation of the child agitated her, though her face was pale and calm. She feared—indeed she knew—that the man she loved must know all; for his stern look, and the incoherent ravings of Effie, convinced her of this.

Very, very fallible and slender, therefore, were the hopes she entertained of now succeeding. A tempest of varying passions—love, anger, sorrow, mortification, revenge—every feeling by turns burned in her bosom.

After a long, weary watch, the sleep of the invalid was broken. She unclosed her eyes: in an instant the doctor was bending over her.

"She will live, madam," he said, after a moment of suspense.

"Ah, heaven be praised!" said the nurse; and, approaching Mrs. Linn, she whispered: "There is a young gentleman down stairs, in a dreadful fret to hear from our dear young lady—shall I send word that she is better, and will get well?"

The mother started, and changed countenance.

"I will go myself, and tell him this happy news," she said; and, kissing her daughter's forehead, she hurried from the room.

It was a great effort for her to appear calm, as she entered the room where Cleveland was yet kneeling. But she need not have striven so hard, for he had that moment forgotten his position towards her. When she entered, he sprang up.

"Tell me instantly, Mrs. Linn—oh, speak! is she dying?"

"The crisis is past—the physician pronounces her out of danger!"

The lover clasped his hands fervently.

"And now, dear one," said the lady, with the smile of an angel, "now that this anxiety is over, we can again spend a charming hour together! Sit here—I want to talk of all that has happened since we were separated by this unfortunate illness."

Mr. Merefort declined the seat she proffered, with a cold, impatient air.

"Can I not be permitted to look upon the poor sufferer—my Effie?" he asked.

Isabel did not blush nor frown, but replied with her everlasting, beautiful smile.

"Ah, I scarcely know! any excitement might—"

"But she shall not see me—I will not speak!" interrupted the lover, eagerly. "Believe me, I will be discreet!"

The lady gnashed her teeth secretly, but smiled again.

"Come, then; but I will not answer for you to the doctor!" she said.

He followed her with a beating heart; and, silently entering the sick room, stood by the bed-side, concealed by the curtain.

Oh, his darling, beautiful, suffering Effie! He would have given a fortune, had he possessed it, to press that wasted form to his breast, and see a smile on that pale, pure cheek. Still, and colourless, and exquisitely lovely she lay—so motionless and pure, like a rare statue, only more spiritual, more transparent.

"Doctor," she said, faintly, as they all gazed on her, "have I been very ill?"

"Yes, my dear lady; but you must not speak now."

She moved her eyes slowly, till they fell on her mother's face.

"You here, my dear mother?" and, as her eyes still wandered, they rested on the countenance of her lover, who, in his agitation, had advanced within sight: a faint, sweet smile shone then from those large eyes; "and you, too, Cleveland? then mother has repented! You are mine! bless you—bless you, mother!" she almost whispered—she was so weak.

No one heard her but the two interested. Mrs. Linn grew pallid.

"The young lady must cease talking," here interrupted the doctor.

Effie made an effort to extend her hand to her betrothed, as he was turning away: he took it, held it a moment tenderly, looking down into those loving, languid eyes with mournful interest; then turned away, and left the house, despite the still placid invitation of the lady to remain.

After he departed, Mrs. Linn's tender smile vanished. She went to her room, closed the door, and paced hurriedly to and fro. The mask of sweetness was thrown aside, and it was frightful to see her in the paroxysms of mortification and disappointment. She tore her magnificent hair, ill it hung in dishevelled masses around her haughty form; she bit her convulsed lips till they were stained with blood; she snatched her jewels, and flung them away; she stamped her delicate feet till they were blistered; she tore the muslin drapery from her beautiful arms, and the folds of silk and linen from her swelling, passionate, wild, mad heart! She threw herself prostrate on the floor, with her black locks and torn garments streaming around her. Then she arose, and lifted up, in threatening grandeur, her clenched hand. Splendid, yet degrading sight! passions that, cultivated and restrained, would have made her sublime in womanly power, now raging uncontrolled—wrecking and convulsing their fair tenement! One moment she was a hateful fury, debased by anger and malice, grinding her teeth and tearing herself; the next, she was terribly, touchingly beautiful—as anguish, and sorrow, and regret, at this blighting of her first, strong love agitated her. Then the dark eyes were thrown upward, in an intensity of agony, their long lashes trembling on the contracted brows; then her burning lips quivered, and her small hands pressed her throbbing bosom; then the attitude of that superb form was eloquent of despair.

Half the night the excited woman gave herself up to this uncontrolled outbreak of her emotions. What dreadful thoughts suggested themselves during that time, who shall say? That she did curse her daughter for falling ill, for getting well, is true; but whether darker thoughts of yet making that recovery impossible brooded in her selfish soul, the events that followed only witnessed to. We know that such things have transpired—and Isabel Linn was wilful, passionate, unprincipled, uncontrolled; she loved her daughter's affianced, and hated that daughter.

Completely exhausted, Isabel at length threw herself on the bed, and fell into a muttering slumber. It was late next day when she awoke. She sprang from her couch, and hastened to the mirror. It gave back her features pale and haggard; her lips were blood-stained, her eyes heavy: there seemed wrinkles on that beautiful face.

"It will never do to indulge in this!" she murmured. I look ten years older than I did yesterday!"

From that time forward, for several days, the haughty, cold, indifferent manner of Isabel, was changed for one of gentleness and suavity, at least, before Cleveland—who came every day, as Effie grew stronger, to sit beside her couch: sometimes silently holding her hand, sometimes reading to her, and sometimes whispering dear words which brought a faint hue of happiness to the cheek of the invalid. Isabel even took the lover to her boudoir one day, and humbled herself before him, confessing, with penitential sorrow, that she had been the cause of Effie's illness; but that she had no idea that so mere a child was really so interested—that her own wild love blinded her; but that now she saw the wrong, and had made a great effort, for her child's sake, to smother her own feelings; and she thought that she had conquered them; when Effie was well enough, they would have a wedding. She could smile now, to see her two children wed one another.

Cleveland pitied and forgave her, and went away with a heart full of joy, to talk to his betrothed about it; and the invalid, too, smiled and blushed, and seemed a great deal better.

CHAPTER V.

CLEVELAND MEREFORT was threading his way through one of the bye-streets of his native city. Though he was not a rich man, he had a heart and a purse for the suffering: and now, with his fine, intellectual face beaming with kindness, he was on a visit to one of the poor men he had at some time employed, who was now sick. As he turned a corner in the dirty street, a lady, in a plain, dark dress, and thick veil, glided before him, without perceiving him. He watched her with interest, wondering if she, too, was bent on a charitable errand—for that she was elegant and fastidious he saw, though she was in this low part of the city. Her whole demeanour, despite the plain dress, was so haughty and graceful, that he was almost sure that the lady was Mrs. Linn.

After preceding him for a short distance, she paused a moment, and then entered, with a hesitating step, a dingy house, which, the young man at once recollected, was the abode of a necromancer, and dealer in love and hate philters. Convinced that it was Mrs. Linn, he strove to conjecture her errand, but was at a loss. He proceeded on his mission of mercy, and then wended his way to the residence of his dear invalid.

Effie was now so strong that she came down every day and sat in the easy chair, in the back drawing-room—the pleasant room that opened into the conservatory.

As he was now in the habit of doing, Cleveland entered the hall without ringing the bell; and, going first into the front drawing-room, he paused a moment, when he saw that the inner door was half open, to look, unperceived, upon the fair sufferer.

She sat by the open window, with her head resting on her hand. She wore a light-blue morning dress, her hair was pushed back wearily from her forehead, and a slight flush of anticipated pleasure, probably, was on her clear, soft cheek. Her face was the purest thing out of heaven! and now, spiritualised yet more by suffering, it was unearthly in its loveliness.

While the lover, with suspended breath, was feeding his soul on this rare beauty, he saw, through the partially closed door, Mrs. Linn enter behind Effie, holding something wrapped in paper in her hand. Her bonnet and veil were cast aside, but it was the same dark dress. She paused at a stand where stood some cooling drink for the invalid, and, pouring some of this from the cut-glass pitcher into a silver cup, she dropped the contents of the paper into the goblet. Had it not been that her hand trembled so violently, and that she grew so deathly pallid, he would have supposed, of course, that it was some powder prescribed. But her face wore such a strange expression, and she pressed her hand to her heart, as if to strengthen some purpose, that immediately the thought of the visit to the necromancer flashed over him. He grew quite faint at the thought, and leaned against the wall, still watching the inner room. When the mother grew more calm, she went to her daughter, and kissed her cheek.

"You are a little feverish this morning, I fear?" she said, kindly.

"No mother, I feel better—almost well!" was the reply.

"I will roll the stand here, where you can drink when you are thirsty," continued the lady; and, deigning as she said, she left the room, remarking: "Cleveland will be here soon, I suppose!"

The sweet girl blushed, and, as the door closed after her parent, ere the blush faded, Cleveland entered and called it back.

He sat a moment or two, conversing pleasantly.

"So you are almost well, are you, dearest?" I heard your mother say you must drink this beverage: so, as you are well enough to tease now, I shall give it all to the canaries and lap-dog!—and the lover arose and emptied the contents of the cup into the China dishes on each side the gilded cage of the golden warblers, and the rest into the porcelain plate of little Fidele. Then he filled it again from the pitcher, and watered a portion of the plants in the conservatory, and set the goblet back, with a gay face.

CHAPTER VI.

EFFIE, dear, cannot you trust me? Cannot you place entire confidence in what I say? Believe me it is only necessity that urges me—a pressing necessity, which I keep from you, for your own happiness.

"I do trust you, Cleveland; but it is so strange, when we were to have been married in a few weeks, to propose so strange a step! Tell me all, Cleveland, or I cannot decide."

The lovers sat in a little sylvan temple in the garden, and they supposed they were entirely alone; but Isabel, coming herself to summon the young couple to tea, heard the eager questions of the gentleman, and paused to listen outside the doorway, which was made of marble, in the shape of two sweet statues, with their hands linked together overhead.

"Oh, Effie—Effie! I cannot tell you anything, except that the reason is good! Do not hesitate, then: be mine to-night, and to-morrow we will be far away on our journey to a southern home! When I tell you, Effie, that it is for your own safety and welfare, you will not refuse me!"

"Leave my home, my mother, for ever—be married secretly—go to the south—conceal from my mother where I am? Oh! Cleveland, it is not possible! it cannot be!"

"Speak, dearest! what do you suspect?"

"You have not by accident committed—you have not—tell me, have you committed some terrible crime?"

"Oh! Effie, then you do not confide in me, when I tell you that I have done nothing wrong! You will not place yourself in my keeping now, under circumstances a little darkened; yet in a few weeks you will trust your happiness to me! If you cannot consent now to give all to me, I cannot accept the gift at a more fitting time: I have told you I have done all this for you. I have made sacrifices for your happiness. I would willingly tell you all now, only that I assure you it is better that you should not know. Effie, do you believe me?"

"I do! I do! But my mother—my lonely, desolate mother—my home—to leave them for ever!"

"Do you love them better than him you have promised to wed?"

The young girl burst into tears.

"Dearest—my own sweet one!" pleaded the lover; "it is cruel, I know, to tear you away from them! It is natural that you should hesitate. I hardly, myself, realised this—the necessity was so very great! Yet you must go—you must be mine to-night. And if you will not feel satisfied without, you shall know the cause: though, I assure you, you would be happier in ignorance. Yet, rather than you should suspect me of any crime, I will tell you all!"

"No—no!" interrupted the lovely girl; "tell me nothing! I will trust to the words you have spoken. Heart and soul are yours already, and, if you say so, to-night I will be yours!"

At this moment, Mrs. Linn stood in the temple. A scornful smile was on her lip, and her eyes flashed fire.

"So, my grateful, loving little bird is going to fly away—is she? I shall have to fasten her cage doors to-night! Can Mr. Merefort explain the meaning of this?"

Effie lifted up her face, which was very pale now, and stood with her eyes cast down. She had always feared her mother, and as she heard her speak in that distinct and hissing tone, she clung closer to her lover. She felt that those fierce eyes would annihilate her if she looked up.

"I cannot explain, Mrs. Linn," said the young man, firmly; you have given your child to me, and I claim her now!"

"I retract the promise, then!" was the disdainful reply; "I did not anticipate this—it was not part of the contract! Can you tell me what one so poor as you is to do with that delicate child? You are very discreet, Effie!" she added, with an accent of bitter scorn.

"Mother!" said the fair girl, with unusual firmness,

"you choose riches; and how are you repaid? My choice is love!"

"Bless you, Effie!" said the young man, folding his arms around her.

"Effie will stand without your aid, if you please!" said the mother, haughtily.

The proud man pressed her closer, and looked up at the excited woman with a calm smile.

"Henceforth her home is here!" he said, with dignified tenderness.

"It is a home which ill befits the daughter of Isabel Linn!" was the sneering reply; "I have a presentiment that my dainty child will not live very long, under such gentle care!"—and a flush of dark triumph made the beautiful fiend look awful.

Cleveland looked steadily in those triumphant eyes, and said, with slow and distinct emphasis:

"I have a presentiment that she will live longer in my humble home, than under the care of her affectionate mother; that potions received from the necromancer are not healthy for such delicate creatures, let the late death of your flowers, your canaries, and your lap-dog testify!"

Effie looked up with a startled and frightened look, turning as white as a lily, as she met her mother's gaze.

For a moment the betrayed and discomfited woman stood motionless, growing paler and more pale; her great, dark eyes were distended, and her lips parted; then, pressing her hands over her mouth, as if to repress the thrilling scream which burst forth, she sank slowly down to the floor.

"My mother!" murmured Effie, kneeling beside her, as she saw a crimson torrent of blood gush from the lips of the magnificent but fatally thwarted woman.

The blood-vessel which burst proved fatal: the physician—speedily summoned—could not save her; and ere the morning broke, she was dead.

"Forgive—forgive!" she faintly whispered, some hours before she expired. Effie and Cleveland heard her, and pressed her cold hands.

Her death was an accident—so people thought—caused by falling, and receiving an internal injury.

When the bright form of Isabel Linn was shrouded for the coffin, bitterly—bitterly Effie wept over it. She had already forgotten the great crime her mother had meditated against her; and Cleveland shuddered and wept, too, for his Effie's sake.

The life of Isabel had been a mockery—for she worshipped riches, and was rewarded accordingly. She was buried with funeral pomp; and that was the end of all.

No, not yet the end; nor yet quite a mockery—for Isabel was a mother!—mother to the pure, the angel-like, and surpassingly lovely wife of the gifted Cleveland Merrett; the kind creature who lived so many years to dispense mercies with her delicate hands.

FACETIÆ.

TO SHARPEN A MAN'S MEMORY.—Borrow five pounds of him.

A FORLORN HOPE.—The widow that wishes to die an old maid.

WHY are soldiers like clocks? Because their first duty is to "mark time."

NATURAL MAGIC—some one defines as being a pretty girl. We cannot gainsay it for the life of us.

WHAT makes a lawyer's position so perilous? Because he has other men's deeds to answer for as well as his own.

A late Dublin paper contains the following advertisement: To Let.—The upper part of a cellar, to a small family, rent low. P.S.—Privilege on the side walk for a pig.

A BASS VIOL.—A small bottle filled with "doctor's stuff."

A late traveller, in speaking of Austria, says that one half of the people are under arms to keep the other half in gaol.

If five and a half yards make a Pole, how many would go to the composition of a Laplander? Answer by return mail.

A poor woman went to an eminent but eccentric surgeon, to inquire what was the proper treatment for some bodily wound. "Put on a cataplasm," was the answer. "But, doctor, it's for a little child." "Then put on a kitten-plasm."

If you doubt whether two skulls are better than one, just undertake to row against the tide some day.

The question has often been asked: "Why an elephant is like a thousand of bricks?" and the answer invariably is: "Because neither of them can climb a tree." A friend suggests that the true reason is, "because neither of them wears yarn stockings."

If a spoonful of yeast will raise forty cents' worth of flour, how much will it take to raise funds enough to buy another barrel with.

A traveller went into an inn after a shower, and asked the landlord to show him a good fire; "for," said he, "I'm very wet;" and then turning to the waiter, he said: "Bring me a tankard of ale immediately, for I'm plaguey dry."

A functionary at Sleaford has the following on his sign-board: "Letter-carrier by appointment, almoner town-crier, primary envoy, external paper-hanger, renovator of faded habiliments, hair abbreviator, ambrosia dealer, adroit horse-trimmer, and general agent, &c."

CON.—Why are a country-girl's cheeks like well printed cotton? Because they are warranted to wash and keep their colour.

The best safety-valve to a boiler is a sober engineer. Parliament may legislate till doomsday, but as long as the officers carry too much steam, the boats will follow their example.

DOBBS says that he has always noticed that the slight acquaintance of a great man is generally a person that the great man slights.

CHARACTERS.—The following amusing circumstance is stated to have occurred at a fancy-ball given in Washington City, recently. It was understood that every person was to dress in character, and an usher was stationed at the door of the saloon, to announce to the company within, the different characters as they entered. Two young ladies appeared at the entrance. "Your characters?" asked the usher in a whisper. "We do not appear in costume to-night!" said the two young ladies. "Two ladies without any characters," bawled out the usher, at the top of his voice.

JONATHAN TRYING TO TURN THE TABLES.—A new play, called "The White Slave of England," has been performed in New York, at the Broadway Theatre. The details of the plot are ludicrously inaccurate. Grind, taskmaster of Lord Overland's white slaves, is represented as kicking coal-miners with top-boots, and goading them with a cudgel tipped with tennepenny nails. Women are represented carrying baskets of coals, as they did formerly. Then there is a white slave-market, and a woman with a halter round her neck is sold for twenty shillings. The whole ends with a scene to show the comparative happiness of the blacks in the Southern States of the American Union.

WHY is a sharp-nosed woman like the great wall of China? Because, if crossed, you're apt to find a Tartar.

WHAT is the difference between Scott's best novel and Desdemona? Listen, and we'll inform you. One was the "Bride of Lammermoor," while the other was the bride that "the Moor" lam'd. The young man that perpetrated the above, left for New York in a fish-car last week. A cordwainer mourns his untimely departure.

THE BENCH MISBEHAVING ITSELF.—The Hull magistrates are learned in physiognomy, and delight to prove that justice can use her eyes to advantage. Three girls were examined lately, when the following dialogue—which we take from the police report in the Hull Advertiser—occurred. Mr. Cookman (magistrate): Pull up your veils, girls. (Loud laughter.) The women hesitated and blushed. Mr. Steed (solicitor): Pull them up, the gentlemen want to have a look at your pretty faces. (Loud laughter.) Mr. Greaves (solicitor): You can't do any harm if you only lift up your veils. (Renewed laughter.) Mr. Blyth (magistrate): Come up with them. (Continued laughter.) Mr. Steed: Why, what's the use of being so long about it; pull up your veil, Elizabeth; the magistrates like to see a pretty face. (Convulsive laughter.) Mr. Cookman: You'd better lift them up; we want to see who you are. (Laughter.) The three girls then lifted up their veils, but one of them, Elizabeth Mills, shortly afterwards, when the prosecutor entered into details and cross-examined, again hid her countenance from view, and put down her veil.

LADIES' STOCKINGS.—At a camp-meeting a number of ladies continued standing on the benches, notwithstanding frequent hints from the minister to sit down. A reverend old gentleman, noted for his good-humour, rose and said: "I think if those ladies standing on the benches knew they had holes in their stockings they would sit down!" This address had the desired effect—there was an immediate sinking into the seats.

PHOTOGRAPHY ANTICIPATED.—Sir George Beaumont, about forty or fifty years ago, hoaxed the good people of London very pleasantly, by advertising in a fashionable newspaper, that Signor Sketcherelli Vittrious, a wonderful Italian artist, had arrived in town, and taken apartments at No. 46, Bond Street, to practise his newly-invented method of likeness-taking. His method was—to place his sitters before a looking-glass, and then, by the chemic agency of a peculiar fire, to bake the reflection hard and fast on the polished surface. Hundreds and hundreds of silly people crowded to No. 46, Bond Street, to have their likenesses baked; while Sir George sat at the window of his hotel opposite, sipping his Burgundy, and maliciously enjoying the fun.

PARLIAMENTARY COGNOMINA.—The following names will be found constituting the members of the House of Commons returned to sit in the present Parliament, which, when put together, appear somewhat strange aliquot parts of the constitutional body at large: A Court with two Kings, with Grace, a Duke, a Hale Knight, and a Hastie French Marshall. A Portal, two Halls, and two Chambers, with a Guest, and one Bell. A Wall with a Walpole. A Forester, a Roebuck, a Buck, besides a Bagge Fox and a Talbot. A Monck, a Goodman, and a Shee-Hayter, Cocks and a Vane Peacocke. A Masterman, two Carters, with a Mare and Packe. Currie and Rice, with Greene Lemon Peel. A Butler, with two Butts. A Collier and Pryme Yorke Coles, with two Prices. A Woodhouse and Hutt, with Barnes, and a Freshfield with Hill and Wood. A Miller, with two Mills, two Brookes, besides Wells. A Cootie, a Swift, and a Martin. A Wise Child. A Potter, with Clay Balls. Six Smiths (Bright Fellows). A Taylor, a Tyler, a Sadleir, and a Palmer. Milton, Thompson, Cowper, and Shelley. Power, North, East, and West. A Hogg with Lowe Manners. A Scott and a Kirk, and, by way of winding up the list, two Dunnes and a Baillie.

A late writer says that the fact that men can go into bankruptcy, and yet laugh afterwards, is strong proof of the advancing philosophy of our times. A Roman tailor, incapable of meeting his debts, would have strangled himself with a bed-wrench. Things have been completely revolutionised. It is not the tailor who now gives up to despair and cordage, but his creditors.

A HOME ARGUMENT.—A lecturer, addressing an audience, contended, with tiresome prolixity, that art could not improve nature, when one of his hearers, losing all patience, set the room in a roar by exclaiming: "How would you look without a wig?"

The national peculiarities of a people are shown as strongly in the naming of ships, as in more consequential matters. The Spaniard displays the religious tendency of his mind by such titles as "the Holy Trinity" and "the Twelve Apostles." The French exhibit their sensuality in the "Prima Donnas" and "Madame Ceritas." The industry and love of money of the Dutch, shows itself in such titles as the "Beaver" and "Gold Hunter." John Bull comes out in the shape of "Spitfires" and "Boxers," "Thunderers," and "Devastations." Jonathan goes his length on speed, progression, and universal dominion—a peculiarity that shows itself in such names as "Flying Cloud," "Sovereign of the Seas," "West Wind," "Wild Pigeon," "Empress of the Deep," and "Frightened Lightning." In our opinion, a philosopher could get up quite a truthful history of a people, without consulting any other documents than the stems of their ships.

"STOP MY PAPER."—When a man gets mad and stops his paper, he always borrows the next number of his neighbour, to see if the withdrawal of his patronage hasn't killed the editor and dressed the columns in mourning. This grows out of the fact that none try to show their spite in this way but the kind of people who imagine that the world rests on their shoulders.

GASTRONOMIC PROGRESS.—M. Soyer has now come forward with a new discovery, consisting of an improved method of making mustard! This shows that the "Gastronomic Regenerator" is no longer a mere class caterer; for we recollect him formerly as being partial to the "broad brim," inasmuch as that he stuck firmly to the pepper and salt! This "per Saltrum!"

TURNING THE TABLES.—A correspondent of the Dublin Warder shows how an old acquaintance once turned the tables upon the bailiffs. Two smart-looking fellows dressed as sailors, and with a rolling, seaman-like gait, called at his house, and chucking the servant girl under the chin, told her to tell her master that they had brought commands from his brother, who was at that time at sea. The credulous debtor eagerly opened the door, and was soon in the arms of the bailiffs. After complimenting them upon their ingenuity, he invited them into a back parlour, and begged they'd wait till he'd send off a bit of a note to a friend that he expected would arrange it for him. "The messenger was back in the shakin' of a lamb's tail; and my dear life, 'twasn't long till the tables wor rightly turned, and the brace o' shoulder tappers frightened out o' their seven sinases by the arrival of a press-gang; and, says Mister Blake, throwin' the Freemasons' sign to the officer, who happened, as Providence would order it, to be a Leithrim man, 'Here's a pair o' light active chaps, that have deserted their ship, and are disgracin' the blue jacket by actin' as bailiffs.' Sure enough that was a sore day for the disguised bailiffs, for, notwithstanding their entreaties, they were obliged to go with the gang!"

CATECHISM OF THE FINE ARTS.

Q.—What is Poetry?
A.—Too frequently "doggrel." Some prefer measures to imagination; but, properly speaking, imagination ought to be allowed to take its own measures.

Q.—What is meant by Music?
A.—Music is generally supposed to be a succession of sounds which create agreeable sensations; but this is a fallacy, since it too frequently happens that the sounds at our modern theatres promote just the reverse feeling. Vocalists who ascend the scale in their own estimation, generally go down the scale in public opinion.

Q.—What is an Overture?
A.—A proposal of marriage to a pretty girl.

Q.—And a Symphony?

A.—A Symphony is the expressed approbation of the couple about to be "made one," which is thoroughly within musical rules, as all parties ought to play together as one executant.

Q.—What is a Solo?

A.—A "Solo" is a somewhat solitary affair, and is best illustrated when a lover is expecting his "ladye love," who is rather behind her appointment.

Q.—What is a Duo?

A.—A Duo is redolent of sweet sounds, being no more nor less than the "protestations of faith" between the lover and the beloved.

Q.—Then what do you understand by a Trio?

A.—It is not so agreeable as a Duo. On the contrary, it is calculated to mar musical effect—since it is well known that "two are company, but three are none!"

SNAIL EATING IN ENGLAND AND ITALY.

A CORRESPONDENT writes: "Snail-eating is not uncommon. When a youth, I took a dozen snails every morning to a lady who was of a delicate constitution, and to whom they were recommended as wholesome food. They were boiled, and mixed up with milk. They were the common snail, usually found about old garden walls. A friend of mine, in walking round his garden, was in the habit of picking the snails off his fruit-trees, and eating them raw."

He was sometimes fastidious, for I have seen him take a snail, put it to his tongue, and reject it as not of a good flavour, and select another more agreeable to his taste. We are strange creatures of habit, especially in our feeding. I am fond of oysters, muscles, and cockles; but I do not think anything could induce me to taste a snail, a periwinkle, or a limpet." A second remark: "This practice is very general in Italy. While residing near Florence, my attention was often attracted by a heap of fifty or one hundred very clean, empty snail-shells, in a ditch, or under a bush; and I indulged in many vain speculations before I could account for so strange a phenomenon. One day, however, I happened to meet the contadina coming out of my garden with a basket on her arm, and from her shy, conscious manner, and an evident wish to avoid my seeing the contents, I rather suspected she had been making free with my perches. To my surprise, however, I found that she was laden with the delicious frutti-di-terra (sometimes so called, as the Echinus, so common along the Indian coast, is called frutti-di-mare); and, thinking that she had been collecting them simply from regard to my fruit and vegetables, I thanked her for kind services. But she understood me ironically, and, with a great deal of confusion, offered to carry them to the kitchen, apologising most elaborately, and assuring me that she would on no account have taken them, had not our cook told her we despised them, and that she would no doubt be welcome. I asked her what in the world she intended to do with them: and, with a look of amazement at my question, even surpassing mine at the reply, she informed me that her brother and his wife had come to pay them a visit, and that, with my kind permission, she would thus treat them to una bellissima cena. She had collected about three quarts during a search of two hours. The large brown kind only are eaten. Among the poor, they are generally esteemed a delicacy, and are reputed to be marvellously nutritious."—Notes and Queries.

GEMS OF THOUGHT.

As frost to the bud, and blight to the blossom, even such is self-interest to friendship; for confidence cannot dwell where selfishness is porter at the gate.—Tupper.

THE worst men often give the best advice.—Bailey.

AMBITION is a lust that's never quenched, grows more inflamed and madder by enjoyment.—Uwacy.

WHAT you keep by you, you may change and mend; but words once spoken can never be recalled.—Roscommon.

It is indeed a blessing, when the virtues of noble races are hereditary; and so derive themselves from the imitation of virtuous ancestors.

To make the cunning artless, tame the rude, subdue the haughty, shake the undaunted soul; yea, put a bridle in the lion's mouth, and lead him forth as a domestic cur, these are the triumphs of all-powerful beauty.

It is a glorious occupation, vivifying and self-sustaining in its nature, to struggle with ignorance, and discover to the inquiring minds of the masses the clear cerulean blue of heavenly truth.

PERHAPS perseverance has been the radical principle of every truly great character.

THE drunkard begets children in his own image, like him in propensities not less than in features, and so is the guilty means of entailing on them a descending curse.

No mockery in this world ever sounds to me so hollow as that of being told to cultivate happiness. What does such advice mean? Happiness is not a potato, to be planted in a mould and tilled with manure! Happiness is a glory shining far down upon us out of heaven.

I have found that the most cross-grained are by no means the worst of mankind, nor the humblest in station the least polished in feeling.

A word of kindness. It is a seed, which even when dropped by chance, springs up a flower.

A princely mind will ruin a private fortune. Keep the rank in which Providence has placed you; and do not make yourself unhappy because you cannot afford whatever a wild fancy might suggest. The revenues of all the kingdoms of the world would not be equal to the expense of one extravagant person.

MISCELLANEOUS.

THE first opera ever composed was "Daphne," sung at Florence, near the end of the sixteenth century: the words by Rinuccini, and the music by Peri.

WOMAN'S LOVE.—No woman ever loved to the full extent of the passion, who did not venerate where she loved, and who did not feel humbled (delighted in that humility) by her exaggerated and overweeping estimate of the superiority of the object of her worship. What state could fall, what liberty decay, if the zeal of man's noisy patriotism was as pure as the silent loyalty of woman's love? Woman's love is a robe that wraps her from many a storm.

A CHASE ACROSS THE PAMPAS.—We now entered upon the plains, where for the first time I saw wild deer and ostriches—and here we enjoyed a glorious chase. We were going at rather a gentle pace, when we came upon a herd of deer: they did not appear to take much notice of us, until we were near enough for them to hear the mare's bell, the sound of which attracted their notice—for they turned their heads, and stood with ears erect, and their bits of tail stiff with expectation. We gave a long tallyho, which sent off both horses and deer at a killing pace, and being compelled, volens volens, to keep up with them, we seemed as if in full chase of a troop of wild colts. It was most princely sport—Nimrod himself never had a finer chase. The cattle on the estancia cleared out, leaving a broad open space for our coursers, and for a long distance we followed, at full speed, a quarry composed of colts, deer, and ostriches. Storks, turkey-buzzards, and countless flocks of birds, poised on their wings, as if astonished at the unwonted sight. At length the ostriches and deer parted company, and we very gladly saw our tropilla slackening their pace. It reminded me of a superstition amongst the natives: almost every night, at about the same hour, it is said, all the dogs in the country commence a most melancholy howling, as if they were lamenting the dead; and the natives say that this occurs when some spirit rides past on his nightly rounds, mounted on a wild colt, and driving a troop of horses before him.—Two Thousand Miles' Ride through the Argentine Provinces.

LITTLE THINGS.—Springs are little things, but they are sources of large streams; a helm is a little thing, but it governs the course of the ship; a bridle-bit is a little thing, but see its use and power; nails and pegs are little things, but they hold the parts of large buildings together; a word, a look, a smile, a frown, all are little things, but powerful for good or evil. Think of this, and mind the little things. Pay that little debt: it's a promise—redeem it; it's a shilling—hand it over—you know not what important events hang upon it. Keep your word sacredly—keep it to children: they will mark it sooner than any one else, and the effects will probably be as lasting as life. MIND THE LITTLE THINGS.

WHICH IS THE TINKER.—A modern writer, whose name we omit, out of charity, has published 'an edition of the "Pilgrim's Progress," in which he has undertaken to tinker the work of the incomparable dreamer by putting brass to Bunyan's gold. According to this gentleman, "the work, in the state in which John Bunyan left it, cannot safely be put into the hands of children," and as he, the editor, considers that it teaches "formal heresy," "he cannot be called dishonest for making his author speak what he believes that, with more knowledge, the author would have said." Had he lived yet, and known this, he certainly would have said some sharpish things about it, we opine.—Scottish Press.

PETITIONS AGAINST THE OPENING OF THE CRYSTAL PALACE ON SUNDAYS.—We have seen a petition about to be presented to the legislature, against the desecration of the Sabbath by the opening of the Sydenham Palace on the Lord's Day, which is now in course of signature, by the working classes and labourers of Belfast and Ballymacarrick exclusively, the subscriptions to which already number four thousand six hundred and ninety, and which, it is expected, will reach to six thousand. The petition, with its signatures, for ms a roll fifteen or twenty yards in length, and sets out in full, not only the names, but the occupations and residences of the subscribers. It will, we understand, be presented in the House of Commons, by Mr. Cairns, who has expressed his cordial sympathy with the movement. This is a worthy example to set to all the other large communities in the province, whence it is expected that a most formidable protest will be ready to meet the petitions now getting up in London and elsewhere, in favour of the Sabbath desecrating scheme. The petitioners mainly rest their prayer on the ground that the proposed measure would inevitably lead to the employment of a vast number of hands on the Sabbath, and would tend to degrade them, as a class, in the eyes of the nation. Some idea, indeed, of the Sabbath labour which the scheme would create, may be formed from the fact, that a sum of £30,000 is about to be expended by a Sydenham hotel-keeper in stabling accommodation alone.

FRENCH LAW OF MARRIAGE.—The Imperial court of Paris (says Galignani), has just been occupied for three days in hearing arguments, in a case which may be of some interest to English people. In 1823, Captain Weir, of the English navy, came to live with his family in France, and took up his residence at Loches. He had a daughter, Emma. When she attained the age of twenty-three, she was sought in marriage by M. Alfred Perault, an officer of a cavalry regiment; and as he knew that his father would object to his marrying, he went with her to Jersey, where they were married by a Protestant minister, without any of the formalities required to be observed by the French law. This was in September, 1831, and in November, 1832, a son was born. M. Perault's father took law proceedings, for the purpose of having the marriage annulled, on the ground that it had been clandestinely celebrated. At first, M. Perault, jun., and his wife opposed these proceedings; but after awhile they separated, and allowed them to take their course. The marriage was accordingly declared null by the Tribunal of Nantes and the Court of Rennes. Some years after, M. A. Perault and his father and mother died, and their fortune passed to Madame de Julvécourt, sister of the former, and daughter of the two latter. In 1852, Madame Weir demanded from Madame de Julvécourt a portion of M. A. Perault's property for her son; and as this was refused, she brought an action before the Civil Tribunal against that lady, for the purpose of having the claim allowed. She contended, in support of it, that both she and Perault had celebrated the marriage in the belief that it was perfectly regular, and that, even if it were not, the son ought not to suffer. But the tribunal declared that it was tainted with fraud, that she must be assumed to have known that—and that consequently the son had no claim to any portion of his father's property. She appealed to the imperial court, but the judgment was confirmed. In the course of the proceedings, it was stated that M. de Julvécourt, husband of the defendant, had promised that Madame Weir's son should be provided for.

WHITE ROSES.—In an old newspaper, the Weekly Journal, or British Gazetteer, of Saturday, June 15, 1723, I find the following paragraph: "Monday being the anniversary of the White Roses, some persons who had a mind to boast that they had bid defiance to the government, put them on early in the morning; but the mob not liking such doings, gathered about them, and demolished the wearers: which so terrified the crew, that not one of them afterwards would touch a white rose."

NINEVEH was fifteen miles by nine, and forty round, with walls one hundred feet high, and thick enough for three chariots abreast. Babylon was sixty miles within the walls, which were seventy-five feet thick, and three hundred feet high, with one hundred brazen gates. The Temple of Diana was four hundred feet high, and was two hundred years in building. The largest of the Pyramids is four hundred and eighty feet high, and six hundred and sixty-three feet on one side; its base covers eleven acres. The stones are about thirty feet in length, and the layers are two hundred and eight. Three hundred and sixty thousand men were employed in its erection. The labyrinth of Egypt contains three thousand chambers and twelve halls. Thebes, in Egypt, presents ruins twenty-seven miles round. It had one hundred gates. Carthage was twenty-five miles round, and so was Athens.

EDITORIAL ABILITY.—Newspaper writing, says the Spectator, has grown to be an art of itself. Many a literary man who thought, because the "greater includes the less," every author is, ex-officio, qualified to be an editor, has sunk back into the rear place of the press, after some smart writings had shown his bookish talent, and his inability to deal with facts. Others who could pour forth volumes, have failed, because they could not cope with hydraulic pressure, or prompt selection of silent points needed for the space and rapid comments of the journal: Take the best papers of London or Paris, different as the circumstances of the case may be, and you must allow that it is not every booby that could seize the moral spirit of passing history. People of some little talent fancy they can edit a newspaper, if they can do nothing else; but they eventually find their mistake. Not only is intellect, but knowledge of the world, miscellaneous information, tact, industry, rapidity of thought, a nervous style, and a capacity at once to catch the strong and weak points of every subject, are required for a good editor.

WITCHCRAFT IN PENNSYLVANIA.—The Chambersburg Whig relates the following singular instance of superstition, which proves that the belief in witchcraft is not yet done away with: "A correspondent, writing from Fulton county, informs us of a singular case of supposed witchcraft that occurred near Sidding Hill. There is a certain religious sect in that neighbourhood, calling themselves the Christian Church. A lady, one of the members, was taken sick, and lay for some time, until she finally imagined herself bewitched, and a sister in the church was settled upon as the witch. A meeting of the session was called in due season, at which the minister presided, and the charge of witchcraft was formally preferred against the lady. Being a new case, and, we presume, not provided for in the discipline, the session was puzzled as to the proper manner to proceed in the case. At length it was proposed that she should be asked to step over a broomstick, as it had been said that a witch could not do so; but the accused got over it without apparent difficulty. After a consultation, it was then agreed that she should be tried in a pair of weighing scales, with a Bible to balance her; and, if she were a witch, the Bible would be too heavy for her. Accordingly, she was taken to a mill, and the experiment tried; but she proved too heavy for the Bible. It was then intimated that probably her clothing prevented a fair test, and half a bushel of corn was put on the scales with the Bible, to balance the clothing; but still the lady was too heavy, and the charge was formally dismissed."

OH! LET ME KEEP MY LITTLE CHILD.

BY WILLIAM H. MCALLA.

"Cassy overhears the bargain between the slave-dealer and her master for the sale of her little child."—Uncle Tom's Cabin.

"Oh! take an arm—I still can wind

The other round its little form—

I still for it a home can find,

Can shield it still from life's rude storm.

Oh! take an arm—take out my eyes—

'Twill drive me mad! 'twill make me wild!

Though sight of God's bright world I prize,

I still can hear, can feel my child!

"I'll be your patient, willing slave,

I'll watch in sickness by your bed,

For you I'll every danger brave,

I'll call God's blessings on your head:

Let gentle pity touch your heart,

Nor by this vile act be defiled,

Say that we will not have to part—

Oh! let me keep my little child!

"I'll work and toil the livelong day,

I'll heed not hunger, cold, or pain,

I'll work till I am old and grey:

Let me not ask this boon in vain.

Give me the lash—I have no fear—

I'll deem your sentence kind and mild,

I'll shed not one complaining tear—

But let me keep my little child!

"Not one kind look—not one kind friend—

Of hope for me no single ray!

Will God no aid unto me send?

Must it from me be torn away?

Oh! take an arm—oh! take my eyes—

'Twill drive me mad! 'twill make me wild!

To take all on this earth I prize—

Oh! let me keep my little child!"

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

S. S. M.—The President steamer was lost in returning from New York, on her third voyage.

A. C.—Procure the means of an introduction to the parents. Clandestine courtships are dangerous, and rarely terminate happily.

ROLLA.—The etiquette is, that when a lady and gentleman who have been engaged disagree, and the match is broken off, the presents that may have passed between them are mutually returned.

W. W.—The clerks in county courts are appointed by the crown. The patronage is divided among the great law officers.

BRASS FOUNDER.—Substitutes for brass may be made of pewter two parts, zinc four parts, fused at 300 to 350 degrees; or pewter three parts, zinc four parts, fusible from 250 to 350 degrees.

BLUCK PRILL.—The American barbarism called Lynch law, owes its origin and name to having been first put in practice by a person of the name of Lynch. Tarring and feathering is an old Saxon punishment.

T. D.—An apprentice is bound, unless there is a special agreement to the contrary, to serve the full term of his apprenticeship. Illness or involuntary absence is no excuse.

J. B.—Pulmonary consumption, it is believed, can be given by one person to another, just as a piece of wood that has the dry rot can impart the disease to a piece that has not.

YOUNG WOMAN.—There is no process by which hair can be removed without injuring the part on which it grows. Depilatories darken the skin, and the deadly poison in them is absorbed by the ducts, and thrown into the system. The tweezers and patience are the only remedy.

ISABELLA.—Should your grandfather die intestate, you, as the only child of his deceased eldest son, would be entitled to share equally with his surviving children, in the distribution of his personal property.

J. W.—The number of gas-lamps in the metropolis is of course known. The gas companies have them classified and numbered. Taking the number of streets, squares, and lanes in the metropolis at 15,000, and supposing that on the average each has two gas-lamps, that will give a total of 30,000, which we should say was about the correct estimate.

M.—Farming all depends on the quality of the soil. The system of the north is not adapted to the south, or that of the east to the west—and so on. The Scotch system is the most scientific and economical.

MISS LUCY, at the performance of a comedy at the Haymarket Theatre, fell in love with one of the actors. She must fall out again. Let her go and see the gentleman play a villain. If that don't cure her, she had better go to a nunnery or turn poetess. A lady once saw the elder Keats in one of his most heroic characters, and she became so enamoured of him that she left him a large legacy. Some time afterwards she saw him play Luke the Labourer, and fainted. Neither Keats nor his son ever touched a farthing of the legacy.

HENRIETTA SEPTON.—Fifteen young ladies belonging to a school walked out together for seven days, in parties of three, without any two walking together twice. How was this done?

A. R. M.—You surmised correctly. We do say "Return home, and at once." We have no sympathy for prodigal sons. Besides, there are your parents to consider: have they no feelings, no hearts, no affections to be consulted? For shame! Go to them immediately, and induce them to send you out to India or the Cape, where a little roughing would tame you down to a decent young man.

M. J.—We could readily give you our interpretation of the meaning of the thirteenth verse of the sixteenth chapter of Revelations; but we refuse to do so, as being contrary to the principles on which this Journal has been conducted. Our interpretation would necessarily be only an opinion—and as there are now too many opinions extant on religious subjects, we would rather not give publicity to another. When people travel from the broad, undisputed facts of Christianity, they get lost in mists, fog, and darkness. It is safer to believe in promised conditions, than to attempt to give them form and substance by even the best analogical reasoning.

ADA forwards us a rebus, which we insert. My 8 5 2 1 6 7 is a river; my 4 2 8 is an animal; my 1 2 10 4 5 is a month; my 5 6 3 is a bird; my 8 5 10 9 6 is a number; my 6 2 7 3 9 10 is an university term; my 4 5 6 7 8 9 10 is a city; my 2 6 2 is a refreshing beverage; my whole is a town in Lancashire.

JOHN MOOR.—Were you the criminal with the first lady? If so, you must marry her; if not, what earthly objection can there be to your consulting your own self-respect and future happiness? Be a man—think purely and act honourably, and you will have no occasion to trouble editors with stupid questions.

JUVENIS.—The custom of wearing rings dates back to a very remote antiquity. It prevailed extensively among the Greeks and Romans. From the latter we have derived the wedding-ring and its symbolical meaning. In the middle ages rings were given and worn as symbols of authority. Every prince and noble had his signet-ring, an impression from which was essential to the validity of any legal document. In the present day, among refined people, the custom is "more honoured in the breach than the observance."

JULIA.—The following pomade for the hands has been highly recommended. Take two ounces of oil of sweet almonds, three drachms of virgin wax, and three drachms of spermaceti. Warm these three substances in separate vessels, and then pour them all into one, taking care to stir them well with a wooden spatula, then throw them into a basinful of very clear, fresh water. Keep stirring, and change the water often, till your pomade becomes very white, then put it in rose-water or spring-water, which must be changed daily.

INQUIRER.—The term "Iron Duke" was given to the late Duke of Wellington, as the most forcible expression that could be applied to his insensibility to fear, and the indomitable resolution of his character. His nerves were steel—he had neither an ideal nor an instructive knowledge of what fear was. Having resolved upon a course of action, nothing could dissuade him from pursuing his purpose to completion. Hence the phrase "Iron Duke," for which the robustness of his physical organisation afforded additional warranty.

TOBY FRINK.—Calling a person a "liar" is not libellous in law, but it is wrathful and vulgar; and, being calculated to provoke a breach of the peace, a magistrate has the power to order the "caller" to find sureties to keep the peace for a definite period; so that this kind of explosion of passion may occasion great inconvenience, and no trifling expense; for the costs of summons, &c., must be paid.

JOHN W. EDWARD.—Don't marry until you can afford to maintain a wife in more than decency. You must also give up your pipe and glass in the evening, or the pipe and glass will give you up. It is the pipe and glass men that turn out bad husbands, bad fathers, and bad men. A prudent girl ought to look upon a pipe and glass man as striding rapidly along the high road to ruin. A pipe and glass, indeed! Why cannot you go the theatre, the concert-room, or the lecture-hall, if you want relaxation; or, what would be better, visit your intended, and, while feeling delightfully thrilled in her presence, talk lovingly of the future. We are afraid that, with all your scruples, the girl would have the worst of the bargain.

A. Z. cannot overcome the awkward habit of blushing on all occasions. Let her fall in love, and she will speedily acquire the necessary command over her nerves and susceptibility. People in love are very sly—and we believe sly, artful people never blush at all. A hint is as good, &c.

ORPHAN DAUGHTER.—A minor may hold and enjoy any description of property, but cannot dispose of land, so as to give a legal title, before he or she is twenty-one years of age. The rule does not apply to personal property in possession—such as furniture, money, or stock in trade.

JAMES RINGETT asks which is the better singer, Mr. Sims Reeves or Signor Mario. It is doubtful. Both are so very good, that choosing between them is difficult. Mario is, perhaps, more spiritual, but then Reeves has not had the same amount of experience. The temper of the English singer is against him, but undoubtedly he is a vocal genius of the highest order.

ANNA MARIA is a prudent, sensible, good wife. Her husband holds the first place in her heart, and she cannot let him be foolish if she can help it. Very proper. It seems he can barely afford to be just, and yet he wishes to be generous. His penchant must not be indulged. The lodger, whether his mother-in-law, or an angel from the skies, ought to pay for board, &c. "Give's a fool, and Take's a rogue!" said Ebenezer Elliot, and we cordially subscribe to the sentiment. But it seems the old lady wants to pay. Take the money, and tell your husband to mind his own business.

Q. V. D.—A solution of muriate of cobalt, so diluted with water, that the writing, when dry is invisible, is a good sympathetic ink. The pen must be quite new and clean. On gently warming the paper, the writing will appear of a blue or greenish colour. A solution of muriate of copper, in like manner, forms a yellow sympathetic ink, and acetate of copper, a rose or purple.

MARY.—The parish of Rotherhithe must be a very ancient one; for, in 1094, William Rufus endowed the priory of St. Saviour, which formerly stood in Bermondsey, with the manor of "Bermond's Eye," an ancient demesne of the crown, which included Camberwell, Rotherhithe, the hide of Southwark, Dulwich, and Reyham, with their appurtenances. We do not know when the church was erected.

N. N. A.—Housekeeping expenses all depend upon the station in life of the parties. But with the addition of a wife there is something else to be considered. She requires clothes and pocket-money. A wife should always have more in her possession than she actually requires, for prospective as well as present necessities. The stinginess of husbands in this respect is as cruel as it is foolish. As you have put a pointed question, we should say a person in the station in life of a clerk, should have at least £100 a-year before he took unto himself a wife. In housekeeping, the contingencies try the temper as well as the pocket. Ten pounds won't go a long way in bringing to a conclusion the solemn ceremonies to be observed before a lovely, domestic, et cetera, is enveloped in abbreviated necessities.

R. W. P.—The conclusion of your poem, "The Warbinger of Spring," contains a good idea, well expressed.

Lonely outcast of nature, foredoomed to the shade,
How many frail dreamers in thee are portray'd,
Whose hopes gaily bound, like some sun-gilded wave,
But whose joys are o'ershadow'd by grief and the grave.
Too much hath mankind—cold experience has shown—
That an emblem in thee, little floweret, must own;
Meek hearts, that are strangers to falsehood and scorn,
Are the snowdrops of life—the unfoster'd and lorn;
And souls that are noble, fair shrines of true worth,
That would emulate heaven while dwelling on earth,
That would place their proud names on the scroll of the free,
Gaunt spirit of want! are as slaves unto thee.
Peep forth, with each year, from thy nook in the vale,
To whisper pure truths in the ear of the gale;
And when the world-wearied droop o'er thee unknown,
Still prove to each bosom it grieves not alone;
Still gently remind us, when pausing to rue,
"What shadows we are, and what shades we pursue;"
And long will hards love thee, long make thee their theme—
Brave, beautiful venturer, born of a beam.

BASHFUL unintentionally accurately describes all the symptoms of a modest, maidenly regard for a man. He says: "About three years ago I became acquainted with a young lady, and, being in the habit of visiting her parents' house almost daily, we of course became very friendly, which, on my part, soon ripened into a pure and devoted love; but I have delayed from time to time to avow to her my fond partiality; why, I cannot tell, except for fear of being rejected, and that my love is not reciprocated. There are times when I fancy there is something in her manner more than ordinary friendship; at others, there is a peculiar shyness which I cannot understand, and when in the presence of friends, is cool and indifferent towards me, but when alone, she is generally kind and friendly in the extreme; I can safely assert that she is no flirt—quite the contrary—rather shy before strangers, and of a modest, amiable, and domesticated disposition. Bashful must address himself to her parents, but a preliminary declaration to the girl herself would be extremely advisable. Surely one pliant hour might be seized out of the twenty-four."

L. S.

DEAR sir, in your Journal one week,
Fitz Glennie's address met my eye;
Though a blush as I write dyes my cheek,
That it suits me I cannot deny.

Though I love not to sound my own praise,
I will not from the ordeal flinch;
I can play, sing, and draw, and can raise
A painting or two at a pinch.

I am tall, and not quite skin and bone,
My hair is abundant and jetty;
Though I'm blushing again, I must own
That every one says I am pretty.

My name is euphonious and short,
'Tis Lucy—familiarily Lou;
(Hint) I always to reading resort,
If I've nothing important to do.

My nature is gentle and kind,
My affections till now have been free;
If your Cupid will make up my mind,
I am willing his Psyche to be.

DAME DUDEN has attained her twenty-first year, and wishes to meet with a husband who would be steady, loving, and attentive. She considers herself rather intellectual. Her figure is good, she is about the middle height, with good features, and will have £1000 on her marriage-day.

MARIANNE would have much pleasure in corresponding with "A. B. C." She possesses all the requirements he seeks for in a wife, is a native of London, and has moved in the first circles. She has personal attractions commensurate with her thirst for literary and refined pursuits. She is twenty-two years of age, of the medium stature, inclining to a brunette in complexion, verging on embonpoint, fascinating, and accomplished. She is entitled to a large property at the death of her parents.

* * A creditor sending a letter to a debtor, with the royal arms engraved at the top, and a printed county court threat at the foot, commits an illegal action. He is not only usurping the functions of an attorney—an indictable offence—but using the royal arms, which formerly was deemed petty treason. The practice seems to have crept into extensive use lately, but we suspect will be stopped the moment a vindictive debtor lays an information.

LENOX.—At twenty-eight, a man who has sufficient moral and mental capacity ought to regard nothing possible as impossible. Mahomet was turned forty-five when he commenced the greatest revolution in society since the advent of Christianity. Milton was old, poor, and blind, when he composed his glorious "Paradise Lost"; and, to descend from poetry to substantial prose, Arkwright had passed the prime of life when he set to work and made a fortune of seven millions sterling. It is never too late to commence anything dictated by a laudable desire, and offering reasonable hopes of realisation.

LETTERS RECEIVED.—Cromwell (Many thanks for your praises of our Journal. The style of the handwriting is unexceptionable).—Emigrant (Consult some of the various guide-books. We do not approve of emigration. At best it is only a make-shift. Working men and women have as much right to England, as the higher and middle-classes, and we can perceive a monstrous injustice in packing them off to the colonies, just like so many bales of manufactured goods).—R. R. S. (Read the book advertisements in the daily papers).—An Inventory Lad (An excellent specimen of handwriting).—Z. R. (Any of the first-class dealers in old books. See the "London Directory").—F. R. (An English Bible of the date 1649, would be of no value except to a collector of rare books, &c.).—Mesmer (We could not recommend any work on "Mesmerism," unless it was the "History of the so-called science").—T. O. (See the derivation of the word "Oldham," which is given in "Baines's History of Lancashire").—A. E. B. (The lines "To Emma," are pretty and musical—but blighted affections should be screened from the public eye).—W. Fraser (A full account of "Lord Lovat" will be found in the histories of the stirring events of 1745–46 and 46).—Curious (Do not be foolish. Planet ruling has gone out of fashion. A few sharp men live by imposing on the dull ones).—E. N. Sedding (We gave a full account of the "Life of Lord Nelson," in the course of "The History of the Consulate and the Empire").—Punny ("Twenty cheeses," not "twenty cheeses")—Thomas Watson (Persevere. You have a poetic vein in you).—Will Sidelier (A silver coin of the reign of Elizabeth, would not be worth more than double its intrinsic value).—T. R. M. B.—(The address would do. The works of Shakespeare comprise only his plays, sonnets, and two lengthy poems).—T. J. L. Z. P. (Thanks for your encomiums. Your suggestion will be partially carried out, but we fear the celebrities are very scarce).—A. B. (The Index and Title-page to Vol. XVI. of this Journal are on hand, and may be had at the Office, 334, Strand).—Jack Robinson (Deeds of apprenticeship in the merchant service cost nothing whatever. They are prepared by the merchant, ship-owner, or broker).—Henri (The volumes of this Journal are issued half-yearly).—Slender (Hair that does not curl naturally, cannot be made to curl by any other means than putting it up in paper every night).—Cesar (All letters intended for her Majesty, must be forwarded to the Lord Steward of the Household).—A. B. S. P. (Consult "Walker's Pronouncing Dictionary").—J. Martin (The explanation will be found in the "Dictionary of Arts and Sciences," and the modern cyclopaedias).—Un Jeune Cleric (An employer should be addressed with respect—not servility. Servants are not slaves. Employ the simplest terms).—J. W. (The charge for a number of this Journal, a month old and upwards, is three halfpence, and no more).—G. Finch (We have systematically refused to enter into religious controversies. Eat the loaf in England, Poland, or America).—Agnes F. (Would you send one of "Moore's Songs" as an original composition? Kie).—Bank (The expression is rank nonsense. How could a man "commune with a massive pillar")—E. G. Banks (The lines are too irregular).—George Osborne (Purchase one of the numerous Treatises on the "Art of Painting in Water Colours").—Joe Beans (Go to the Bank of England on a dividend day, and take your papers with you. The accumulated interest will be paid as a matter of course).—Charles Harding (Very poor. The subject was borrowed from an old caricature by H. B.).—R. L. B. (The marriage was legal. The parties were cousins).—F. Pollard (The present volume of this Journal commenced with No. 420).—P. B. (The man cannot compel you to take in the work).—A. R. C. (Declined, with many thanks).—A Cheltonian (The deed of apprenticeship should have been executed by your father. Without his signature it is worthless).—J. M. (The spire of Salisbury Church is the highest in the United Kingdom).—G. T. J. (The receipt of your inclosure was acknowledged at the time).—M. L. F. (Numerous Treatises have been written on "Perpetual Motion," but they are all of them nonsensical).—Z. C. L. T. (Consult some eminent oculist).—Joseph Potter (Apply at one of the East India merchants' offices, either in London or Liverpool).—Mearan (You may take out the Post Office Order in any name you like, but you must previously advise the party for whom it is intended of the fact).—Pietro (The recommendation of an East India Director).—D. Temperley—George Maquire—Marion B. Scholasticus—Cyril—Two Cousins—W. D.—Nil Desperandum—Alice Glenville—Montague—B. A. Annie—Miss E. G.—Frank—M. F.—Annie Laurie—John Elijah James—J. Smith—G. Green—Genevra Sfonza—Silvester—Amica—Topsy—Ivy May—A Lady Bird—Zenophon—Josephine—James Borden—Happy Ned—X. Y.—Alice C.—Romeo B.—A. B.—Charles Florence—Two Laughing Girls—E. Cluster—A. X. G.—J. A. R.—Eva—J. Q.—J. G. and T. W.—A. M. Y.—Achilles—Clara Gordon—A. R.—L. T. C.—Cecilia Dore—Henry and John—Georgiana and Sarah—J. A.—Lassy—Frederick L.—Edward Gising—W. H. W. S.—Augustus Marriott—J. W. C.—Academicus—W. Knight—P. A. S.—Mary Ann Suffolk.

T. Withers' solution of Rebus, in Number 424. I am two words of sixteen letters: My 1 6 9 4 16 is clever—witty; 3 6 11 a title of respect—sir; 13 2 12 11 an animal—bear; 7 10 4 is a snare—net; 5 6 9 15 a small insect—mite; 16 10 12 11 is a portion of time—year; 8 9 2 10 11 is to guide—steer; 3 9 12 11 is a luminary—star; 7 2 12 11 is close—near; 13 12 14 16 a young child—baby; 9 15 7 is a number—ten; 2 11 12 an epoch—era; 1 10 8 9 a point of the compass—west; 11 12 4 is an animal—rat; 2 12 11 is one of the organs—ear; 9 10 12 11 is to break—tear; 1 6 8 10 prudent—wise; my whole "Westminster Abbey." Correct solutions were also received from Cromwell—F. W. D.—R. Wallen—W. J.—F. K. S.—Halbert—Lizzie and Annie Lawrie—Etonian C. Davies—Edward Gosling—John H. Herbert—J. L.—Eames—J. W. C.—Thomas Wild—Frank—R. B. Johnson—Juvenis—John Partington—F. R. A.—O. M. D.—Huddersfield—D. Harrison—W. L. P.—Agamemnon—W. Sampson—John Jones—W. Hughes—R. A. Williams.

* * All letters intended for the Publisher, Editor, or Proprietor of this Journal, should be addressed, "The Editor of the LONDON JOURNAL, 334, Strand, London."

London: Printed and Published for the Proprietor by GEORGE VICKERS, at the office of "THE WEEKLY TIMES," 331, Strand.—May 28, 1853.

THE LONDON JOURNAL:

And Weekly Record of Literature, Science, and Art.

No. 432.—Vol. XVII.]

FOR THE WEEK ENDING JUNE 4, 1853.

[PRICE ONE PENNY.]

[HENRY ASHTON RECOGNISING WILL SIDELER ON THE PIER AT CALAIS.]

THE WILL AND THE WAY.

BY THE AUTHOR OF
"THE JESUIT," "THE PRELATE," "MINNIGREY," ETC.

CHAPTER XXIII.

A habitation fragile and unsure
Hath he that buildeth on the vulgar mind.

THE warrener devoted the greater portion of the night which followed the visit of the wily agent of Meeran Hafaz, to sawing through a portion of the massive lock of his cell. The bar shot into the solid granite, and consequently could only be tampered with when fastened. The sharp-biting edge of the spring saws slowly but surely cut through the well-tempered bar. Daylight dawned as he had about half finished his operation.

Although there was slight chance of detection—for the bolt once drawn back, no indications of the attempt could be perceived—the prisoner thought it most prudent to remain, under pretence of indisposition, all day in his cell, so as not to give a chance away.

"One night more," he muttered, as, tired with his efforts, he threw himself upon his narrow pallet, "and I shall be free! I have often, in my youth," he added, "dreamed of other lands, but never thought to lay my bones in them! No matter—with gold I can live as merrily in India as in England!"

The door of the corridor in which the cell of the speaker was situated opened into the day-yard; it was regularly locked every night after the turnkeys had taken their round: this, however, did not present any serious difficulty to the plan of his escape—for directly over it was a grated aperture, for the double purpose of ventilation and light, quite large enough to admit of a much stouter man than himself passing through—that is, provided the iron bars were removed. Sidelier calculated that he could saw them in about two hours.

Although considerably fatigued, the ruffian was too much excited to sleep, but lay upon his back, mentally measuring the chances and difficulties of his position. Suddenly he recollected a danger which he had not previously calculated: the door of his dungeon grated heavily upon its hinges every time it was either opened or shut, and his fellow-prisoners would be certain to hear him, even if he succeeded in cutting through the lock, and might raise sufficient outcry to cause an alarm.

"I must have oil," he thought, "to ease them!" The difficulty was, how to procure it.

A copious breakfast, which remained untasted, was placed upon the little deal table, close to the window of the cell. The warrener sat near it, with his arms folded, lost in profound meditation; his usually voracious appetite had deserted him—thick-coming fancies crowded upon his mind; the attempt to escape might fail, in which case what remained? a trial, the press-room, and the scaffold! The mob, with their eager, curious faces turned towards him—their yells, perchance—the grip of the hangman—the death struggle—and after death!—he shuddered as he thought of that.

So painful had his reveries become, that he felt considerably relieved when old Mike, with his stealthy, cat-like step, came gliding into the dungeon. Any society was preferable to his own reflections. The old man cast a greedy look upon the table.

"Perhaps I intrude?" he said.

"Not in the least," replied the prisoner, forcing a smile.

"On the contrary, the sight of a human face is welcome."

Mike gave one of his peculiar smiles: perhaps he thought to how few the sight of his face was welcome.

"One of the keepers told me," he continued, "that you were ill, so I thought I would drop in in a friendly way."

"Ill!" repeated Sidelier, passing his hand over his blood-shot eyes; "I should think I am ill—and enough to make me! The air of this accursed place is thick and heavy—I can't breathe here! I feel the slow throbbing of my pulse—can almost hear the beating of my heart! I pine for the free air and green fields—they never appeared such luxuries as since I have been deprived of them!"

The old man nodded his head, as if to intimate that he perfectly comprehended the feeling.

"Besides," continued the speaker, "when I try to eat, I have a choking sensation in my throat!"

"That's because you eat alone," observed Mike, from time to time casting a hungry look towards the breakfast table. "When I first came here I felt as you do—careless little or nothing for food; but I soon got over it—my appetite returned, and now I am so used to the place that I should regret to change it for the green fields you talk of: the sight of trees and flowers always sets me thinking!"

The warrener took the hint, and invited the speaker to share his meal with him.

Mike needed no second invitation, but, seating himself at table commenced an attack upon the food with the earnestness of a man sharp set, and conscientiously bent on doing justice to the good things before him. Chop after chop disappeared, to the envy and admiration of Will Sidelier.

"It strikes me, my friend," he observed to his visitor, who threw himself back in his chair, with a sigh of repletion, after making a meal which a ploughman might have been proud of, "that you do not often come across a good breakfast?"

"Seldom, except upon hanging mornings!" was the reply; "and that is generally once a week!"

"Hanging mornings!" repeated the prisoner—a very unpleasant suspicion crossing his mind. "Why on that morning more than any other?"

"I'll tell you!" said the old man, in a confidential tone.

He moved his chair, in a friendly way, nearer to the warrener, who drew back the stool upon which he was seated, with an involuntary shudder.

"You know that I am generally present on such occasions?"

"I have heard so!" drily answered the prisoner.

"Well, then," continued the narrator, "as soon as the chaplain has given the signal, and the executioner has drawn the bolt, the sheriffs and their friends hurry off to the governor's room to breakfast. Such a scramble and such a spread—fowls, tongue, beef! Talk of my appetite—you should see them! To be sure they are obliged to be up early, in order to get through the mob to the prison, and that I suppose gives them an extra whet! Enough, however, remains for the turnkeys and—you know who I mean?"

"No, I don't!"

"The hangman!" added Mike. "They are a good-natured set of fellows, and generally invite me to pick a bit with them!"

"What!" exclaimed Sidelier, with disgust; "do they sit at the same table with such a wretch?"

Mike regarded him very much like a man whose feelings were deeply wounded. Perhaps he was a friend of the much-abused functionary of whom they had been speaking; or his long residence in Newgate had upset his previously-conceived ideas.

"And why not?" he said. "I can assure you that he is considered a very respectable person!"

"I never saw one," observed the prisoner, with a sickly look; for, like most rustics, he had a most unphilosophical idea of the dignity of the office in question.

"That may account for your prejudice," said the old man, with a forgiving smile—which had, however, something sinister in it.

"What is his name?" demanded the prisoner.

"Mat Cows."

"And his age?"

His visitor seemed to reflect for a few moments before answering.

"I can't exactly say," he replied. "It's rather difficult to guess his age; but I should think he is not much under fifty."

Sideler noticed with satisfaction that the speaker was nearer seventy.

"He is a thin, wiry man," continued Mike, "with black hair and very bushy whiskers, and when dressed in his best suit of black and a white neckerchief, looks almost as well as the parson. In fact, when I was the City grocer, was sheriff, he took him for one, and chatted with him very pleasantly until he found out his mistake—which I don't think he ever forgave."

"I should think not!" observed his listener.

"Did you ever hear how Mat came to be made hangman?" inquired Mike.

"Never!"

"Well, then, I'll tell you," resumed the visitor; "for somehow I begin to feel quite a liking for you!"

The prisoner—whose suspicions of the speaker, whatever their nature, were entirely removed—extended his hand, which Mike shook most cordially.

"Thank you!" said the warrenner. "I hope we shall become better acquainted!"

"Not unlikely!" replied Mike; and the warrenner again noticed that peculiar smile which had previously annoyed him.

"Some twenty years ago, more or less," resumed the narrator—"for I can't be particular as to dates—Mat Cows was a cooper in the London Docks. He was a happy fellow then, and had everything comfortable and respectable about him: a neat little cottage at Rotherhithe, and a wife whom the world called pretty—perhaps she was. Mat believed her to be good, and loved her for that better even than her beauty. Wasn't he a fool," added the speaker, with fearful earnestness, "to suppose a woman could feel grateful for an affection which displayed itself in rising early and working late to keep their home in comfort about them? Had he flattered her vanity with soft words and fine speeches, she might have liked him better!"

"It's the way with them!" observed the warrenner—many passages in whose early life led him to sympathise with the story. "I suppose I can guess the rest?"

"Doubtless," said Mike; "the tale is as old as the world, or pretty nearly so. She deceived her husband for a young fellow whom he had assisted out of charity, when dismissed from his place in the docks; but with all your cunning," added the old man, "I question if you can guess Mat's revenge!"

"Perhaps he murdered her?"

"No he didn't?"

"Left her, then?"

"Neither one nor the other—though his blood was changed to gall, and his heart to ashes: he dissembled, gradually yielded to the persuasion of his dear friend, and accompanied him to the alehouse; from a sober and industrious man, became a drunken and a lazy one—lazy in appearance only—for his brain worked night and day."

"And enough to make it!"

"Well, sir, at the end of three months, Mat lost his situation, too, and then the punishment of the false wife commenced. One by one he stripped the cottage of every piece of furniture, till not a bed remained for them to lie upon—even the shawl he had given her upon her wedding-day, went to the pawn-shop. She dared not reproach him—she felt that she had no right to do so. One day when there was not a loaf of bread in the house, or anything left which she could sell to procure one, intelligence was brought her that Mat Cows and Dick Houghton—that was the name, if I recollect rightly, of her seducer—had been taken up for housebreaking—caught in the very act."

"That was unfortunate!" observed Will Sideler, who began to take considerable interest in the history of the hangman: not so much, perhaps, from the circumstances themselves, as the singular earnestness with which his visitor related it.

"No it wasn't!" said Mike.

"Of course I mean for the husband!"

"It was the very thing he wished—had been trying and scheming for: the person who gave information to the Bow Street officer was no other than Mat himself; he also restored the property taken, and, in consideration of his penitence, as they called it, was permitted to turn king's evidence."

"And was he?"

"Was he!" exclaimed the old man, with a deep chuckle. "I'm hanging him with his own hands—for the situation happened to be vacant at the time, and he asked for and obtained it. What passed when the cap was drawn over Dick Houghton's eyes, and the rope over his neck, none knew. The sheriff supposed he was asking pardon of his friend for the duty he had undertaken—but I guess they were deceived!"

"More likely," said the warrenner, "he was reproaching him for his ingratitude, and telling him how he had been deceived."

Mike nodded his head, to intimate that he thought it not unlikely.

"And what became of Mat's wife?" inquired the speaker.

"Oh, he hung her, too!"

"What, his own wife?" ejaculated Sideler—for even to his callous nature, such a revenge seemed going a little too far.

"And why not?" demanded his visitor, in a calm tone of voice. "It was his duty, as executioner to do so: he remembered his, if she had forgotten hers!"

A low, indistinct sort of murmuring indicated that his new friend could not quite agree with him.

"At first," resumed Mike, "she lived—at least I have heard so—with a City banker, whose notions of respectability were shocked when he heard that she was the wife of the hangman; so he turned her off. The same thing occurred more than once; for, wherever she went, Mat took care to let the fact be pretty generally known. At last she became connected with a gang of forgers, who employed her to pass the notes. It was chiefly brought home to her by her husband's means—she was condemned! How the once fond fool she had deceived laughed, when he saw the judge place the black cap over his beetle brows, and heard him sentence her to the gallows!"

"He must have been a devil!" exclaimed Will Sideler, emphatically.

"He was what a bad wife and a false friend made him," answered Mike. "The rest of poor Mat Cows's story is soon told," he added; "the tie between him and the woman was not generally known, and those who were aware of the fact, pretended not to know it—it might have inconvenienced them; for there was no one else to fill his office: people will get more enlightened by-and-bye!"

"But did he really hang her?"

"You shall hear: on the morning of the execution, the instant her husband entered the press-room to pinion her, she began violently to reproach him for her ruin, as she was pleased to call it. One word silenced her—the name of Dick Houghton. No sooner did Mat whisper that in her ear, as he drew back her arms to pass the cords, than she comprehended it all—his drunkenness, dissipation, loss of character and place; the robbery—everything. What is very odd," added Mike, musingly; "from that moment she neither resisted, spoke, nor seemed conscious of what was going on, till the drop fell."

There was a pause: the warrenner felt as if he had listened to the narration of some terrible dream—he could almost have imagined himself under the influence of the nightmare; his visitor, on the contrary, appeared as calm as usual. The only indication of the excitement which he had betrayed at the commencement of the story, was the rapidity with which he drew the smoke from the pipe which he had just lighted: his coolness might be accounted for by the supposition that he had both heard the tale and related it, many times before.

"And how did you know all this?" inquired Sideler.

"Mat told me!"

"He must have great confidence in you!"

"Very great!" observed the old man; "we are friends he tells me everything."

"Then I must tell you, Master Mike," said the ruffian, with an affectation of disgust, "that your acquaintance with such a fellow does you very little credit!"

A deep scowl appeared upon the features of his visitor.

"You had better not let Mat hear you say so!" was his reply.

"And why not?"

"Nothing—that is, nothing particular! only he might remember it in the event of your becoming better acquainted with him! In hanging," he added, with the most provoking coolness, "a great deal depends upon the knot—the manner in which it is tied. In Dick Houghton's case, the struggles lasted more than ten minutes; but then the executioner was a novice at his trade, and felt a little nervous!"

The warrenner felt a sudden chill creep through his veins, and regretted, he scarcely knew why, his imprudent speech: as his visitor rose to leave the cell, he felt almost tempted to request that he would not repeat it.

He had not been long alone, before one of the turnkeys made his appearance, accompanied by the agent of Meeran Hafaz. Sideler eagerly welcomed his pretended parent, and the impious farce of prayer was repeated, with the same success as on the preceding day.

"How have you succeeded?" demanded Mr. Davids, in a whisper.

"Excellent! the lock is half cut through!"

"It must be entirely cut through to-morrow night," said the seeming countryman, "for I have promised your friend that by that time you shall be free."

"I shall require oil," observed the prisoner.

The thoughtful agent placed a phial, containing about four ounces, in his hand.

"Read the paper round it," he whispered, as the warrenner thrust it into his bosom; "it contains every instruction: you must follow them to the letter; and, remember, no impatience must induce you to quit your cell before the governor has made his rounds, which he regularly does at eleven!"

"I understand."

"How long do you think it will require to cut through the bars in the window over the door of the corridor?"

"An hour, at least," was the reply.

After a few moments' reflection, the respectable Mr. Davids informed him that would do; and it was finally arranged that, the instant the clock of the neighbouring church struck one, a ball of twine should be thrown, by his friends on the outside of the prison, into the day-yard:—by which contrivance the prisoner was to pull a knotted rope over the wall: that once done, the rest of his task would be easy enough.

As the seemingly heartbroken old man, after taking an adequate leave of his pretended son, crossed the day-yard of the prison, in company with the turnkey, who was to accompany him to the lodge, they encountered Mike, whose countenance still bore traces of the spiteful feelings which the observations of Will Sideler had left rankling in his breast.

"The fool will hang—I am sure he will!" he kept muttering to himself; "the mark of the gallows is upon him!"

No sooner did he perceive the clever agent of Meeran Hafaz, than his eyes began to sparkle with peculiar intelligence. With the craftiness which marked his character, he took care, however, to make no inquiry, till the object of his curiosity had left Newgate.

That same evening, whilst smoking in the porter's lodge, he inquired of the same officer "who the old man was whom he had conducted out of the place that morning."

"The father of a prisoner," replied the turnkey, in a careless tone, as if he presumed that the answer was a matter of perfect indifference.

"Of Sideler?" said Mike.

The man nodded.

"Has he been often to see him?"

"Twice—yesterday and to-day."

"Of course you remained all the while in the cell, according to the prison regulations?"

"Of course I did!" replied the man, thrusting his tongue into his cheek.

The old fellow knew that he was lying, but did not choose to say so.

"You should hear him preach!" added the man.

"Did you hear him?"

"How else should I have known it!"

This was enough—Mike inquired no further. He had recognised Davids, despite his disguise; for they had had more than one profitable transaction together. His relationship to the warrenner he knew to be a pretence—nor was he at a loss to guess the purport of his visit.

"No—no!" he muttered to himself; "I said the fool would hang, and I am determined that he shall! No escape! but I must watch—it is fortunate that I can do so! Escape—indeed—I'll teach him what it is to insult me!"

Perhaps there was another consideration—it would have robbed his friend the hangman, Mat Cows, of ten guineas; and he felt a strong interest in the worldly prosperity of that very amiable individual, and law officer of the crown.

That same night the warrenner was busy, as before, at the lock of his cell.

CHAPTER XCIV.

Revenge, the luxury of vulgar minds,
As generous pardon, and soft, pitying words
Distinguish nobler natures. OLD PLAY.

THE Governor of Newgate had made his usual round, and everything was still within the prison, when Will Sideler, who had succeeded in cutting through the lock of the cell, with shoeless feet crept stealthily along the corridor, the door of which was strongly barred against him: a difficulty, as our readers are aware, which had been foreseen and provided against by the clever Mr. Davids.

After several ineffectual attempts, the ruffian contrived at last to raise himself to a level with the grated aperture, through which was the only mode of escape into the day-yard.

Fortunately for him, the bars were already corroded by rust and time, and required but little time to cut through, for the effort was most fatiguing: seeing that he was obliged partially to support himself by one hand, whilst he plied the saws with the other.

On the other side of the door was the figure of a man, with his ear glued to the iron-studded panel, listening eagerly for every sound. As the sharp teeth of the spring saw began to bite into the iron above, it made a kind of low, hissing sound, which the listener occasionally answered by a corresponding chuckle.

We scarcely need say that it was no other than Mike like a bloodhound upon the watch.

"Saw away!" he muttered; "saw your heart out—you cannot escape me! It will be delightful," he added, with a ferocious kind of joy, "to look into his eyes, when he knows who I really am! but I'll not balk him—he must be at the very moment of escape, when his pulse beats high with hope—then will be my time!"

There was a fiend-like refinement in the reasoning of the old man—the very solitude of whose cell had given a rough sort of philosophy and half-penned tone to his mind.

First drawing a pistol from his breast, to see that the priming was all right, Mike crept with noiseless step from his hiding-place by the door of the corridor, across the courtyard, and took his station in an angle formed by the wall of the day-room and that of the prison. The moon was shining so brightly, that a cat could not have run over the flagstones without his perceiving it; whilst the deep shadow of the spot where he was standing, effectually screened him from observation.

As he crouched down in the corner, like a tiger waiting for his spring, the clock of the neighbouring church struck a quarter to one.

A few minutes later, and the bulky figure of the warrenner was seen crossing the yard towards the wall. He had his shoes suspended round his neck by a twisted handkerchief, having prudently removed them to break the noise of his fall from the window, as well as to avoid alarming his fellow-prisoners by his foot-fall along the corridor.

"I wonder," muttered Mike, "how he intends to scale the wall! Does the fool think he can fly over? He is too long now—waiting? Rather too soon for that!"

The ruffian was upon his knees, fastening on his shoes. Hence the mistake of the concealed witness of his proceedings.

The old man had not long to wait—for just as the warrenner rose from his knees, the clock struck one. The last vibration had scarcely died away, before a leaden weight, enveloped in a soft wrapper, to deaden the sound of its fall, was thrown over the wall. A strong thread of twine was attached to it.

The spy grinned. He saw at once that his suspicions were correct—the prisoner had accomplices.

Sideler hastily began to pull the twine, and soon succeeded in dragging over the wall a strong rope, knotted at regular distances, so as to afford a hold for the hands and feet.

After pulling it several times, to ascertain that it was well secured on the opposite side, the prisoner began to ascend. He had just raised himself from the ground, when a cold, clammy hand grasped his neck, and a voice, something between a chuckle and a whisper, bade him descend.

The next instant sideler as on his feet, with Mike, who still retained his hold upon his neck, presenting a pistol to his head.

"Mike!" faltered the warrenner, "is it you?"

"Well, I guess it is!" replied Mike, mockingly.

"You surely don't mean to detain me?"

"Don't I!" said his captor.

"But I thought we were friends?"

"And so we are—such dear friends that I can't think of parting with you!" answered Mike, with a grin. "To speak plainly with you, I must say your proceeding is most unhandsome towards me!"

"Unhandsome?"

"Yes—robbing me!"

"Robbing you!" repeated the warrenner, more and more mystified; "I don't understand what you mean?"

"You soon will!" observed the old man.

"How can my escape rob you?" demanded Will.

"Of just ten guineas—to say nothing of the value of your clothes, which are dirt-cheap at two pounds more: which makes just twelve pounds ten shillings!"

A cold perspiration broke over the haggard features of the prisoner—for a horrible suspicion had struck him.

"You are," he exclaimed, in a tone, in which terror and disgust were mingled—"the—"

He could not pronounce the name. His throat became suddenly parched, and his tongue clave to the roof of his mouth.

"Exactly!" said Mike; "the hangman, Mat—you know me at last! Of course," he added, "you would not wish to deprive a poor fellow like myself of his perquisites! You would never be so unreasonable!"

As the speaker made this last observation, he peered into the eyes of his victim, who remained helpless as a child in his hand. The old man chuckled with delight, as he felt the muscular, iron frame of the strong man tremble beneath the grasp of his long, bony fingers, which half encircled his neck.

At this moment the rope was agitated from the opposite side by the agent and his assistants—they were growing impatient.

"I will give you the ten guineas," said the warrenner, with a desperate effort to recover his self-possession.

"You forget the clothes!" quietly observed Mike.

"Twelve, then?"

"But the risk!"

"Fifty!" added the prisoner, with increased terror.

"To say nothing of the pleasure of turning off a fine-built fellow like yourself!" whispered the hangman.

"What say you to a hundred?"

"It is not enough."

"All I possess?" urged Sideler.

"Will not tempt me!" replied Mike, in a determined tone; although it was not without a severe struggle with his avarice that he came to such a resolution. "It is not often that I make up my mind to a luxury—but when I do, money does not stand in my way! You remember our conversation yesterday, when, like a fool, I told you my story—you scorned me: it's ill quarrelling with Mat—he will not forget it when he ties the knot! If you stir or offer the least resistance," he added—for the warrenner was beginning to draw courage from desperation—"the bullet whistles through your brain!"

"Better that," muttered the prisoner, "than the rope!"

With a sudden blow, he dashed the pistol from the hand of his captor: as it fell upon the ground the pan flew open and the priming fell out, fortunately without exploding. Once disarmed, the tables were turned—Mike was like an infant at the mercy of one as pitiless as himself.

"Help!—help!" he cried; "pri—"

The word was cut short by a blow upon the temple from the fist of Will Sideler, which felled the hangman like an ox in the shambles. To seize him by the throat, and drag him into the obscure corner of the courtyard, was the work of an instant.

Again the rope was jerked more violently than before; but, although a minute's delay might compromise his safety, and his friends on the outside of the prison were evidently growing impatient, the warrenner did not leave the old man till he had kicked him about the head and body so as to fearfully disfigure him. Bitterly did he regret that he had not his knife; never had he experienced, in the course of the long indulgence of his passions, such ferocious joy—it rendered him insensible even to his danger.

But then it must be remembered that his victim was the hangman—the fellow who had threatened him with the rope—coolly calculated the price of blood—a wretch whose fearful grin he had already felt upon his neck.

"I may see," he muttered; "but Mat Cows will never let the knot he boasted of!"

Giving the senseless man a farewell kick, the ruffian grasped the rope, and, with the activity of a much younger man, soon drew himself to the top of the wall: once there, the descent was easy. He glided down, and stood once more at liberty.

The agent and two of his confidential assistants, who were well armed, were waiting to receive him.

"What the deuce delayed you?" demanded the respectable Mr. Davids; "you appear to have been as loth to quit your prison as others are to enter it!"

"I have been watched!" replied the warrenner.

"By whom?"

"The hangman! and had a struggle for life with him. I would have bribed the aged wretch, but he refused my gold! He longed for the pleasure of tying me to the gibbet, and so—"

"You murdered him?"

"Even so!"

"And very proper, too!" replied the philosophic agent; "are you sure that he is dead?"

"Unless he has more lives than a cat!" was the reply.

The agent felt that there was no time to be lost; it was just possible that the speaker was deceived—that the hangman might recover, and give an alarm. Hastily removing the cloak from his own shoulders, he threw it over those of the liberated felon, and placed a fur travelling cap upon his rough, shaggy head.

"Follow me," he said, "without a word!"

The whole party pursued their way as rapidly as possible towards Blackfriars Bridge, where a travelling carriage with four horses was waiting, ready to start at an instant's notice.

The warrenner entered first, and Mr. Davids followed him; the two persons who had accompanied them remained behind.

"Dover!" said the agent.

The postilions cracked their whips, and the carriage started at a rate which threatened—in the event of their being followed—to leave pursuit behind. At every stage fresh horses had been ordered—every difficulty foreseen and provided against: so that they reached the sea-port without interruption.

At the Ship Hotel, they found the valet of Meeran Hafaz waiting for them: he had been directed by his master to accompany the warrenner to Marseilles, and see the fugitive safely embarked on board the vessel which was to convey him to India.

As the Post Office packet sailed out of the harbour at Dover, the agent—who was standing upon the pier, impatiently counting the moments of departure—rubbed his hands with an air of pious satisfaction: he had very cleverly earned the large sum of five thousand pounds, and saved the life of a fellow-creature.

We need not inform our readers which reflection afforded him the most pleasure.

Great was the consternation amongst the officials in Newgate, when, at an early hour the following morning, the flight of the prisoner was discovered. The turnkeys underwent a strict examination before the governor—but nothing could be elicited to afford the least light upon the subject. Mike—or, as we must now call him, Mat Cows, the hangman—was removed to the infirmary; for, although fearfully disfigured, he still lived.

"I can do nothing for him!" observed the surgeon, as he contemplated the swollen and distorted features of the old man; "he is past cure!"

"No—no!" murmured the patient, with a deep groan; "I shall live! I will live to hang the rascal yet! Try, doctor—try!"

The man of science did so: and Mat Cows kept his word. He did live—but whether to accomplish the revenge he had promised himself, the future only can decide.

Despite the indifference which Meeran Hafaz had assumed, at his interview with Will Sideler, he was not insensible to the danger which might accrue to himself, should the scheme of his agent fail—for he felt assured that the ruffian would put his threat into execution, and denounce him to the hands of offended justice.

Although he appeared in society with the usual smile upon his lips, and a light spirit, the canker was secretly gnawing at his heart. He had given orders to his domestics to be called at any hour a person of the name of Davids should inquire for him: it was not till an early hour on the morning of the fourth day, that the indefatigable old man drove up to the door of the splendid mansion in St. James's Square.

"You have returned at last?" said his employer, who had been watching all night in the library.

"As fast as four horses could bring me!" answered the man; "it has cost a mint of money!"

"Never mind the amount!" hastily ejaculated his employer—who regarded gold only as the means of contributing to his pleasures or his passions; "we will not dispute on that point!"

The agent could not suppress a sigh of envy, as he looked round the splendidly furnished apartment, and mentally calculated the wealth of the speaker.

"The result?" impatiently demanded Meeran, to whom every moment of suspense was agony rendered more intense by the long hours of doubt he had endured; "has the ruffian escaped?"

"He has!" was the reply.

"And embarked?"

"I did not quit the pier till I saw the packet out of harbour."

The eyes of the young Indian flashed brightly for an instant, with intense satisfaction. The weight was removed from his heart.

The account between himself and his visitor was so liberally settled, that even the avenging Mr. Davids for once was compelled to own himself satisfied: and he quitted the house, to return to his den in Clement's Inn, much richer man than he left it.

"A few more such clients," he thought, as, overcome with fatigue, he threw himself upon his truckle-bed, "and my fortune would be made!"

With this reflection he fell asleep. His dreams were of gold—the only god he worshipped, or had ever believed in.

Greatly as Meeran Hafaz rejoiced at the escape of the warrenner, one doubt of the future still lingered on his mind: frequently he tried to dismiss it, but it would return to him. For more than ten days he had received no letters from Martingale, and he kept continually asking himself whether the attempt upon the life of Henry Ashton had failed; the interest, too, which the Khan appeared to take in Ellen alarmed him—for he knew him, by experience, to be both resolute and indefatigable in the pursuit of any purpose upon which he had once set his mind. With respect to any suspicion which he might entertain touching the death of Sir William Mowbray, he felt perfectly at rest. The oath of his quondam friend assured him that he would never, by word or writing, denounce him.

"Let him return!" he said, alluding to his rival; "long before he can reach England, Ellen shall be mine, and seas be placed between us!"

He was mistaken: the avenger was closer upon his steps than he imagined.

"Better he should live," he added, soliloquising, "to endure the misery of knowing she is another's—to feel the serpent fangs of jealousy gnawing his very heart-strings—its fires consuming him! The death of an unsuccessful rival like Henry Ashton would be mercy—not revenge!"

That same day Meeran Hafaz started, with Colonel Mowbray, for Carrow Abbey.

CHAPTER XCV.

In vain he flies—the furies still pursue.
Avenge justice on the murderer's track
Follows to claim her due.

SIEGE OF COLCHESTER.

THE chancellerie of the British embassy was crowded with Englishmen anxious to obtain the visé of his excellency to their passports—the regulations regarding which were far more stringent than at present. Amongst the number of visitants was a tall, pale young man, whose countenance was marked by sorrow and recent fatigue. Still there was a cold determination in his dark eye, which showed that his energies were not yet subdued. He was dressed in deep mourning. It was Henry Ashton, who, after travelling day and night, had reached the capital of our Gallic neighbours. As his passport was a diplomatic one, the formality of calling again was dispensed with: the necessary signature was affixed at once.

Several gentlemen who had been waiting, murmured at the preference—which, with their English notions, they could not understand.

"I have called twice!" observed one.

"And I, also!" added another. "My business is most important."

"Life and death wait upon mine!" exclaimed a third speaker, who was no other than the worthy rector of Carrow.

At the sound of his well-remembered voice, his former pupil turned hastily round—for he had been standing with his back to him, replying to the attaché, who had promised to offer his apologies to the ambassador for omitting the usual visit which etiquette required. They recognised each other in an instant.

"Henry!"

"My benefactor!"

Such were the mutual exclamations, while each grasped the hand extended to him.

"Thank God, my dear boy," said the rector, "I have found you at last! It has spared me a long and painful journey! But you are ill!" he added; "and how is this? In mourning. Have you, then, heard—"

"Everything," replied the young man, mastering his emotion with a violent effort; "but tell me—"

The heart of the lover was so full that he could not pronounce the name of Ellen.

"Well—quite well!" said the rector, hastening to relieve him—for he perfectly comprehended to whom the question related. "I left her in the care of her uncle, Colonel Mowbray!"

An audible expression of gratitude broke from the lips of the youth—who, however he might dislike the brother of his murdered benefactor, was far from supposing him capable of descending to pander to the designs of his unprincipled rival.

The place of meeting was ill-suited for such explanations as they had to receive and make; but previously to adjourning to the hotel of our hero, Henry procured the visé for his friend's return to England.

"More favouritism!" observed one of the disappointed group, as they left the chancellerie. "I shall complain, on my return, to the House!"

Although the speaker was a member of Parliament, his threat only procured for him the unwelcome distinction of being kept waiting to the last. The attaché, who overheard it, being nephew to one of the ministers, felt perfectly at his ease in disregarding it.

Those only who have had some dearly-loved or venerated friend torn from them by the hand of brutal violence, can conceive the agony with which Henry Ashton listened to the terrible details of the murder of his benefactor. To have wept—to have relieved his overstrained heart by tears—would have been consolation; but it was denied him.

"Do not think me ungrateful!" he said, fixing his blood-shot eyes upon those of his aged friend. "I cannot mourn until I have avenged him! Is there no clue," he added, "to enable me to track the assassin to his den—to drag him, amid the execrations of the world, to justice! Cruel, pitiless, remorseless villain! The life whose purity an angel might have envied—so benevolent and good—cut short—and by such means!"

The rector informed him of the visit of old Martin, Lawyer Elworthy, and Joe, to the library; and the discovery of the gibern of the warrener in the recess at the end of the secret passage.

"What did it contain?" demanded the young man.

"Letters of ancient date," replied the rector, "which proved that Sir William had been cruelly deceived respecting the conduct of his unhappy wife; and that his former servant had been one of the unprincipled instruments; but not the least clue how they came there!"

"It needs none," muttered Henry; "I shall find it!"

As briefly as possible, he informed his kind old friend of all that had taken place in Rome: the perfidy and commission of Martingale—his discovery of Lady Mowbray—the death of Walter, and his ultimate conviction that he was the son of the late baronet.

"I do not think so!" observed Dr. Orme, after a few moments' reflection.

"Why not?" demanded his former pupil.

"Because I distinctly remember the marriage of the colonel—which was against the inclination of Sir William—and the birth of a son. Lady Mowbray's boy was not born till more than a year afterwards!"

Hurried as these explanations were, they afforded the unhappy lover one consolation. Ellen, he believed, was well. Joe Beans and Susan were with her—and he knew he might rely upon the courage and fidelity of his early friend.

Despite the entreaties of the rector, who felt seriously alarmed for the health, if not the reason of our hero, Henry determined upon starting within an hour for Calais. Had it been possible, he would have given half his life to have annihilated the time and distance which separated him from England.

As the carriage passed the Porte St. Denis, Dr. Orme for the first time mentioned the name of Meeran Hafaz. His affection for his adopted son made him dread their meeting.

"Do not name him!" exclaimed Henry, grasping his arm with convulsive passion. "When I have shed the life-blood of the cold, calculating, remorseless villain—trampled on his heart—offered to outraged justice and gratitude the only victim which can appease its claims—then, and then only, can I hear his name!"

His companion felt that it would be unwise to pursue the subject further. Mentally he offered up a prayer for the preservation of the youth, whom he loved like his own son; and for several hours they pursued their journey in silence.

At a late hour the following night, the tired travellers reached Dessin's Hotel, at Calais. Dr. Orme, yielding to the entreaties of his young friend, consented to retire to bed, for they found that the mail packet was not to sail till six in the morning.

Although he had endured, both mentally and bodily, enough to weaken a frame of iron, Henry could not sleep—the fever of his heart kept him awake and restless: enveloping himself in his travelling cloak—for the night promised to be a rough one—he crossed the market-place and made his way to the pier. The keen blast refreshed his burning cheek; there was something congenial to his spirit in the raging elements—the dash of the billows, as they came roaring into the harbour, or broke in angry murmurs against the piles, soothed him.

He had taken one or two turns, when he encountered a naval officer wearing the British uniform, who regarded him attentively; but our hero felt scarcely conscious that any one beside himself was treading the creaking planks.

"Surely I can't be mistaken?" thought the officer.

A second time they passed each other.

"What, Harry Ashton!" exclaimed the speaker, as they met for the third time; "don't you know me?"

The wanderer looked up, and recognised the son of a gentleman whose estate was in the neighbourhood of Carrow: they had often met, when boys, to play at cricket upon the common with their young companions.

"Fred Suckling, if I am not mistaken?" said our hero.

"Of course you are not!" said the young man, shaking him warmly by the hand. "I cannot tell you," he added, "how delighted I am to see you! Do you return with me?"

"Return!" repeated his friend, as if he scarcely understood the question.

Lieutenant Suckling explained to him that he commanded the government packet, which was to sail in a few hours.

"Yes—yes—I shall return with you!" eagerly answered the lover of Ellen; "and oh, Fred, if the recollection of boyish days and pastimes has any weight with you, set every sail, stretch every nerve, to reach the shores of England! My heart is consuming in its own impatience, till I once more set my foot upon its strand!"

"Fear not," said the young man, "but we will whisk you over quickly enough! The wind is in our favour, and the little craft I have the honour to command worthy a better service—but we are at peace now. Harry," he added, a thought suddenly striking him, "if you have had any unpleasant adventure—any dispute with the authorities—perhaps you had better go on board directly with me! Once under the flag of old England, you are safe!"

The offer was gratefully declined.

"I am indeed most anxious to quit France!" observed our hero; "but not from the cause you name."

The officer of course pressed no further.

"Well," he said, after a pause, during which his companion, who had fallen into a reverie, continued to walk mechanically by his side, as if unconscious of his presence, "our meeting is most singular—but it is not the most singular one I have had to-day!"

Henry looked up in his face.

"And from Carrow, too!"

"From Carrow?"

"Ay—did you notice a tall, solitary man seated at the end of the pier?"

He to whom the question was put had noticed such an object, but turned short to avoid him—for the presence of a stranger was hateful to him.

"Yes—that is, I think I did!" was the reply.

"And did you recognise him?"

"No!"

"Had you done so," continued Lieutenant Suckling, "you would have discovered the face of an old acquaintance."

"In the name of heaven, whose?" demanded the listener.

"A fellow who has often chased me as well as yourself over the common and out of the woods of Carrow: not that either of us, I am sure, bear him any ill-will for that!"

"His name?" gasped Henry Ashton, his eyes flashing fire; "for mercy's sake keep me no longer in suspense!"

"Will Sidelers, the warrener," replied the officer, who began to think that his new-found friend had lost his wits.

"I spoke to him, but he did not appear to recognise me. Excuse the frankness of my speech, Harry, but he seemed as mad as yourself, or perhaps a little more so—for he kept tossing his arms in the air, and muttering some unintelligible words. Perhaps, after all," added the young man, "he was only drunk!"

"It is with blood, then!" exclaimed our hero, fiercely; "the blood of his victim—the good, the noble-hearted Sir William Mowbray—for something whispers me that he is his assassin! Fred, you must assist me to secure that man!"

"Secure him!" repeated the bewildered lieutenant—who certainly had heard of the baronet's assassination, but never had the slightest surmise that Will Sidelers was the murderer.

"Yes; and bear him with us to England."

"Haden't you better apply to the authorities?"

"And so give the villain an opportunity to escape!" interrupted Henry Ashton, impatiently. "No—no! it must be done at once! The fiend who employed him is rich! No chicanery will be left untried—no gold spared—to defeat the ends of justice! I will take all the responsibility on myself!"

"You?"

"Yes—I! and Dr. Orme, you know, is a magistrate: our worthy rector is the companion I spoke to you of."

Suckling was perfectly aware of the paternal interest which the benevolent clergyman had taken in the speaker, and how it was generally supposed he would leave him a considerable portion of his wealth: he began to think that his old playmate was not so mad as he appeared.

Determined to convince himself that the lieutenant had not been deceived, Henry drew his cloak around his face, so as effectually to conceal his features. The two young men crept cautiously towards the end of the pier, where the murderer was standing, his grey hair—for the travelling cap which the agent had given him had fallen or been blown off—streaming in the wind. It was evident that the ruffian was very much excited: the brandy—great quantities of which he had drunk upon landing—had affected his brain.

As he stood gazing towards the shores of his native land, he fancied that some imaginary personage was beckoning him to return.

"The sea is between us!" they heard him mutter, "and I will not return! I have felt the hangman's grip once upon my neck—but I escaped him! Safe—safe—safe! Beckon away!" he added, with a yell of furious laughter; "point to the gash upon your throat! they can't prove I did it! or if they can, I am safe here!"

Henry Ashton pressed the arm of his companion.

"Are you convinced?" he said.

"Perfectly!" was the reply; "but listen!"

The murderer spoke again.

"You can't follow me!" shouted the drunken warrener, shaking his clenched fist with defiance towards the imaginary object he was addressing; "the sea will not bear your footsteps! God!" he added; "it is changed to blood! The avenger still pursues me! I won't be taken!"

The wretch, exhausted with the terrors which his conscience had conjured up, cast himself upon the pier, and hid his face in his hands.

"Can you still refuse me?" whispered our hero.

"No!" said the lieutenant, firmly; "but we must proceed cautiously, and without alarming the authorities. In an hour I will have him safe under hatches on board the packet: once safe in my custody, I should like to see the Frenchman that would take him from me! But I must seek the assistance of some of my men."

"Where will you find them?"

"At the Dover Castle, close to the gate at the end of the pier!" answered Suckling; "you remain here to watch the villain, whilst I seek my tars to secure him."

(To be continued in our next.)

WHEN we see birds, at the approach of rain, anointing their plumage with oil, to shield off the drops, should it not remind us, when the storms of contention threaten us, to apply the oil of forbearance, and thus prevent the chilling drops from eating our hearts?

THE MASK.

It is the day's decline, and, leaning from a window of one of the old palace homes of Venice, looking down into the clear transparency of her waters, and seeing reflected therein her own loveliness—with a troubled shade, it is true, on her countenance, and thoughts oh! how far absent—is seated a noble Roman lady. She has all the grand beauty of her race: the full throat—the small and gracefully shaped hand—the exquisite bust—the large, glorious, shadowy eyes, tremulous as stars, full of soul and poetry—the clouds of dark hair pushed back from the forehead, and secured behind by having a silver arrow run through them—no other ornament; herself a gem, priceless, unapproachable. Truly so; for as you gaze upon her, you see the eye brighten and dilate wildly, mournfully, whilst she sways herself to and fro with a restless motion, as though to still the beatings of her heart, singing all the time a kind of low, crooning lullaby to the ripple of the waves. In the afternoon, when the little bay is alive with pleasure-craft, and gondolas come up under her very windows, taking in their freight of happy passengers, her figure may still be seen, ever singing that same monotonous chaunt—ever pressing her hands against her bosom, and bending over them, as though she thus soothed some unconscious infant to its sweet repose.

Such are the mournful phases of her disordered intellect. Her story is soon told. Young, lovely, loving, and beloved, with one beautiful boy to bless their union, life was fast becoming to Lucrezia B. an earthly paradise. She had been bidden with her husband to a grand state ball; and as she swept past them, with brilliants hanging like tears in her dark hair, and the folds of her white dress flowing round her in classic drapery, even those most accustomed to her appearance felt upon them "the power and might of loveliness." She stooped to kiss her infant son, slumbering in his cot like a fair bud of promise; and, having exacted of the nurse—that she would not leave the side of the timid child until her return, passed onwards with the calm smile and placid manner that is ever the best assurance of a heart at ease.

Shall we follow her into the marble halls, where through the pillars may be seen sweet fountains, throwing up their crystal jets of water, and dashing bright, trembling tear-drops on the living flowers that repose beneath them, laden with perfume, glorious in colouring, peeping out from their green sanctuary of shade like stars of earth, glimmering, tremulous? Shall we listen with her to the invisible music that seems to rise as beneath our feet with prelude—passionate, appealing—till, swelling in sound, it bursts in gladness and revelry into a kind of choral triumph, in which voices are blended, and from which is struck out, like ringing bells, the waltz's musical melody? How rapidly the dancers fly forwards in the mazy circle, threading intricate figures! How beautifully is combined the music of motion with the poetry of sound! The evening speeds swiftly forwards. The Prince de B— has solicited the hand of our heroine, and through the graceful waltz her figure is again seen floating, brilliant as houri, light as spray of ocean. Suddenly a shriek rings piercing from her lips—wild, fearful, she stops. She shudders; she trembles convulsively; she grasps the arm of her companion desperately, as though to steady herself, and sobs, from her white, half-opened lips: "My child! oh, God! my Carling!" Her eyes are fixed: there is in them an expression of nameless horror, of unfathomable dread; her teeth are chattering as with ague. They bear her through the pillars, dashing the cold water from the fountain on her pale brow, but it is still the same bewildered look of agony. "Take me home! oh! quickly—my child! do you not see he is dying?" and a cold, shivering tremor again seized her. The carriage is brought round—reverently she is placed in it—for the presence of a great grief will sober even the giddiest—the horses' feet strike the flints—they draw up under the palazzo—the door stands open—her husband raises her in his arms like a child, and carries her up the broad stair-way; she presses her hands upon her ears, for the wild shrieks of a little child come ringing through the halls, and even the father's strong frame totters and shakes beneath them. They enter their boy's nursery: it is crowded with hirelings; and on a low stool is seated the nurse, holding the child in her arms, just as she has taken him out of his cot. He is screaming in violent convulsions—his face black—his eyes turned upwards to the face of a mask that is suspended over the cot curtains. Painfully, as though in a dream, the unfortunate mother staggers forwards, grasping him in her arms just as a fresh convulsion seizes on his weakened frame, and the soul dissolves away in its mortal fear and agony. The faithless nurse had seized the opportunity of the mother's absence to spend her evening abroad; and, knowing the child to be timid, had thought to guard against danger by leaving the lamp burning in the room, and suspending a mask over the cot, that he might have that to turn to and play with should he awake and find himself alone.

Heaven help the poor child! who, stretching out his arms to receive the usual caresses, was met only by that grim spectre mask-face bending over him as though it were coming down to overwhelm him, and would not be denied its prey. We can only image the terror that little soul passed through, and give a sigh to the miserable mother, who, ever since that miserable day, has kept her bewildered watch at his nursery window: now, in her wild passion of delirium, clasping him in fancy to her bosom; and now, with low voice and raised finger, singing snatches of childish lullaby.

[ELIZABETH CARRIED PRISONER TO THE QUEEN, AT RICHMOND.]

LIVES OF THE QUEENS OF ENGLAND.

BY J. P. SMITH, ESQ., AUTHOR OF
"ROBIN GOODFELLOW," "AMY LAWRENCE," ETC.

ELIZABETH,
QUEEN REGNANT OF ENGLAND.

CHAPTER XXIV.

O Fortune! how thy restless, wavering state
Hath fraught with cares my troubled wit,
Witness this present prison, whither fate
Could bear me, and the joys I quit.
LINES WRITTEN BY ELIZABETH IN PRISON.

THE royal maiden had been permitted occasionally to walk in the garden of the Tower, where none save the child alluded to in a preceding chapter, were suffered to approach her person. Her enemies were fearful of her communicating with any of the reformed religion without the fortress. Here, it is more than probable, the future sovereign matured that system of government which, in after years, gave such lustre to her reign. Misfortune develops the intellect as much as study.

So anxious were Gardiner and his friends to obtain evidence against the Protestant heiress of the crown, that they caused the child to be arrested and brought before the privy council, where he was severely interrogated, but nothing could be elicited to answer the purpose of her enemies.

Elizabeth was sitting, pensively enough, at the window of her chamber in the White Tower, when the two noblemen intrusted to remove her to the royal bower of Woodstock—a measure which Mary had decided upon, after various other places had been suggested—entered the courtyard, at the head of the hundred men under their command.

"Who is that man?" she demanded of her gentleman, who was standing at a short distance from her.

The officer, with a look of surprise, approached the window: it was not often that he had seen the countenance of the lion-hearted princess blanched with terror, or heard her voice betray such profound emotion—he recognised the person of the stern old Catholic knight at a glance.

"Sir Henry Beddingfield," he replied, respectfully.

His mistress became more and more agitated: she knew the person so designated to be not only a devoted partisan, but deep in the confidence of her irritated sister, and naturally imagined his arrival at the Tower boded her no good; but one thing she did not know—that the Norfolk knight was a man of unblemished honour, ready to risk life, lands, and name for the queen and the Catholic cause; but incapable of an act of treachery or infamy, even to advance the cause nearest to his heart.

"God help me!" exclaimed Elizabeth, "I am in a sore strait! Send for the Lieutenant of the Tower—I would speak with him!"

In a few minutes Bridges made his appearance.

"Who is this Sir Henry Beddingfield?" she demanded, the instant he entered the apartment; "and what brings him here?"

"He has been appointed by her majesty to guard your grace," answered the officer, "and the Lord Williams of Tame is joined with him in the commission."

"To guard me?" repeated the princess, fixing a searching glance upon him.

"Even so, your grace!"

"Nothing more?"

"Nothing!"

The calm tone of the speaker somewhat reassured the royal prisoner: still she was far from being satisfied, and inquired whether the scaffold of her cousin, Lady Jane Grey, was still standing within the precincts of the Tower.

"It is, madam," answered Bridges; "but there is nothing unusual in that! Let me entreat your grace to dismiss such thoughts from your mind; for, feel assured, there is no cause for inquietude. Her majesty has no such unkind thought towards you!"

Elizabeth smiled scornfully.

"Be assured of it!" continued the speaker, who proceeded to relate the conduct of Gardiner in sending a warrant for her execution—how he had taken upon himself to disobey it—the indignation of the queen, and her tearing up the death-warrant in his presence.

"So," thought the captive, "they would avoid the scandal of an execution—an assassination would be more convenient!" She next inquired what sort of man the lieutenant considered Sir Henry Beddingfield to be.

"What sort of man?"

"God's death! do not palter with me!" exclaimed the daughter of Henry VIII., in a tone which reminded Bridges forcibly of her father; "but answer a plain question with as plain a speech—what sort of man is he? one of those ready tools which power finds ready to its hands, when it would imbrue them with the blood of a princess? Is he a Tyrrel?" she added, harshly; "a ruffian to strangle childhood in its sleep, or lay a murderous hand upon the daughter of a king?"

"Heaven forgive your grace such unjust suspicion!" answered Bridges—who, as well as the stanch Norfolk knight, belonged to the Catholic party. "Sir Henry would not, for the crown he has more than once risked his life to guard, have hand or dealing in so foul an act! You have asked me, madam," he continued, "what kind of man he is? I will answer you. Were your grace condemned by lawful authority to die, and Sir Henry Beddingfield, with only ten men under his command, commissioned to see it done, he would hold out the Tower to the last, though all London were clamouring at the gates. Placed under his ward, he will guard your life with equal fidelity. The queen's is not more sacred in his eyes than yours!"

Elizabeth's after experience, proved that the judgment of the Lieutenant of the Tower was correct. The Catholic knight proved himself a stern but an honourable guardian, and defeated, by his precautions, more than one attempt against the safety of his prisoner.

The royal maiden drew her breath more freely. The conduct of the speaker in the affair of the warrant, induced her to place confidence in his words.

"Why comes he here, then?" she inquired, more calmly. "His orders, I believe, are to conduct your grace to another residence."

"To Pontefract?" exclaimed the princess, with a shudder; for she remembered the fearful crimes committed—the murder of so many princes.

Bridges answered in the negative.

An unpleasant suspicion crossed the mind of Elizabeth. She had heard that the emperor, who was her bitterest enemy, had recommended Mary to send her to the court of his sister, the Queen of Hungary; or to Brussels, where she would have been more immediately in his power; but she did not know that her sister had refused her assent.

"I shall not quit the realm!" muttered Elizabeth, half aloud and half musingly; for, even in the most adverse fortune, she appears never to have lost sight of the reversion of the crown.

"I do not think such is her majesty's pleasure," observed Bridges. "I at least can vouch that Sir Henry Beddingfield is intrusted with no such orders. His present instructions are to convey your grace to Woodstock. But here come the knight and my Lord of Tame—they will doubtless inform you of the queen's good pleasure."

The gentleman usher—who, during the above conversation, had remained in the antechamber—now entered the apartment, and announced the visit of the commissioners, who followed him so closely, that his mistress had scarcely pronounced the words, "Admit them!" when they entered the apartment.

Sir Henry Beddingfield was a tall, gaunt-looking personage, apparently between fifty and sixty years of age. His hair and beard, which he wore closely trimmed, were of an iron-grey; there was great severity in the cast of his features: the deep-set eye and thin upper lip denoted determination. His manner was cold as steel, but neither unpolished nor without dignity. His companion, who was some years younger, had far more of the courtier in his appearance. Both doffed their bonnets as they advanced towards the chair in which Elizabeth had seated herself.

"We hear, gentlemen," said the princess, endeavouring to repress the fire of her eye and the impatient bitterness of her speech, "that you are charged with a commission from our dear sister, whose mind is disabused at last, we trust, of the cruel slanders and devices by which my enemies and hers have blown the coal of discord between us—for a more loyal subject than myself never suffered wrong!"

A grim smile curled the moustache of Sir Henry.

"God's wot! do you doubt me?" added the speaker.

"It is not foinne to judge your grace's loyalty to your sovereign and sister," replied the knight, not in the slightest degree abashed or moved by the angry glances which from time to time she bestowed upon him; "I am here to execute the queen's commands!"

"Which," added Lord Williams of Tame, willing to lessen the harshness of the old knight's speech, "I am happy to state, are more favourable to your grace than your enemies could wish!"

"In which," interrupted Elizabeth, sarcastically, "I presume I am to include the messengers of our sister?"

"I am not the enemy of your grace," replied the noble.

"Nor I!" said Sir Henry Beddingfield, firmly. "We are both loyal subjects to the queen; and, as such, prepared to execute the orders intrusted to us."

"Which orders I am bound to hear," observed Elizabeth—who began to see the impolicy of making enemies of two such men.

"And obey!" added the old knight. "Your grace will prepare for your departure for Woodstock, where it is her majesty's pleasure you should remain, till such further steps be taken as the queen, with the advice of her privy council, shall see fit."

"And when must this be?"

"When the hour is fixed we shall inform your grace," answered the Lord of Tame. "Having announced to you our commission and our orders, for the present we will take our leave."

It having been decided that Elizabeth should be removed as privately as possible from the Tower, in order to defeat any project or demonstration of the citizens of London in her favour, neither of the parties intrusted with the affair thought it prudent to permit the hour or day to transpire; for it was well known that the Protestants contrived to communicate with the royal prisoner by signs and tokens in the Tower. There is good reason to believe that Cecil, or some other male friend about the court, found means to intimate the intention of Mary to grant her an interview at Richmond, though for what purpose, was a secret confined to the queen's own breast. From the decided conduct of the princess on the occasion, she must have well considered and matured her resolution.

It was on a bright morning in May, that the barge which was to convey the future sovereign of England to her new abode, drew up to the Tower stairs. This time it was not the Traitor's Gate, but the usual landing-place. The gates of the fortress were shut, to prevent the approach of the idle or the curious. The Lord Treasurer and the Lord Chamberlain were there.

As Sir Henry Beddingfield conducted his charge to her seat, she cast her eyes thankfully around her. The recollection of her mother's death, and the bitter hours she had endured, made the Tower distasteful to her, independent of her own sufferings. As she stepped into the barge, the child who had so frequently brought her flowers, but who had not been permitted for some time to see her, ran to the water's edge, and exclaimed:

"Farewell, lady! I shall bring you no more nose-gays!"

The captive was observed to dash aside a tear, and the barge, with the curtains of the awning drawn carefully down, moved from the Tower stairs.

CHAPTER XXV.

Remember in thy youth the Lord,
And gladly bow before His throne;
Follow the precept and the word,
The narrow path in mercy shown.
Remember Him in joy, and life
In danger's hour will pity thee.

OLD POEM.

THOSE who had charge of the august prisoner, did not permit the barge once to stop until it reached Richmond, where Mary Tudor then held her court, when it drew up at the landing-place in the gardens.

The palace—a plain but large pile of building—was the same which Henry VIII. had bestowed, together with the manor of Richmond, upon his favourite, Cardinal Wolsey, when that magnificent prelate surrendered to his rapacious master his more splendid palace of Hampton Court, which he had reared at such great expense, and furnished with every luxury.

As Elizabeth, surrounded by her escort, passed through the gardens, many of the courtiers—especially those inclined to the reformed church—regarded her with the deepest sympathy—for none could tell what might be her fate. The demeanour of the captive was firm, and even cheerful: pride would not let her betray the doubt and secret terror which must have agitated her spirits.

Leaving the great entrance, they approached the palace by a private path, and reached the north tower, in which the royal apartments were situate. It was evident that arrangements had been made for their reception—for they found the captain of the guard at the bottom of the stairs, and a gentleman usher at the entrance.

"The queen," said the last-named officer, bowing humbly, "expects your grace! I will conduct you."

"God help me!" sighed Elizabeth, as she slowly ascended the staircase. "My life hangs on the balance!"

Sir Henry Beddingfield and the chamberlain alone accompanied her.

In a tapestried chamber, hung with arras from the looms of Beauvais, was seated Mary Tudor. There was an air of determination on her harsh features, which argued unfavourably for her successor. A missal, richly illuminated by the cunning hand of some Italian painter, together with a cross and portrait of Catherine of Arragon, were upon the table. The latter was inclosed in a sort of ebony and silver shrine, such as the Catholics use to contain the relics of the saints.

The gloomy queen was clothed in a dark mulberry coloured velvet dress, edged with miniver, and richly ornamented with pearls. Upon her head was one of those small peaked caps, such as we find in all her portraits. It was evident she had been praying, and from prayer had fallen into a deep reverie.

A gentle knock was heard at the door, but Mary did not seem to hear it till it had been twice repeated.

"Enter!" she said, in her usually brief tone.

The curtain over the door was drawn aside, and Gardiner made his appearance. Mary received him rather coldly.

"Madam," said the prelate, "the prisoner has arrived."

"Our sister, my lord—I presume you mean the Lady Elizabeth? 'Tis well! Give orders to the captain of our guard to admit her grace to the presence when he shall hear the strike of the bell."

The chancellor bowed. From his manner it was evident that he wished to urge something, but was doubtful how his advice would be received; for, since his unconstitutional attempt to execute the princess without the form of a trial—stretch of authority which, with all his tyranny, Henry VIII. himself would have paused at—he had evidently lost ground, both in the favour and confidence of his royal mistress.

"Speak!" she said, perceiving his embarrassment; "what would you request?"

"Nothing madam."

"Advise, then?"

"Merely this: that in the approaching interview with the rival to your throne—for such my duty compels me to designate the Lady Elizabeth—and the enemy of our Holy Church, your majesty should have the support and presence of one of your ministers!"

"Yourself, my lord?" inquired the queen, coldly.

"It is not for a subject, madam, to dictate to the choice of his sovereign!" was the reply of the astute churchman.

"I shall receive the Lady Elizabeth," said Mary Tudor, "according to my original intention!"

"Madam! the council?"

"Are my subjects!" exclaimed the daughter of Henry VIII., striking her hand upon the table; "I have no dictation to receive from them! You have your answer, my lord, and may withdraw: it is not my custom to pronounce my pleasure twice!"

Gardiner bit his lips with mortification, and, bowing lowly, to conceal his confusion, withdrew.

"Our Lady of many Sorrows help me!" murmured the queen, as soon as she was alone. "I am beset on all sides! First, Spain, Philip, the Pope—and now my ministers urge me to consent to the death of my rival! Would that rival," she added, sternly, "were any but my sister!"

Before giving the signal which was to admit the captive to her presence, the speaker closed the little ebony shrine which contained the portrait of her mother—but not till she had pressed it to her lips.

"Ne nos inducas in tentationem!" she said; and, seating herself upon a chair of state, close to the table, she struck the bell.

When Elizabeth entered, she approached the spot where her sister was seated, and, bending the knee, began a passionate protestation of her innocence and loyalty, ending in a well-rounded period, in which she expressed her affection for her sister, and the joy she felt at being once more admitted to her presence.

Mary listened to her with the impassibility of a statue—there was no sign of relenting in her features.

"Words!" she said, at last—"mere words! which bitter experience teaches us are used to conceal, more frequently than to express our thoughts! I am tired of them!"

"Alas! how can I defeat the malice of mine enemies?" exclaimed Elizabeth, wringing her hands with real or well-acted sorrow, "and prove my love to your majesty?"

"By obedience."

"Obedience?"

"Ay," continued the queen; "the councillors of my throne urge me to bring you to trial and execution. But I have paused. The public voice has accused you of treason—as yet I have not listened to it—one way will end my doubts, and cast a seal of oblivion over the past. Accept as a husband Philibert of Savoy, a prince of unblemished honour, who is a suitor for your hand. Your dower shall be worthy of the sister of a queen! One word," added Mary, "of assent, and I restore you to my favour and my love!"

"Alas, gracious madam!"

"Hear me!" interrupted her majesty. "I will do more, in consideration of your compliance with my wish. I will cause parliament, in default of my having issue, to acknowledge you heiress of the crown: the object of your dreams—of your ambition!"

"It has done so already!" observed the princess.

It was terrible to see the change which overspread the countenance of Mary Tudor, at this indiscreet reply of her sister. Her brow knitted, and her eye flashed like her father's.

"Has it, minion!" she exclaimed. "But thou dost forget that between it and thee the headsman stands, grasping the blood-stained axe—the fitting doom of traitors! Dost think I cannot read thy pretended love and loyalty? Hollow words—masking deceit and falsehood! I have chosen for thee a husband worthy the daughter of a king; and doubly so, of the offspring of of Anne Boleyn!"

This was one of the very rare occasions on which the speaker had been known to make an ungenerous allusion to the mother of her sister.

"Madam," said Elizabeth, sinking once more upon her knee; "punish me not for the slanders of mine enemies—it is your place, as the fountain of all justice and honour, to protect me from them—but judge my disinclination to accept the gracious offer of your majesty for my unworthy hand to its true motive—the resolution I have made to lead a single life! I shall never love!"

Mary smiled bitterly, and pronounced the name of Seymour—alluding, of course, to the high admiral, the first lover of the princess.

"I have been foully wronged!" replied the princess; "the admiral was nothing more to me than a friend!"

"Arundel?" added the queen.

"A fool who deceived himself!"

"And Courtney?"

"A relative," said Elizabeth, "for whom I was bound to pray!"

"I am tired of this paltering with my will—answer me at once!" said Mary; "do I see before me a sister whom I can take to my heart and love, as the bride of the Prince of Savoy, or a contumacious traitor, plotting against my crown?"

"A loyal subject, and a true sister!" answered the princess, in a firm tone, although her features were pale as she pronounced the words; "but not the bride of Philibert!"

The queen, with a look of terrible anger, struck upon the bell: in an instant the captain of the guard, Sir Henry Beddingfield, the chamberlain, and the chancellor, entered the apartment: there was an expression of curiosity in every countenance.

"Sir Henry," said Mary, with dreadful calmness, "conduct the Lady Elizabeth to Woodstock, and hold her close prisoner until further orders! We need not recommend you to be careful of your ward—for we have proved your fidelity to our crown and person! You will dismiss her household!" she added, "and see that none have access to her, but on our especial warrant!"

So saying, she left the apartment, without deigning to cast a look upon her still kneeling sister, who faintly murmured, as she disappeared:

"Lost—lost!"

ESSAYS.

NO. CLXXXVI.—THE BOYHOOD OF GREAT MEN.

THE boyhood of the mental luminaries of the world, presents a subject worthy of the most anxious study. It not only points out with distinctness the several paths by which great men arrived at their respective eminence, but would seem to afford a clue to the solution of the grand mystery of all intellectual development.

The investigation of all divine natures must always afford the most exquisite pleasurable sensations; but when pursued under the influence of economical considerations, is capable of yielding a vast amount of instruction, as well as preparing the mind for suggestion of the deepest gravity.

The Boyhood of Great Men! What may we not learn of that susceptible, yearning, half spiritual, half physical existence—that romantic period which, even to those who subsequently shine high and bright in the firmament of thought, is ever dear to the remembrance—ever surrounded by a halo of pure, imperishable memories. How was the early bias formed?—how was it manifested?—how early did the bud peer forth?—did the blossoms afford any indication, or give promise of the magnificence of the fruit? All these are questions of thrilling interest, and furnish a splendid theme for those who, by promoting education, regard mankind under a nobler aspect than being the slaves of circumstances or necessity.

In addition, the information thus to be obtained must be highly advantageous in an educational point of view: as showing the condition of mind in its early dawn, and so enabling parents and guardians to avoid those dreadful tyrannies, in the guise of mistaken affection, which have blighted and ruined myriads of capacities, which, under more judicious culture, would have expanded to the greatness which wears the crown that age cannot dim, or detract rob of a single jewel. Ignorance and prejudice have and daily are shutting out countless numbers from all sense of the glorious summer noon of mind, all knowledge of an existence as far transcending that

"Dim with a dull, imprisoned ray,
A sunbeam which hath lost its way," as the sun in its full effulgence transcends itself when in dim eclipse, and

"O'er half the nations disastrous twilight sheds!"

Indeed, it may be accepted as indisputable, that the study of the boyhood of great men would tend to weaken, if not to destroy, the pernicious system which tramples down and makes a litter of materials intended to lay the foundations of superstructures wherein "the thoughts that wander through eternity" may be coined, and the earthly man lift himself nearer to the source of the immortality that pervades the universe, invisible to mortal eyes, but still a living glance of everlasting life. We would therefore recommend the first indications of genius and the earliest incidents in the careers of distinguished men to the earnest attention not only of fathers and mothers, but to that distinguished host of practical philanthropists, who have at heart the moral and mental improvement of their fellow-creatures. We would, in fact, wish the boyhood of great men to be made the study of both parents and schoolmasters—so that in time a science might be elaborated out of the glittering mass of details that would be gathered together, and some rules established which would leave the birth and growth of talent for a particular pursuit less to chance, and more to some defined principle of certainty. At present boys are directed to the future by no rules whatever, beyond the arbitrary inclinations of their natural guardians, or the contingencies which arise out of the independent exercise of a will too robust for the position to which it is attempted to be confined.

The natural bias is too little consulted: because in some instances it is not respected, in others not understood; and we might mention many in which it is overruled by a dogged desire to realise a wish or fulfil a promise made before the child had acquired even the gurgling language of infancy. It is too much the fashion for parents early to decide what profession or trade their children shall follow. How can the most astute father or sagacious mother know what a boy under ten or twelve, or if of a sluggish temperament, under fourteen years of age, is fit for? To say that such an infant shall be a lawyer, another a physician, another an artist, another a soldier, sailor, or mechanic, is sheer infatuation—a species of domestic bigotry which, in the majority of instances, dooms the child to a condition far worse than slavery—for it takes not the slightest notice of the ability or adaptive capacity of the future boy or man for the pursuit selected; in fact, it ignores every wise and prudent consideration, and is just about as humane a proceeding as turning a man adrift on the trackless ocean, instead of compelling him to adopt the old buccaneering expedient of walking the plank at once.

But probably a few examples will best illustrate what is meant by sound educationists, when they energetically contend that the natural bias of the child should be studied and accommodated before any attempt is made to control or carve out for him a future destiny. Take the cases of three boys, who subsequently became very great men in three of the highest departments of intellect. Their fathers were pre-eminently wise fathers, and the boyhoods of their sons are actually pages of encouragement and sunshine. We allude to Galileo, Mozart, and Sir Thomas Lawrence.

Galileo Galilei was born at Pisa, on the 15th of March, 1564. His parents were descendants of a noble Florentine family; indeed, he had the best blood of Florence in his veins, but it was allied to poverty. His father had a very small income and a very large family; but to compensate for his want of fortune, he was accomplished, refined, and possessed rare musical talents. Not being able to afford to have his son educated at an academy, he undertook the task himself, and under such loving auspices, the young Galileo soon grew up a graceful and talented boy. His father at first destined him for commerce, in order that he might repair the broken fortunes of the house of Galileo; but the studious habits of the boy proved obstacles too formidable to be surmounted, and the fond father gave way, and resolved to afford him an education to fit him for a liberal profession. Accordingly, at the age of seventeen, he was sent to the University of Pisa, to study medicine; but this intention proved abortive. Galileo could not accommodate himself to the system of education then in vogue, and embroiled himself with the professors, by exposing and denouncing their ignorance, in the keen, ironical way which afterwards drew down upon him the vengeance of the Inquisition. He had early manifested a taste for geometry, and at this period commenced the study of Euclid and Archimedes. His father sought in vain to recall his attention to his professional pursuits. The early bias first indicated when he pondered over the cause of his top spinning, had grown stronger, and the father wisely allowed him to follow the bent of his own inclination. His first essay, a paper on the hydrostatic balance, procured him the acquaintance of Guido Ubaldo, a learned Pisan, who conceived such a strong friendship for the young author, that he procured him the appointment of lecturer of mathematics in his native town. From that time may be dated the commencement of Galileo's greatness, and, what embittered his life, his daring attacks on the false doctrines of Aristotle. In 1609, he re-invented the telescope, which enabled him to prosecute the science of astronomy with such ardour, that he soon proved the mobility of the earth, and the immobility of the sun. Now, had his father forced him into the drudgery of trade, or compelled him to adopt medicine as then practised by the Sangrado tribe, where would the Galileo of history have been? Chance might have rescued him; but chance can do little towards extricating a mind from darkness—from the dull lethargy of distortion and perverted powers. No, Galileo had a wise as well as an indulgent father, and he lived to adorn and glorify the world of science, and do quite as much as Luther in bringing the Romish Church into contempt and ridicule. For had he not been persecuted by the Inquisition, public attention would not, for at least a century, have been so markedly drawn to the irreconcilable differences between the revelations of science and the Roman interpretation of the Holy Scriptures. As to Galileo's weakness, that must all be charged to the execrable Inquisition. Men of science have not the enthusiasm which leads martyrs to the stake. Besides, when summoned to Rome, he was verging on the period assigned to human life, was weak in body, and shattered in nerves. And was it not a miserable triumph to make an infirm old man bow his grey head before the terrors of the dungeon and the rack? But posterity amply avenged the indignity. From the hour that persecution had done its work in Galileo, the Romish Church declined, and to this day is falling—and will continue to fall, until its mission has been accomplished, and it shall have been consigned to the pages of history or the dim chronicles of tradition.

Turn we gladly to the more pleasing illustration afforded by the boyhood of Sir Thomas Lawrence. His father had a strong penchant for poetry, and, spurning the profession of attorney, began wandering about the country in search of ideas and subjects upon which to exercise his luxuriant imagination. Whether he succeeded is not recorded, but he found a wife in his wanderings, the daughter of affluent parents, by whom the youthful couple were disarmed; and the poet being thus obliged to cultivate something besides the romance of life, after several ups and downs, became supervisor of Excise, at Bristol: in which city his sixteenth and youngest child was born, on the 4th of May, 1769. In the same year, the father, now "old" Lawrence, resigned his appointment in the Excise, and finally settled down as landlord of the Black Bear Inn, at Devizes. Here he is stated to have tried the patience of his customers by his constant recitations of Shakespeare; and, not content with the exhibition of his own powers, assiduously laboured to impress upon his distinguished son a love of the same kind of performance. The precocity and versatility of Master Thomas were so remarkable that his father used to say to his visitors:

"Will you have him recite from the poets, or take your portraits?"

The innkeeper—he must have been an extremely worthy man—was so delighted with the accomplishments of his son, that he omitted not the slightest opportunity of bringing him out. When Thomas was six years old, Lord and Lady Kenyon arrived one evening at the inn, fatigued after a long journey; but in the host the proud father was so predominant, that he must needs introduce his prodigy of a son to take their portraits. The boy did so, and with astonishing success. They were delighted, and did not omit to spread abroad the fame of the future "painter in ordinary to his majesty."

At thirteen, his talent and popularity were so well established, that the price of his portraits was raised from one guinea to four, and the studio of the boy-artist, at Bath, was the resort of the noble and learned. When eighteen, his father yielded to the entreaties by which he was beset, and removed his son to London, where he took up his quarters in Tavistock Street, and became a student of the Royal Academy. His subsequent progress was extraordinarily rapid, and it must have delighted the sound old heart of his admirable father, to have lived long enough to behold his son the companion of nobles and princes, and caressed by the most beautiful as well as the most distinguished in the land. Too much praise cannot be awarded to that father. Although an innkeeper, he had the soul of an artist. Had he not had something heroic in his disposition, the boyhood of Sir Thomas Lawrence might have been frittered away, and the future great man totally lost to society. Or, to indulge in a more dreadful supposition—had he been a coarse publican, the genius that in 1814 commanded the patronage of the Allied Sovereigns, might have been extinguished in the squalid tavern-keeper, or popular parlour bon vivant. Chance might have rescued him? Possibly—but as we don't believe in chance, we detect it, and regard the memory of that Shakespeare-reciting father of the greatest portrait painter that ever existed, with a mingled feeling of respect and kindly excuse for the foible that proved so troublesome to his hard-headed, fastidious customers. The great son owed everything to the fond father; and it is gratifying to know that their affection for each other was enthusiastically reciprocated.

Mozart, in like manner, had his genius developed under the most favourable circumstances. His father was an accomplished musician, and encouraged his wonderful boy to obey the law of his nature.

At six, young Mozart composed a concerto, and in his seventh year his fame had preceded him to Paris, where he met a brilliant reception. Indeed, not to enter into particulars that must be familiar to all our readers, there is a remarkable parallel in the careers of Mozart and Lawrence. Both were precocious, both had enthusiastic but clear-headed fathers, and each, before he had attained his thirty-fifth year, had acquired imperishable renown.

How different was the case with Handel, the prince of melodists, as he has been styled. His father, a parchment-loving lawyer, refused to believe that

Music hath charms to soothe a savage breast,
To soften rocks, or bend a knotted oak;

and strove by every possible means to stifle the genius that was destined to become so potent. Everything in the shape of a musical instrument was banished from the house, and Handel, when only six years old, by the aid of a servant, when the family had retired to rest, stole to a garret, where he practised on "a small clarichord—an instrument in the form of a spinet, with strings so covered with little pieces of cloth, as to deaden or soften the sound." Accident threw the young enthusiast in the way of a German prince, who was so delighted with him, that his father was summoned to court, and the result was that Handel was provided with musical tuition, and in time became the composer of pieces that will endure as long as divine sounds linger on earth, to chasten, elevate, and ennoble the human soul.

These memorable instances ought, we think, to be sufficient to show the necessity for knowing what a boy is fit for before he is put to any trade or profession, and that the arbitrary selection of the parents without this previous inquiry, is not only foolishly erroneous but decidedly cruel. The boy should take to the business or profession, not the business or profession be forced on the boy. The capacity should select the employment, not the employment the capacity. Dr. Parr is an example in point. Having a taste for the ponderous in matter as well as sentiment, he wished to be a clergyman. In his infancy he amused himself by pronouncing funeral orations over dead dogs and cats. His desire was gratified, and he became, through his classical acquisitions, a rather famous man in his day. Had he selected to have been a butcher, no doubt he would have distinguished himself—for his biographer informs us that, although "his humanity to animals was extreme, and the only battle he had ever fought at school was in defence of a worried cat, he had, notwithstanding this, a strange fancy for filling oxen at the slaughter-house." So that for any pursuit in which originality or brilliance was requisite, it is quite evident that he was totally unqualified. He was adapted by nature for the heavy responsibilities of the parson and pedagogue, and his friends showed much wisdom when they allowed him to study for the position which he afterwards obtained.

On the same principle, a man with a poetical organisation rarely succeeds in the law. The present Mr. Justice Talfourd, an elegant poet and accomplished scholar, may be an exception—but we doubt whether he would have been a judge, if he had adopted poetry and literature as a profession. He merely used them as auxiliaries: so that this or any of the solitary and far, very far between exceptions that might be cited, rather strengthen than weaken the rule. And we confidently refer to the boyhood of Sir Walter Scott for corroboration of the truth of our remark, that natural poets seldom excel as artificial lawyers. Scott's father was a lawyer, and he ardently wished that his son should succeed him in business; but the bias acquired at Sandie Knowe was too strong to be resisted even at the call of filial affection. The mimic hero mounted on his Shetland pony, and the delightful rambles with old Dalgety in the village of Prestonpans, were not forgotten in the man. He qualified for the bar—but as, in three months after his assuming the gown, he was "exploring the border dales in search of ballads, it is almost impossible to think that his heart could ever have been earnest in his professional pursuits." No, all his tastes and inclinations were literary; and, by cultivating his powers, he became one of the most facile and original writers that ever adorned the literature of any nation or any time. Had he been compelled to labour at the law, he would probably never have been heard of out of his own locality, and his fine intellect would have been frittered away "in the collection of curious old books, rare coins, Highland claymores, and all sorts of antiquities."

As the organisation of Scott peculiarly adapted him for becoming a great poet and novelist, so did the organisations of such men as Canova, Ferguson, and Newton, enable them to excel in the departments in which they shone so brightly. The grandson of the village mason, like the Scotch celebrity, received his bias from his charming tale-telling, ballad-singing, and poetical old grandmother, while his grandfather initiated him into the mysteries of drawing and sculpture. It is a pleasant picture to fancy that old man bending over his protégé, then about ten years of age—as, on account of the feebleness of his frame, Canova was "indulged in modelling flowers, drawing animals, and other matters congenial to his fine taste and bright fancy." The angel of that boy's future was surely at such a moment whispering in his ear.

Ferguson, the son of a poor Scottish day labourer, and himself a poor shepherd boy, is another brilliant example of genius allowed to continue in the right channel by kind encouragement. Who can forget his remark on his practice of star-gazing, when out at night keeping sheep. "I used," he writes, "to stretch a thread with small beads on it, at arm's length between my eye and the stars; sliding the beads upon it, till they hid such and such stars from my eye, in order to take their apparent distances from one another; and then, laying the thread down on the paper, I marked the stars thereon by the beads. My master at first laughed at me, but when I explained my meaning to him, he encouraged me to go on; and that I might make fair copies in the day-time of what I had done in the night, he often worked for me himself. I shall always have a respect for the memory of that man."

The minister of Keith, who gave him a map to copy—Mr. Grant, the squire, and his sun-dial painting butler, who taught the incipient astronomer decimal arithmetic and algebra—also richly merited his gratitude; and it may safely be assumed that, had it not been for the direction thus early given to his bias, he would never have "died on the 11th of November, 1776, having won and enjoyed a distinguished reputation both in England and on the continent."

Sir Isaac Newton is another glorious illustration of genius not being twisted from its original bias. The "sober, silent, thinking lad," at fifteen gave no promise of becoming a farmer, as his mother fondly desired. "The cultivation of the soil, the breeding of sheep, the growth of corn, and the fattening of cattle were not subjects of the slightest interest to him. He was framing some model, getting a water-wheel into play, or solving a difficult problem—little recking whether his wheat was ripening on the arable land, or his flocks thriving in the green pasture." A clergyman, his uncle, the rector of an adjoining parish, found him one day seated under a hedge, reading a book which so completely monopolised his attention, that he was totally unaware of any one having approached the spot. The reverend gentleman was in no small degree astonished to find that the cause of his nephew's attraction was his being deeply engaged in the solution of a mathematical problem, and had no hesitation in determining that nature had not intended him for rural honours. He therefore employed his influence with Newton's mother, and the young philosopher was sent to Cambridge, and entered at Trinity College.

None of these great men appear to have been capable of having filled any other than the positions they respectively held. And in all of them we see how the natural bias was promoted either by friendly circumstances, or the dearer fostering influence of affection. Chance had nothing whatever to do either with the adoption of the pursuit, or the subsequent success of him who followed it. Chance—most likely it was a warm impulse—may have led Moody, the actor, in the largeness of his noble heart, to tell Mr. Stratford Canning, the London merchant, that his nephew was on the high road to the gallows, unless something were done for him; but chance did not fill George Canning's head with brains, or, when at Eton, cause him to shine in a mimic House of Commons, and give the bent to an inclination that conducted him to the premiership of England. Chance or accident may have caused the son of Sir Astley Cooper's foster-mother to be run over by a cart-wheel; but chance did not give the boy Cooper the courage, coolness, and sagacity to stop the bleeding of the wounded artery by tying his handkerchief tightly above it.

But it would be idle to pursue such an argument. Chance is rather an enemy of genius than otherwise. It is to circumstances of a sunny nature, to forethought and kindness of parents, and the sagacity of philanthropists, that we must chiefly look for the causes which have assisted the sons of genius to climb the steep ascent to undying fame—to prove that and, from the unequivocal positiveness of the principle to be deduced from the details of the boyhood of great men, establishing, beyond a doubt, that it is madness and against nature to thwart the instinctive bias of a brain that only requires proper cultivation to become as fruitful as the fields of the earth under the hands of the skilful agriculturist, and the bountiful supply of nurture derived from the rains and the light of heaven. J. P. H.

The child is father of the man;

A LADY'S HAND.

'Tis dimpled, white, and oh! so soft,
That little fairy hand!

It lies within mine own so warm,
So graceful in its petite form;

No words I can command
Will tell the magic, mystic spell,
Which in that tiny hand doth dwell.

As to my burning lips full oft
That little hand I press,
Bestowing Love's caress

Upon the flake of dimpled snow
Which warm with life and youth doth glow—
My lady's soft white hand!

I love to mark the blue veins swell
Upon that little hand!

Each finger tapers, round and fair,
And by that much loved hand I swear,

While I have wealth or land,
That gentle hand no ill shall know,
No rude touch bid its whiteness glow,

That snowy hand I love so well.
Would it were now in mine,
That I might leave Love's sign,

His signet, and his sweetest seal
On that hand, which, thro' woe and weal
I'll love—my lady's hand!

[VIEW OF ETON COLLEGE.]

ETON COLLEGE.

THIS venerable and illustrious seminary—which, for nearly four centuries, has planted the seeds of piety and learning in the expanding mind of youth, and the records of whose favoured alumni contain a host of names distinguished for their renown in the field, the cabinet, and the varied pursuits of literature—was founded by Henry VI. In September, 1440, that monarch purchased the perpetual advowson of the parish of Eton, for the purpose of founding a college; and by two charters, dated October 11, 1440, and March 11, 1441, endowed it with sufficient funds for its maintenance. The building was commenced in the following year, and, when completed, contained accommodation for twenty-five poor grammar scholars, and twenty-five poor and infirm men to pray for the king; with the requisite number of tutors and ecclesiastical attendants. The new establishment was modelled upon the plan of William de Wykeham, the founder of Winchester College, his statutes being transcribed without any very material alteration. In 1464 a treaty of union and mutual defence was concluded between Eton, Winchester and King's College, Cambridge. The first head master was William Waynflete, Bishop of Winchester, afterwards provost of the institution, and founder of Magdalen College, Oxford. Fostered by the hand of royalty, even during the stormy period of the Reformation and the subsequent fluctuations in the established religion of the country, the infant establishment made rapid progress, and speedily numbered in its list of provosts the most celebrated men of the age. Among them was Sir Henry Saville, who founded professorships of astronomy and geometry at the University of Oxford; Sir Henry Wootton, Bart., an eminent statesman at the court of James I., by whom he was frequently employed in embassies to foreign states; Provost Steward, Clerk of the Closet to Charles I.; Francis Rowse, whose principles became so decidedly puritanical as to procure him a seat in Cromwell's Upper House of Parliament; and many others, equally eminent, of later date than the preceding.

The present establishment consists of a provost, vice-provost, six fellows, a master, under-master, assistants, seventy scholars, seven lay clerks, and ten choristers, besides the inferior officers and servants for the domestic offices of the collegians. The scholars on the foundation are distinguished by wearing a black cloth gown; the others are termed oppidan, the expense of whose education and maintenance is defrayed by their relatives, and who are boarded in private houses within the precincts of the college: the total number is upwards of 600. The annual election of scholars to King's College, Cambridge, takes place at the latter end of July, when the twelve senior scholars are put upon the rolls to succeed to King's as vacancies may occur: four or five generally take place in the course of a twelvemonth, and the students succeed to the fellowships at three years' standing. Upon the day of election the provost of King's College, accompanied by two posers, attends at Eton, when the candidates pass through an examination: on this occasion the senior scholars deliver public orations, in the upper school, selected from the classics and the best English authors. Eton likewise sends two scholars, denominated post-masters, who originally officiated as choristers, to Merton College, Oxford, and has several exhibitions of twenty-one guineas each, for the benefit of the scholars who are supernumerary, which, by the statutes of the college, they become at nineteen years of age.

The singular custom triennially celebrated at Eton on Whit-Tuesday, and which had the title of Montem (but now fallen into disuse), appears to have been coeval with at which time consecrated salt was sold to the spectators. The spectacle partook somewhat of a military array; the major part of the boys were habited in uniforms, and the senior scholars wore the dresses of a marshal, captain, lieutenant, and ensign, the latter of whom carried the college flag, inscribed with the motto, "Pro more et monte," which was waved with much form on the summit of the mount at Salt Hill. The two principal collectors were termed salt-bearers, and were assisted in the duties of the day by several more of the upper boys, who had the title of servants; their dresses were rich and fanciful, chosen according to the taste of the wearer: so that it was by no means unusual to witness these youths habited in the costume of every clime and period. The collection generally amounted to between £800 and £1000.

The buildings of the college form two large quadrangles, and, with the exception of the chapel, are built of brick, having the roof battlemented; the principal front faces the Thames, a neatly-disposed garden extending to the bank of the river. The outer quadrangle is formed on the east side by the clock tower and apartments of some of the masters; on the north, by the lower school, above which is the Long Chamber or dormitory for the scholars on the foundation; on the west by the upper school, which, with the stone arcade beneath it, was built by Sir Christopher Wren, at the expense of Dr. Allestre, provost of the college after the Restoration; and on the south by the chapel. In the centre of the courtyard is a bronze statue of Henry VI., on a marble pedestal, inclosed within an iron railing; the monarch is in his full robes, wearing a cap of state, and having the sceptre in his right hand, and the globe and cross in his left. It was executed by an artist named Francis Bird, in the reign of George I.

The chapel is a very handsome Gothic structure, supported on each side by massive buttresses, but fitted-up internally in a style of great plainness and simplicity.

A small postern gate, luxuriantly mantled with ivy, forms an opening from the cloisters into the playing fields—an extensive tract of ground, shaded by several lofty trees, and bounded on one side by the Thames. The young gentlemen educated here are greatly attached to aquatic amusements, and twice during the summer (on the 4th of June, in commemoration of the birthday of George III., and on the last Saturday in July, when the senior scholars are elected to King's College, Cambridge) splendid regattas take place. On these occasions, they go in procession, habited in fancy dresses, in several long-boats, ornamented with flags, and accompanied with music, to a meadow opposite Surley Hall, about three miles up the river, where a cold collation is provided; and on their return, a brilliant display of fireworks is exhibited on an eyot, a short distance above Windsor Bridge. This spectacle has been frequently graced with the presence of several members of the royal family, and annually attracts a considerable number of distinguished visitors.

ROMANTIC ADVENTURES OF A PAISLEY BODY.

SOME seventeen years ago, a young man, a native of Paisley, the son of a most respectable tradesman, went to sea: the vessel founded, and, with one solitary exception, all on board perished. The sad intelligence was soon brought to Paisley: the family went into mourning; and for seventeen long years, if they had not forgotten the sailor, they had ceased to think of him as one about whose fate there could be the least shadow of a doubt.

A letter lately made its appearance there, addressed to the young man's father, who several years ago had retired to a watering-place on the west coast, to enjoy the otium cum dignitate of a green old age. As he had long been out of Paisley, the post-office folks had forgotten him, and could not find a party to whom the letter should be delivered. It was sent to Edinburgh, and, after being tossed about from one office to another, was opened at London, and from thence re-directed to Paisley, with instructions that every effort should be made to discover the owner. The contents soon led to the discovery; and it now appears that the young man supposed to have been lost at sea was the one man saved.

A person at present in New Zealand, in the course of his peregrinations, heard that a white man was living far up the country. He determined to search him out. On arriving at the native village, the white man's hut was pointed out. He entered it, and found a comely-looking damsel—a New Zealandess—with two or three fine healthy whitey-brown children nestling about her. She was able to speak a little broken English; told the visitor the Christian name of her husband, and said she expected him home shortly, inviting the stranger to await his return. By-and-bye the husband arrives, tattooed and dressed as a New Zealander.

The two men, of course, were not likely to have recognised each other, even though they had been previously acquainted; but after comparing notes, it came out that they were both natives of Paisley, and had been at school together some twenty-five years ago.

The surprise and astonishment of the stranger may be well conceived. As for the host, he explained that he had been picked up from the wreck of his ship by a passing vessel, and after many curious escapes and adventures, found himself in the interior of New Zealand, far from any settlement. There he married a native of the country, a chief's daughter, by whom he has had a family, and with whom he has been living very happily. He feels quite comfortable in his adopted land; likes the mode of living extremely, and has no desire to return to Paisley. He cannot tell how long he has been in New Zealand, not having adopted Crusoe's expedient of notching the time.

After a long talk about Paisley and auld lang syne, the stranger bade him adieu, and on his return to the British settlement, wrote the letter above referred to.

FORGIVE AND FORGET.

BY CHARLES SWAIN.

FORGIVE and Forget! why the world would be lonely,
The garden a wilderness left to deform;
If the flowers but remember'd the chilling winds only,
And the fields gave no verdure for fear of the storm!
Oh, still in thy loveliness emblem the flower,
Give the fragrance of feeling to sweeten life's way;
And prolong not again the brief cloud of an hour,
With tears that but darken the rest of the day!

Forgive and Forget! there's no breast so unfeeling
But some gentle thoughts of affection there live;
And the best of us all require something concealing,
Some heart that with smiles can forget and forgive!
Then away with the cloud from those beautiful eyes,
That brow was no home for such frowns to have met:
Oh, how could our spirits e'er hope for the skies,
If Heaven refused to Forgive and Forget?

ALL THE GOLD IN THE WORLD.—Mr. Jacob has estimated the existing gold of the world, previously to 1844 (four-fifths of it existing in manufactured articles), at £350,000,000. Add our new acquisition of £255,000,000, and we have a present world-wealth of gold of £705,000,000. Taking the cube yard of gold at £2,000,000, which it is in round numbers, all the gold of the world, at this estimate, might, if melted into ingots, be contained in a cellar twenty-four feet square and sixteen feet high. All our boasted wealth already obtained from California and Australia would go into an iron safe nine feet square and nine feet high. So small is the cube of yellow metal that has set populations on the march, and roused the world to wonder!

EUROPEAN DRESS AND TURKISH WEARERS.—The change that has been introduced (into the Turkish costume) shows the wonderful power of the Sultan over the people; all has apparently been done by example, and by the influence of that universal power, fashion. The Turk, proud of his beard, comes up from the province a candidate for, or to receive the office of governor. The Sultan gives him an audience, passes his hand over his own short-trimmed beard: the candidate takes the hint, and appears the next day shorn of his honoured locks. The Sultan, who is always attired in a plain blue frock-coat, asks of the aspirant for office if he admires it: he of course praises the costume worn by his patron, whereupon the Sultan suggests that he would look well in it, also so in the red, unturbaned fez. The following day the officer again attends, to receive or lose his appointment, and, to promote the progress of his suit, throws off his costly and beautiful costume, and appears, like the Sultan, in the dull, unsightly frock. A regimental cloak may sometimes be seen covering a fat body inclosed in all the robes of the Turkish costume; the whole bundle, including the fur-lined gown, being strapped together round the waist. Some of the figures are literally as broad as long, and have a laughable effect on horseback. The saddles for the upper classes are now generally made of the European form; but the people, who cannot give up their accustomed love of finery for plain leather, have them mostly of purple or crimson velvet embroidered with silver or gold, the holsters ornamented with beautiful patterns. The horses are small, but very good and showy. Every gentleman in the street is on horseback, with one, two, three, or four servants, according to his rank, walking by his side, one carrying the pipe.—Sir C. Fellows's Asia Minor and Lycia.

[THE NEW WING OF BUCKINGHAM PALACE.]

BUCKINGHAM PALACE.

THIS town residence of royalty is comparatively a modern structure; for in "Walks through London," a work published about thirty years ago, we are informed, that "at the west end of St. James's Park, fronting the Mall, stands the Queen's palace, which, till 1762, when his present Majesty bought it, was called Buckingham House."

George IV. had this old house pulled down, and the greater portion of the present imposing edifice erected on its site. The cost was enormous, and afforded to the political agitators of the time of the regency, and the early portion of that monarch's reign, a fruitful topic for declamatory exertion. His taste was for the gorgeous and showy. He wished to rear a marble palace amid the smoke of the metropolis, and to hand his name down to posterity as George the Builder. Posterity has ignored his claim; and in connection with Buckingham Palace, only remembers him as George the Extravagant. Most of his plans have been set aside; for even in the reign of William IV., under the judicious suggestions of that amiable and accomplished lady, the late Queen Dowager, the work of more chaste adornment, as well as comfortable addition, under the guise of alteration and improvement, was commenced, and rapidly proceeded with.

When her present Majesty ascended the throne, it was found that the palace was extremely inconvenient; but when Queen Victoria became the mother of several children, the building, although to the eye so vast in appearance, was speedily discovered not to be large enough. There was positively not the slightest provision made for such contingencies as royal children.

Fortunately for the claims of royalty to be properly housed, the late Sir R. Peel was at the head of the government when the want of accommodation became too evident to be longer postponed; and accordingly we find that, in the spring of 1846, the right hon. baronet informed the Lords of the Treasury, that her Majesty had been for some time past subjected to great inconvenience "from the insufficient accommodation" afforded by the palace. A letter was consequently written to the Commissioners of Woods and Forests, who promptly replied to it by, in August, calling upon Mr. Blore, the architect, to "report on the nature and extent of the insufficiency of accommodation, together with such plans, elevations, and alterations as would best provide for its improvement and enlargement." Mr. Blore, in August, 1846, replied, that "he had long been aware of the extreme inconvenience to which her Majesty personally, the juvenile members of the royal family, and the whole of the royal establishment had been subjected, in consequence of the insufficiency of Buckingham palace in point of accommodation."

Among other inconveniences enumerated by Mr. Blore, it appears that the private apartments in the north wing "were not calculated originally for a married sovereign—the head of a family"—that the nursery department was confined "to a few rooms in the attics of the same wing," and that the basement story of the wing was used "by the Lord Chamberlain's department for stores and workshops"—that there was a constant noise, and continual smell of oil and glue; and, as if these were not enough, he adds—"the kitchen, again, is a nuisance to the palace."

In short, he might have said that, however well Buckingham Palace might have suited a childless monarch, like George IV., it by no means suited Queen Victoria, who—in addition to a taste unexcelled for purity—had a love of the comfortable and the domestic. As she must reside a portion of the year in London, she asked for a proper house to reside in, and the Commissioners of Woods and Forests promptly acknowledged that her complaint was just and reasonable.

Mr. Blore's estimate amounted to £150,000, and for this he was to make "a new east front to the palace—clear out and re-arrange rooms in the north wing—make alterations in the south wing—new kitchens and offices, with ball-room over—take down the marble arch—decorate, paint, and alter drains."

With these precise instructions, and ample funds to resort to, the architect vigorously proceeded with his task; and in the course of less than seven years it may be assumed that he has given quite a new appearance—indeed, a fresh and less questionable character—to Buckingham Palace—internally as well as externally. The gloomy and unsightly sunken square which formerly disfigured the east front, is now properly shut in as a carriage yard, and a superb façade is now presented to promenaders in the park.

The sculptures which adorn the centre and two wings of this façade are very beautiful. In the former is an arch, opening with a balcony supported by bold trusses, and surmounted by scroll-work, inclosing a shield, bearing "V. R., 1847," whilst on the lateral turrets are placed colossal figures of our old tutelar favourites, St. George and the Dragon, and Britannia with the British Lion. These figures are sculptured by Termouth.

Over the north wing is a group of the hours, upon a pedestal pierced with a circle intended for a wind-dial, flanked with recumbent figures.

Upon the corresponding, or southern wing, is a circle for the reception of a clock-dial, flanked by Morning and Night—the latter with bats' wings and her characteristic bird; the centre figure of Apollo being an impersonation of Noon. These two groups (upon the wings) formed part of the original sculptural decoration of the Palace.

Military trophies and festoons of flowers are distributed over various parts of the building where ornament has been required to give effect to the design.

All the other portions of these attractive architectural additions, are in complete harmony with this really beautiful façade. The section just completed, is that of the new ball and concert-room, in the south wing. The refined taste of Prince Albert is here very manifest. Every feature of the exterior, as will be seen by our pictorial embellishment, is plain, simple, but massive and beautiful. There is no affectation of the unadorned Doric, or an effort at a more pretentious composite style. Her Majesty and the Prince Consort wished to have a handsome ball and concert-room, and the architect has literally and successfully carried out his instructions. When the embellishments shall have been completed, the effect of the chaste ensemble will be more visible. At present, a noble frontage is presented to the eye—neither too heavy nor too light—but just showing a frontage sufficiently adorned to take it out of the category of rude simplicity.

LINKS IN THE CHAIN.

A TALE OF MOSCOW.

ON the 19th of August, 1812, the ancient capital of Russia was in a state of intense commotion. A French army, under the command of, to the Russians, the Tamerlane of modern times, was already in the heart of the empire, and its march on Moscow was anticipated with rage and trembling. Rumours of a great battle, in which the Russians had been unsuccessful, were flying through the city, and the continual arrival of messengers, bearing despatches through the gate of Smolensko, only seemed to add to the general apprehension.

The morning broke finely—and all classes remembered that it was one of the high festivals of the church. Devotion and habit proved too powerful for fear: accordingly, from the earliest dawn the preparations for celebrating the day set apart for the Donskaya—Holy Mother—were vigorously proceeded with. As soon as the sun had peered above the horizon, the bells of the six cathedrals, twenty-one monasteries, and three hundred churches, which were then in Moscow, began tolling; and high above them all, sounded like rolling thunder, the bells in the tower of Ivan Veliki.

The population of the city at the same time began pouring into the streets and squares, and at all the gates streams of people from the neighbouring villages came in almost unbroken lines. In the squares the military and the militia were assembled, in heavy marching order, while mounted police and gendarmes hovered on the edges of the crowds, or were grouped in the vicinity of the fire-engines—which in the Russian cities are always kept ready for instant service, either for extinguishing a fire or dispersing a disorderly assemblage.

After the holy procession from the Cathedral of the Assumption, consisting of the bishops and clergy, all bare-headed and on foot, accompanied by the holy banners, crosses, books, and relics, had arrived at the Donskoi Monastery, Divine service commenced, and the immense multitude gathered together in Moscow bowed their heads in prayer to the Donskaya. Not a head was covered, not a sound was heard, but the incessant tolling of the bells, and the occasional clatter of a horse's feet on the pavement, as a messenger dashed onwards, at full speed, to the mansion of Rostopchin, the governor of the city.

In about two hours the tolling began gradually to cease, until at last the vibrations of the great bell of the cathedral only were heard; and as they became less frequent and finally died away, a hoarse murmur, just like that of the sea beating against a rocky shore, rose upon the air, and was succeeded by a roar of tremendous volume. Moscow had ceased to pray. The signal for general mirth had been given, and with the enemy almost at their gates, the people, as if animated by one impulse, committed themselves to the excitement of a saturnalia, which may be better imagined than described. All the characteristics of an English fair of the olden time—such as dancing, drinking, fighting, with the super-addition of an amazing amount of genuflections before images of the Donskaya, were developed. Those who rushed from the churches, joined the mêlée; the soldiers and militia, after stacking their arms, were allowed the same privilege; and scarcely a human being in Moscow wore a grave face, save the guards and sentinels at the various public buildings, and the artillerymen, who, with lighted matches in their hands, stood grimly by loaded guns on the walls of the Kremlin, and all the various city gates.

The nobility mingled freely with the populace, and there seemed on this special occasion to be quite a genial, although on one side deferential intercourse established between the masters and their serfs. One group, wherever the party composing it wandered, attracted considerable attention. It comprised the Count Orloff, one of the richest nobles in the empire, his daughter Catherine, a tall, fair, intellectual-looking girl, Ivan Rostopchin, the son of the military governor of Moscow, upon whose arm she lightly touched, the governor himself, a stern, hard-featured man, and Alexis Pheodorovitch, a relative of the count, a young man of distinguished appearance. He was tall, dignified, almost majestic in his look. He was dark-complexioned, with curling dark hair, thick, jet-black moustaches, and large, piercing dark eyes. His costume was rich—and, being in imitation of that of a Cossack chief, well became his remarkably fine figure. He wore a tall black helmet, terminated by a crimson sack, with its plume-laced festoon and white cockade. His dress and arms were altogether those of a Cossack, with one exception—he carried by his side the long, heavy sabre first introduced by Frederick the Great, and afterwards adopted by the French cuirassiers.

As this party wandered down the alleys of grocers' stalls, cooks' shops, taverns, and tea-tents, erected before the monastery, they were saluted with the most profound respect; and when they mingled among the crowds of peasantry squatted in the adjoining fields, eating and drinking, every one rose and made as reverent an inclination as that which he or she a few hours previously had bestowed upon the image of Donskaya.

"What thoughtfulness!" remarked the governor's son, as he glanced at the groups of merry-makers. "The French may be here to-morrow, and yet to-day the people are dancing!"

"They will fight none the worse to-morrow for being glad to-day!" said Catherine, quickly.

"Umph!" growled Ivan, who was rather good-looking in face and figure, but his manner was repelling. "In such a crisis, the worship of to-day ought to yield to anxiety for the morrow!"

Catherine smiled, as she replied:

"My cousin Alexis has seen a good deal of service, and I have heard him say that the men under him never behaved better than when they went into battle with light hearts and merry faces."

"Oh, he is a paragon!" sneered Ivan; "Monsieur Perfection—what he says must be right!"

"He is my cousin," answered Catherine, proudly, "and has served the emperor with his sword—not his pen!"

Ivan had touched a wrong chord; and, although inwardly chafing with envy and mortification, began to praise the noble-looking soldier a few paces in their rear; then renewed the suit for her hand, which for months he had been pressing with vehemence. But Catherine interrupted his passionate exhortation by stepping towards some pretty peasant girls—her father's property—and chatting with them so affably, that the poor girls fluttered like newly-imprisoned birds. While this little bit of bye-play was going on, the Count Orloff and his companions were engaged in a very grave discussion.

"What induces you to imagine that this mad French Emperor will endeavour to push on towards Moscow instead of St. Petersburg?" inquired Count Orloff from the governor Rostopchin, the destined destroyer of Napoleon—for he it was who conceived and carried out the project of burning Moscow: through which act the French army, by being deprived of winter quarters, was overwhelmed in irretrievable ruin.

"Moscow is nearer to Constantinople than St. Petersburg!" replied the governor, gloomily. "Napoleon aims at re-establishing the Roman Empire."

"Besides," remarked Alexis, "by pushing on to our ancient capital, he aims at securing comfortable winter quarters, so as to prepare himself for vigorous operations in the spring."

"He should be driven back!" exclaimed the count—who was one of those who, not comprehending, detested the tactics of the Russian generals, in studiously avoiding a pitched battle.

"He will advance victoriously to the walls—yea, enter our beloved city!" said Rostopchin, his face darkening terribly; "but it will only be to the grave of his hopes! I already see the winding-sheet of his magnificent army!"

"But if he winters here," said the young soldier, impatiently, "in the spring he will be reinforced, and perhaps be able to dictate terms at St. Petersburg!"

"Young man," replied the governor, in his sepulchral manner, "neither the Emperor Napoleon, nor his army, will winter in Moscow! I shall prevent that—let his majesty's generals fight or run, just as they please!"

At this moment a mounted messenger spurred up, and delivered a package to the governor. He opened it—and as he read the contents of the despatch inclosed, his usually dark eyes sparkled strangely, and something like a spasm of exultation played round his large mouth.

"Bad news!" said he, as he folded up the paper. "Smolensk, after being abandoned, has been set on fire, and burnt to the ground. Our army is in full retreat—the French are advancing. So, count, as this will be our last day of illness, and we have seen enough of the merry-making, let us adjourn to your house, and at your hospitable board for a few hours forget the miseries that have been undeservedly heaped on our unhappy country!"

The count gladly assented; and the party, entering their carriages, were driven off amid the enthusiastic cheers of the multitude.

The mansion of the Count Orloff stood about ten versts from Moscow. It was a plain building, two storeys high, partly of wood, and partly of bricks. Its size was amazing, having a frontage of a thousand feet, and the land attached to it extended over at least a thousand acres.

The feast was truly baronial; for though the Russians had adopted the French style of cookery, they still retained their native dishes, with the addition of the solid joints which characterise the English repasts. The guests comprised the élite of old Russian nobility; but the chief one of the evening was Rostopchin, although only a patrician of the second class, owing to his being unable to trace his family back more than a century. His son, during the entertainment, had an opportunity of approaching very close to the count; and, having drunk freely, did not hesitate to declare his passion for the beautiful Catherine.

The father listened complacently—for a matrimonial connection with the only son of a man high in the favour of the emperor offered many inducements, even to a nobleman of his rank and wealth.

"I admire your father," was his cautious reply; "and do not doubt he will rise to the highest eminence in the state; but Catherine has to be consulted. She is my only remaining unmarried child, and I would not thrust upon her a husband she might not like. Go to her—you know the way—and if you can win her consent—why—why I'll consult with Rostopchin."

Elated with this concession, and not doubting but that he should ultimately succeed—for in Russia a parent generally disposes of his children in marriage without even consulting their inclinations—Ivan stole from the banquet room, inspired with hope, and, it must be confessed, no inconsiderable quantity of wine.

At the rear of the house, some paths, whose intricacies he well knew, conducted him to a flower-garden, arranged after the English fashion. At one end of this garden some steps led to a gallery which ran along that part of the house from which doors opened and conducted the privileged visitor to the drawing-rooms of the lady Catherine. Ivan ascended to this gallery full of confidence; but as he passed along, he happened to glance in at an open window, and as he did so, beheld a sight which drove every particle of colour from his face, and almost made him stagger. The sun had not quite gone down, but the room was brilliantly lighted up; and from where he stood, thanks to a bushy Portuguese laurel in a gigantic vase beside the open window, he could see and hear all that passed within, without being himself observed.

The apartment was richly furnished—but to Ivan's eye, angry as it was, the most exquisite piece of furniture in it was the figure of Catherine. She was attired in the evening dress then, and for many years afterwards, popular all over the continent, and in England. The corsage was low, revealing the upper portion of a bust, fair, but glowing with the soft tint of youth and health. The waist was contracted, and below it the dress fell in thick folds until it swept the carpet, and concealed feet, than which the whole Court of St. Petersburg—that is, the masculine portion—had declared none smaller or more symmetrical had ever been revealed in the giddy whirl of the intoxicating waltz. Her face, fair, classical in outline, and lit up by a pair of light-grey eyes, was shaded by her dark auburn hair, parted in the centre, and looped up in the German style. Her appearance altogether was luxuriant and fascinating; and as she was seated on a couch, with her plump white arms glistening like marble peering through subdued tints of purple, and her cousin Alexis, seated on a chair close to the scroll end of the couch, was turned towards her, with his handsome face radiant with very lover-like enthusiasm, it is not surprising that the suitor outside should have experienced the pangs of the most acute jealousy. But hark! she speaks!

"When did you begin to love me, cousin Alexis, as cousins are not wont to love?" she asked, with a slightly coquettish air.

The hand of Alexis stole to the long, slender one of the maiden, as he tremblingly replied:

"I cannot tell the exact time, for I always loved you dearly. But I remember, when I joined the army, parting from you was the saddest sorrow I ever felt. I was bewildered—overwhelmed by a sensation that chilled me to my very heart. Then I dreamed of you at night—saw your sweet face in the smoke of battle—at the festive board—in church—in the chace—everywhere. Then I came home again and found you a woman; and oh, how beautiful! Then I heard people talk about love, and wonder who would be your husband; and as I gazed at you, the voiceless whisper of my heart crept up to my brain, and made me wish to have you for a wife, even if only for the blissful instant when I might, in the Holy presence, seal my love on your lips, and feel their velvet touch thrill me, as celestial fire thrills mortal man. After that, my poverty smote me, and I went to the wars again, loving you hopelessly, but more and more. The credit I gained at Friedland, brought me under the notice of the emperor, and I was promoted rapidly. The Turkish war commenced, and I got the rank of colonel. But honour and a sword are poor things to offer a father in exchange for his darling daughter; and when I thought of that, I knew I loved you. The heavy load on my heart disappeared, and a warm, thrilling, ecstatic feeling came into its place. I knew you, surrounded as you were by noble and wealthy suitors, might never be mine; but I loved you not the less for that irresistible conviction."

Catherine's voice slightly quivered, as she replied:

"Position and wealth do not always influence a maiden in her choice. There is honour—the unspotted honour of a gallant soldier—courage, and that largeness of heart, which in man is so noble, so god-like. These I have found in you, Alexis, and, with my father's permission, I would not hesitate to commit my destiny to your keeping."

"Dear Catherine!" was all the soldier could utter, as he leaned forward, and, drawing her beautiful form towards him, clasped it to his bosom passionately.

The agony of the Evil One, in the garden of Eden, when he witnessed the conjugal tenderness of our first parents for each other, was almost excelled by that of Ivan, as he heard this mutual confession, and gazed with glaring eyes on that protracted embrace. Half drawing his sword, he was about to rush into the apartment, but the sound of voices summoning him and Alexis again to the banquet, arrested his murderous intention, and he hastened away, chafing like a baffled fiend.

In the morning, Moscow had resumed its usual appearance: the inhabitants, being kept in total ignorance of everything that related to the political condition of the country, went about their business as usual; but, among the highest officials the greatest agitation prevailed. They knew well that the French army was rapidly advancing. Rostopchin alone was aware of the imperial intention not to hazard a battle on a large scale, until the enemy had been lured into the heart of the empire, far away from his supplies. He alone knew that Moscow was not to be defended.

"Go," said he, to the chief of the police; "go, and find me the most pious men in the city. I want five hundred men who, at the bidding of the church, would march to the gates of Islam!"

As soon as the officer had departed, the governor muttered:

"When a desperate deed is to be done, fanatics in religion are the men to do it!"

"When do you think the French will be in Moscow?" inquired his son.

"They may be here to-morrow!" was the answer—for the governor would confide his great purpose to no one—his only confidant was the emperor—"or the next day—or the next! Do you go to Ivan's Tower, and bring Michael to me!"

This celebrated belfry stands at nearly an equal distance from the cathedrals of the Assumption and St. Michael. It is the most conspicuous object in Moscow, being visible from almost every part of the city, and to a great distance on all the approaches to it from the east, south, and west. From the bottom to the top of the cross it is 269½ feet high. The number of bells in it is thirty-three, all of them of immense size—the smallest said to weigh 7000 lbs. English, and the largest 124,289 lbs. On festivals they are tolled without intermission, and with but few variations, from an early hour till the evening, the peasantry, and the Russians generally, being extremely fond of Ivan Veliki's, or Great John's, music. The great bell of Moscow, one of the wonders of the world, stands in an immense cavity on the east side of this belfry. In 1812, the ruins of the tower fell into the cavity, and covered the bell. When the court arrived at Moscow, in 1817, it was uncovered, and again surrounded with a rail. According to Dr. Lyall, it originally contained 8000 poods' weight, and was cast in 1654. Being destroyed by fire, it was re-cast, and 2000 additional poods of metal added to it in 1734. In 1737, the wooden edifice erected over it took fire, and the bell becoming hot, was most probably cracked, in consequence of cold water being thrown upon it. An inscription on it recording its second casting, expressly states its weight at 10,000 poods—equal to 360,000 lbs. English. According to the measurement of English engineers, the height, if it had been full cast, would have been twenty-one feet—it is actually only twenty feet seven inches. The greatest diameter, at the mouth of the bell, is twenty-two feet eight inches. The top of the bell, a double ring, measures three feet one inch. The top of the crack is five feet seven inches from the ground. The clapper, which lies at the foot of Ivan Veliki, is fourteen feet long.

Dr. Clarke, the celebrated traveller, positively asserts that this Czar Kolokol, or the Emperor of Bells, was never suspended, and that the Russians might as well attempt to suspend a first-rate line-of-battle ship with all her guns and stores. But this objection falls to the ground, when it has been ascertained that the bell was never removed from the mould, but proper supports, and beams, and cross-beams having been erected, the soil in the vicinity and underneath was carefully removed, and then it hung securely enough in a chamber prepared for it expressly. Travellers who visited Moscow in 1698, expressly state that it was suspended by a great number of beams and cross-beams, and was rung by forty or fifty men, one half on each side, who, by means of ropes, pulled the clapper. An inscription on the bell itself states that it began to announce Divine service A.D. 1668, and continued to be used till 1701, when—in consequence of a great fire in the Kremlin—it was damaged. Whether it was ever suspended after its second casting is doubtful; but the Russians believe it was, and on great festivals—such as that of the Donskaya—the peasants resort to it as a kind of sanctuary, regarding it as an act of devotion, crossing themselves all the way as they descend and ascend the steps.

When Ivan arrived at the tower, he found the object of his message superintending the men who were employed in removing the vestiges of yesterday's pilgrimage. He was a man past the middle age of life—uncouth in appearance, and occupied the post of keeper of the bells, whose music seemed to have deadened him to every other feeling save that of fidelity.

"The Czar Kolokol has sounded twice this morning!" said he, in answer to Ivan's salutation.

"Indeed!" replied the latter—who, although better educated, had a superstitious veneration for the great bell—"and what may that bode?"

"Evil!" said Michael, solemnly. "Moscow's pride never speaks but to warn. The last time it spoke was when our last beloved emperor was —"

Murdered he would have said, but as such a phrase

It had been his own doom, he added—"taken into the bosom of blessed martyrs and holy saints."

"And the time before?" asked Ivan.

"When your father's father was betrayed by a traitor, and imprisoned in the chamber of 'the Links in the Chain,' at the top of Ivan Veliki."

Ivan gave a sudden start; a light like a dull phosphoric flash broke in upon his mind, and, taking Michael aside, he held with him a long conference. When it was concluded, he said:

"It shall be done." The will of the governor's son is law with Michael. But suppose the links run out, what then?"

"Leave him to solitude, silence, and death!" was the savage reply; "but long ere that I will take measures for his relief. Once my aims accomplished, I care not what becomes of him. He has crossed my dearest purpose, and must take the consequences of his audacious presumption!"

"No, no!" he muttered, after he had parted from the willing instrument he had found to carry out his diabolical design; "he must not go to the army again with that charmed, handsome person of his, to win glory, as he calls it, and, what is better, promotion, and lands, and a title! Why the count would jump at such a son-in-law then!"

September had arrived, and the news from the army every day became more distressing. After one or two sanguinary engagements, which the Russian generals only risked to appease the clamours of the soldiery and populace, the army fell back on Moscow. On Sunday, the 13th of September, 1812, it fell back on Moscow, in full retreat. Dread, confusion, and despair seized the inhabitants: they issued in crowds through the Gate of Kalomna, flying in all directions across the country. Secret agents, skillfully dispersed throughout the city, had stimulated the natural fears of the people at the near approach of a hostile army into a perfect frenzy; and the whole city, in the course of a few hours, actually took wing and fled, driving their cattle before them, but leaving their homes and other property to the mercy of the invaders.

During this horrible bustle, Alexis—who had been appointed to the command of the guard that was to escort the waggons containing the plate, jewels, and money from the Kremlin—disappeared. He was last seen in the neighbourhood of Ivan's Tower, and it being supposed—as he was aide-de-camp to Marshal Kutusof, the Commander-in-Chief—that he had been dispatched on some other duty, no search was made for him, and in a few hours his regiment marched away without him.

The truth was that Alexis, like thousands of other high-spirited young men in the Russian army, was indignant at what he deemed the pusillanimous conduct of the generals in retreating before the French; and to cool his rage at being appointed to the command of some baggage waggons, had retired to the deserted open space in front of the Great Tower. He felt sure that Catherine would be his bride, if he could only distinguish himself; and now, when he thought the opportunity had arrived for some hard fighting, the army was in full retreat, and the old capital was to be abandoned!

While occupied by the gloomy thoughts these reflections aroused, Michael, the keeper of the tower, approached, evidently in great perturbation:

"Oh! general—general!" he cried, "the enemy—the enemy! Holy Mother protect us!"

"Where?—where?" exclaimed Alexis.

"I can discern them quite clearly from the upper chamber of Ivan Veliki," said the keeper, evidently in great agony; "come and see!"

Alexis, without a moment's hesitation, sprang after the man, and ascended the spiral staircase that wound round the interior of the tower, until he came to a ladder. This was placed under a trap-door of just sufficient width to admit the body of a man. As the keeper had wriggled himself through, the soldier followed his example; but no sooner had he got through the aperture, than he found himself violently seized and thrown down by some six or seven men, and, after a desperate struggle, was thrust into an upper chamber, where for hours he lay stunned, and bleeding profusely.

When Alexis recovered from the swoon into which he had fallen, he found himself in a circular room, lighted by narrow apertures in the walls. The only furniture it contained was a rude couch, covered with straw; at the head of which, on a piece of granite, stood a loaf and a pitcher of water. On raising himself, which he did with difficulty, he heard the clank of chains; and when he required an upright position, found that his wrists and ankles were encircled by iron rings to which chains were attached, that extended to a solid ring behind him, from which another chain ran to some fastening inserted in the wall. Horrified at this discovery, he started forward, but could not advance beyond the middle of the room. He then examined the fastening in the wall, and found that it was a ring that slid along an iron rod, buried in the masonry so that he could make half the circuit of the room without ever going beyond the centre.

When he had somewhat recovered from the stupor into which a full conception of his dreadful position had thrown him, he sat down on the edges of the couch, and tried to think, but in vain. He could not recall any offence—even the lightest word he had uttered—that could bring down upon him the suspicion and vengeance of the government. Then he thought of his duty, and the suggestion that would get abroad that he had deserted. His strong frame shook at this surmise. He grasped the edge of the wooden couch, until the blood oozed from his finger-nails. Then he thought of Catherine, and what she would think when the tidings of his absence from his post reached her. A deserter! and she to deem him so! He fairly groaned at this, and the hot tears started to his eyes. Presently he heard a noise like the prolonged roll of muffled drums; and, jumping on to the couch, he looked through the aperture before him. The scene that met his gaze was sufficient to make the stoutest heart quail. At the Kalomna, or eastern gate, he saw the rear guard of the Russian army disappear, followed by every species of vehicle loaded with furniture, and accompanied by confused masses of men, women, and children, on foot. All of them, even the children, carried something; and as night approached, and the stream of fugitives dwindled away to a few stragglers—and at last, when it seemed to have been exhausted, to a few wretches who had evidently crawled out of the public hospitals, and a tremendous silence reigned over the whole city, he cried out, in the bitterness of his despair:

"Moscow is deserted! and I am left alone to die!"

There was something so excruciatingly cruel in such a fate, that it is not to be wondered that, although when at liberty he would cheerfully have charged the enemy to the mouths of their grape-dispensing cannon, in his present condition he should have trembled, and experienced that nameless dread of death which, on the young heart, falls like sharp hail on the tender flowers. Sleep did not visit his eyes during the night; and as the morning sun poured its beams through the prison apertures, and disclosed to him his beloved city spread before him like a map, but silent as the grave, the sense of desolation in him was deepened in intensity. Moscow was indeed deserted, and the enemy might take it without a blow. A slight rattle of his chains drew his attention to the wall; and upon looking round him, he perceived, in a recess near the door, a substantial-looking pie, flanked by a bottle and a glass.

"If I promised to be your gaoler," said a voice behind those articles, "I did not engage to starve you."

Alexis in an instant recognised the voice as that of Michael's, whom he well knew; and he rushed to the opening—a feat his chain allowed him to do, for it slid close up to the spot.

"Why am I here? Who has dared to lay hands on the emperor's soldier?" he eagerly demanded.

"Faith, those that have dared, dare do anything!" chuckled the man. "But as to the 'why,' you are as wise as myself."

"This is not a prison!" exclaimed Alexis, indignantly. "It ought not to be!" said the man, with something like a sigh.

"Its sanctity is profaned—violated!" continued Alexis; "and I wonder the great bell does not rise from its bed, and with its thunder bring it tumbling to the ground!"

"So do I," answered the man. "But the will of the governor is law in Moscow."

"The governor!" shouted Alexis.

The man growled out something; but to all the prisoner's entreaties he returned an obdurate refusal.

"How long am I to remain here?" at length he asked, in despair.

"Count the links in your chain—those from the ring to the wall," was the answer.

Alexis did, and found they were twenty-one.

"Well, that is the number of days I promised to wait upon you. If you are not delivered by the time they are done, I would recommend you to turn your face to the rising sun, and depart as quietly as possible."

With this equivocal assurance the man disappeared, and Alexis was left once more to his own sad thoughts. However, his soldier-like habits came to his aid, and after making a hearty meal of the pie, and disposing of the bottle of wine, he laid himself down, and slept long and soundly. When he awoke, the sounds of music fell on his ear, and on peeping through an aperture that commanded a western view, he saw a division of the French army in deep and serried column, marching into the Kremlin. In fact, it was the advanced guard of the French, under Murat. Later in the day, and at other points, dense masses of infantry, cavalry, and artillery poured into the city, and from the numerous camp-fires blazing in the streets and outside the walls, he was assured that the enemy were in complete possession of the ancient capital of the czars.

In the morning he amused himself with watching the evolutions of the French soldiers; but as such a spectacle soon tired his practised eye, he sat himself down on his couch in absolute weariness of spirit, to think. To think! What is thought in the solitude of a cell? The prisoner's only refuge, his only link with the world without, and at last his madness. As he turned over and over in his mind every suggestion that presented itself to him to account for his imprisonment, his glance fell on the chain, and, for sheer occupation, he counted the links in it. There were only twenty. Yesterday, he was sure, he counted twenty-one. He counted again, but there were only twenty. Thinking he must have been mistaken, he glanced at the recess, and there, as on the previous day, saw a repast and a bottle of wine; but although he called and shouted repeatedly, no voice, as before, responded to his own. He never heard the old man again during his imprisonment.

On that night, he observed an unusual glare in the city. Look whichever way he did, he saw flames, and could plainly perceive them devouring whole streets, and licking their way like tongues round churches and palaces. The roar of artillery and the quick rattle of musketry next caught his attention; and every now and then a blazing house shot up into the sky, and when it fell, there was darkness on the spot for an instant; but the flames as if aggravated by the attempt to extinguish them, shot up again with redoubled fierceness, and plunged into quarters which had before been untouched.

"Moscow is on fire," said he to himself, "and in a few hours will be no more! This accounts for Rostopchin's gloom and reserve during the last few weeks. By St. Andrew! but it is a noble revenge! The French cannot winter in Moscow! As the governor predicted, their winding-sheet of snow is already prepared!"

His nationality overpowered every other sensation, and as he stood watching the progress of the roaring and hissing flames, he exulted in the reflection, that in the fires of Moscow the glory of France would be consumed, and the independence of his country guaranteed.

On the fourth day the wind fell and the flames abated, but the work of destruction had been completed. Moscow, without the Kremlin, was no more. The only building in the Kremlin—thanks to the exertions of the French soldiery—that was destroyed, was the imperial palace.

The heat was now so oppressive, that the atmosphere of his dungeon more resembled that of an oven than anything else; and, as the excitement consequent on the conflagration had subsided, despair—hopeless, gnawing despair—again resumed the mastery over him. He glanced at the chain, and counted the links. There were only sixteen. This time he could not be mistaken. He counted them, one by one, several times over, but could not number more than sixteen. He glanced at the recess—there were food and drink as usual; but this visible shortening of the chain, what could it mean? Was it real? He shivered with that instinctive dread which maddens horses, and paralyses the fiercest beast of prey. He determined not to sleep that night, but to keep watch, with the chain firmly grasped in his hand.

When daylight dawned, he again counted the links—there were only fifteen. Was he dreaming, or mad—or were there in existence minds that could coin such exquisite torture as that of drawing a man—incarcerated from all fellowship—with his fellow men—link by link, to the cold wall of stone that was to be his future coffin? All that day he remained like one in a state of torpor. He could scarcely feel, much less think.

The next morning, at dawn, his eyes stole mechanically to the links. He ran his fingers over them—there were only fourteen. He stepped to the recess—he could just reach it with extended hand. On the following day it would be beyond his reach—and the next—and the next. Oh! horror! horror! he saw himself day by day drawn closer to the wall, until he almost fancied he witnessed his death agonies, and that in after years a group of the curious were gazing on his grisly, but still manacled skeleton.

This idea tortured him so keenly that he uttered one loud, prolonged yell, of such volume, that it penetrated even the thick stone walls that encompassed him, and led to his rescue.

The French had taken possession of the tower, and used it as an observatory and signal post; but as the officers on duty never dreamed that it contained any secret chambers, they were, on the Saturday morning of their occupation of what to them proved the infernal city of Moscow, rather surprised—we cannot exactly say alarmed—to hear under their very feet a cry which sounded very like the death agony of a wounded horse on the field of battle. Not being superstitious, or having much reverence for the sacred tower of Ivan Veliki, they commenced a more careful exploration, which resulted in the discovery of a door, so successfully painted to resemble the surrounding stone-work, as to deceive every eye but that of an old officer of engineers, who once had the privilege of studying such court ingenuities within the precincts of the Bastille. To batter it down was the work of a few minutes, and Alexis was discovered senseless on the floor. To relieve him of his chains was equally expeditiously done, and to remove him tenderly to more agreeable quarters was also a prompt operation. The French are generous adversaries—and that all their opponents have frankly admitted.

Stimulants were administered to Alexis, and in the course of a few hours he recovered sufficiently to be able to tell the story of his wrongs. The novelty of the torture, and the diabolical refinement in cruelty evinced by it, created quite a sensation. The particulars speedily reached the ears of the emperor, who had Alexis before him. The Russian spoke French fluently, but he could scarcely—unnerved as he had been by his recent imprisonment—command himself to be sufficiently composed in that marble presence.

"You have been wronged," said the emperor, quickly; "and would seek reparation?"

"I would—at the throne of my emperor," replied Alexis.

"Ha! you say well!" said Napoleon; "Alexander is magnanimous!"

There was a pause, which the emperor interrupted by hurriedly saying:

"Moscow is destroyed!"

"It is, your majesty!" answered Alexis, venturing to look upwards.

"Do you suspect me of such a wanton act?" demanded the emperor.

"I do not—I would not! Although an enemy, I do not believe you war upon cities."

"You say truly. What do you think—what do you suspect?"

Alexis was silent.

"Ah!" said the emperor, "you Russians are a singular race! Impossible—impenetrable! Your destiny will be great!"

With this characteristic declaration the interview terminated; and on the following morning, Alexis undertook to guide General Lauriston to St. Petersburg, whither Napoleon had sent him to negotiate. The journey was performed in five days; but all that the general could obtain was an armistice. Alexander wanted time. Winter had not set in.

The character of this prince has been made the subject of much contradiction. But he was himself a contradiction, and somewhat of a fanatic. At one time he was the friend and ally of Napoleon, and the sharer with him in the spoils of his unprincipled wars; at another, his decided opponent, censuring, in the most open manner, his plans of aggrandisement. While he was protecting and encouraging Bible Societies, and the education of the people in his own empire, he was interfering with the spread of political knowledge, and also of liberty, in states far from his own, and with which he possessed not the slightest right to interfere. Sometimes he was wise and liberal—sometimes the reverse, in his commercial policy; sometimes exhibiting great and undoubted decision and firmness of character—at other times vacillating, undetermined, and easily guided. His character baffled all who endeavoured to describe him as he actually was. He was an enigma. But, amid all his inconsistency, he was guided by the hereditary principle of the Russian monarchs—the extension of the empire towards the south and south-east.

At the private interview which he granted Alexis, he treated him with extreme kindness—almost with parental affection; but he enjoined upon him the strictest secrecy.

"The scandal of this outrage," said he, "must not get abroad—the time demands the utmost circumspection. Have you any idea to whom you are indebted for your right?"

Alexis replied in the negative. He really had not; and Iren Rostopchin, with whom he had always been on terms of apparent friendship, was the last person he would have suspected.

"Are you affianced to any lady?" demanded the emperor.

Alexis blushing told the story of his love for the fair and lovely Catherine. The emperor smiled, but, again enjoining caution, dismissed him to the army, with the rank of general of brigade. The same evening the emperor saw Count Orloff and his daughter, and from the latter obtained all the particulars relative to the suit of the governor's son. The emperor assured her of the safety of Alexis, and also gratified her ear with the news of his promotion. The agitated girl stammered forth her gratitude—for Alexis was her cousin; but the emperor, tapping her cheek, bade her prepare her bridal dress—for when the war was over, he would himself honour with his presence the bridal of one of his bravest soldiers and most beautiful of daughters.

"Safe, and a brigadier!" exclaimed the old count, when he heard the news. "I am glad of it. The lad has mettle in him!"

"Alexis at large, and promoted!" exclaimed Ivan, as he stalked through the streets of St. Petersburg, afraid to meet the man he had so much injured.

While thus occupied, a police officer tapped him on the shoulder, and, with a very significant, gesture told him the emperor had summoned him to court.

To hear was to obey, and in a few minutes he stood in the presence of Alexander, who in his anger was as terrible as he was generous in his cooler moments. Denial and hesitation were useless, so Ivan, making a virtue of necessity, confessed everything. That same night, after an interview the emperor had with the governor, Ivan was appointed to a command on the frontier of Siberia, and started willingly—for he knew that Alexis would certainly call him out when he learned who had caused his imprisonment.

In the course of five weeks winter set in, and Napoleon commenced his retreat, leaving strict orders to blow up every remaining portion of the Kremlin. These were only partially obeyed. Ivan's Tower had a narrow escape: instead of being blown into the air, it was rent from top to bottom, and, for a few seconds, reeled like a drunkard, but it did not fall, and was afterwards completely repaired.

The retreat was a march to the grave. By the 13th of December, the whole of Napoleon's once magnificent army had melted away; five hundred thousand men lay in their shrouds of snow. It was the most terrible catastrophe in the annals of warfare, and sealed the ruin of the extraordinary man who for twelve years had Europe at his feet.

As there was not much fighting during this horrible retreat, except at the passage of the Beresina, where Alexis had an opportunity of hearing the whistle of balls and of greatly distinguishing himself, he was enabled in the spring to return to the capital. As the emperor had promised—having graciously interposed and won the cordial consent of the count to the match—he graced the nuptials of the fair Catherine with his august presence, and gave the husband a grant of a large tract of land, which in after years, under the management of a Scotch agriculturist, became one of the finest estates in Russia. But in the three eventful years that followed, Alexis accompanied the army in its arduous campaigns; and after the second occupation of Paris, returned to Russia with the rank of full general, and the reputation of being one of the most brave and accomplished officers in the Russian service. The links in the chain had lengthened into a brilliant position, blessed with a beautiful wife, and sustained by a handsome fortune.

SCIENCE.

NEW INVENTIONS, &c.

THE most intense cold ever known in the neighbourhood of London was on December 25th, 1796, when the thermometer indicated two degrees below zero. In Iceland, and some other northern countries, the thermometer frequently falls to zero, which is 32 degrees below the freezing point. At Hudson's Bay it has been known to sink even 50 degrees lower. Such has been the expansion of water in freezing, that rocks and trees have often been split during intense frosts.

GROWTH OF FISH.—Few fresh-water fish grow so rapidly as the pike and carp; yet the former, during its first years, seldom attains a foot in length, while carp takes six years to put three pounds of flesh upon its bones.

GAS.—A new mode of heating the Music Hall at Worcester is described by the local Herald. The heating apparatus consists of three brick cylinders placed in the basement under the hall, containing an arrangement of gas-tubing, perforated so as to afford hundreds of jets of flame. From these cylinders only pure warm air is said to be given off—the residuum of combustion—viz., carbonic acid and aqueous vapour, being taken away in a separate tube, without, however, any waste of heat; that tube being inclosed in the one containing the purified warm air, to which its heat is imparted. The pure-air tube is conducted beneath the floor, which it traverses in the centre, having seven openings of perforated zinc, fitted with slides to admit or exclude the hot air. "The apparatus," adds the Herald, "consumes only 520 cubic feet per hour, and an hour's supply of hot air is sufficient for an evening's concert, while it also insures complete safety." Mr. Richards, of the local gas-works, arranged the apparatus.

SHIP-BUILDING ON THE CLYDE.—There are at present 100 vessels in course of construction on the Clyde, and of these only six are timber-built, all the rest being built of iron. It is also notable that these iron vessels consist both of steam and sailing vessels, though the former class preponderates. The aggregate tonnage of the ships now in course of construction on the Clyde amounts to upwards of 60,000 tons. The engines of the steam part of this great fleet have an aggregate of more than 14,000 horse power. The probable value of the whole, though the estimate is necessarily inexact, cannot be much short of £2,000,000 sterling! Yet, in a few months, this enormous amount of shipping will be off the stocks, and its place supplied by a new production, equally valuable. The number of workmen employed in building the vessels and making the machinery is about 15,000. The number of hands employed in raising the raw materials from the basin of the Clyde, within a circuit of twenty or thirty miles, for these and similar great works, is still more immense. Another most gratifying feature of the ship-building trade of the Clyde is, that the employers in nearly all the establishments were working men themselves within the last thirty years. Most of them had attained the period of middle life before they turned their attention to iron boat-building at all. The men are not only the architects of their own fortunes, but the creators of a new branch of industry.

THE COLLODION PHOTOGRAPHIC PROCESS.—The following process, it is understood, has been adopted in France, for keeping the collodion plates sensitive for many hours. Two pieces of plate glass, of equal size, are taken, and on one the collodion film is spread in the usual way; it is then dipped in the nitrate of silver bath, and when the streakiness has disappeared, it is lifted vertically from the bath, leaving the lower edge just immersed in the fluid. The second piece of glass is then applied to the collodion film, beginning at the lower edge. A thin stratum of the solution, by capillary attraction, becomes inclosed between the two glasses, which are then placed in the slider; and it is said that thus prepared, they may be kept sensitive a whole day, before exposing them to the action of the camera. On the operator's introduction, at one corner, of a thin ivory or bone paper-knife, without any injury to the collodion film, and the image is then developed in the usual way.

FALSIFICATIONS OF FOOD.—Mark yonder portly man: he has scarcely passed the period of maturity, and yet he incessantly complains of ailments which the art of no physician has yet been enabled to reach: his health is evidently breaking, his system has struggled long against the ravages of an insidious foe. Probably the water with which his domicile is supplied, besides being tainted with all the foulness that a London company can impart, is received into leaden cisterns, which are fast corroding from the action of carbonic acid, and are thus hourly tending to bring their victim to the grave by means, slow but sure, and terrible as sure. At breakfast, his tea, coloured (as it commonly is) with Prussian blue, chromate of lead, or carbonate of copper, adds to the already poisonous nature of the water with which it is combined. His bread, if he reside in London, is certainly adulterated with alum, not improbably with plaster of Paris or sand; his beer with coculus indicus, grains of paradise, quassia, &c. Those gherkins, of emerald hue, that appear so innocent, and consequently so tempting, in their prismatic jars, owe their seductive beauty to one of the deadliest poisons in all the range of chemistry. The verdant apricots in that tart are attractive from the same baneful cause. The anchovy paste produced contemporaneously with the cheese, if analysed, would be found to consist of an amalgam of decayed sprats, Venetian red, and red lead; nay, that double Gloucester itself is not free from contamination: its colour is due to anatto, and that anatto has been compounded of red lead, chrome, and ochre. The oil in that salad has possibly come from Paris, where incredible quantities are manufactured at the knacker's yard! Whole carcasses of horses being there boiled down, the fat is resolved into its component stearine and oleine: the former being converted into candle, and the latter into olive oil. —New Quarterly Review.

IMPORTS AND EXPORTS.—The Board of Trade returns again furnish remarkable evidence of the activity and prosperity of trade throughout the country. As compared with the corresponding month of last year, they show, in the declared value of our exportations, an increase of £919,097, and as the increase shown in the preceding returns was £1,410,000, it appears that the total comparative augmentation for the two first months of the year has been £2,329,157, or at the rate of nearly 23 per cent. Cotton, silk, and woollen manufactures are among the prominent items that have contributed to this result; and it is to be noticed that in each of these cases the description of goods involving the greatest amount of skilled labour has been taken: since in the exportation of yarns there has been a falling off. The largest specific increase has, however, occurred under the head of metals, and in this instance an allowance must be made for the rise which has taken place in prices, although it has influenced the total only to a limited extent. Another principal feature for remark is the continued improvement in the exportation of haberdashery, which, on the present occasion, has far exceeded even its usual extraordinary rate of advance. The total declared value of the exportations for the month of March in the years 1852 and 1853, were respectively £5,353,552 and £6,272,649. The quantities of imported articles taken into consumption present, on the whole, no important variation. There has been a rather considerable increase in flour. Coffee, cocoa, sugar, spirits, and spices, have likewise been extensively used. In tea and wines there has been a diminution.

ADULTERATION OF DRUGS.—The very general adulteration of drugs becomes more and more manifest as the published analysis proceeds. It appears from the Lancet of April 2 that, on an examination of the powder of jalap sold by different druggists, no less than fourteen samples out of thirty-five were adulterated. In some of them one-third of the article was spurious, and in all the fraudulent motive was obvious. It is but just, however, to say that the retail chemists and druggists are not the culpable parties. Evidence is produced to prove that they generally receive the adulterated drug from the wholesale houses, and that these again often receive it from the drug-grinders, who, like the spice-grinders, keep machinery for the purpose of pulverising dry wood to mix with the powdered drugs, to make them more bulky. It must, however, be remembered that the wholesale chemists and druggists are not wholly cleared, for in many cases they are themselves drug-grinders; and it is notorious that other wholesale druggists are accustomed to send a certain quantity of an article to be ground, with a request that it may be returned of a weight greatly exceeding that of the article sent. Thus, it is common to send to the drug-grinder eighty-four pounds of jalap to be made into a hundredweight. This was stated in the House of Commons by Dr. R. D. Thompson, in 1838, in reply to a question by Mr. Wakley.

THE CHARM.

"VERY well, indeed! I see that I shall make quite a gardener of you in time!"

The fair girl to whom this was addressed looked up in the old man's face with a smile, and then went on with her task. This task consisted in tying up various flowering annuals, which, like many other things in this world, required a little wholesome restraint. A pretty little garden it was on which they were bestowing so much pains, both useful and ornamental. The straight green rows of beans had some tall stalks among them, that might have emulated their classical ancestor, on which Jack the Giant Killer mounted to the ogre's castle; and the peas deserved all the praises which it did their master's heart good to hear lavished upon them. There was a background of cabbages, and some artichokes overlooked the neat quickest hedge. Gooseberries and currants were beginning to redden amid their verdant leaves, the cherries were looking a sort of yellow coral, and the small, crisp apples were already set. A blue tint was already appearing on the lavender, and the pale young shoots were springing in the box edges which neatly surrounded the small flower-bed. The porch at the door was covered with China roses, pretty, delicate, frail things, without scent. But this was compensated by the cabbage roses, now opening their crimson depths full of summer and sweetness, wearing the richest blush that ever welcomed June.

Adam Leslie was a happy man: he had all that a long life had desired—a window looking into the street—his house was the last of a row—a garden, and a small competence. He had passed a number of years in the very heart of the city, where a dusty geranium, a pot of mignonette, and a blackbird, were all he had to remind him of his boyhood and his native Argyleshire. He kept a small shop, whose profits just, and only just, maintained a wife and large family. They were not destined long to be the burthen which in his moments of ill temper he sometimes called them: wife, children, were carried one after another to the crowded churchyard in the next street. He wished that they had been buried in the country—for the country to him was the ideal of existence. Years passed away, and found him still the same hard-working man, toiling he scarcely knew for what. Suddenly a new tie again bound him to existence. His brother died, and left an orphan daughter to his charge. Once more that dark and narrow staircase was musical with childish feet; and Adam Leslie no longer sat down to an unshared and silent board. The timid, quiet little stranger soon became to him even as a child of his own. She had the blue eyes and bright hair of those that he had lost. Like them, he soon became anxious for her. The cheek grew paler day by day; the little feet lost their lightness; and the languid lip poured forth less and less frequently its snatches of mountain song. Mariou was accustomed to air and exercise, and pined in the close street.

"Can I not keep even one to be the joy of my old age?" thought the old man, as he looked on the pale and spiritless child, who had drawn her stool towards him, and was resting her head on his knee. His resolution was taken: he gave up sundry visions of wealth and civic honours, that of late had troubled him overmuch—and, gathering together what he had, gave up the pursuit of more. He sold his shop, and retired, as we have before said, on a small but comfortable independence. He took a small house at Greenwich—something of lingering habit still kept him near to the great city where he had passed so many years; and at first, it must be confessed, he found time rather heavy on his hands. But an active mind soon makes occupation for itself, and in the course of a year Leslie had quite enough to do. In the meantime he was amply rewarded by the improvement in Marion. The change did wonders for her. The cheek recovered its blooming colour, and amended health soon showed itself in the amended spirits. Often and often, when at work in his garden, he heard her sweet laugh, like musical bells in the distance; and her soft voice singing those old songs which yet struck a chord in his heart.

But Marion, from the rosy child, was now grown up into the lovely young woman, and there was one in particular who thought her so. Her engagement with Edward Meredith was known to and approved of by her uncle—certainly, in the first instance, he did say that Marion might have done better; yet a little eloquence on the part of the lover, and a little silence and a few blushes on the part of the mistress, obtained his consent.

Young Meredith had his way to make in the world, but his steadiness and activity had made him a favourite with the merchant in whose counting-house he was a clerk, and, in a couple more years, he confidently calculated on being able to support a wife. Adam Leslie had not much to give during his life, but at his death Marion would inherit his little property. In this they were as happy as youth and hope could make them. Expectation is in itself a pretty sort of reality. Night after night Edward used to row, or, if the wind served, sail down the Thames, and land about a mile above Greenwich, when a quarter of an hour's rapid walking brought him to Leslie's house. He usually arrived there about eight, which just left time for a walk in the fine old park with Marion. Slowly did they wander through these green and shadowy glades, where the deer feed so fearlessly, conscious, though scarce observant, of the beauty around them. They had no eyes for the Venetian palace at their side, through whose divided domes are seen the masts of a thousand ships. They looked not on the mighty city, dark in the distance, nor on the green country that stretched far away: they had eyes only for each other. But the natural influences were not unfelt: the soft air aided her companion's words to raise the rich colour on Marion's cheek; and Edward grew more eloquent with the free breath that he drew on the fresh and open heights, which the Scotch girl laughed at him for calling hills. At nine punctually they returned to the house, when Marion used to disappear for a few minutes, "on hospitable cares intent," and she and supper came in together. They say suppers are very unwholesome: our grandfathers and grandmothers never discovered it, and Adam Leslie belonged to them; at all events, it was very pleasant when on a summer evening the little table was drawn to the window-seat, which two of the party found quite large enough for their accommodation, and on the other side the old man in his large arm-chair. In this seat Adam Leslie had three sources of happiness: he saw his supper, the clematis he had planted and trained round the window, and the young people who were to him as his children.

"We shall have a thunder-shower soon," had been his prophecy the whole day.

The wish had been father to the thought; still hour after hour the dark clouds had passed provokingly away, taking their showers with them; however, they were now gathering in good earnest. A low clap of thunder growled in the distance, and the wind awoke on the branches. A shower of leaves—green, fresh leaves, falling before their time—whirled through the air. This was followed by the pelting rain, and Edward shut down the window. The gardener congratulated himself and his peas and beans, and the supper went on with added cheerfulness. Suddenly Edward exclaimed:

"Look, Marion, how beautiful!"

She turned, and saw the clear, silvery crescent of the new moon just emerged from a black cloud; a ring of blue sky was around, and the edges of the dense vapour were touched with light.

"Ah!" exclaimed Marion, who had all the ready superstition of a mountaineer, "I have seen the new moon through glass for the first time, and you, Edward, have shown it me!"

"It is very unlucky," continued her uncle, "to see the new moon through glass for the first time."

Edward tried to laugh at the superstition, but unshared mirth only damps the spirits of a small circle, and he gave up the attempt. That night they parted somewhat cooler and less cheerfully than usual. The next morning was too glad and sunny for any ill omen to be recollected, and by a sort of tacit agreement the moon was kept out of the conversation: Marion a little ashamed of a belief which she could not reason upon, and Edward as little liking to renew any subject in which he could not agree with her.

A fortnight passed away, and the moon was at its full; Edward was now later of an evening than he usually had been—for an extreme pressure of business on the house in which he was employed, made the work of extra hours necessary—and he was only too glad to do anything that put him forward in his master's favour. One night he was returning very late, but the tide served, the night was a lovely night in June, and he enjoyed it, as those enjoy whose naturally poetic temperament is checked by their ordinary circumstances, but which lends the keenest delight to any touch of romance or beauty that breaks in upon the commonplace. He floated down the noble river with a navy resting on its dark stream. The light-arched bridges, with the long lines of light trembling through them, were left far behind. The huge dome of St. Paul's arose bathed in the moonlight—that giant fane of a giant city; a hundred spires were shining silvery in the soft gleam, and all manner objects were touched with a picturesque obscurity; all around was silence and rest. The myriad voices of London were still, and nothing vexed the lulled ear of midnight. The only sounds were those that might have soothed even the ear of sleep: there was the languid waving to and fro of some loose sail, and the dip of Edward's oars. His little boat was the only moving thing on the water—for if the black colliers, whose gloomy canvas was still spread, moved, the movement was imperceptible. But his light boat went on, and left behind a train of glittering bubbles, like the small stars that meet and mingle on the milky way.

He had now arrived at that more lonely portion of the river which preceded his landing. A little tired of rowing, he let the oars drop, and his boat glided with the stream, as he leant back, gazing on the clear heaven above. He started—for a wild strain of music floated on the ear. It was interrupted for a moment by the chiming of the clocks, that, one mingling with another, told the hour of twelve. They ceased, and the music rose distinct upon the ear. He gazed around, and saw, far away in the moonlight, a little boat, with a white and swelling sail. He rowed towards it, and could distinguish the chords of some lute-like instrument, and the tones of a human voice. As he came nearer, he saw that the little bark lay motionless on the river, and that it only held one person. The figure was too much muffled for observation, but the flowing drapery denoted a woman, even if the sweet voice had left it doubtful. Edward remained entranced by the delicious singing. The air was singularly wild, and the words were in a foreign tongue, but he thought in his heart he had never listened to music before. After pausing awhile,

His spirit like a swan did float
Upon the silver breath of that sweet singing.

He rowed eagerly towards the mysterious bark. A dense cloud sailed over the moon, and the river for a few moments was shrouded in complete darkness. The moonlight softly broke through the dusky barrier, the dense veil melted into soft and glittering vapour; again the river was flooded with light, but the music had ceased, and the boat was gone. Edward strained his eyes in gazing round the horizon, but in vain. He listened, but no sound broke the profound stillness till the clocks struck one. He started from the reverie in which he had been indulging, and, snatching up the oars, he rowed to the landing-place. Fastening his boat, he proceeded hastily along the lane which he had so often trod. Twice he paused to breathe the cool, fresh air—for he was feverish, and his temples were throbbing, while that sweet, strange air would not quit his ear.

Late as it was, there was a light in Adam Leslie's cottage, and a light step stole along the passage, and a soft hand unbarred the door; a few whispered words were all on which they might venture—for her uncle would have been miserable at the idea of Marion keeping such late vigils. Edward's sleep that night was broken and troubled—that song haunted him. In his dreams he was again upon the water: he drew near to the strange boat, he spoke to its lady, she raised her veil, and he gazed on a face beautiful beyond all that he had dreamed of beauty. Morning came at last, but he awoke weary and fevered.

"How ill you look, dearest Edward!" said Marion, when they met at their early breakfast; "you are over-working!" and she gazed upon him with a tender anxiety which left him not a thought but for herself.

She walked with him down to the boat, yet he never alluded to the mysterious music of the preceding night, though it still rang in his ear, and mingled with even her sweet voice: a shyness, for which he could not himself account, prevented his alluding to the subject—he shrank from naming it; and when he reached the river, he cast a hasty and confused glance around, as if it must retain some consciousness. But all was bustle and life, the ships, taking advantage of a favourable wind, were under a press of canvas, and boat and barge were in full activity. Children were playing on the banks, and their shrill voices and laughter softened the deeper tones of manhood and business.

Edward sought in vain that day to fix his attention to the desk before him; still he heard that sweet, low song, and faces of strange loveliness floated before him. He was impatient for night, and when it came, he sprang into his boat, half fearfully, half eagerly. It was as his heart foreboded: again he heard that melancholy song—again he saw the veiled figure in the little boat—the clocks, too, told the same hour, but this time he rowed at once towards the stranger's bark. The lady flung back her veil, and he at once recognised the lovely face that had so haunted his dreams. She stretched forth her hand, as the boats lay alongside, and he took the small white fingers, that glittered in the moonlight with gems, in his own. But the touch was as an electric shock—his boat seemed to sink from under him, a mighty sound was in his ears, and he sank back insensible.

He awoke as from sleep, confused and dizzy: he gazed round, and, as he gradually recovered his senses, saw that he was in a vast hall. He lay for awhile in a pleasant state of half-consciousness, his gaze slowly taking note of the various objects by which he was surrounded. The hall was surrounded by pillars of malachite, wrought into the semblance of gigantic serpents, that supported the shining dome, and whose illumined heads made an enormous lamp in the centre. The partitions they formed were filled either by alcoves crowded with birds of rich and foreign plumage, or by paintings representing scenes in some far country. At one end was a large fountain, which played in fantastic forms round an inner basin that shone with liquid fire, and mingled its reddening jets with the fountain's clear and crystal ones. At the other end was a conservatory crowded with large, beautiful flowers, but none of them familiar to Edward. Marble urns scattered around were wreathed with their magnificent blossoms, and some of the birds, loosened from the golden net-work, flitted past: some with crests of meteor-like crimson, others spreading vast and radiant pinions coloured from the sunset. The waving of their pinions, and the falling of the fountain, were the only sounds heard in that stately hall; these, and one other: it was the low, soft breathing of a woman. Edward heard it, and, turning to the side whence it came, saw, watching by his side, the strange beauty of the song and of the boat. She was tall beyond the ordinary height of woman, but stately in her grace as the ideal of a queen and the reality of a swan. Her arms and feet were bare, but for the gems which encircled them. A white robe swept around her in folds gathered at the waist by a golden girdle inscribed with signs and characters. Her hair was singularly thick, and of that purple blackness seen on the grape and the neck of the raven—black, with a sort of azure bloom upon it. It was fastened in large folds, which went several times round the head, and these were adorned with jewels and precious stones, like a midnight lighted with stars. Her complexion was a pale, pure olive, perfectly colourless, but delicate as that of a child. Her mouth was the only spot where the rose held dominion, and lips of richer crimson never opened to the morning.

"Youth," said she, in a low voice of peculiar sweetness, "I love thee; night after night I have watched thy boat on yonder river. I know not what the customs of thy land may be; I speak according unto mine. I have wealth—I have power—I have knowledge; I can share them all with thee!"

Edward started to his feet—the image of Marion was uppermost in his thoughts.

"Lady," he replied, unconsciously imitating her own high-wrought language; "in my country, woman pleases not to man. I have not wooed, and I do not wish to win thee! Thou art wonderful and very fair, but thou art not my love!"

She looked at him for a moment with her large, dark eyes.

"I think," continued she, "I could make thee love me, if thou wert to stay here awhile! I pray thee give me a lock of your sunny hair—I have seen none like it!"

Edward gave her one of those bright curls which clustered around his head.

"Look around thee," said the lady, "for a little time. This hall is a triumph of my art. These birds and flowers belong to my native Mexico, and so do those glad valleys!"

Edward gazed around in wonder, and while he gazed there came on the air the same melancholy song that he had heard while on the river. The very sound of his own steps disturbed him, and he flung himself on a couch, to enjoy without interruption the exquisite melody. The intense perfume of the flowers intoxicated him like wine. He felt as if lulled in a delicious trance, in which one image became more and more distinct—the pale but lovely face of his hostess. His heart was filling with love for those radiant eyes. A softer fragrance breathed around him—it was her breath. He looked, and she was again bending over him; he saw himself mirrored in the moonlight of her eyes.

"You will not leave me?" whispered she, in those soft, sweet tones which were like notes from a lute.

"Never!" exclaimed the youth, and threw himself at her feet.

Weeks had passed away, and done the work of years in Adam Leslie's cottage. His garden was now in the richest season of the year. The sunshine had settled into crimson on the peach; the bloom was on the plum, and the dahlias, whose colours might vie with a monarch's clothing, crowded the garden with unwonted prodigality. Arm-in-arm the old man and his niece wandered around the now mournful garden: he trying to speak that comfort which his every look belied, and she trying to smile as if she believed him; but the tears rose into her eyes as she tried to smile. It was now more than six weeks since Edward's mysterious disappearance, and the little hope that had once been cherished was now fast dying away. That night, after Adam Leslie had gone to bed, Marion strolled into the garden. She could not sleep, and the lovely moonlight she thought might soothe her. Alas, the tears that had been in her eyes all day had now begun to flow, when suddenly the sound of footsteps roused her attention. She raised her face from her hands, and saw a little deformed negro-woman standing beside her.

"Why do you cry?" said the strange visitor, fixing on her a pair of small, bright, snake-like eyes, "like a child, when you might win your lover back like a woman?"

Marion stood silent with extreme astonishment, and the woman went on.

"Yes, if you will follow me—though you look as if you were frightened to death—I can help you to set your lover free. There are other bright eyes in the world besides your own; but yours will be the best and last loved, if you dare to follow one who is your friend."

"I will ask my uncle," said Marion, trembling with agitation.

"You must ask no one, and nothing," interrupted the little negro, her harsh voice growing yet harsher as she raised it, "but your own true heart: unless there be love enough to lead you on, your lover will remain bound by the spells of the sorceress for ever!"

The thought passed rapidly through Marion's mind, that if she could but see Edward, old love must revive, even if he had deserted her for another. Led on by some strange fascination, she followed the little negro woman. They came to the river side, where a boat was moored; and, when her companion was seated, took up the oars, and began rowing with great quickness down the river. They stopped at a small flight of wooden steps, and an almost worn-out door admitted them into a large, but desolate-looking garden; another door, but that huge and massy, admitted them into a dark and winding passage. Marion shuddered as the little negro caught her hand to lead her forward: she followed her for some distance, when the sudden opening of a door dazzled her eyes with a blaze of light. They had entered a magnificent chamber, fitted up in the utmost oriental luxury for a sleeping-room. Marion was scarcely allowed time to look round, for her dwarfish companion whispered, in a low tone, like the hissing of a serpent:

"Open that gold box, and take out the lock of hair you see there: it is your lover's."

Well did the forsaken girl recollect the sunny hair: she pressed it to her lips, while her fast-falling tears dimmed its lustre.

"Come, come, I will show him to you!" exclaimed the little negro woman, again hurrying her on; "if you will love him, when you see him, throw that charmed lock of hair into the fountain of fire by which we shall be standing, and the spell that binds him will be broken."

Marion had not power to speak, but she followed the dwarfish creature with a heart beating louder than her steps. Again her eyes closed in the presence of sudden splendour—they were standing behind the fountain of mingled fire and water: thence they could see without being seen. In the centre of that gorgeous hall, a lady was seated on a mattress covered with cloth of gold, and Edward was at her feet. They had eyes but for each other, and her one hand was in his, while the other was twisted in his bright hair.

"Now girl," hissed the same whisper, "fling the lock you hold in the fire!"

Marion almost mechanically obeyed: she flung it, and a burst of thunder shook the building—the little fountain grew crimson, as if with blood; but one heart-piercing shriek rang above every other sound—it came from the dark lady.

"Hast thou found me, oh my enemy?" said she, in the same low, sweet voice; but which now seemed the very echo of a broken heart.

"Ay," cried the little negro woman, "the dark spell has the mastery!"

At this moment Marion rushed forward; she had seen Edward sink back convulsed on the couch: she threw herself on her knees beside him, and supported his head; the dew of death were upon it. The tall and stately lady stood by, paler than marble, and even her bright lips colourless. Still her radiant eyes flashed defiance on the negro dwarf; but the heart's agony was in the compressed mouth, and, with tears in those starry eyes, she turned to Edward. Marion saw her approach, and, clasping him passionately in her arms, exclaimed:

"He is mine—loved long before you knew him! let us at least die together!"

"Ah!" exclaimed the stranger, "is it even so? I knew not of it."

A shrill, wild laugh came from the little negro woman, and a faint cry from Marion; for Edward had sunk down exhausted from her arm. Once more he unclosed his eyes, and, fixing them on Marion with a look full of tenderness, murmured her name, and expired. The dark lady leant over him for a moment: whatever might be the anguish of that moment, she subdued it; but the veins swelled like chords in her clear temples, with the effort. She turned, and gave one look at the negro, who crouched beneath it like a beaten hound, and remained as if rooted to the spot.

"Take him to your home," said she to Marion; "what I must do, your eyes would shrink to witness! I will offer you nothing; my love and my gifts turn to curses!"

She stamped on the ground, and four strange figures came forward, and, raising Marion and Edward, carried them into the boat by the stairs, and there left them. The wind and tide slowly drifted them along, and the maiden sat floating over the river, with her lover's head upon her knee. Once, and once only, she raised her eyes. A wild, melancholy song came upon her ear, and a dark bark, dimly seen amid the grey vapours of morning, flitted past. On the deck she fancied she saw a tall figure, with long, floating hair, stand wringing her hands in passionate despair. It passed rapidly out of sight, and as it passed, the melancholy song died away in the distance: never since has it been heard on the Thames. The boat that bore the living and the dead was met by some watermen, who conveyed them on shore. Marion was perfectly insensible, and was carried home in a brain fever, from which she never recovered. At the last gasp they thought her sensible, for her eyes wandered round the room in search of her uncle: she caught sight of his face—a scarcely perceptible smile passed over her countenance, and in that smile she died. The house and garden still remain, but they have a lonely and mournful look. The old man plants no more flowers in his garden: the few that he watches grow in the churchyard. He has planted some rose-bushes on the grave of the lovers; those he still tends and waters. They are the last link between this living world and himself. Night and morning he visits those tombs; but he never visits them without a prayer that the time may soon come when he shall sleep at their side.

FACETIÆ.

A good lady at Watertown recently refused to let her daughter dance with a Cambridge man, because she understood he was a bachelor of arts.

An artist painted a dog and tree so naturally, the other day, that you could hear the bark of one, and see it on the other.

A POSTHUMOUS EPISTLE.—An Irishman on arriving in America, took a fancy to the Yankee girls, and wrote to his wife: "Dear Norah—These melancholy lines are to inform you that I died yesterday, and hope that you are enjoying the same blessing. I recommend you to marry Jemmy O'Rourke, and take good care of the children. From your affectionate husband till death."

BAKEFACED.—The fashionable bonnet, which sits on the back part of the head, is acknowledged to be the most bakefaced of modern improvements.

"CATO, what do you suppose is the reason that the sun goes to the south in the winter?" "Well, I don't know, massa, unless he no stands de clemency ob de norf, and so am obliged to go to the souf, where he experiences warmer longitude."

THE engineer's apostrophe on his boiler.

Alas! I thought she could be trusted—

But when I tightly tied her down—she busted.

A SPEEDY CURE.—"Doctor," said a querulous, suffering patient, who had paid a good deal of money for physic to apparent little purpose, "you don't seem to reach the seat of my disease. Why don't you strike at the seat of my disorder?" "So I will," was the prompt reply, "if you insist on it;" and, lifting his cane, he smashed the brandy bottle on the sideboard.

A Judge, suspected of bribery, chided his clerk for having a dirty face. The clerk replied, "I plead guilty my lord, but my hands are clean."

"We see a little work advertised, called 'Love in the Moon.' We cannot speak of its contents, for we have not yet looked into it. But we confess we think the title is a decidedly well-chosen one. Love in the Moon seems to us quite in its proper sphere, seeing what defiance lunatics it makes of all who come within its influence."

We were present recently when a lady entered one of our most fashionable dry goods stores, and inquired for "black gentlemen's cravats." It reminded us of the Frenchman who found a "white lady's handkerchief."

ADVICE.—As the season of change is here, it may be well for landlords to follow the advice given by a house-hunter: "When you billet your house to let, put on the price—the rent. We don't mean to say put it on thick, but state the amount of rent you want for the premises. It will save yourselves and everybody else a deal of trouble."

A RUSTIC RHYME.

A bee, while lay sleeping young Dolly,
Mistook her red lips for the rose;
There honey to seek were no folly,
No flower so sweet ever blows.

It tickled, and waked her; when, clapping
Her hand on the impudent bee,
It stung her; and Dolly, caught napping,
Came pouting and crying to me.

Said she, "Take the sting out, I pray you!"

What way I was puzzled to try;
And a trifling wager I'd lay you,
You'd have been as much puzzled as I.

I'd heard about sucking out poison—

A sting is a poisonous dart—

So I kissed her—the act was no wise one:

The sting found its way to my heart.

"Two GREAT LIES."—A slave was sent to meeting with a particular charge from his master to remember what the minister said, so as to give an account of it when he returned. The master had a son named Jonathan, to whose orders the slave was also subject. Pompey accordingly went to meeting, and was questioned by his master on his return: "Gorry, massa!" said he, "minister tell two great lies." "What! What!" exclaimed the master—"you mustn't talk so about the minister! What do you mean?" "Why minister say no man serve two masters—and I know I serve you and Massa Jonathan too." "Well, what else did he say?" "Why, he say, 'he will love the one and hate the other.' Dat am a lie, too, for I hate you both alike!"

COTTLE drove Wordsworth one day from Bristol to Alfoxden, in a gig, and they called at Stowey, by the way, to summon Coleridge and Miss Wordsworth, who followed swiftly on foot. They carried with them bread and cheese, and a bottle of brandy. A beggar stole the cheese, which set Coleridge expatiating on the superior virtues of brandy. It was he that, with thirsty impatience, took out the horse; but as he let down the shafts, the theme of his eloquence rolled from the seat, and was dashed to pieces on the ground. Coleridge, abashed, gave the horse to Cottle, who tried to pull off the collar. It proved too much for the worthy citizen's strength, and he called to Wordsworth to assist. Wordsworth retired baffled, and was relieved by the ever handy Coleridge. There seemed more likelihood of their pulling off the animal's head than his collar, and they marvelled by what magic it had ever got on. "La, master," said the servant-girl, who was passing by, "you don't go the right way to work;" and, turning round the collar, she slipped it off in an instant, to the utter confusion of the three luminaries.

A lady said to her beau, after fifteen long years' courtship, "Charles, I am going out of town to-morrow." "Where?" "I don't know." "When are you coming back?" "Never." "What are you going for?" "I am going to look for something which you have not, never had, and yet can give me without loss to yourself." "You are very welcome to it, I am sure; but what is it?" "A husband!" "Why, you might have had that fifteen years ago if you had only said the word; but I was afraid to begin."

WHEN Voltaire wrote his tragedy of Europe, he called up his servant one morning at three o'clock, and gave him some verses to carry immediately to the Sieur Paulin, who was to perform the tyrant. His man alleged that it was the hour of sleep, and that the actor might not like to be disturbed. "Go, I say," replied Voltaire; "tyrants never sleep!"

A sculptor in Paris, as eccentric as he is skilful, made a bet, some weeks ago, that he would stand an hour in a hairdresser's window, without laughing, in company with a waxen lady, dressed in the latest fashion. He arrived within ten minutes of his time, when the police interfered to disperse the crowd. However, the money was paid.

Married, at Podunk, by the Rev. D. Willis, Mr. H. Hoe to Miss Ann Handle, all of that city.

How useless a Handle without any Hoe,

And useless a Hoe without Handle;

No better a winter without any snow,

Or a candlestick minus a candle.

But here, joined in one, the Handle and Hoe,

Will life's rugged journey smooth over;

And each prove a helper in this world below,

Till death shall hoe both to another.

ADVICE TO AN AUTHORESS.—An authoress, of some celebrity in her day, once asked Dr. Johnson to give an opinion upon a work she was just about to publish, observing: "If it will not do, I beg you will tell me so, as I have other irons in the fire; and should you think this is not likely to succeed, I can bring out something else." The doctor, having turned over several pages of the work, returned it, with the following laconic observation: "Madam, I would advise you to put this where your irons are."

IRISH THEATRICALS.—The following is a correct report of an address delivered by the manager of a small theatre in Ireland, where Mr. Rae was engaged to perform. There were only three persons in the house: "Ladies and gentlemen, as there is nobody here, I'll dismiss you all; the performances of this night will not be performed, but the performances of this night will be repeated again to-morrow evening."

EXTRAORDINARY INVENTION.—A regular genius, near Camden—who, by the way, is a firm believer in "spirit-rappings"—has invented a pocket telescope that will bring the farthest object so near, as to enable him to give any fellow a sound licking who may be seen trespassing upon his premises at any distance. He intends securing it by obtaining a patent for the invention.

A man has been sentenced in Paris to three years' imprisonment for selling quack medicines. Among his compositions were, the "Water of Giants," to hasten the growth; "Water of Financiers," to strengthen the flesh; the "Elixir of Arabs," to fortify the voice; "Prodigal Son Pomatum," composed of the marrow of the fatted calf; and the "Oil of the Capuchins," to make the beard grow. It was shown that the waters and elixirs were either pure water or scented vinegar.

MOLIERE'S TORMENT.—One day, during the representation of the Tartuffe, a person coming to speak with Molière, in his study, which looked upon the stage, the latter suddenly called out, "O that dog! that burglar! that butcherly wretch!" and struck his head with his fist, like one in a frenzy. The gentleman was extremely surprised, and thought him seized with a sudden fit; but Molière the next instant added, with the greatest composure, "Sir, 'twas only an actor, who spoke four of my lines most shamefully, without any accent or gesture."

THE INDIAN AND THE INNKEEPER.—Colonel Putnam used to tell a story of an Indian, upon Connecticut River, who called at a tavern in the autumn for a dram. The landlord asked him two coppers for it. The following spring, passing the same house, he called for another, and had three coppers to pay for it. "How is this, landlord?" says he; "last fall you asked but two coppers for a glass of rum—now you ask three?" "Oh!" says the landlord, "it cost me a good deal to keep rum over winter. It is as expensive to keep a hog'shead of rum over winter as a horse." "Ah!" says the Indian, "I can't see through that: he won't eat so much hay; maybe he drink as much water."

WOMAN'S RIGHTS.—David Hale once wrote a jeu d'esprit on the "Rights of Woman," in which he showed that the balance of wrongs was decidedly on the side of men. When the simple question of superiority is at issue, the men always have to give up. If ladies and gentlemen meet on the side-walk, who has to turn out? If there are not seats enough for the whole company, who has to stand up? When there is danger to face, who must go forward? If there is a curiosity to gratify, who goes behind? If there is too much company for the first table, who eats at the second? We could mention a hundred other cases, in which, on the simple question of right, everything is yielded to the woman. But there are many cases in which the condition of men is still worse. For instance, if on any public occasion, a pew at church, or a seat anywhere, be occupied by men ever so respectable or aged, smirking little beauty trips along and presents herself at the top of the seat, and they must all jump up and clear out at it.

they had been shot. Especially ought it to be noticed, that, when matrimonial negotiations are to be made, the whole burthen of performing the delicate and often very embarrassing parts of making proposals, is thrown upon the men, while the women sit and say, "No, no, no, no," as long as they like, and never say "Yes," until they have a mind to.

ANNUAL SALUTATION AT THE PALACE.—"Welcome, little stranger."—Diogenes.

THE MUSEUM CATALOGUE.—The construction of this Catalogue is ever a matter of complaint. It is based upon an alphabetical arrangement of the names of authors, instead of subjects. So that the unfortunate student who happens not to know all the writers upon the subjects of his study, cannot possibly derive the benefit of their works. This is obviously a mistake. Who, for instance, wishing to read the life of Bentinck (Lord G.), would turn to D'Israeli? or of Moore, would turn to Russell? They would as soon think of referring to Gilfillan for Milton.—Ibid.

A DAINTY DISH (To set before the Emperor).—Taking into account the turn of luck that Mr. Louis Nap. has encountered, we must confess we consider this gentleman has had his share of WEAL and HAM.—Ibid.

GOLD-DIGGING HUSBANDS.—Young ladies are especially recommended to marry those young gentlemen who have returned from the "Diggings," as, independently of their golden charms, they make most domesticated husbands, and are especially recommended as being adepts, from long practice, at rocking the cradle.—Ibid.

DANGEROUS PRECEDENT.—One of the members of Parliament was lately pronounced to be "not duly qualified," and therefore lost his seat. This is a dreadful blow to the constitution of the House of Commons; for if every member unqualified for legislative duties were to be thrown out, there would certainly be a house left, but how many members would be in it?—Ibid.

SERVANT-GALLOP—OR, WHAT'S TO BECOME OF THE MISSES.—Housemaid; "Well, Soosan, I've made up my mind not to stop 'ere no longer to work like negroes as we do!" Cook: "Nor I, nuther! But just turn the meat, will you, please, the whilst I finish my crochet?"—Punch.

THE LIVERY OF THE CITY OF LONDON.—We do not know what livery this particularly is, but we should say that, since the deputation of the bankers and merchants to Paris, it may be precisely the same as that worn by the servants and finkies of the French Emperor.—Ibid.

AN EXCISE QUESTION TO THE RAPPERS.—Is Mrs. Hayden, the lady "medium" who attends parties wishing to communicate with the other world—is she duly licensed to sell spirits? Answer: No, she only sells the dupes who pay for what they don't get.—Ibid.

A HINT FOR STUPID GENTLEMEN.—One Mrs. Catherine Winter had been pleading her cause in the law courts of Dublin, and lecturing afterwards in the Mechanics' Institute. On the latter occasion she said, that she thought "when ladies had pleaded before Moses, she might surely be allowed to plead before Chancellor Brady (great laughter). Many ladies had a taste for the law, and as for herself, she believed she was as good a lawyer as was to be found amongst them (laughter). Suppose a lady with a legal mind married a stupid attorney (laughter), did they not think he would employ himself more profitably in rocking the children to sleep (laughter), than in attempting to manage cases he did not understand, and which his wife would be fully competent to conduct?" (Laughter).—Ibid.

THE NEW DECIMAL COINAGE.—There is no doubt that counting our copper coinage by fours and twelves very often throws everything into sixes and sevens—an inconvenience that would be avoided by making pence into a shilling. A proposition to this effect has been put forward, and as we are very glad to make the most of our money, we shall be delighted to hear that two shillings are to do duty for half-a-crown, and that if we owe the latter sum, we may pay the former in discharge of the obligation. There is some difficulty, we believe, as to names for the proposed new coins, and somebody has suggested that a sixpence should henceforth be called by the old name of a "tester." We do not see why the word "tester" is entitled to any particular recognition, any more than a "tanner," or a "Bob," and indeed a "Joey" would have an equal right to recognition by Act of Parliament. If brevity is desirable, let us carry out the principle to its fullest extent: let all our copper coinage pass indiscriminately under the name of "Browns," and let Queen, Lords, and Commons formally recognise as "Tin" the whole of our metallic currency.—Ibid.

GEMS OF THOUGHT.

Our best security consists in innocence, and the cheering influence of approving conscience.

Show me a liar, and I will show you a thief.

Some live within their means; some live up to their means; and some live beyond their means.

Vain-glory blossoms, but never bears.

Men who make money rarely saunter; men who save money rarely swagger.

A prime minister was asked how he could perform such a vast amount of business, and yet have so much leisure? He replied, "I do everything at the time."

Of all melancholy sights, a bachelor's home is the most so. A house without a woman, is like a world without a sky, or a sky without a star—dark, desolate and dreary.

Those who lie upon roses when young, are apt to lie upon thorns when old.

Those only are fit for solitude who are like nobody, who like nobody, and who are liked by nobody.

The eyes of the multitude are not strong enough to look upon truth, and, generally, where they blink most there is most truth.

The writer does the most who gives his reader the most knowledge, and takes from him the least time.

Of the cloud which wraps the present hour,
Serves but to brighten all our future days.

The worst of law is, that one suit breeds twenty.

There is no merit, when there is no trial,
And, till experience stamps the mark of strength,
Courards may pass for heroes, faith for falsehood.

Liberty is willing, thinking, speaking, and doing what we understand; provided we violate no law or principle.

In the moral world there is nothing impossible, if we can bring a thorough will to it. Man can do everything with himself, but he must not attempt to do too much with others.

As the prickliest leaves are the driest, so the pertest fellows are the most barren.

When the million applaud you, seriously ask yourself what harm you have done; when they censure you, what good.

Mind this.—Ten friends are dearly purchased at the expense of a single enemy; for the latter will take ten times more pains to injure you than the former will take to do you a service.

MISCELLANEOUS.

A GREEN CLOTH "BOARD."—The Board of Green Cloth is a court in the department of the Lord Steward of the Household; it is one of the most ancient courts in England, and has jurisdiction of all offences committed in the Queen's palaces, and verge of the court. It is called the Green Cloth, from the table whereat they sit being covered with green cloth; and without a warrant from this court, none of the Queen's servants can be arrested for debt.

DISCOVERY OF ICELAND.—Iceland was discovered in 860; settled in 870; became an independent republic in 928; was Christianised in the year 1000; in 1265 became voluntarily subject to Norway; in 1387 fell, together with Norway, under the dominion of Denmark; and remains to this day a Danish province. For 900 years the dress, habits, manners, and character of the people (60,000 in number) have remained unchanged.

INSTINCTS OF THE HOTTENTOTS.—The Hottentots are represented as the lowest in intellect of any family of the human race. But even they have an intelligence with which the most civilised cannot compete. They can educate some faculties to a wonderful extent. The facility with which the Hottentot can track his way over the wildest wastes, through the intricacies of the deepest bush, by the light of day or during the darkness of night, is quite proverbial, and amounts to a sort of natural instinct, which they appear to possess in common with some of the brute creation. Endowed with the most acute power of vision, the faintest landmark serves him as an unerring guide. With like facility he will for miles and miles trace the "spoor," or footprints of either man or beast. Place him once on the "trail," and no bloodhound can follow it more accurately by scent than the Totty will do by sight. A single blade of grass removed from its original direction—the slightest appearance of moisture left by the displacement of even a small pebble—a ruffled leaf on the bush—are all sufficient evidences to direct him in discovering the spoor, by the appearance of which he will not only be able to tell whether the object of his pursuit has passed within three minutes or three days, but likewise whether his flight has been precipitate or slow—whether he has moved with the confidence of strength, or that dread of detection inseparable from fear, weakness, or guilt.

NELSON'S HEART.—Human nature is very frail. No man ever had a stronger sense of it, under the influence of a sense of justice, than Lord Nelson. He was loth to inflict punishment; and when he was obliged, as he called it, "to endure the torture of seeing men flogged," he came out of his cabin with a hurried step, ran into the gangway, made a bow to the officers, and, reading the articles of war the culprit had infringed, said: "Boatswain, do your duty!" The lash was instantly applied, and, consequently, the sufferer exclaimed: "Forgive me, admiral—forgive me!" On such an occasion, Lord Nelson would look round with wild anxiety, and, as all his officers kept silence, he would say: "What! none of you speak for me? Avast! cast him off!" And then added to the culprit: "Jack, in the day of battle remember me!" He became a good fellow in future. A poor man was to be flogged—a landsman—and few pitied him. His offence was drunkenness. As he was being tied up, a lovely girl, contrary to all rules, rushed through the officers, and, falling on her knees, clasped Nelson's hand, in which were the articles of war, exclaiming: "Pray, forgive him, your honour, and he shall never offend again!" "Your pretty face," said Nelson, "is a security for his good behaviour. Let him go! the fellow cannot be bad who has such a lovely creature in his care." This man rose to be lieutenant; his name was William Fye.

EXTRAORDINARY MARRIAGE.—Another of those extraordinary marriages, which were reported about twelve months ago, has again taken place—namely, the marriage of two deaf and dumb men—Thomas O'maley and Catherine M'Kean. The marriage was celebrated in the parish church of Ardret, a few weeks since, by the Rev. Mr. Jones, curate of that parish. Mr. Whitaker acted as interpreter. O'maley was educated at Claremont, near Dublin, is a native of the county Mayo, and served his time in Moneymore to the tailoring business—which he gave up, and joined Miss Wright's school, for the education of the deaf, dumb, and the blind. Being an expert fellow, he soon learned to be an excellent carver in wood. So clever did he become at the business, that when the teacher whom Miss Wright had employed to teach the others had left, he was fit to take his place and to teach the others. Catherine was brought up in Moneymore, and was educated at the same school. She is also very clever at the carving work, and not only at this, but is also an excellent hand at any kind of needlework, either plain or fancy. They are able to earn from 12s. to 15s. weekly. They can both read and write well.—Dublin Freeman.

INDIANS IN EUROPEAN DRESS.—As much as I like to see an Indian in his native dress or ornaments, be it as scanty as possible, equally funny and disfigured do they look when they put on European clothes. They frequently have no idea for what purpose and in what order they ought to be worn. First, a dress-coat, and then a waistcoat, then part of a shirt, or a waistcoat by itself, or a pair of trousers, or three and four pair of them at the same time, they do not care; and they admire a uniform most—red, if possible, with gold or silver. I frequently saw Indians in the greatest heat with three pairs of trousers, the upper ones pulled up as high as they could get them, the second pair rolled up to their knees, and the undermost left to their natural length, to let all men see what a splendid wardrobe they called their own, and could afford. Cravats for garters, shirt-collars point downwards, waistcoats buttoned behind, and other mistakes continually occur; and, like children, they hang upon them what they can get, and sometimes even what they can buy with hard-earned money, till they get tired of it, and throw it aside.—Gerstaecker's Journey Round the World.

SPAIN, AS IT WAS BEFORE THE FRENCH CONQUEST.—Though its people were endowed by nature with heroism, intelligence, and greatness of soul, it was, however, the most backward of all Europe in its institutions. The struggle, at once national and religious, which it had to maintain against the Moors, to reconquer its territory and its independence—thus combining in one flame of enthusiasm its faith and its nationality—had left upon its character an impress of violence and superstition, in which the priest, the soldier, and the executioner were mingled, as it were, in the same individual, and their respective qualities summed up together in the Inquisition. This Inquisition, a perpetual auto da fé, suspended over conscience and liberty, and invented by the war of races to purge the soul, had indurated the character of the Spanish people. Cruelty, sanctified by religion, human victims burned for their belief by a slow fire at the stake, offered up as a spectacle and a holocaust to heaven and to men, had stifled all feelings of humanity in this nation. It had, still further, hermetically sealed up Spain against every ray of intelligence and liberty from the rest of Europe; science and civilisation were only known there as words of evil; philosophy hid itself there as a mystery, and brooded as a vengeance; its manners were depraved; its monks reviving the middle ages—in one place possessors of all its wealth, in another sanctifying mendicity; the court itself was only absolute over the people in virtue of its subjection to the priesthood. The sacerdotal police had the power of citing even the conscience of its kings, and did not withhold its hand before the Sovereign Pontiff himself. Egyptian in its institution, African in its character, and Italian in its manners, such was Spain.—Lamar-tine's History of the Restoration of Monarchy in France.

WORDS OF WISDOM.

TRANSLATED FROM THE CHINESE, BY DR. BOWRING.

A man must never talk about,

What passes his own home within;

And for a woman 'tis a sin

To speak of what takes place without.

To pardon crimes is a most foul offence;

But still more foul to punish innocence!

Even though the tree should near the temple grow,
The blasting hurricane will lay it low.

The poet's and historian's pen

Drags from their graves distinguished men.

The power of music penetrates the skin,

And makes the very marrow dance within.

'Tis sad the world's superfluous waste to see,
While millions starve in want and misery.

As the peach-tree's crimson blossoms

'Midst the verdant foliage bloom,

So the virtuous bride embosoms

Love and harmony at home.

If every man would see,

To his own reformation,

How very easily

You might reform a nation!

Give me the most inglorious peace

Rather than all the spoils of war;

Victory's most brilliant trophy is

A fierce fire, blazing, blasting far.

What men call laurels are but blood.

And conquerors for their triumphs should

Have only funeral honours;

Should be their victor-souls and tears!

And 'midst such living sorrows

Their pyramids of bones should rise.

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

T. ALLEN.—The Battle of Berea, in Kaffirland, was fought in December last. But it was more in the nature of a razzia than a regular engagement.

T. C. C.—The following will remove freckles: Take one ounce of rectified acid of pitch, and one pint of distilled water. Mix, and apply to the parts affected.

LONGFELLOW.—The hero in Cooper's novel, "The Pilot," was intended to be a portrait of "Paul Jones," the naval hero, and a very good portrait it is, too, although rather over-coloured; but fiction writers are privileged.

W. W.—If your mother died intestate and you are of full age, you can take possession of all the personal property she left for distribution among her children. Take out letters of administration, and then you can act legally.

C. S.—Moles on the skin may be removed, but not without leaving a mark behind.

B.—The black population of America vote in the election for members to Congress. Five black votes count as three white ones.

Ego. a gentleman, greatly admires a lady whom he has known a number of years by sight, but never had an opportunity of obtaining an introduction to her. They see and notice each other very frequently, in a place of worship. He fears the lady does not like him, she being his superior in life. She has heard of his personality, and since then he fancies she is shy. Very likely. A modest girl does not like to be made the subject of gossip. A gentleman would doat on such circulated rumours. In this case, "Ego" may take the liberty of addressing himself, either personally, or by letter—the former mode is preferable—to the object of his distant worship. No true woman rudely repulses the respectful advances of an honest, pure-hearted man.

MERCHANT tells a funny story. A short time since, he was engaged to a young lady "whooped the question" and has accepted. When, by a gentleman came into the field, and he was completely put aside. On his remonstrating, the lady flew into a passion, and scratched his face so badly, that he was unable to go out of doors for a month. His face is quite well, but, along the places visited by the lady's fingers, is streaked with red marks. Let him be comforted. The marks will disappear with the old skin. He ought to consider himself lucky to have got off so easily. Marriage almost localises the use of the talons; but we have an impression that the finger-nails of an angry married woman are not half so venomous as those of a spinster above thirty. But it requires a good deal to exasperate the latter. Commend us to the windy side of both of them.

H. H.—The widest streets in any large city in the world are in St. Petersburg. The Novski perspective in the latter city is more than half as wide again as Oxford Street in London.

KATH ELLEN is twenty, and has not been baptised. She had letter have the ceremony performed at once; of course she will require sponsors. But the parents may go to the district registrar's office, and register the birth, on payment of five shillings.

UN AMICO.—You must put a restraint on your inclination. Fathers are not mountains of gold. When you are twenty-five get married, and your father will place you in an establishment of your own. At present we don't think you have any cause to complain.

AMARANTH.—You must have faith. Love is worse than nothing without it. Indeed, the sentiment, to exist, must be founded in confidence. But as hoping against hope is difficult, have your doubts at once removed or confirmed. Better to know that a man is faithless, than to be tortured by a vague suspicion. In the former case, scorn and contempt are sovereign remedies for a wounded susceptibility.

WALTER BERNARD.—The rich are often too much engaged in pleasure and ambition to care for the wants of those beneath them. They are generally too far removed to understand them, and too few to make their intellectual powers felt throughout the community; and so all transactions between rich and poor become either mercenary or condescendingly charitable. The working classes are, even under the most favourable circumstances, too much occupied and too much harassed, by their necessities, to be able of themselves to improve their morality or intelligence. It is the middle class which verges towards either extreme, until it loses itself in both, that possesses the greatest amount of virtue and intelligence, and disseminates the good qualities of each amongst the other. It improves the tastes and morals of the masses, copies the refinements of the rich, and checks their habits of luxury. It stimulates production and consumption in bringing intellect to bear upon labour, and in its greater demand for the comforts of life. If the middle class gets either too wealthy or too poor, it becomes inert or powerless—it imbibes the vices of both extremes, and each is left to vitiate in its own circle, until the whole nation becomes depraved.

M. Y. L.—It must frankly be admitted that the great bulk of our electors exercise the franchise conscientiously. The constitution has invested them with the franchise, and being only able to exercise it to the best of their judgment, they are not to be censured for having returned such men as would, best champion their peculiar political views, and exert their utmost to promote those measures which will best develop the freedom, prosperity, and happiness of the trading and commercial classes of the United Kingdom. Conscience in matters of election, lies at the bottom of the till, or in a decent amount at the left side of the banker's book.

B. P. D.—It often happens, when a long life interest, under a will, or a long suit in Chancery, delays the payment of a capital sum, given as a legacy, or forming part of the residue, that in the meantime the person who had a vested reversionary interest in the sum in question, and to whom, therefore, if living, it would have been payable, dies before the payment is made; and occasionally it happens that the residuary legatee, or next of kin of this person is also dead, and the legacy, or residue, or share of residue, is payable to his legatees or next of kin. In such cases the property must be considered as passing into and out of the estate of each person who had a vested interest, whether living or dead, and both probate and legacy-duty must be paid on it at each step.

PHANTOM.—The elements upon which we should operate to produce a change in our moral organisation, are circumstances, habits, and modes of thinking and acting. The impulse of all our actions from birth to death—the spring of all our movements—is a conviction that we can alter and improve our condition. We have a consciousness, stronger than reason, that we can control our circumstances. We can change our regimen and habits, and by patience and perseverance even our temperament. Every one can cite innumerable and melancholy instances of those who have done it for evil. The habit of indulging in opium, tobacco, ardent spirits, or any of the pernicious narcotics, soon reduces the physical and mental constitution to that temperament in which those stimulants are felt to be necessary. A corresponding change is produced in the mind and disposition. The frequent and regular use of medicine, though it may have been wholly unnecessary at first, finally becomes an inveterate habit. No phenomenon of physiology is more striking than the facility with which the human constitution commences a conformity to whatever changes of circumstances—as of climate, habit, or aliment we impose upon it. It is a most impressive proof that man is capable of becoming the creature of all climates and conditions.

MORNING.—The etiquette is, when a lady meets a gentleman in public to whom she has been formally introduced, that she should salute first. Unless she does so, the gentleman will consider that she does not desire to be noticed by him.

E. N. C. H.—At the altar, the bride, when required, repeats the language of the ceremony after the officiating minister. The responses she must utter clearly, but with shrinking timidity. The bridesmaids support the bride, carry her handkerchief, gloves, scent-bottle, &c.; at breakfast cut the cake.

W. W.—Make your will, and there will be no dispute after your death. Should you not make your will, your wife would only be entitled to one-third of your personal effects. In such matters, it is safe to employ an attorney.

HOLLY.—The practice of decorating houses and churches with holly, is of great antiquity. It appears to have been first made use of at Christmas by the early Christians at Rome, and was probably adopted because holly was used in the great festival of the Saturnalia, which occurred at that period.

GEO. THOS.—To pot mackerel: Clean, season, and bake them in a pan with plenty of spice, bay-leaves, and butter. When cold, put them into a pot and cover them with butter.

ALPHAT.—According to returns published by the authority of the House of Commons, the number of scholars in 1847 was—Church Schools, 955,865; British and Foreign Schools, 225,000; Wesleyan, 38,623; Congregational, 6839; Roman Catholic, 34,750; Ragged Schools, 20,000; total, 1,281,077. Number of schools—Church of England, 17,015; British and Foreign, 1500; Wesleyan, 397; Congregational, 89; Roman Catholic, 585; Ragged Schools, 270; total, 19,856. The income of these schools in 1847 stood thus: Church of England, £817,081; British and Foreign schools, £161,250; Wesleyan, £27,347; Congregational, £4901; Roman Catholic, £16,000; Ragged schools, £20,000; other schools, £50,000; total, about £1,100,000. The sources of income are as follow: Local endowments, £69,587; local subscriptions, £366,823; local collections, £114,109; school pence, £413,044; other sources, £38,076; private supporters, £54,000.

A PURCHASER.—Under the act for abolishing interments in the metropolis, compensation is to be allowed for brick-built vaults, but not for ordinary graves: which to us seems a gross injustice—for a few bricks cannot alter the character of the title to land that is necessarily freehold of inheritance. There is a short bill on the subject before Parliament. Watch its progress.

NNA.—Jealousy is a sure sign of love. Neither man nor woman can love well, without being jealous. Love feeds on the counter-passion. As fools are necessary for the exaltation of wise men, so is jealousy essential to the maintenance of the strength of the most selfish of passions. Your friend ought to demand a candid explanation.

JUPITER. like his ancient namesake, has wooed too imperiously. He has commanded instead of entreated. Now, as young ladies won't be commanded under any circumstances, it is supreme folly in a man to command a woman to love him. She won't do it—it's against her very nature to do so. Love comes by instinct—it is not seen or understood at first, but it comes the more surely for all that. Our advice is, wait. Your feeling may not be love: after marriage it is too late to make the discovery. Matrimony commits sad havoc in the palace of the imagination.

PATNA CO.—The constitution of the Turkish government is strictly despotic. Not only the executive, but the legislative power resides in the sovereign. His spiritual and temporal authority are indicated in the language of the jurists by the titles of Imam and Sultan. In virtue of his sacerdotal authority he is Emperor of Islamism, Pontiff of Musselmans, and Protector of the Faith. At court, when mention is made of the Sultan, the appellation of "refuge of the world" is usually added to his title of Padishah, or Emperor of Islamism. His highest title, and the most esteemed, because given to him by the Kings of Persia, is Zil-Ullah, Shadow of God; and one of the most remote from our manners, though common among all ranks of his subjects, is punkier, or man-slaver. This is given to him because the law has invested him alone with absolute power over the lives of his subjects. The Turkish casuists allow that he may kill fourteen persons every day without assigning a cause, or without imputation of tyranny. Death by his hand, or by his order, if submitted to without resistance, confers martyrdom.

R. M.—We like the two first verses of "Lines for Music," but not the third.

Go—where the modest violet pours
Its incense o'er the mossy bank,

'Neath sunbeams fair;

Where dew-drops wet the perfum'd flowers,
That both hill and valley frank:

Go, seek me there!

Go, where sweet Philomel enchains
The heart—at twilight's pensive hour—

With music rare;

Weaving, in soul-enchancing strains,
Love's tale, within the roseate bow:

Haste, seek me there!

Whether at cheerful morn, or eve
Frowning, in shadowy cloak awhile,

With aspect drear;

Yet would I never have thee grieve;
Where willows weep, or lilies smile,

E'er seek me there!

C. J. L.—Lambeth Palace has for ages been the residence of the Archbishops of Canterbury. It was built in 1189 by Baldwin, metropolitan in the time of Richard I. In 1292, it was, in a great measure, if not wholly, rebuilt by Boniface. That part which is called the Chantry's Tower, was built in the reign of Henry V., by Henry Chicheley, Archbishop of Canterbury. He was a persecutor of the followers of Wickliffe; and the tower derived its name from a room which it contained, appropriated to the imprisonment of the followers of that reformer, who were called Lollards. This is a small room, twelve feet by nine, planked with elm, in which still remain light rings and staples, to which those unfortunate people were chained.

W. H.—Papier-maché is made of cuttings of white or brown paper, boiled in water, and beaten in a mortar till they are reduced to a kind of paste, and then boiled with a solution of gum arabic, or of size, to give consistency to the paste, which is afterwards formed into different shapes by pressing it into oiled moulds.

JAMES TELFORD.—We must persist in our opinion, that sentiment will not do much towards liberating the African. Besides, sentiment, if properly interpreted, means levying contributions on the rich. Will that emancipate the negro? Not very likely—so that we are entitled to believe that his freedom must come with the growth of a condition that will not require his services as a slave. When labour in the slave states of America becomes so abundant that it will be cheaper to hire than have it on hand as a property, the fetters of the negro will fall off as gradually as did the iron collar from the serfs of England. Our vaunted freedom is not the offspring of acts of parliament, or of benevolence, or even the pure ministrations of the church—but simply of necessity. As men and women became more numerous, as commerce increased, new conditions sprang into existence, and enforced servitude gradually ceased, and finally became extinct without the intervention of any express law, civil or religious, and solely through the force of custom, and the non necessity for its continuance.

X. Y. Z.—The following is considered a very good liquid for thickening the hair: Slice eight ounces of burdock root, and cut four ounces of onions; boil these for half an hour in two quarts of spring-water, and then add half a pint of rum, a pint of sweet oil, and two ounces of pearl-ash, dissolved in an ounce of warm water. The three last ingredients are to be well mixed previous to their addition to the decoction of burdock, &c.

J. H. asks which has done the greatest service to the cause of Truth—Philosophy or Poetry. The former, without doubt—for is not Philosophy "the knowledge of the reasons of things?" And what could we know of things, without a knowledge of the reasons for them? and is not Truth itself a thing to be known? Poetry is merely a garment, which either truth or falsehood may wear. Without Philosophy, we should never have known anything of the nature of Truth beyond what was visible to our senses. Believing in a thing because you either cannot or will not refuse to believe in it, is one thing—but believing in a thing with a knowledge of its uses, original design, and application, is quite another: therefore Truth, as a moral system, cannot be defined without the aid of Philosophy. But Poetry has assisted in the development of Truth, because it has presented facts and principles to us in a fascinating garb. At the same time it must be admitted that Poetry, as a medium, may be false, just as spurious coin and base people are false. It is merely an agent.

L. L., not being comfortable at home, wishes to marry. She is jealous of a brother, whom her parents pet, and allow every indulgence. She is not in a fit frame of mind to think even of marriage. She is tormented by envy and jealousy, two of the worst passions that can agitate and darken the human breast. She must school herself to endure. Meekness in a daughter soon finds its way to a parent's heart. But we must say her case is another instance of the abominable cruelty of showing mortification to one child than to another. Parents have no right to have pets among their children. And as petted children generally grow up to be spoiled young men and women—sometimes either very stupid or very wicked men and women—the practice is a domestic vice and a pest to society.

LETTERS RECEIVED.—W. W. (The Lines to "Eva," are declined).—P. Hanley (We miss the vigour of the previous efforts. You ought to do better).—A Clerk (The Statute of Limitations affects Bills of Exchange).—Roger de Coverley (You must already have perused our remarks on History. Alison is a powerful writer, but we consider him partial).—J. D. (Peruse the Army and Navy Lists given, at the beginning of every month, in the columns of the WEEKLY TIMES).—J. Johnson (Excellent hand-writing).—Harry Hill (Decent prose, but by no means poetry).—E. James (How can you expect that, we should attempt to revise the decision of the public?).—A Lone Widow (Forward your communication).—C. H. E. H. Z. (There is no such institution in existence).—A. Dutton (Send the advertisement to Messrs. Thomas and Co., Advertising Agents, Catherine Street, Strand).—F. W. H. (A question for a solicitor to advise upon).—John Watts (Consult a physician immediately).—Lyro (Using the word "Miss" to a lady is vulgar. "M'am" is the most acceptable).—K. X. (Write to the registrar of the diocese in which the deceased died).—Gustavus (The eldest son of a German Count has no title by courtesy during his father's life-time).—William (The origin of the order of Freemasons is involved in mystery).—A Mechanic (Purchase a "Treatise on Engraving." The information would occupy too much of our space).—E. N. (You cannot anticipate the property; and, being a married woman, cannot make a will).—Eureka ("With a Commonwealth," dated 1648, is valuable except to collectors of old books).—G. A. D. (All the numbers of this Journal, containing "The Will and the Way," are in print, and may be had at the Office, 334, Strand).—G. J. B. (What would you have us to do? We must be guided by our own experience).—J. E. E. (At the end of "Walker's Dictionary," you will find rules for pronouncing Greek and Latin names).—Philomel (Apply at Herald's College. The fees are very trifling).—A. Clifford (Government situations in Australia are in the gift of the local governments. It is the policy of this country to make the colonies as independent as possible).—Hydrophatist (We have as much respect for the science as we have for experiments in general. At present, it is neither true nor false—merely non-established. Consult the "London Directory").—Charles Howard (All in print, and may be had at the Office, 334, Strand, but it would be more convenient for you to obtain them through a new agent in Sheffield).—C. H. J. (You may enter a government educational training school).—A. Brown (The standard height for the service of the East India Company, is as low as five feet five and a-half inches).—Annie (Patience and the tweezers).—Alfred Austin (Declined, with thanks).—L. (The knot cannot be untied. Difference of temper is no ground for a divorce, even if you could afford it).—H. W. (The two sisters take the property between them).—Thomas Freeman (Such books are being constantly advertised in the daily press).—James Watson (A fair specimen of handwriting).—Edward Hind (Under consideration).—William Budwittle (Must employ a solicitor).—J. S. (Not creditable as an effort, by any means).—H. V. D. L. (See the book advertisements in the WEEKLY TIMES).—Ludlow Castle (The pens are manufactured in Birmingham. There is a London House in the city).—Louisa James (The fourth finger of the left hand).—Martha (The American Consul at Liverpool).—Un Ami (Declined).—Roland (Declined).—Thomas B. (The number can be had at the Office, 334, Strand).—A Poor Widow (Wishes to be informed of some particulars relative to Miss Mary Lackington's Gift to Poor Widows).—Agnes (You would have to serve an apprenticeship to the business. A first-rate wood engraver would require a premium of £30, at the least).—A. B. (The order of the "Holy Ghost" is a French one. We do not think the Emperor of the French has retained it. It has a blasphemous sound in it).—George C. (The new landlord coming over you does not alter the character of the tenancy. You must give notice, and leave in the regular way).—C. R. Bayley (Anne Boleyn had the same number of fingers and toes as any other properly formed woman).—Frederick (As one bad sheep infects a whole flock, so one decayed tooth ruins a whole set. Go to a respectable dentist, and have the unsound tooth cleaned and plugged).—W. Hunter—Jacobs H.—Susan—Eames—T. G. H. Norton—Agamemnon—Kate A.—Expectans—James Burton—Ernest—Minimus—J. M. C.—E. J. Brindley—Roger de Coverley—G. K.—Tunbridge Wells—John Schofield—Caer Leon—Gab. L.—Alexis—W. H. S.—D. S. F.—F. R. C. S.—Stanwell—W. Samson—F. Winterton—Pauline—Walter B.—Alpha—William Henry—J. P.—Claudius—H. M.—J. Wakelin—X. Y. Z.—Constance—J. W. S.—Miss M. Rose—Emigrant—J. K.—Jessie—Jane Humphries—The Unknown—E. B. W.—Paul—Adams—Clara—R. W. E.—L. D.—F. G.—Arnold—Blanche—French—Venus—Henrietta—J. S. Cooke—Yvanhoe—Rosa—Leslie—J. H.—Rose H.—Cantab—J. Johnson—Augustus—Carlos—And William—Fred.—Princess of M.—Lizzy—Isabella—Twin Sisters—S. A. B.—W. F. D.—Eugene—Arthur C.—Edith—D. Ganem—W. A.—Reuben—E. G. and J. C.—Henricus—C. H.—Paul Jerrard—C. M.—E. L. Salisbury—G. Smith—W. H. W.—G. S.—N. G. M.—Thomassin—Mary S. W.—J. F. W.—B. B.—Bela—J. R.—Robert Pearce—W. Shea—Carolus—Em. F.—J. Shelton—E. Smith—E. R. B.—Peter Simple—Scotus—H. W. G.

THE LONDON JOURNAL:

And Weekly Record of Literature, Science, and Art.

No. 433.—Vol. XVII.]

FOR THE WEEK ENDING JUNE 11 1853.

[PRICE ONE PENNY.]

[HENRY ASHTON'S RETURN TO THE FARM.]

THE WILL AND THE WAY.

BY THE AUTHOR OF

"THE JESUIT," "THE PRELATE," "MINNIGREY," ETC.

CHAPTER XXVI.

Man in his foolish pride proposes,
But of the future as the past,
God in his wisdom still disposes,
Confounding all his aims at last.

OLD PROVERB.

It was with a loathing, sickening sensation, similar to that with which men regard the bloated toad or slimy reptile, that Henry Ashton continued, from his place of concealment, to watch the warrenner, as he lay at the end of the pier, writhing in maulin drunkenness and mental agony. The idea—for as yet he had no positive proof—that he saw stretched before him the assassin of his friend and benefactor, broke the long lethargy which had hitherto enthralled him, and sent the warm blood rushing to his heart and brain. His shattered nerves resumed their elasticity. He felt as if they were suddenly transformed to steel. More than once he clenched his hands with nervous impatience, till the nails cut deeply into the flesh.

He felt an almost savage joy in contemplating him—for he felt that he was in his power: it was a joy

Like that the savage tigress feels,
When fortune to her sight reveals,
Prostrate before her fury flung,
The robber of her ravished young.

"Monster!" he muttered, "between his firm-set teeth; writhe on! the noble blood thou hast shed is choking thee! thy polluted soul is red—thine eye-balls seared with it as with the hangman's iron! God!" he added, "let not reason desert me, lest, in the desolation of my soul, the madness of my indignation, I wrest from the minister of justice his awful attribute, and rend the carrion limbs of this fell miscreant as the lion rends its prey!"

After a few minutes' pause, during which Will Sidelier raised his head and gazed like a maniac round him, our hero advanced cautiously towards the spot where the murderer lay. Above the howling of the tempest and the roaring of the billows, which dashed their foaming crests against the piles of the pier, he distinctly heard the ruffian pronounce the name of Sir William Mowbray, coupled with broken words, which sounded like a supplication for mercy.

He could endure no more; but, dashing aside his cloak, he sprang forward, and stood before the astonished wretch like an avenging spirit—terrible in its mission—armed with no earthly strength.

"Mercy!" he exclaimed; "monster! the angel's ear is deaf as thine has been: the blood-stifled groans of thy victims have filled it! The gibbet waits thee—the curses of the yelling crowd—the execrations of the poor and fatherless, made doubly orphans by thy crime—the cord—the felon's grave!"

The warrenner started to his feet, and, by the light of the beacon, which fell upon the spot where they were standing, he recognised the pale but well-known features of the speaker. He was bewildered—forgot for the moment that he was in France, and imagined himself at Carrow.

"Henry Ashton?" he faltered.

"Ay! Henry Ashton," repeated the youth, "and Will Sidelier, the murderer!"

"It's a lie!" roared the ruffian, furiously; "who dares to say so? there is no proof—and even if there were, you cannot touch me here! I am right!" he added, looking round; "I remember it all now: I am in France—free from prison—safe from the hangman's clutch: I felt it once—but he is dead—dead—dead! they cannot hang me now! ha—ha! prate of justice—I defy it and heaven!"

The wild, savage laugh of the warrenner rose above the dashing of the waters and the whistling winds, like the shrill cry of the night-bird.

As if to answer the defiance so impiously hurled towards heaven, the dark clouds above the sea were rent by a terrific peal of thunder, and a broad sheet of lightning illumined for an instant the snow-crested billows, as they broke over the pier.

"Fool!" said the young man, "to brave its might at the very moment its hand is outstretched against thee! Dost think our meeting at such an hour, and in such a spot, the effect of a blind accident? No; by the simplest means Omnipotence still works its will—the punishment thou hast merited has at last overtaken thee!"

"Has it?" said Will Sidelier, with a sneer; for remorse and a sense of danger had partly sobered him. "Perhaps you will tell me by what right you interfere?"

"The right of nature," answered Henry, "which arms every honest hand against the murderer! Fly where he will, the earth trembles at his footsteps—even the grave rejects him! Thou art doomed, Will Sidelier—I tell thee thou art doomed! Thy limbs shall feed the ravens, and thy kite and pie shall perch on thy fleshless skull—thy bleaching bones shall swing from the gibbet's height, a sickening spectacle to earth and heaven! Felon—I arrest thee!"

"Boy!" exclaimed the ruffian, perfectly roused at last to a sense of his situation, and at the same time attempting to pass him; "the tree is not planted yet, from which to make the gallows upon which I shall hang!"

"You pass not!" said our hero.

"We shall see!"

With these words, the warrenner sprang upon Henry Ashton, and grasped him in his sinewy, strong embrace. The youth shuddered for an instant with loathing and disgust, as he came in contact with the assassin, who mistook the tremor in his adversary's frame for terror. He was quickly undeceived.

"Boaster!" he muttered; "you tremble!"

"It is with hate, then!"

These were the only words uttered on either side during the long and deadly struggle which ensued. Although between fifty and sixty years of age, Will Sidelier was a fellow of uncommon strength, to which terror gave additional energy. He had several times disengaged the grasp which the lover of Ellen had laid upon his collar—but failed to succeed. Although young, it was of iron.

There was something fearful in the contest of the two men on such a lonely spot—the waves hissing as they roared round them—neither uttering a word. Finding that he could not release himself by fair means, the escapee suddenly released his hold of our hero, and drew his long clasp-knife from his pocket, then opened it with his teeth. A gleam of ferocious joy shot from his eyes as he raised his arm to strike; but Henry had seen the action, and caught with his disengaged hand the descending blade which slightly wounded him in the palm—still he only smiled. He felt that it was impossible that, in a contest with a wretch whom he believed to be the murderer of his benefactor, he could succumb—and the force of his conviction sustained him. With a violent effort, he wrenched the weapon from the grasp of the warrenner, and cast it into the sea.

Sidelier, who in his youth had been an expert wrestler, tried by every ruse to throw him—back fall and cross were alike unsuccessful. The breath of the ruffian last became thick and heavy—it was evident that his strength was exhausting itself; whilst Henry Ashton's appeared to increase with each fresh effort.

Satisfied that he could not escape—the next thought of the murderer was of revenge. He determined if possible to escape the gibbet by a voluntary death. Claspings his antagonist with both arms round the body, he raised him from the ground, and succeeded in carrying him to the end of the pier, which fortunately was guarded by a stout oaken railing. Twice did he attempt to lift him over, and plunge with him into the foaming surge beneath. The last time he reeled and staggered like a drunken man—then fell with our hero upon the spray-washed planks.

The combatants paused, as if by mutual agreement, to draw breath—but without relaxing their hold. After a few seconds the contest was renewed, and their limbs became entwined like knotted serpents, in the embrace of hate. The veins and arteries of their necks and temples rose like cords, so violent were their struggles; whilst thick drops of sweat and blood chased each other down their cheeks.

At the time the scene we have endeavoured to describe was being enacted, a party of English sailors, belonging to the government packet, were seated in the little parlour of the Dover Castle—a public-house kept by an Englishman, close to the Calais gate—so well known by Hogarth's inimitable picture. The men were waiting for the tide to serve. The house is well known as the rendezvous of a class of English residents who find it more convenient to live abroad than at home—a set of sharks, who live by preying upon their countrymen—pleading their nationality as an excuse for borrowing or begging, as mendicants do their sores.

The valet of Meeran Hafaz, who had promised his master not to lose sight of the warrenier till he had conducted him safely to Marseilles, and seen him safely on board the vessel which was to convey him to India, alarmed at the absence of his charge, had sought him in every café in the town. As a last hope, accompanied by a laquais de place, he made his way to the Dover Castle.

"Who is the land-lubber asking for?" demanded a bluff old sailor, who overheard the valet's inquiries of the landlord.

The man explained to him that he sought a rough, country-looking person, who had, he feared, lost his way in the town.

"No fear of his being lost in Calcy!" observed another of the crew! "the jenny d'armes picks up everybody and everything! Ax the boatswain if they doesn't—he knows the inside of the fiddle!"

"The fiddle?" repeated the perplexed valet.

"Monsieur mean de violin," said the laquais de place; "vat you call in Angleterre de Nougat!"

"The what?"

"De prison! It shall be all de same; but de shentleman is not dere. We speak if he vas of de concierge municif."

"What's the French frog parlevoocoo about?" said the bluff son of Neptune who had first spoken. "I can tell the landsman where his messmate is!"

"Where?" eagerly demanded the servant.

"First let's bear a reckoning, and see what his figure-head is like," answered the sailor, "and take a squint at his rigging!"

"What does he mean?" inquired the valet, turning with a hopeless look to the landlord of the house—who, having been a sailor himself, perfectly understood his brother tar's phraseology.

"Describe him?" replied the host.

"Ay, how is he rigged?"

"Rigged?" replied the inquirer.

"He means dressed!" observed his interpreter.

"Lateen or square-rigged?" said the sailor, puffing the smoke in hasty whiffs from his pipe—a sure sign he was getting impatient. "Has he the cut of a pirate or a land-shark?"

"A seaman or a landsman?" whispered the landlord of the Dover Castle.

"Oh, of a landsman, certainly!" answered the valet.

"And a figure-head like a shipwrecked parson's," inquired the purser, "or one of the king's hard bargains: fellows who go to sea to avoid the gallows at home?"

The servant could not but confess that the description might answer for that of his friend.

"Well," replied the tar, after a few more whiffs, "you will find this precious friend of yours spinning a yarn to the fishes. I passed him upon the pier as I crowded sail to the Dover Castle; the lubber was tossing his fins about, and talking like the play-actor Poll and I once saw at Portsmouth. He'd make a rum messmate!" he added; "I shouldn't much care to sail in the same ship with him!"

"Why not?"

"Because I neither like his build nor his figure-head," said the old tar; "I've seen many a better-looking fellow swinging at the yard-arm!"

Although Mr. Narcissus—the name of the valet—was extremely anxious to discover the lost companion of his journey, he was far too prudent a person to trust himself without additional precautions, on such a night as the present, on the pier. He dispatched the laquais de place in his stead, and returned at once to his hotel, where he solaced himself as he best could, under the circumstances, with a bottle of genuine Lafitte, and a flirtation with the landlady.

He had not left the Dover Castle many minutes, before Lieutenant Suckling entered the little parlour. The sailors started to their feet in an instant: they knew, from the visit of their commander, that something—as the bluff old tar who had replied to the inquirers observed—"was up."

"Follow me, my men!" said the officer.

It needed no second command, for the speaker was exceedingly liked by his crew. In their way to the pier-head, he explained to them that his object was to get the warrenier on board the packet as secretly and speedily as possible; for at that time no treaty of extradition existed between the two countries. Gold, he knew, would achieve anything with the French police; and, in a point of so much moment, Meeran Hafaz was not the man to spare it.

Four of the men were sent on board the vessel, which was lying close to the side of the inner basin, with orders to take one of the boats and row round to the mouth of the harbour. The rest accompanied their officer, to seek the assassin and Henry.

"Five guineas, my men," said the lieutenant, after he had given his instructions, "and a night on shore at Dover, if you succeed!"

"Ay—ay!" replied old Tom, the boatswain. "I'm an old press-hand, and helped to man Duncan's fleet in Yarmouth Roads. We'll have the land-lubber under hatches in less time than the Polly takes to make three knots—and your honour knows what a clipper she is!"

As they approached the end of the creaking pier, whose rough, weather-worn planks groaned and trembled in the storm, like a living thing with the ague, Suckling looked anxiously round in order to discover Henry and the warrenier; the waves were beating over the jetty with undiminished fury. He saw no one near.

"What can have happened?" he exclaimed. "Has the rascal escaped?"

Then the recollection that Henry Ashton, from his determined character, would never have quitted the man whom he believed to be the murderer of his benefactor with life, suddenly crossed him, and, clasping his hands, he murmured, with a deep sigh:

"The villain must have murdered him!"

"Murdered him!" exclaimed the old tar; "I only wish he may—that's all! we'll show the Mounseers a specimen of British justice, and, if your honour only gives the word, bring the rascal to a drum-head court-martial, and hang him up at the yard-arm!"

"Belay there!" cried one of his messmates; "doesn't your honour see, just under the bow of the pier, summat very like a land-shark?"

Suckling darted through the foam and spray, which at regular intervals dashed over the jetty; and, close to the rail—where the receding waves had washed them—lay the bodies of Henry and the warrenier: both were insensible. The hand of our hero was firmly twisted in the long, grey hair of the assassin, his dress torn and stained with blood, from the fury of the encounter.

The lieutenant and his men instantly raised and separated them.

"God!" exclaimed the officer, who was supporting the form of his friend; "he is dead! I am too late—too late!"

The boatswain, who had been chafing the hands and chest of our hero, fancied that he felt his heart beat.

"All right, captain! the gentleman's cable is not run out yet! Once on board the Polly, a snug hammock and plenty of warm grog will soon set him to rights, I warrant me!"

At this time they heard the voices of the sailors: despite the tempest and the force of the returning tide, the gallant fellows had rowed round to the pier-head.

The difficulty was, how to get Henry Ashton and their prisoner—who also began to show signs of returning life—on board.

Sailors are never at a loss—they are as ready at a shift as a politician. A sail, which fortunately was lying at the bottom of the boat, was hastily rolled into the form of a hammock, and drawn up by the men upon the pier. The still breathing form of the lover of poor Ellen was first lowered, then that of the warrenier. Lieutenant Suckling and his men descended by a rope, which they drew into the boat after them.

"Give way," said the officer, "with all speed, to the Polly!"

The men replied with a cheerful "ay ay, sir!" and the boat shot from the pier-head into the mouth of the harbour.

As the last man disappeared down the side of the jetty, a person who had been silently watching their proceedings, stepped from the obscurity in which he had concealed himself, into the broad light cast by the beacon.

It was the laquais de place.

"Mine Got!" he exclaimed; "de English sailor dog have catch him!"

CHAPTER XXVII.

Over the sea the bark we guide,
And gaily stem its foaming crest;
The sailor woos his ocean bride,
And sinks 'mid waves and storms to rest,
Whilst the seaway screams his lullaby!

SONGS OF THE OCEAN.

DAYLIGHT was just beginning to dawn, when the mailbags were brought on board the packet. Dr. Orme was already there; for, despite the fatigue he had undergone, Lieutenant Suckling no sooner saw his friend comfortably disposed of in his own berth, than he hastened to Dessin's Hotel, to inform the worthy rector of what had taken place, and escort him to the Lively Polly.

Although the storm had subsided, there was still considerable doubt whether the vessel would be able to quit the harbour, at the mouth of which the waves were running mountains high.

It was not without a feeling of secret envy—which most of our readers will consider very pardonable in such a case—that the rector received the assurance of the lieutenant, that his taking the sofa in his cabin—his berth was already occupied by Henry—would not in the slightest degree incommode him.

"I shall walk on deck," he said, "for an hour or two, to get an appetite for breakfast."

"Walk!" repeated the old gentleman, whose ruddy complexion began to assume a decided bilious tint; "how can you talk of walking or eating in such a dreadful place? crossing over was bad enough, but returning will be ten times worse!"

The young sailor replied only by a good-humoured smile: the sea was his home—he felt as much at ease on board his well-rigged little craft, as the speaker did in his pulpit at Carrow.

As he was about to quit the cabin, some one rapped at the door.

"Come in!" said the lieutenant.

A midshipman made his appearance, to inform his commander that a boat had pulled alongside, with a message from the captain of the port, who wished to see the officer in command of the packet on shore.

"Does he?" said Suckling; "send word back that, if the captain of the port wishes to see me, he must come on board! Does he think I am mad, to quit my vessel at such a time? He is no sailor," thought the speaker, "and will not venture to dim the lace of his uniform by donning it such a morning!"

As a matter of precaution, however, he gave directions to raise anchor—determined to put to sea at all hazards.

Lieutenant Suckling was busily engaged on deck, in seeing his orders properly executed, when the barge of the functionary rowed alongside the Polly, which was slowly making head to the mouth of the harbour: a middy hailed them, and inquired what they wanted.

"To speak with your commander," replied the port-captain, an unhappy-looking little man, who, wrapped in an immense cloak, sat shivering in the stern of the barge.

The ladder was let down, and the Frenchman mounted with the agility of a cat.

"Who are you, sir?" demanded the young officer, of a scowling-looking personage, who was following up the ladder.

"Le commissaire de police de Calais!"

"Then, Mr. Commissary of Police," said the young man, "you do not set a foot on the deck of the Polly! I allow no interference with my command here!"

The functionary—who had been bribed by the valet—would have remonstrated, but the lieutenant ended the dispute by ordering two men to the gangway, with orders to cut down the first person from the barge who tried to set a foot upon the deck of his vessel without his permission.

With a "sacré Dieu!" and something which sounded very much like "Inglis dog!" the disappointed commissaire slunk back into the barge.

"May I inquire to what happy circumstance," continued the speaker, "I am indebted for the honour of this visit on board his Britannic Majesty's ship, the Polly?"

The captain of the port answered, that information had been laid that an Englishman had been entrapped on board, without any communication having been previously made to the authorities; and that he could not permit the packet to sail till the affair had been properly investigated.

"And pray, sir," inquired Suckling, in a mocking tone, "have you considered how you will prevent it?"

The functionary observed that he was captain of the port.

"And I," said the young officer, "am commander of this vessel!"

"You must pass the batteries!" exclaimed the little Frenchman.

"We will do so," replied the lieutenant; "and, if you will bear me company, you shall see how gallantly, with St. George's ensign flying at the fore! I doubt not but reflection will induce you to pause before you venture to insult it!"

The captain of the port appeared embarrassed.

"I must do my duty," he said.

"And I mine," observed Suckling, giving his orders to the men at the same time with the greatest coolness, to call all hands upon deck, and shot the guns. "Pray, Monsieur le Capitaine," he added, a thought striking him, "by how many persons did you say the information on which you are acting has been laid?"

"By one," was the reply.

"I thought that the law of France required two?" observed the commander; "rely upon it that your dissiminy in this affair will do you no service with your government—they have embarrassments enough already: it is a matter for the big-wigs, not sailors, to settle!"

During the above interview, the vessel had continued to move slowly towards the bar at the end of the pier.

For a few moments the captain of the port reflected. He had done quite enough, he thought, to prove his zeal; added to which, his breakfast was ready on shore, and the motion of the Polly was becoming anything but agreeable to his feelings. Another consideration was, he had no longer the commissary of police to back him; and, to speak the truth, the little man did not possess the most exalted courage; but then, to make amends, his politics were unquestionable—his sister had married the first cousin of the valet de chambre of the Count d'Artois.

Such an alliance, under the elder Bourbons, would have made any man's fortune; in Louis Philippe's time an alliance with the blanchisseuse of the Rothschilds might have been better.

"This well, sir!" he said, trying to assume a look of offended dignity, the effect of which a sensation of sea-sickness unfortunately destroyed; "I shall take my leave, and report your extraordinary conduct to the minister!"

Suckling's first idea was to let him go—but he remembered his threat of the batteries, and determined to keep him on board, to prevent mischief. The consternation of the dapper little Frenchman became pitiable when he heard it: he felt assured that his stomach would never endure the tossing at the bar; then the idea of disgracing La Grande Nation by yielding to sea-sickness in the presence of the insolent English sailors, who never appear to have any stomachs to turn—it was horrible to contemplate.

"My duty demands my presence on shore," he said.

"Sorry I can't oblige you!" replied his tormentor; "we shall only just escape the turn of the tide as it is; besides, to a sailor like yourself, this land-breeze will only give an additional appetite!"

By this time they approached the bar at the mouth of the harbour, where the swell to a landsman was really terrific: the Polly danced merrily upon the billows, and ducked and dived like a petrel in a storm; even the old boatswain confessed that he had never seen a craft behave better. The presence of the port-captain put the crew of the little vessel upon their mettle; the orders of their officers were executed with a precision which the greatest martinet in the navy could scarcely have found fault with; but their seamanship was entirely thrown away upon the Frenchman.

At the last heave of the Polly, in crossing the bar, he heaved with it—nature could endure no more.

"This comes of feeding upon frogs!" observed a sailor to one of his messmates; "beef and biscuit will stand anything—no danger of preaching to the fishes upon that!"

Once clear of the bar, the barge, which had followed close in the wake of the Polly, was permitted to come alongside to receive the captain of the port, who—more dead than alive, his brilliant uniform considerably shorn of its lustre, his white plume dragged and soiled from the spray, till it resembled the long feathers in the tail of a fowl in wet weather—carefully descended.

"Mon Dieu!" he muttered, as he sank, shivering into his cushioned seat in the barge; "catch me going to sea again!"

The commissary, whose countenance was, if possible, of a yet more pallid hue than his own, looked as if he was of the same opinion; but the unfortunate wretch was too ill to speak.

About two o'clock the same day, the Polly arrived safely at Dover.

The impatience of our hero to pursue his journey would not admit of delay. Fatigue seemed to have no power over him; he had recovered from the effects of his contest with the warrener, as if by the mere exertion of his indomitable will.

As fast as four post-horses could convey them, the carriages of Dr. Orme and his adopted son rolled along the road to London. In the first were the rector and Henry; the second, the blinds of which were down, contained the prisoner. Two servants, upon whose fidelity they could depend, rode with him to guard him.

For the present they were undecided whether to place him at once in the hands of justice or not. A letter, which they found on their arrival in town, from Elworthy, decided them upon taking the assassin with them to Carrow.

The lawyer informed them that, in consequence of some intelligence he had received, he had started the day before for Norfolk, whither he advised our hero to follow. He had written the letter in the vague hope that one or other of them might return in his absence. It concluded by adding that they would find him at the rectory.

"Not a word, my dear boy!" said the rector, in reply to Henry Ashton's entreaty that he would spare himself the fatigue of pursuing his journey. "Since I left that wretched packet—where, par parenthèse, I must confess that Suckling conducted himself admirably towards us—I feel quite strong again; but, strong or weak, ill or well, I have found you at last, and do not intend to part with you!"

The youth replied to so much affection by a grateful pressure of the hand: his heart was too full for words. He was one of those natures kindness could melt, injustice or oppression only harden.

"What are we to do with our prisoner when we arrive?" he demanded, after a pause. "Send him to Norwich Castle?"

"Perhaps," replied the rector; "but for one night I can find a prison for him as sure."

"Where?"

"In the old tower of Carrow Church," answered Dr. Orme. "It will not be the first time it has been used for such a purpose. The two Kitts, during their rebellion, used it to detain the citizens in till they paid ransom. His ransom, I fear, will only be paid by life!"

Although the two servants placed in the carriage to guard him, refused to answer Will Sidelers a single question, the wretched man seemed to know instinctively whither he was being conveyed; and, strange to say, although he had partially recovered his strength, he made no attempt to escape. Perhaps he felt that, in his meeting with Henry Ashton, the hand of heaven had been visibly outstretched against him, and that it was hopeless to contend.

More than once during the journey he fell asleep, but his countenance became so convulsed, the expression of his features so horrible, that the domestics could not endure to look upon him: for their own sakes they awoke him.

The murderer had been dreaming.

"Thank you!" he said, in a humble tone, as the coachman of Dr. Orme shook him violently by the collar. "I don't want to sleep—it unnerves me!"

His two companions looked as if his appearance and groans whilst he slept had unnerved them.

"Ah, James!" he said, recognising the man—who, like himself, was a native of Carrow—"this is a bad business! What do the people say about me at home?"

This was intended merely as a feeler: he wished to know if public rumour had as yet connected his name with the murder of Sir William Mowbray; but the sturdy coachman, unlike most servants, cared little about chatting, and remained obstinately silent.

"Won't 'ee speak?" roared the warrener, beginning to feel excited.

Still not a word.

"Curse thee!" he said; "where beest thee taking me to?"

"To the gallows!" replied the man, impatiently; "don't rave so—thou wilt arrive there soon enough!"

With a deep groan of mental anguish, the unhappy wretch sank back upon the seat of the carriage.

He asked no more questions of his companions.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

Since fortune cannot recompense me better
Than to die well, and not my master's debtor.

SHAKESPEARE.

LAWYER Elworthy, Joe Beans, the Khan, and Susan, were all assembled in the library of the rectory; Mrs. Jarmy, the late housekeeper at Carrow, was also present: the good old lady declared it to be her firm conviction that Martin, could he be consulted upon the operation which was to restore him to the use of reason, would not weigh the risk to his life a single instant against the faintest chance of success.

"I would not," she added; "to avenge my dear master's murder, and drag the villain to justice who committed it, I could sacrifice it freely!"

"If he survives it but one hour," observed the Khan, "it will be sufficient for the purposes of justice; for, during that hour he will be in the full possession of his reason."

"Would to heaven Master Harry or the rector were here!" observed Joe, who had a great horror of subjecting poor old Martin to an operation, the result of which was doubtful in his mind; for he had more faith in the zeal than the skill of the renegade; indeed, a greater degree of responsibility rested upon him than any other person, except the Khan; for, without his assistance or that of Chettleborough—who would have nothing to do with it, partly from fear, and partly from the affection which he began to feel for his harmless charge—it would be impossible to induce the idiot to consent to it. Their voices he still remembered; they were the only persons, since the day when his old enemy the warrener attempted to remove the cap with the plate which guarded his shattered skull in the churchyard, whom he permitted to enter it.

True, it was possible to force him to submit; for, once in the groove which the renegade had invented, resistance would be impossible; the danger was, that the anger and agitation of the patient might cause a determination of blood to the head, bring on fever or apoplexy, and so defeat their aim.

"You must decide quickly," said the Khan, "or Miss De Vere will be lost to her lover for ever!"

"And I swore to protect her—to guard her—in the absence of Master Harry!" muttered Joe.

Susan whispered in his ear, "that he had done his best to keep his promise."

"But I have not kept it!" replied the honest rustic, in a tone of self-reproach. "God forgive me!" he added; "I shall never forgive myself if anything happens to the old man; but since there is no other way, it must 'e'en be so. I will assist you."

"At once!"

"At once."

"And your mind is fully made up?"

"Fully!" replied the humble friend of our hero. "I have no great wit—and what I have, I sometimes fear I don't exactly make the best use of! God forgive you if you deceive me!"

"And what should I gain?" demanded the renegade.

"I know, I know," muttered Joe, "I am unreasonable; but you must acknowledge that I am in a sad strait! Is there any other way to save her?"

"There is not," said the Khan.

"I have often thought," said the young man, "that you knew more than you choose to tell about Sir William's death!"

All eyes were turned upon the mysterious man, who appeared, however, to pay but little attention to their scrutiny.

"I know nothing!" he said, slowly; "but I suspect much! Unfortunately, my suspicions are not evidence—and if they were, I could not give them."

"Why not?"

He remained silent.

Fortunately, they were spared further discussion by the sudden appearance of two carriages, drawn by post-horses, dashing up the avenue.

"The rector!" exclaimed Mr. Elworthy.

"Master Harry!" said Joe, with a shout of joy—for he had recognised the pale features of his friend, even at that distance; and, forgetful of everything but the happiness of once more beholding him, he rushed to the porch, to welcome the long-absent wanderer back.

A faint smile—the first which for weeks had been seen upon the pale countenance of Henry Ashton—appeared there, as he returned the honest grasp of Joe Beans.

"I must cry!" said the poor fellow, vainly attempting to hide the tears which coursed each other rapidly down his cheeks. "If I don't, my heart will burst! Oh! Harry—Master Harry—where has 'ee been all this time? and I writing day after day, without once getting a line in return, to say that you were alive! Not that I thought 'ee had forgotten me—I knew 'ee too well for that!"

"I never received one of them!" replied our hero; "the most shameless villany has been at work to intercept them! Mine to you, I doubt not, have equally miscarried!"

"This is no place," observed Mr. Elworthy—who was as methodical in his ideas as conduct—"for explanations—we have much to tell, and doubtless much to hear. But whom have you here?" he added, pointing to the second carriage.

"An old acquaintance of yours, if I mistake not," said the rector; "when once you have seen him, I feel assured there will be no need to recommend him to your care!"

The vehicle stopped, and the door was opened. First James the coachman alighted, and then Will Sidelers and the second domestic: a half-subdued yell of horror and disgust saluted the ruffian as he descended.

"In the name of heaven," said the lawyer—who, not having looked at the papers for several days, was ignorant of the warrener's escape from Newgate—"how came that wretch at liberty?"

A few words briefly explained all that he had to learn respecting his escape, and capture in France. He instantly suggested the propriety of his being sent at once to the county goal.

"No," said the Khan; "since accident hath sent him here, let him remain. When poor old Martin is restored to reason—as in a few hours he will be—he may wish to have a few words with the warrener!"

Up to the present moment Will Sidelers had shown a bold, determined front towards his enemies; but at the sound of the renegade's voice, his countenance fell. He felt that the hour of retribution was near.

To the great indignation of the butler, the assassin for the present was ordered to be confined in the cellar, with no less than three men to guard him, and the strong oak door doubly locked upon him.

After having seen him properly secured, and ascertained that escape was impossible, the party re-adjourned to the library.

Poor Dr. Orme! it is impossible to describe the sigh of satisfaction with which he sank into his easy chair. He felt as if every joint in his frame had been dislocated; yet he did not complain—for the son of his adoption was beside him.

It is extraordinary what even weak and indolent natures will endure, where their affections are concerned.

Several hours passed in questions, explanations, and replies, before Henry Ashton and his friends mutually understood the nature of the events which had occurred during their separation.

"Poor Mr. Walter!" said Joe Beans, with a sigh, as his young master concluded the history of his assassination. "He was a true friend, and a noble gentleman—pity he had not a better father!"

"I do not think," said our hero, "that Colonel Mowbray was his father."

"Who, then?" demanded the Khan, with surprise.

"My late benefactor, Sir William Mowbray," replied the young man; "despite the opinion of my venerable friend," he added, turning to the rector, "the more I reflect upon the subject, the more I am convinced."

Before separating for the night, it was arranged that Colonel Butler, the magistrate who had so warmly interested himself on the occasion of Sir William Mowbray's death, should be sent for; also two eminent surgeons from Norwich, of the names of Martineau and Dalrymple.

Despite the remonstrance of the rector, Henry insisted upon starting instantly for the farm.

"My dear boy," said the old man, "after all you have endured, think of—"

"And what have my kind uncle and his dame not suffered?" said the young man, interrupting him; "I can measure their distress by my own! I must go—it is my duty!"

"You are right!" replied the rector, with an approving smile; "I never thought of their feelings; like most men, I only consulted my own! Good night! and heaven bless you! Somehow that boy is always right!" he mentally added, as his adopted son, accompanied by Joe, set out to walk towards the farm—for he had declined the carriage: he felt as if the bracing air of the common would do him good—would still the fever of his blood and the anxious beating of his heart. True, he had returned to his native land, after so many trials, in safety; but the murder of Sir William was still to be avenged, and Ellen rescued from the hands of her persecutors: as yet he possessed no clue to the place of her confinement.

His companion, in the exuberance of his joy at once more seeing his young master—as he loved to call him—scarcely found time to whisper a word of adieu to Susan: he longed to be with Henry alone, to pour forth his feelings—to justify his faithfulness to his charge.

"Master Harry," he said, as they entered the long, shady lane which led to the farm, "when you left for further parts—I have lost all desire to see them now—I promised you that I would watch over Miss Ellen?"

"You did, Joe?"

"Don't 'ee blame me," added the honest fellow, "if I haven't done all that I promised: it was not the fault of my heart—that was right enough—but of my head; I ought to ha' shot 'em!"

"Shot who?"

Joe explained that he alluded to Meeran Hafaz.

"And I would ha' done it," he said, "if I had only been assured that you'd ha' thought I had acted rightly! Pity I didn't: thee wouldst have been happy now—and I—no matter where I should ha' been!"

"Not for worlds!" exclaimed our hero. "he is reserved for me! By heavens, I should hate the man who stepped between me and my revenge! Joe," he continued, shaking him warmly by the hand, "you were my first friend; heaven gave me the second one—as true, as devoted as yourself: he is gone! I shall never seek another!"

"Thee dost not blame me, then, Master Harry?"

"Blame you!" repeated Henry; "God bless you, Joe, for your fidelity and friendship to me! I shall never be able to repay you!"

The honest fellow was repaid in those few kind words from the speaker; a weight was removed from his heart: his friend had done him justice.

Silently they made their way towards the farm.

Farmer Ashton and his dame were seated in their little parlour, talking, as usual, of the absent one, the recollection of whom mingled in their daily occupations, and whose return was the theme of their constant prayer. The mind of the old man had been pondering over the communication which Chettleborough had made respecting the visit of Martin to the abbey. At times he was inclined to think his informant had been misled by the poor harmless maniac's ravings. More than once he wished he had consulted Joe Beans upon the subject; but he had only seen Joe once since his return to Carrow—for, as our readers are aware, he had left his service for that of the rector.

"Has Joe been to-day?" he inquired, addressing his dame, who sat listlessly by the chimney-nook.

"No; what does 'ee want wi' un?"

"Nothing—that is, nothing particular!" replied the farmer, relapsing into his former moodiness.

The curiosity of the old lady was roused.

"I tell 'ee what it is, Matthew," she began, "I have been a good wife to thee—worked hard and late?"

"True," said her husband, looking up.

"Our butter," continued the dame, "has been the crack of the market; and as for poultry—you know what that has brought!"

"What does 'ee mean?" demanded the bewildered Matthew.

"Why I mean that thee has a secret from thee wife—that's what I mean! Ever since old Chettleborough called thee out into the garden, there has been a weight upon thee mind! Tell it, Matthew—tell it: if it be anything touching our poor Harry," she added, bursting into tears, "the Lord will give me strength to bear it!"

Farmer Ashton took the hand of his wife, and was about to reply to her, when the door of the room opened, and Joe Beans, his countenance flushed and radiant with smiles, entered the room.

"Ah, Joe!" said the old man, "I wor just wishing to see thee!"

"Likely—likely!" replied the young man; "and I wor wishing to see thee and dame! I guess I be the pleasantest visitor thee hast seen for many a long day!"

"What dost mean, lad? has 'ee been drinking?"

"No!"

"What, then?"

"I—I be almost afraid to tell 'ee!"

What is there in the world so quick as the instinct of woman's love? Dame Ashton at once divined that he had some intelligence to communicate respecting her nephew.

"Thee hast had a letter, Joe?"

"No, no, missus!"

"No!" she repeated, in a tone of disappointment; "I thought thee had—I am sure I thought thee had!"

At that moment there was a slight noise in the outer room, and Bird's-eye, a favourite old dog of the farmer's—half setter and half lurcher—set up a joyous bark. The farmer and his dame both remembered that the faithful animal used to welcome the return of their nephew with just such another. Both of them turned very pale.

"Dame!"

"Farmer!"

These were the only words they could utter. Each cast an imploring look upon Joe Beans, as if to entreat him to relieve a suspense which, from its intensity, was worse even than disappointment.

"Cheer up!" said the young man; "there be news of Master Harry—only I wor afraid to tell it you too soon."

"He has returned!" exclaimed the dame, her attention once more excited by the barking of the dog. "I am sure he has! Listen how the old thing whines with joy! Harry! Harry!"

At the sound of the voice of one who had been like a mother to him, our hero, unable longer to restrain his feelings, rushed into the little parlour; and, whilst he extended a hand to his uncle, clasped the dame in an affectionate embrace.

"God bless 'ee, Harry!" sobbed the old man; "thee beest welcome back!"

"Welcome!" repeated the dame; "ay, that he is—as sight to the blind, as health to the sick! Where should he be welcome, if not here? Thee wilt not leave us again, Harry?" she added, gazing upon him with pride and affection; "home be home, thof it be humble; though farmer and I have scarcely found it home without thee!"

"I have had enough of foreign travel," said the young man, with a sigh; "I shall never willingly quit England again, I assure you!"

A loud "Thank God for that!" from the farmer, denoted how heartfelt was the satisfaction the promise afforded him.

"Thee beest pale, thin, and worn, Harry! Do tell us what has happened? Is there anything money can do to make 'ee happy? Matthew and I are old, and require but little: do we, farmer?"

Her husband made no answer: he knew, better than his wife, that the unhappiness of his nephew was occasioned by a cause which no wealth could remove.

The excitement of the meeting over, the energy which had hitherto supported the wanderer through all his trials, began to yield to the cravings of nature for repose. Even the loquacious dame, alarmed by the pallor of his cheek, insisted upon his retiring to rest. A few moments saw him asleep once more upon the clean but rustic bed which he had so often pressed in infancy.

The old dog just mentioned would accompany her young master to the door of his chamber, where she obstinately remained, despite the repeated attempts of Joe Beans and the farmer to call her away: the faithful brute only wagged her tail and uttered a low whine.

Henry Ashton had a singular dream that night: he dreamed that Ellen and himself were both seated in the old Gothic library at Carrow Abbey, when Sir William Mowbray appeared to them, with a countenance radiant with joy—such as it must have been in youth, ere the energies of his soul were bowed by sorrow, or the sense of unmerited shame corroded the life-stream of his being. He thought that the recluses blessed both him and Ellen in his dream, and vanished from their sight: so deep was the impression which it made upon his mind, that even the fatigue and deep slumber into which he had fallen did not obliterate it from his memory—he awoke with it fresh upon his recollection.

The sun was streaming brightly into the room, as, remembering the many important objects he had in view, he started from his bed. The old household clock struck eight as he descended.

When Farmer Ashton heard of the intended operation upon poor old Martin, he expressed a determination to accompany his nephew to the rectory. The information he had received might be of use or not: he determined, therefore, to act according to the opinion he might form of the state of the groom's mind. He saw that Henry's health, although his resolution enabled him to bear gallantly up, was severely shaken, and he feared to agitate or unsettle him unnecessarily.

Joe Beans was invited to share the plenteous breakfast in the little parlour. Neither the dame nor her husband would hear of so true a friend as he had proved himself to our hero, resuming his old seat in the kitchen—nor would Henry have permitted it.

"What does 'ee think of this man," demanded the farmer, "who has promised to restore Martin to his senses?"

"I know but little of him," replied his nephew; "but that little is in his favour. I have reason to think he would serve me."

Joe Beans corroborated the opinion of his young master. He related the conduct of the Khan on the night of Sir William's funeral.

"Do not think," said the farmer, after a pause, "that I am prompted by a vain curiosity! But I confess I am most anxious to see this man."

Old Chettleborough had told him something which had set him thinking. It was finally settled that they should all three ride over to the rectory together.

It was amusing to see the zeal with which the farmer's men saddled the horses for the party. Two of them all but quarrelled who should perform that office for the favourite pony of their young master. Whilst they were disputing the point, Joe Beans quietly stepped into the stable, and saddled it himself.

"Ah!" ejaculated the elder of the two; "Joe Beans again—nothing but Joe! He hold his head up so high since he has been to Lunnon, there be no coming near him!"

"Thee beest a cross-grained toad!" said his companion, who was equally vexed, but more just than himself. "Joe be a good lad, ready to do a kind turn to any one!"

And so he was.

(To be continued in our next.)

THE PEASANTRY OF ENGLAND.

BY CHARLES SWAIN.

THE Peasantry of England,
The merry hearts and free;
The sword may boast a braver band—
But give the scythe to me!
Give me the fame of industry,
Worth all your classic tomes!
God guard the English Peasantry,
And grant them happy homes!

The sinews of old England!
The bulwarks of the soil!
How much we owe each manly hand,
Thus fearless of its toil!

Oh, he who loves the harvest free,
Will sing where'er he roams,
God bless the English Peasantry,
And give them happy homes!

God speed the plough of England!
We'll hail it with three cheers:
And here's to those whose labour planned
The all which life endears!
May still the wealth of Industry
Be seen where'er man roams;
A cheer for England's Peasantry!
God send them happy homes!

A FRAGMENT OF A LETTER WRITTEN BY A LADY AT NAPLES TO A FRIEND.

I mentioned that I got the particulars in a most romantic and interesting history lately; and I only now have found leisure to write them down for you. When in public with the Marchioness of S—, I had seen her frequently address a very pleasing, fine young woman, whose name and rank I knew, but nothing more; and she said she wished I should be better acquainted with her before she told me her history. She was reserved, but had a mild sort of quiet melancholy in her manner, that attracted me very much; and you shall now learn the cause. I am not at liberty to give her full name, so you must be satisfied with her being called Rosalie, after her saint. She was the daughter of one of the first houses in this country, and brought into the world with every advantage—having been educated at home, and under a very amiable mother, who, unfortunately, died when she was only fifteen. Her father had selected a youth for her partner in life every way worthy of her; and, what seldom happens, the young people were allowed to form an attachment before marriage, by a considerable degree of intimacy. The young count's mother was a high, violent character, but had not openly opposed this: however, she conducted herself in a manner that showed little partiality to her future daughter. All, however, went on till a few days before the marriage. Great and splendid were the preparations, and future happiness appeared within their reach.

The evening before the marriage day, Count P.'s mother came to his house, newly prepared for his bride, and said it had been resolved the marriage should take place on that night, privately, to spare his lovely Rosalie's feelings, as she shrank from the public solemnity; and that all should be ready, and at an hour she named he would be called for by the father. Accordingly everything was so arranged, and the young man was conducted to church, his carriage following that of his supposed father-in-law. At the altar, which was dimly lighted, stood his mother and the bride, covered by a very thin silver tissue veil; and the ceremony proceeded. The youth, whose thoughts were fixed on present happiness, and engrossed by the service, distinguished no one, and received his wife in full confidence. Silent she was, but tranquil; and his mother carried her home. All the cortège parted; and he followed to his own house, there to unveil the treasure of his heart. He found the saloon illuminated, and his brother and sister, who on some pretence had been kept absent from the ceremony, seemingly waiting in impatience with his mother and the bride. The doors closed after him, and his mother withdrew the veil and discovered to him that his wife was a beautiful idiot, whose large estates she had long coveted, and had taken this most wicked manner of obtaining for her family.

The anguish that followed brought him to the gates of death, and the loss of reason had nearly been the price at which she gained the success of a plan truly diabolical. His sister, a most amiable creature, soothed him at last into submission to his hard fate, after finding no means were left to set him free. Of the mother and idiot I say nothing: he never saw either, I believe, from that hour.

Rosalie's fate, I believe, has drawn more tears than any event in real life ever did in Naples. Public proof was brought her father next morning of the marriage; but it was added, the bride being veiled, her name was not known. Enraged, as you may conceive, he carried his daughter in silence to his villa, and there, I understand, with more of tenderness than might have been expected from his stern character, unfolded what he deemed the treachery of her lover. The death-blow to all her happiness was such as, her most interesting countenance proves, fifteen years cannot efface; and for a couple of years life seemed held by a very slender thread. That a young woman should remain unmarried out of a convent is a thing unknown; and her vast possessions made her father anxiously desire to see her married before the fatal truth was made known to her: as the sacredness of sorrow had kept aloof all intruders, and her father resolved she should return to the world under the protection of a husband. How this was brought about, may be accounted for by those who know the state of society here. All she desired, when she found that her father's will must be obeyed, was a full explanation of her situation to the Marquis of S—, whom she married.

Thus was this tragedy brought to the most trying scene—the discovery of her lover's innocence, after she herself was another's. The marquis undertook this; he is a cold character, but to her appeared sincerely attached. Rosalie was now only nineteen when this hardest part of her trial was appointed to her; but the effects were quite different from what might have been looked for. The cup of misery appeared to have overflowed, and she received the intelligence as a relief from the bitterness of her former pangs; and, grateful for his faith, she owned it was wisely done to place new duties before her ere she was acquainted with his share in their mutual misery.

Once, and only once, they met in private society; and she requested only her father and husband might be witnesses. With such a woman what must have been the effect upon all present? She clasped him to her heart, and wept in his arms; and then turned to her husband, and said to Count P.:

"To this generous man we owe this indulgence! Kneel with me, and swear it is the last intercourse we shall ever have together!"

You may believe this noble woman's example won him to follow her upright views; and at no moment of their lives, during those years, has that vow ever been broken. In public they meet, but the life of each is exemplary. She fills the station of a wife and mother to perfection, and is rewarded by the respect of her husband, and all her society. There is an elevated character in her sorrows and self-command, that attracts my veneration; and as to him, I do think one of her most severe and secret pangs must be to read in his faded form and fine, dejected countenance what he has suffered.

The idiot and mother both live, no one knows where. Count P. married his sister to a Venetian, and devotes his time to her and her family.

[THE GREAT BELL, IVAN'S TOWER, MOSCOW.]

IVAN'S TOWER.

COLOSSAL as the power of Russia may be considered, it has within its ample bosom all the elements of weakness. It is strikingly a material power, just as the countries where slavery is upheld are material. It has no vox populi, and therefore is deficient of the most characteristic feature in national greatness.

This will be apparent, when it is taken into consideration that, with a few exceptions, the peasants of Russia are all slaves. They form two classes—peasants of the crown, and peasants belonging to individuals. The present emperor has done much to lessen the evils of the former, and to render their manumission, as well as that of the latter class, more practicable. Yet the condition of both is still degrading and deplorable. It is an ulcer on the heart of the empire. And to understand Russia correctly, so that she may be less feared, this institution ought always to be held up to the abhorrence of more civilised countries.

It is calculated that about a sixth part of the peasantry belong to the crown. Peasants belonging to individuals are their property, as much as the cattle on their estates. The rent paid by the crown peasants is fixed; that paid by private peasants is regulated by their means of getting money—or, in other words, is a tax on their industry. There is no law to restrain the demands of the master—their time and labour are absolutely at his command. Some of the nobility send their slaves to St. Petersburg or Moscow, to be instructed in various trades; and then either employ them on their own estates, hire them out, sell to them permission to exercise their trade, or dispose of them at an advanced price. In fact, the system is a counterpart of that in vogue in the United States of America, with respect to the black population, only on a much larger scale. Some of the Russian nobles have 70,000 or 100,000 peasants—and from this fact, as may well be supposed, their wealth is immense, in whatever manner the labour of these slaves is employed. Women and children as well as men, must labour for their master, for such pay as his caprice or means may dispose or enable him to give. Tithes are besides demanded out of whatever may remain in their hands. As soon as a child reaches the age of ten, its labour is required; and when he reaches fifteen, each male is obliged by law to labour three days in each week for his master. If the proprietor chooses to employ him on the other days he may—as, for example, in a manufactory; in this case, however, he finds him in food and clothing. In general, the master, instead of exacting the labour of his slave for the stated portion of the week, agrees to receive a rent; and he is bound to furnish him with a house, and a certain portion of land. The aged and infirm are provided with food, raiment, and lodging at his expense.

The master has the power of correcting his slaves by blows or imprisonment; but the law—in such a country easily evaded—forbids the exercise of any great cruelty. No slave can quit his village, or—if he be a domestic slave—his master's family, without a passport. Imprisonment, with hard labour, is the punishment of runaway slaves. A master may send his slave into the public workhouse, or into the army—in the latter case, he sends one man the less the next levy. No slave can be sold out of Russia; nor in it, except to a noble—but this law is frequently evaded. A slave may obtain his liberty by manumission, by purchase, or by serving in the army or navy.

Viewed in every relation, the state of the Russian peasantry is the lowest in the scale of political degradation. It is, however, consolatory to reflect that, injurious as it may be to the higher feelings of our nature, it is not aggravated by poverty. Their houses—formed of whole trees, and usually constructed solely with the hatchet—are in tolerable repair, and well adapted to their habits. They sometimes, but not often, consist of two storeys: the lower forms a store-room—in the upper one they dwell. A kind of ladder on the outside serves as a staircase. There is generally but one room in the habitable part. Their furniture seldom comprises more than a wooden table and benches fastened to the sides of the room, wooden platters, bowls, and spoons, and perhaps a large earthen pan to cook their victuals in. Their diet is substantial, consisting of black rye-bread, eggs, salt fish, mushrooms, and bacon. They have also a favourite dish—a hotch-potch of salt or fresh meat, groats, and rye-flour, seasoned with onions and garlic. Of this food they obtain plenty at a cheap rate. Their clothing, however, is dear. To clothe a Russian peasant or soldier costs nearly three times as much as in England; but their clothing is strong, and, being made loose and wide, lasts longer. It is rare to see a Russian in rags, and their style of dress becomes them very well. As to their personal appearance, they may be described as a large, coarse, hardy race—possessed of great bodily strength—rarely below the middle stature—strong limbed—lean, but well built. Their mouths and eyes are small—their lips thin—teeth even and white—their hair brown, reddish, or flaxen—their beards strong and bushy. The complexion of the female peasantry is brunet—their skin, in general, delicate. Some of them, as among the other classes, are extremely handsome. But both sexes are remarkable for their superstition. Being deprived of all education beyond that requisite sharpening of their instincts to render them more valuable as a property, they cling to old traditions with extraordinary tenacity—believe in ghosts, goblins, and every variety of supernatural phenomena.

Probably the most singular superstition in the world prevails at Moscow. The people of that city, and for hundreds of miles around it, almost adore the Great Bell, which lies at the foot of Ivan's Tower—a description of which was given in our last number, in the course of the tale called "The Links in the Chain."

On festival days—which in the Greek calendar are remarkably numerous—they resort to the Great Bell as they would to a sanctuary, and in descending and ascending the steps that lead to its base, cross themselves with a great parade of devotion.

The origin of this superstition is involved in obscurity; but as no people, however deeply they may be sunk in ignorance, are so insensible as to be altogether indifferent to the attractions of political and social liberty, the custom may probably be traced to a tradition connected with the bell, which has been preserved among the Russian peasantry for several generations.

This tradition, it appears, refers back to a period when the Russians enjoyed a condition approaching to the freedom of pastoral simplicity. The alarm-bell, suspended in a tower before the Kremlin, was brought from Novgorod, when that city was conquered in 1477. There it had been used as a signal for the people of that republic to assemble from all quarters, in the event of foreign danger or intestine tumult; and they regarded its removal to Moscow as the sure prelude to their departing liberty. Thenceforward the love of bells became quite a passion among the peasantry of Russia; and several of the emperors, without paying much regard to the political sentiment involved in the matter, gratified their taste by the most liberal expenditure in the casting and erection of means to supply a substitute for the dearer and more soul-stirring strains of liberty.

Alexis, the father of Peter the Great—whose memory is still revered in Russia, as that of a wise, pacific, and humane prince—caused the great bell of Moscow to be cast and suspended by a great number of beams and cross-beams; and one traveller—an Englishman—positively asserts that, when rung—which it was, by means of fifty men—one half on each side pulled the ropes—the sound amazed and deafened, rather than delighted the inhabitants. Its thunder reproached them for their lost liberties. At the beginning of the eighteenth century a great fire destroyed all the supports, and the great bell fell into the cavity in which it had been cast. Peter the Great, having removed the capital to St. Petersburg, did nothing to repair what was considered a misfortune. The Empress Anne had it re-cast, but it was never again suspended; so that the Great Bell of Moscow is associated in the minds of the inhabitants with reminiscences of a painful character.

It is a monument of the policy inaugurated by Peter the Great, which aims at territorial aggrandisement, and, by keeping the mind of the nation fixed on conquest, prevents those social developments which can only be obtained through peace as a constitutional idea. It also is a very substantial historical landmark in the misfortunes of Moscow: first, of the great fire which immediately preceded the removal of the capital; and, secondly, to the people it dumbly, but very significantly, points to that remarkable and not over-wise measure; for the destiny of Russia would rather point to extensions on the south and south-east, than a retrograde march to the wastes and snows of the north-west. The fate of Europe has always been decided in the Mediterranean—not the Baltic.

However, not to wander into such a large question, it is quite evident that the veneration of the Russian peasantry for their wonderful great bell had a substantial foundation. Whether it ever will be suspended again, is extremely problematical; but this much is certain—that the Russians, by preserving the tradition of a remote social and political independence, are most assuredly keeping alive the feeling for liberty; and when once that, by means of a rapidly-multiplying middle class, becomes enlarged into a widely-diffused, deeply-rooted national passion, the despotism of the czars, and the abominable domestic tyranny of the nobles, may be said to have approached their termination. At present, the Russian peasant, like the American black, is raised for market. He is a slave; and, as such a defilement of the image of the Eternal is sure, sooner or later, to be purified and washed away in a storm of retributive vengeance, there is plenty of room for the hope, that another generation will not pass away without the Russian, with his strength, intelligence, and vivacity, taking a higher place among the men of what is called the civilised world.

WOMAN'S LOVE.

"Who is that very beautiful girl?" asked a young Englishman of his companion, as they leant for a moment against one of the marble pillars, to contemplate at leisure the enchanting scene which a Parisian ball presents to the eye of the stranger. Not that an English ball-room is not a very delightful sight, but the French manage these things better. Perhaps they are constitutionally a more lively nation; but certain it is that the spirit, animation, and joyousness—the total abandonment of everything, as it were, to the spell of the moment—will be looked for in vain at our graver assemblies. And yet I speak not in disparagement—for, after all, give me my own proud, solemn, high-minded, and right-feeling England! But to return to my tale.

The young girl alluded to was exquisitely lovely, with a petite and child-like figure, a fair, bright face, and a pair of the most mischievous blue eyes that could be imagined; although the demureness of her present attitude made them appear softened, if not subdued. Her head was bent a little forward, and a profusion of light, sunny curls fell upon her white shoulders, and contrasted strangely in their brightness with the dark emerald hue of her satin robe, the front and sleeves of which were clasped with diamonds of inestimable value.

By her side sat a young man, attired with studied plainness; although the turn of his finely-shaped head, the fire of his dark, melancholy eyes, and the troubled expression of his pale, handsome features, rendered him an object of whom one would wish to know more.

"It is Mademoiselle Verney," replied the young Count de Tours; "the richest heiress in Paris, and on the eve of marriage with that solemn-looking personage by her side."

"She must be very young?" said the Englishman.

"She is scarcely eighteen," was the reply; "and wilful as she is beautiful."

"And her lover?"

"Ah! there lies the disparity: he has nothing—absolutely nothing—and is as proud as he is poor! Why, Lestelle, with her beauty and fortune, might have chosen her a husband among the noblest of the land; but she is fond and romantic, and Monsieur Aubertin, quiet as he looks, has had wit enough to persuade her that she loves him."

"Persuade her?" repeated the Englishman.

"Yes, for she is but a girl, and will have changed her mind and repented a dozen times before she comes of age. And as for Aubertin's having any real disinterested affection for her, we know too much of the world to believe that, my friend!" And the young count laughed scornfully, as he drew his companion away.

"You are ill, Claude?" said Lestelle, anxiously, as she watched the changed expression of her lover's face, and marked his haughtily contracted brow and flashing eyes, "have I said anything to offend?"

"Will you forgive me, dearest, if I confess that I have not heard a word you have been saying for the last five minutes?" murmured Aubertin, abstractedly.

The young beauty tossed back the curls from her white brow, and put up her pretty lip, but she did not reply; and the long silence that ensued was broken at length by Claude.

"Shall I tell you, Lestelle," he asked, in a low voice, "what the Count de Tours has just been saying about us?—and he speaks doubtless from the common rumours and opinions of society?"

"As you will!" replied Lestelle, colouring slightly, and trying to speak with indifference.

"He calls you a fond, romantic girl, Lestelle, and me an—adventurer!"

"And can the idle words of such as he have the power to move you thus, my Claude?" said Lestelle, gently; "or do you think," she added, with an arch smile, "that such a prize as myself is to be attained without exciting envious remarks? That I am fond and romantic I confess: ever since I can remember, in my dreams of young romance, I pictured to myself an ideal being whom I could love; but never were girlhood's visions realised as mine have been—that is, if my hero does not spoil all by his too scrupulous pride!"

"But I have not told you all yet," continued Aubertin, while his haughty frown relaxed beneath the witchery of her smiles; "he said, too, that, but for me, with your wealth and beauty, you might have commanded one of the most splendid matches in the kingdom!"

"And would that have insured my happiness?" asked Lestelle. "Oh that we lived in the old time of the fairies, and that I might have one wish!"

"And what would that be?" inquired her lover.

"That we might change situations with one another: you could have all the wealth, and I be a poor girl, lessened only with your affections! Claude, I should feel humiliation, no gratitude in receiving all from you—love would have equalised us!"

"I fear that your creed is rather a theoretical than a practical one, my own Lestelle!" said Aubertin, with a mournful smile.

"If I could but convert you to its belief, I think I should have nothing left to wish for!" replied the young girl, in a whisper; and there was no shade upon the open brow of her lover, as he mingled in the brilliant throng with his beautiful and devoted mistress.

The evening passed away as evenings do when we are most happy; for, with all its heart-burnings, its disappointments—occasioned, perhaps, by the absence or coldness of the only one amidst a thousand for whom we have dressed and smiled—a ball is a bright epoch in the lives of the young.

"I shall see you to-morrow, Claude?" said Lestelle, in a timid voice, as they stood together, waiting for her carriage to draw up.

"Of course," replied Aubertin, gloomily; "I have received a formal invitation to meet your guardians and the notary, to sign the deed relative to the final settlement of your property."

"It will soon be over!" said Lestelle, laying her hand imploringly upon his arm. "And will you bear this trial for my sake, Claude?"

"My sweet Lestelle! but I will make no promises. You shall see how patiently I will listen to M. Fradel's arrogant taunts, and how humbly and gratefully I will conduct myself!"

"Claude!" interrupted Lestelle, almost tearfully, "you are speaking now in bitterness and mockery?"

"No, en vérité!" replied her lover, laughingly. "But good night now, my Lestelle, and God bless you!"

He relinquished the hand he held, and as the carriage whirled rapidly away, the smile faded upon his lips, and he walked home in moody thoughtfulness.

It was a severe trial for the good spirit of Claude Aubertin, much as he loved Lestelle, to consent to owe everything to her—to subject himself to the mortifying surmises of those who judged of him by their own worldly and perverted imaginations. And there were times when he almost determined to give her up for ever, although the destruction of his own peace and hers should be the consequence; while at others he thought of doing something to prove himself worthy of her love. But a name and fortune are not very easily obtained in these days, even by the most talented; and in the interim a thousand things might happen. Lestelle might grow old—or die!—or she might cease to love him—for the heart has its changes and its seasons: none of which, however, resemble its first freshness and purity. The attachments of our girlish days may last through womanhood, and even to old age itself; but every year we live, more of earthly feeling, more of the world's wisdom, will have mingled in our dream of love, until it becomes less unselfish—less ideal—more rational perhaps, but less passionate and devoted. And who could be sure that the faith of one so beautiful and admired as the young heiress would be preserved pure and unbroken, through trial and temptation, amidst ambition and flattery, and with him to whose protection she had clung so confidently, absent for an unlimited period in a foreign land. Woman's fidelity is proverbial; but after all we are but mortal, and

Look through the world, and this truth you will find,

That once out of sight, you are soon out of mind.

It was all very well in the days of old, when, on the departure of the true knight, the constant fair one would shut herself up in her lonely tower, out of the reach of temptation, and, surrounded only by her maidens, employ the weary interval in listening to the noble deeds of his ancestors, and embroidering a gorgeous scarf to present him on his return; but in these days of balls, festivals, and beaux, the young affiancée has a much harder trial—and we seriously advise the lover not to be absent longer than he can help.

The following day, Aubertin found the whole party drawn up to receive him. M. Fradel occupying his large arm-chair at the head of a table covered with parchments, and M. Dumont, the notary—a hard-featured, cold, methodical-looking being—seated at his right; while on the opposite side, Lestelle sat with her elbow resting on the table and her head bent down; and as she slightly raised it on the entrance of her lover, he saw that her eyes were red and swollen from excessive weeping. Having bowed to the gentlemen, and pressed the cold, trembling hand of Lestelle to his lips, he sat down and waited calmly for M. Fradel to commence the business that had brought them together.

"You are aware, M. Aubertin," said the old gentleman, at length, "that my ward is very young, and that, in accepting you for her future husband, she acts contrary to my wishes, and demonstrates the natural wilfulness of her sex?"

"All this is not new to me," replied the young man, while he stole an arch look at Lestelle, who was watching him in breathless anxiety.

"Well, then," we may as well come to the point at once: without my consent your marriage cannot take place until Mademoiselle Verney is of age—a period of which it wants nearly three years; and your signing this deed, by which the whole of her property is settled unalienably upon herself, without giving any one else power to draw or dispose of one sou of it, is the only condition on which the hand of Lestelle shall be yours."

A crimson flush passed over the cheek and brow of Claude Aubertin, and there was a moment's pause, during which the keen glance of the old man, the cold scrutiny of the notary, and the pleading eyes of the anxious girl were fixed eagerly upon his face. The struggle, however, was but of short duration; and with a cheerful smile he held out his hand for the paper, and, glancing rapidly over its contents, instantly affixed his name.

"It is well!" said M. Fradel, complacently. "Now, Mademoiselle."

The hand of the young girl trembled so violently that Aubertin was obliged to guide it; and when the signature was at length completed, she flung herself upon his bosom, and wept long and passionately. Even the notary was moved into something like sympathy, and, gathering up his papers, he hastened to follow his patron from the room, and leave the lovers at full liberty to give vent to their feelings; but regard for the timid and weeping girl, who clung to him so fondly and imploringly, subdued the offended pride of Claude Aubertin, and he had little difficulty in soothing her fears, and winning back the sunshine of her happy smiles.

A few days after this they were married, and the three succeeding years, which glided past so happily with them, are marked in characters of blood in their country's annals. Now it was that the innate nobility of the mind asserted its superiority over the mere hereditary nobility of name and station—that the barriers of rank and aristocracy were beaten down, and men owned no limits to their own wild wills. Claude Aubertin was a revolutionist in the best sense of the word—his proud spirit had been stung by the worldly scorn of those whom he inwardly despised; but not for this did he turn upon his oppressors—not for any feeling save the pure and holy love of liberty; and when that name became prostituted to the very worst purposes—when it was made the watchword to crime and bloodshed—he yet clung to it as in his first hour of youthful enthusiasm, and trusted everything to its power when the first intoxication should have passed away, and be succeeded by an age of reason and rationality.

Lestelle loved her husband too well not to have habited his principles; and the costly saloons of la belle cité, as she was called, were nightly thronged with the leading political characters of the times. But Lestelle was no longer a girl, laughing from the overflows of a glad-spirited spirit; her smiles were less frequent, and had often a purpose to answer which those who looked upon her fair and bright face never dreamed of. There was now a proud aristocrat who, although he knew it not, owed life and fortune to that beautiful and resistless pleader.

The only cloud that rested on the happiness of Lestelle was occasioned by the scrupulous reserve of Aubertin on all affairs connected with her property; nor could her fondness and devotion remove the unpleasant feeling which a consciousness of his total dependence upon his wife was likely to engender in his proud and sensitive spirit; and although she tried to obviate the difficulty by a liberality which pained far more than it pleased him, still there were moments when he bitterly felt the want of funds which could only be drawn through her instrumentality, and which he would have died rather than asked for.

Of late it had been observed that Lestelle was much altered: she would sit for hours in an attitude of deep thought, and was peevish and abstracted when roused, as if the plans which she was evidently arranging in her own mind required the concentration of every thought and energy. She would be absent, too, for hours together, no one knew where, accompanied only by her attendant—she, the gentle and timid, who but a few months before had feared to venture from home without the protection of her husband. But Aubertin, although he felt the alteration, asked no questions: he had too much faith in her affection to have the remotest idea of the fearful shock that awaited him.

One morning, contrary to her usual custom, Lestelle took her breakfast in her own apartment, sending a message by her maid requesting the presence of her husband at twelve exactly in her boudoir; and Aubertin, not being able at the moment to invent any decent excuse for refusing to comply with her request, reluctantly promised to attend her at the hour appointed, determined that the meeting should be as brief as possible, as he imagined that it merely related to matters of a pecuniary nature, a subject of which he always entertained a nervous horror.

"Is it possible," thought Claude, "that she can have generously anticipated my wish to possess sufficient funds at my disposal to prove of beneficial service to our country? And yet, even if it were so, and her guardian consented, I would never accept them!"

At the appointed time Aubertin presented himself at the door of his wife's boudoir, the first glance at which confirmed his previous suspicions as to the purport of his visit. Lestelle was not there, but M. Dumont—the same whom he had met once before at her guardian's—stood bending over a very business like sheet of parchment.

"Pray be seated, Monsieur," said the little notary; "Madame Aubertin will be here directly."

Claude bowed coldly, and took the offered chair in silence.

"Glorious times, Monsieur!" said Dumont, rubbing his withered hands together; "glorious times we live in now! The age of liberty in every sense of the word!"

Claude acquiesced by another bow.

"You have doubtless heard of the new law of revolutionary divorce?" continued M. Dumont; "a very good—a very excellent law, Monsieur!"

"A very convenient one, I should think," replied Aubertin, laughing in spite of himself at the solemnity with which the old man spoke.

"Claude Aubertin," said the notary, after a pause, "I am a man of few words—a man of business—and it is as well to come to the point at once. Lestelle would avail herself of this opportunity to be divorced from you, and has purposely left us together in order that I might inform you of her wishes, to which she entreats that you will offer no opposition."

"Accursed liar! it is false!" exclaimed the enraged husband, "I will never believe it!"

"Claude," said a gentle voice by his side, "as I hope for your forgiveness hereafter, he has spoken nothing but the truth! And now for both our sakes let this scene be a brief one; at a future time all shall be explained, if you will only sign the paper that sets me free to act as I please."

"Lestelle!" exclaimed the bewildered Aubertin, "can it be my Lestelle—or do I dream? What have I done that you should deceive me thus? Have I denied you aught in reason? Have I loved you less? Have I ever spoke one harsh, one unkind word to you, that I did not strive the next moment to atone for, and obliterate from your memory by my caresses? Have I not for your sake prostrated my proud spirit, and dared the sneers of the world? ay, and deserved them—for I trusted—I consented to be dependent on a woman—and now she scorns, despises, deserts me!"

"Dumont," said Lestelle, looking imploringly towards him, "I cannot bear this!"

Aubertin had forgotten the presence of the little notary, but he now looked proudly up, and, recovering his usual calmness, said:

"One more question, and I will sign. Lestelle, as you hope in heaven's mercy, do you this deed willingly?"

"I do!" said the girl, faintly.

"And our divorce will insure your happiness?"

"It will!" she replied more firmly.

"Then be it so." But as the pen trembled in his hand, he looked once more upon the flushed countenance of her who was so soon to be lost to him for ever, and added, in a hoarse voice, "do you remember the last deed we signed in this man's presence?"

"Perfectly," replied Lestelle; "and it is that recollection which gives me strength to act as I am doing."

Aubertin bent down his head, and a hot tear fell upon the parchment; but there were no traces of it as he returned the document, with a low bow, to the trembling girl.

"You are obeyed, mademoiselle!" said he, with a mocking smile, as he moved rapidly towards the door.

The white lips of Lestelle moved fast, but they uttered no sound; she attempted to rush forward and arrest his progress, and her feet seemed glued to the floor; but M. Dumont understood her wishes, and hastened after the offended Aubertin.

"Well, I never could have believed it, so attached as they seemed to each other!" said a young citizen to his companion, De Tours—the same aristocratic count who, but a short time before, would scarcely have condescended to breathe the same air as his plebeian friend, but whom a proper regard for his own safety had conformed to the equalising spirit of the age.

"I always told you how it would end!" said De Tours; "the romance of the young heiress has had time to cool, and she seizes the first opportunity that presents itself of becoming free again!"

"And poor Aubertin, what has become of him?"

"Why, they say that he takes it very much to heart; and no wonder, seeing that her fortune is scarcely reduced, and herself, if possible, more beautiful than ever."

At this moment they were interrupted by the entrance of Claude Aubertin himself, with Lestelle leaning on his arm, or rather clinging, in her sweet, graceful manner, while her bright eyes sparkled with happiness as she listened with a flushed cheek to the whispered accents of her husband, on whose countenance a smile of triumphant exultation mingled with deep love.

"What's this?" inquired De Tours of a person who stood near him, and who happened to be the little notary, M. Dumont; "I thought that the Aubertins had availed themselves of the new law, and were divorced?"

"And so they were, and married again this morning!" said the notary, with a knowing twinkle of his cold, grey eyes.

"How strange!" said De Tours.

"Not at all: according to the first marriage settlement, which took place when Lestelle was a minor, the whole of her property was so tied up by her guardian that, without her permission, Aubertin had no power to draw a single sou of it; but on her coming of age she has availed herself of our new law of divorce, in order that the money may be re-invested in her husband's name only."

"It was a noble deed!" said De Tours; "but Aubertin did not at first know her reasons for wishing to be separated from him—for I met him late last night, in the Rue St. Honoré, without his hat, and singing the Marseillaise hymn in a frenzy of despair and excitement."

"The brief trial which his feelings have undergone was unavoidable," said the notary; "as his proud spirit would never have been brought to consent to the sacrifice."

"De Tours," said the young citizen, impressively, and after a short pause, "ages to come, when our fearful struggle for independence will be remembered only with a shudder, the conjugal devotion of this young girl shall remain as a tale to tell around the peaceful hearthstone of a winter's night; and her name be added to that golden scroll on which the recording angel notes down 'the noble deeds of women!'"

RUINS OF ANCIENT BABYLON.

THE French government has employed a party of gentlemen to explore the site of ancient Babylon. From reports just received from them, it appears that they have ascertained, beyond reasonable doubt, that the ruins beneath a tumulus, called the Kasr, are those of the marvellous palace citadel of Semiramis and Nebuchadnezzar. They are in such a state of confusion and decay, that it is impossible to form from them any idea of the extent or character of the edifice. They appear, however, to extend beneath the bed of the Euphrates—a circumstance accounted for by the change in the course of that river. In them have been found sarcophagi, of clumsy execution and strange form, and so small that the bodies of the dead must have been packed up in them: the chin touching the knees, and the arms being pressed on the breast by the legs. The sarcophagi have every appearance of having been used for the lowest class of society; but, notwithstanding the place in which they were found, the discoverers are inclined to think that they are of Parthian, not Chaldean origin.

There have also been found numerous fragments of enamelled bricks, containing portions of the figures of men and animals, together with cuneiform inscriptions: the latter white in colour upon a blue ground. According to M. Fresnel, the chief of the expedition, these bricks afford a strong proof that the ruins are those of the palace of Nebuchadnezzar, inasmuch as the ornaments on them appear to be sporting subjects, such as are described by Ctesias, and Diodorus.

The foundations having been dug down to in certain parts, it has been ascertained that they are formed of bricks about a foot square, united by a strong cement, and that they are in blocks, as if they had been sapped in all directions.

In a tumulus called Amram, to the south of Kasr, interesting discoveries have also been made. They appear to be the ruins of the dependencies of the palace, situated on the left bank of the Euphrates; and they contain numerous sarcophagi, in which were found skeletons clothed in a sort of armour, and wearing crowns of gold on their heads. When touched, the skeletons, with the exception of some parts of the skulls, fell into dust; but the iron, though rusty, and the gold of the crowns, are in a fair state of preservation. M. Fresnel thinks that the dead in the sarcophagi were some of the soldiers of Alexander or Seleucus. The crowns are simple bands, with three leaves in the shape of laurel on one side, and three on the other. The leaves are very neatly executed. Beneath the bands are leaves of gold, which it is supposed covered the eyes. From the quantity of iron found in some of the coffins, it appears that the bodies were entirely enveloped in it; and in one there is no iron, but some earrings, a proof that it was occupied by a female. The sarcophagi are about two and three-quarter yards in length, by between half and three-quarters of a yard wide, and are entirely formed of bricks, united by mortar. In addition to all this, a tomb, containing statues in marble or alabaster, of Juno, Venus, and of a reclining figure wearing a Phrygian cap, together with some rings, earrings, and other articles of jewellery, has been found, as also numerous statuettes, vases, pials, articles of pottery, black stones, &c., &c., of Greek, Persian, or Chaldean workmanship.

ANECDOTES OF ETIQUETTE.

THE word etiquette is derived from some Latin words strangely mutilated and combined, and expressive of order and regularity, of a very different nature from the ceremonial of society, according to conventional usages, known by the term etiquette; thus:

In ruder ages, before attorneys and men of business had their neat boxes labelled with their clients' names and estates, deeds and registries were kept in bags, of no very elegant or prepossessing appearance, and on these were written the Latin words hic est questio inter A & B, abbreviated into est hic qua est, from which the transition to et-i-quet and etiquette is natural enough.

Some of the recorded etiquettes of courts, ancient and modern, are very whimsical; for example, the Emperor Geta amused himself in arranging etiquettes as much as in state affairs. Amongst other formalities, all the dishes that appeared on his table were served in alphabetical order, and woe to the cook who sent them up, or him who ate them, out of the prescribed order.

Bazile, Emperor of Constantinople, when out hunting, was attacked by a large stag, which leaped upon his horse and entangled his horns in the prince's girdle. In his extremity one of the men of his suite rushed forward and cut the sash with his sword; but etiquette required that the man should be beheaded for drawing his sword in the presence of his sovereign.

In more modern times, the Queen of Charles II. of Spain, who was passionately fond of riding on horseback, was one day thrown from her palfrey. In falling, one of her feet got entangled in the stirrup, and the horse dragged her along, no person daring to assist her, because etiquette forbade any man, under pain of death, from touching the foot of a Queen of Spain.

The king, seeing her fearful condition from a balcony on which he was standing, uttered most piteous exclamations and cries. Two Spanish grandees hastened to the assistance of the queen: one seized the bridle of the horse, whilst the other disengaged the foot of her majesty. But those two brave men were immediately arrested, tried, and condemned to death, and, says the Spanish historian, the queen twice demanded their lives in vain. At length, with great difficulty and much entreaty, she succeeded.

The foot of a Spanish princess seems to have been rather a ticklish member to meddle with, if we are to judge also from the reply of the major domo of a travelling infanta to some manufacturers of silk stockings, who humbly presented a dozen pair of them to her highness.

"Take them away, and know that a Spanish princess has no legs."

King Philip III. of Spain was one day opposite a large fire, and alone: the heat greatly incommoded him, but, according to strict etiquette, to which he tenaciously held, it was beneath his dignity to poke out any of the fire, or even rise from his seat to call for assistance. At length a lord of his suite came into the room, but excused himself with the most profound expressions of respect from meddling with the fire, alleging the grave consequences that would result to a person of his rank and prerogative for exercising so degrading an office. The officer in charge of the fire did not arrive in time, and the king became so excessively hot that an erysipelas was produced in his head, which caused his death.

Even Russia, so barbarous until a recent period, has had her absurd etiquettes, like other courts of Europe. The annals of that empire make mention of a Czar of Muscovy who ordered a nail to be driven into the head of an ambassador who stood before him with his hat on.

James I. of England did not prove himself to be as fierce a stickler for etiquette in an analogous case. The Duc d'Auxonne, Ambassador of France, being presented one day, when that monarch was surrounded by many noblemen, had his head covered. James, who, every one knows, liked to speak in Latin, said to him: "Si vestra dominatio haberet tiam, qualem ego habeo, rogarem eam ut tegeret caput." The duke, who was prompt at repartee, replied: "Si cat majestas vestra quod meus pileus videri debet sicut thia, and he put on his hat." The noblemen who were present, not wishing to remain uncovered whilst the Duc d'Auxonne had his hat on his head, took their departure, one after another, so that the king and the ambassador soon found themselves alone. "Nullo habemus censors commode loquamur Latine." "Tunc," replied the duke, "aquam est, ut discipulus sit detectus coram domino," and he took off his hat.

By the way, what whimsical distinctions etiquette has established between the different kinds of coverings for the head: as that, in certain cases, a cap may be worn even before a king, without showing any disrespect; but a hat, which is a kind of cap, cannot be worn under the same circumstances. Thus it was only by a bon mot that the Duc d'Auxonne eluded this abstract point of etiquette.

It is related of a young Austrian prince who was very hungry, that he remained several hours contemplating a dish, which he could not touch, according to etiquette, because the officer whose duty it was to carve was very ill: it was necessary to summon the next officer in rank, but he was absent in the country, and could not be at his post in less than half a day. But the prince would sooner have died of hunger than suffer a point of etiquette to be transgressed.

Marie Antoinette, Queen of France, is said to have caught a severe cold one day, while waiting to have a chemise put on, the lady in waiting being at the time absent, and the next lady not daring to infringe the law of etiquette, which rendered the pleasing office of dressing the queen the exclusive privilege of the first lady of the bed-chamber.

Charles XII., King of Sweden, though living only for battles and military glory, paid great respect to the laws of etiquette. When a fugitive, and proscribed, uncertain if he should ever return to his country, he yet wrote from Bender to Versailles, to demand that the exact ceremonials of the court of Louis XIV. should be observed with him.

Montaigne relates that a relation of his had such a mania for ceremony, that, perceiving his end near, he occupied himself in his last moments in arranging, with the most minute care, the ceremony of his funeral procession. He requested all the nobility who visited him to attend it. He supplicated, with the greatest earnestness, a prince who came to see him in his dying moments, to attend with his household, alleging many examples to prove that such a condescension was due to a person of his exalted rank.

The great Charles V.—Emperor and King of Spain—went still further: he wished to see a rehearsal of the ceremony which was to be observed, according to the etiquette of his court, at his own funeral.

A magistrate of Toulouse, named Guillaume d'Escalquens, conceived and executed the whimsical project of personating his own corpse, and witnessing all the ceremonials that etiquette demanded at his funeral. He prevailed on the Dominicans of his town to cover their church with black, and to celebrate a solemn service for him. He invited all his fellow-magistrates, as well as a great number of other persons, to be present; had a coffin taken into the choir, in which was his body—forty wax candles were lighted—incense was burned—and when all the burial service was completed, the coffin was taken behind the altar: then he rose up and walked home, accompanied by his colleagues and a number of other people whom he had invited to dinner.

Although etiquette does not seem to have been destined, at first, to regulate the social relations in the plebeian classes, it has gradually found its way down to the inferior grades of society. "Tout marquis veut des pages," says La Fontaine. A shopkeeper who, after having sold for a long time by the ounce, has risen to the station of one who sells only by wholesale, considers himself authorised by etiquette to abandon the title of shopkeeper, and take the higher one of merchant—his shop becomes a depot or magazine—and he who was formerly addressed as Mr., now reads esquire on his letters, and is designated by the etiquette of the provincial newspapers an esquire in every list of quarter sessions or market juries; and even the country dancing-master, when drilling his awkward squad of pupils, tells them that he is the only master who is qualified to teach them etiquette: by which he means to instruct them how to turn out their toes, give a shuffling bow, and hand their partners to or from their seats. Yet what is this but a modification of the etiquette of which a Lord Chamberlain is the regulator at St. James's or the Tuileries, or a Beau Nash at Bath?

IF THOU HAST LOST A FRIEND

BY CHARLES SWAIN.

If thou hast lost a friend,
By hard or hasty word,
Go,—call him to thy heart again
Let Pride no more be heard.
Remind him of those happy days,
Too beautiful to last;
Ask, if a word should cancel years
Of truth and friendship past?
Oh! if thou'st lost a friend,
By hard or hasty word,
Go,—call him to thy heart again;
Let Pride no more be heard.

Oh! tell him, from thy thought
The light of joy hath fled;
That in thy sad and silent breast,
Thy lonely heart seems dead;
That mount and vale,—each path ye trod,
By morn or evening dim,—
Reproach you with their frowning gaze,
And ask your soul for him.
Then, if thou'st lost a friend,
By hard or hasty word,
Go,—call him to thy heart again
Let Pride no more be heard.

THE WORM WELL.

A LEGEND OF LAMBTON CASTLE.

I know not how the truth may be—
I tell the tale as told to me.

THE antiquity and importance of a family are often mainly proven by the effect and purport of traditions, which, originating in the obscurity of a remote age, still linger in the minds of the existing generation. Now there is one of those enduring records interwoven with the annals of the Lambtons, which will suggest to the reader many points of similarity with other romantic legends of the past—the famous dun cow of the Warwicks, or the more renowned dragon of St. George. Thus runs the Lambton legend:

One fine morn, the heir to the house of Lambton was fishing in the River Wear, which now, as of yore, winds through the broad demesne of Lambton. Now the said youth was reckless of paternal admonition, or ghostly precept; and, despite "bell, book, and candle," he would pursue this recreation, even on saints' days and holy days. This very morn, then, happened to be that of Sunday. He was, we may imagine, trolling for a trout or pike; but, instead thereof, he caught only a small worm, or eft, which he threw into a well hard by, and thought nothing more of the matter. Time went on, and the worm grew, until, finding the well too small, it betook itself to the river. Here it would lie during the day, coiled round an immense crag, which rose high above the surface of the water. At night it resorted to a large mound, which it would encircle nine times with its giant bulk; and having thus comfortably pillowed itself, enjoy the balm of refreshing slumber. But so large a body necessarily required a suitable supply of creature comforts; and, after ruining half the farmers of the district by its inroads on their farm-yards and byres, it was found necessary to propitiate it by a daily offering of the milk of nine cows. Meanwhile, the graceless cause of this monstrous growth had repented of his evil ways; and, the better to insure his soul's health, had repaired to cut the throats of heathens by joining the crusades. In this pious and holy work he was ever foremost; and having dispatched a full hecatomb of "Mahound dogs" to the other world, and thereby having insured the admiration of the good here, and a prospect of peace hereafter, he returned, an altered man, to his native land.

On reaching the house of his sires, what was his dismay at beholding the fruit of his unhallowed angling! "Had there been none," he inquired, "with spirit enough to encounter the monster?"

Many, he was assured, had made the attempt, but all had perished; for sword was vain against it. No sooner were its huge folds severed by the steel, than—mirabile dictu—they immediately reunited.

The warrior was sorely perplexed hereat; and, never having found his own brains of any use, he very prudently resorted to another's. He straightway took counsel of the "wise woman" of the district, and, fortified by her advice, bound himself to the adventure. Unlike his predecessors in this dangerous business, he attacked the worm in its apparently strongest fortalice—the crag of the river—and, his armour being well studded with razor-blades, as fast as the furious reptile coiled round him, fold after fold was severed with their trenchant edge, and, falling into the water, the rapid stream hurried them off beyond the power of reuniting.

The sequel of the story, however, assimilates to the rash vow recorded in Scripture. As a condition of success, the warrior had bound himself to slay the first living thing he met—and to secure himself from the guilt of killing a human being, he had agreed with his father that, so soon as three blasts on his bugle announced victory, his favourite greyhound should be unloosed, which would naturally make direct for him, and so furnish a harmless victim. But his good old sire, in his joy, forgetting his agreement, hurried to meet him, and be the first to welcome his valorous son. To keep his vow was now impossible for the knight; and, in despair, he hurried to his adviser. The "wise woman" bade him erect a chapel, and at the same time foretold that, as a penalty for the non-fulfilment of his oath, for nine generations no lineal descendant of his should die other than a violent death.

[LAMBTON CASTLE.]

When Hutchins wrote his "History of Durham," the shell of this chapel, which stood near the new bridge, on the left of the road, and just within the entrance to Lambton Park, was yet to be seen; and inclosed within one of the walls, "the figure of a man to the waist, in relief, with uplifted hands," supposed to represent the slayer of the worm. The well and its adjacent mound are still extant; and individuals are there living, who will swear to having seen, in their younger days, the vermicular traces left by the sinuous folds of the worm around the mound.

The curse of the nine generations, according to a manuscript pedigree, was fulfilled. It records, that "Johan Lambton, that slew the worme, was knight of Rhodes, and Lord of Lambton and Wod Apilton, after the dethe of fower brothers sans esschewe masle. His son Robert Lambton was drowned at Newebrygg;" and it is pretended that, tracing nine ascending generations from General Lambton, the present earl's great grandfather, the several worthies died out of their beds, at least. The "worm well" became, in process of time, a "wishing well," frequented by the gentle maidens of the district, who sought to dream of their husbands in esse, on Midsummer's Eve; and even now a crooked pin may occasionally be descried shining on the gravel that forms its bed.

SCIENCE.

NEW INVENTIONS, ETC.

RAILROADS.—There is railroad enough now in operation to reach round the world, and four thousand miles over.

AN Irish gentleman has invented an indicator for proving the speed at which railway trains are driven at every mile of their journey.

IN Russia they have an effectual contrivance for preventing horses from running away: Around the horse's neck, near the neck-strap, is placed a cord with a running knot. To this slip-noose is attached a pair of reins—on gentlemen's horses generally of silk cord about the size of a pipe-stem—which always lie thrown over the dashboard, ready to be seized at once. When a horse starts and becomes unruly, the gentleman takes up this cord and tightens the horse's throat so that he cannot breathe. The most furious horse stops almost instantly, but he will not fall or kick.

THE VITAL POINT.—At a recent meeting of the French Academy of Sciences, it was demonstrated by a learned academicien, from various careful experiments on the brains of animals, that the motive power of the respiratory mechanism, the vital point of the nervous system, is not bigger in size than a pin's head. Upon this tiny speck depends the life of the nerves, which is the life of the animal. Whatever portion of the nervous system remains attached to it lives, while that which is separated immediately dies.

FUEL SUPERSEDED.—Dr. Alexander Mayer, a physician, has written to the Presse, announcing that he had met with an intelligent and skilful mechanic who has solved the problem of obtaining heat for all the purposes for which fuel is now employed, by means of friction; and that he will soon be able to exhibit to the public an apparatus by which any quantity of heat may be obtained by friction, without fuel of any kind, for the purposes of domestic use, or for the generation of steam for steam-engines.

THE SCHOOLS AND THE ROYAL SCOTTISH ACADEMY EXHIBITION.—The Council of the Royal Scottish Academy, with the view of making the exhibition more directly instrumental in the cause of general education, have made such arrangements as will enable the pupils of schools, accompanied by their respective masters, to make three or four visits to the galleries during the season, at hours when the general public are excluded.

EXPERIMENTAL PHILOSOPHY.—The following information may prove interesting to our readers: 1. The stone of the Persian date, as seen in the grocers' windows, will grow when placed in mould. 2. An acorn, when put into a glass bottle, and suspended in water, will grow into a beautiful miniature tree. 3. Corn, after many months being gathered, will, on being placed in water, turn green, and grow into beautiful leaves, with roots, &c., of bright green. 4. To those wishing to see the beauty of prismatic colours, boiling hot water put into a cup, held up against the light of the sun, will show them to advantage.

A CIRCULAR WEAVING FRAME.—Amongst the patents granted under the new law, and recently specified, is one to H. R. Fanshawe, of the Old Kent Road, which has for its object the production of various textile articles in a circular or curvilinear form: to effect which he constructs a loom, or weaving frame, with harness similar in all the details thereof to the ordinary harness, only that each row of harness shall have the form of a divided hoop—round, oval, or curved in such a way, or to such particular inclines or curves, as may be required in the article to be woven, each row of harness being connected with its own hoop, or corded tumbler; or the several parts of the harness, or the corded tumblers, may be formed as portions of a hoop, and used instead of one hoop, which will be found the plan most generally suitable; a shuttle, or conveyor of the thread, being provided, and arranged so as to travel within the hoop harness, the whole loom and operation of weaving being suitably arranged with respect thereto. This shuttle is caused to travel within the hoop harness by setting and working the loom, or frame, on the slant, opening the warp, and supporting the shuttle in its race—all which is effected by acting upon suitable apparatus by means of treddles, the machine being moved from time to time in accordance with the progress thereof.

AVERAGE DURATION OF LIFE.—Professor Buchanan makes the following observations upon the average duration of life, the effect, in part, of the improvements in medical science. He says, that in the latter part of the sixteenth century, one half of all that were born died under five years of age, and the average longevity of the whole population was but eighteen years. In the seventeenth, one half the population lived over twenty-seven years. In the latter forty years, one-half exceeded thirty-two years of age. At the beginning of the present century, one-half exceeded forty years; and from 1838 to 1845, one half exceeded forty-three. The average longevity of these successive periods has been increased from eighteen years, in the sixteenth century, up to forty-three and seven-tenths, by our last reports.

NEW COMBINATION OF METALS.—Messrs. Morewood and Rogers, of Upper Thames Street, have recently patented a combination of lead and zinc, under the name of "plumbic zinc." It consists of distinct layers of each metal, perfectly united in a peculiar process of manufacture—one side thus presenting a surface of pure lead, the other pure zinc, combining the stiffness of the latter with the durability of the former. A sheet of metal is thus produced, which proves as hard and durable as one of lead several times its thickness and weight; while in peculiar situations the zinc is laid undermost, and is thus protected from atmospheric action, or the effect of acid vapours or liquors, by the preservative power of the lead. For every description of roofing, hips and ridges, gutters, pipes, cisterns, sinks, &c., this metal will most probably be found highly advantageous. For covering terraces, balconies, stairs, and passages, it will be found similar to lead under the feet; while the stiff lining of zinc will prevent it from treading out of shape. For chimney-tops, cowls, &c., the lead is placed inside, which is indestructible from the sulphurous acids and vapours usually contained in smoke. For coal-boxes, baths, pails, and many other domestic utensils, it will also be found highly useful. Japan will adhere to it as well as to iron plate. It will solder as effectually as tin-plate, and works softer and with greater facility than sheet zinc alone. It is also recommended for lining tunnels, sheathing ships, &c.; and no doubt numerous other uses will yet be found for it.

[MADURA.]

TREMAL NAIG'S CHOULTRY.

INDIA for ages has been the land of wonders—the El Dorado of every people and every generation who flourished westward of that noble river, the Indus. For a thousand years, at the least, before the establishment of Christianity, it was the seat of settled governments—organised churches, supported by magnificent architecture—and learning not inferior to that which has immortalised the Greek and Egyptian schools of thought. From the sacred books, or Bible, of the Hindoos, we are informed that about two thousand years before the Christian era, India, from the Indus to the Gangetic boundaries, comprised four states—in fact, Eastern, Western, Central, and Southern India. The different provinces of which each was composed were governed by their respective rajahs, answering, in some measure, to the great feudatories of Europe. A confederacy which held together states and principalities differing materially in language, manners, and religious observances, must, of course, have been subjected to perpetual interruptions. Contests for the supremacy between rival sovereigns, as well as intestine struggles between the sacerdotal and military classes, or contending factions, must have occasioned petty revolutions similar to those which are obscurely referred to in the annals of ancient Egypt, or which have taken place in comparatively recent times among the Buddhist monarchies.

It is to the first moiety of this latter period we must refer for the origin of the Buddhist architecture, the remains of which so extensively prevail over the whole of Southern and Central India. In the latter half of this long period—or say down to about three hundred years before the commencement of the Christian era—or about the time when Alexander the Great was dazzling Europe and Asia by his extraordinary exploits—the Hindoo sovereigns ruled over this vast continent; and it is to their munificence and piety—together with the exertions and contributions of wealthy Brahmins—that we must attribute the erection of those solid fabrics, in the shape of temples and choultries, which to this day are among the wonders of architectural skill and human labour.

But while India has preserved the most splendid memorials of her piety and charity, she has accumulated scarcely anything by which to trace the multitudinous changes in her political condition. Beyond the Cashmerian annals, and the great epic poem called the Mahabharat—which celebrates the victories of those terrible brothers, Bala Rama and Krishnu—and probably a few Sanscrit fables, we have literally nothing to guide us through the maze of Indian history, but her Buddhist and Hindoo temples, her Mohammedan mosques, and the strange, awful fact, that the lethargy of caste has endured, with but few modifications, since its original institution—that it has survived through the most frightful civil wars—proved impervious to the assaults of Moslem ferocity and fanaticism—and is now but imperceptibly affected by the absolute domination over both the peninsula and the continent of the most powerful Christian empire that ever existed.

All that we know is, that India—the golden land of the western imagination for upwards of three thousand years—has been the theatre of the most stupendous, warlike, and political doings in the annals of the human race. Its internal history for that period is eternally sealed—it is buried in the grave of its vox populi. And even as regards the innumerable wars and invasions of which it has been the theatre, its native annals—traditions would be the proper phrase—would be worthless without the light thrown upon them by western history.

It is from the latter we learn that, about five hundred years before Christ, the Persian empire, under Darius Hystapes, had extended itself into India. His admiral, Scylax, a Carian Greek, overran a great part of India Proper, and imposed upon its princes an annual tribute of three hundred talents of gold. It is not indeed probable that his conquests extended much beyond the districts watered by the Indus and its branches; but it is admitted by a Hindoo writer, that the ostensible cause of the celebrated invasion by Alexander of Macedon, was to levy this tribute, which had been withheld, and to compel the Indian princes to acknowledge the supremacy of the great king. This happened two hundred years afterwards, and then we are introduced to the brilliant feats of Alexander and his successors; and after we have wandered over whole pages of nothing but names of men, places, and battles, all we can say we really know is, in the language of Dr. Robertson, “that each of the Bactrian kings carried on military operations in India with such success, that they penetrated far into the interior of the country; and, proud of the conquests they had made, as well as of the extensive dominions over which they reigned, some of them assumed the title of Great King, which distinguished the Persian monarchs in the days of their highest splendour.”

None of these conquests were permanent; they did not alter either the political or religious character of the country: and this, of itself, is amply sufficient to account for the strikingly peculiar and original character of the Hindoo nation, the fixed character of their institutions, and the unchanged nature of their language. They have never been blended down with other nations, by either colonisation or conquest. During more than sixteen hundred years—that is, from the fall of the Bactrian kingdom till the arrival of the Portuguese in the east—no European power acquired territory, or established its dominion in that country. Nothing more was aimed at by any nation than to secure an intercourse of trade with that opulent country.

The Mahomedan conquests, however, may be regarded as an exception. They commenced in the eleventh century; but for nearly three hundred years afterwards, with the exception of founding the kingdoms of Lahore and Delhi, they consisted chiefly in predatory inroads and barbarous razzias. And it was not until the beginning of the sixteenth century—when Baber, descending from the hills and fastnesses of Cabul, destroyed the power of the Patna monarchs—that the Mahomedan rule was established in India to any considerable extent. This accomplished monarch himself informs us, in his autobiography—but here are his own words: “At the period when I conquered the country, five Mussulman kings and two pagans exercised the royal authority.”

This was in 1526; and yet, two centuries afterwards, the Mabrattas shook the empire to its foundations; and in 1803, Lord Lake took possession of Delhi, and the imperial Mogul became the pensioner of English merchants. In fact, the Emperor of Hindostan was reduced to a position inferior to that of the Lord Mayor of the City of London.

So that of all the conquests of India, nothing has remained but the records of great battles, the rise and fall of dynasties, and some Moorish mosques and palaces, rapidly falling into decay.

The British power has endured from its earliest establishment, on the 11th of August, 1612, at the humble factory of Surat, until the present hour—nearly 241 years; and what it has done for India, what it may do, and its future prospects, are not subjects for consideration on this occasion. The rise and progress of British India is too romantic, too strange and eventful a theme, to be discussed in a few rapid paragraphs.

All that we would venture to remark is, that the Hindoos and Hindooism has marvellously survived every change. They are as vigorous now as ever, because they are impassive; their ideas stationary—their politics, their religion, their castes the same now as they were as described in the earliest Puranas—compiled, at the very least, three thousand years ago. And, what perhaps is not so singular, considering that they never possessed the means of transmitting intelligence from age to age, they have no authentic account of themselves. All is vagueness, darkness, and theory, unless we wandered into speculative doctrines, that alarm, rather than please, all sects of Christians.

The only readable, indeed visible records of Hindoo, Persian, Greek, Arabic, and Tartaric dominion, are the temples, the churches, the palaces, and the choultries, or alms-houses; in fact, the only authentic history of India, down to the time of Baber, are the monuments of India. They stand in their severe integrity, almost defying time as well as scrutiny; and in introducing to our readers a very remarkable illustration of ancient Indian architecture—a choultry at Madura, in the principality of Tanjore, in the Carnatic—we must acknowledge that we are obliged to refrain from indulging in a detailed description. In fact, Indian architecture—independent of the mystery that attaches to every portion—cannot be adequately described, so as to avoid offending the taste of the modern reader. The pencil of the artist, and the steel of the graver can alone convey an ensemble perfectly unobjectionable.

Our present engraving represents a choultry—a building whose purposes and uses are the same as those of the caravanserais of Arabia—which forms a portion of a perfect mass of ancient grandeur at Madura, a holy place on the route to the coast of Madura. Opposite and between it and the coast of Ceylon, lies “the sacred island” of Ramisoceram, containing a temple, dedicated to Sieva, which attracts numberless pilgrims from all parts of the peninsula.

These choultries are nothing more than the inns or hotels of India. They are generally in the great roads, and have been erected either by charitable persons or at the public expense. Both Hindoos and Mahomedans contribute to these charitable undertakings. The modern ones belong to the latter, the ancient to the Hindoos. In some the architecture presents a curious admixture of Hindoo and Arabic workmanship. The form, generally, is a square of equal sides, the entrance being through a highly ornamented door-way, which also possesses attractions of a military character. Round the sides are separate apartments, covered on the top, and open to the centre of the area within. In these places the traveller deposits his goods and sleeps. The attendants at these choultries are generally poor people, who supply the traveller with a small bedstead to sleep upon, for which the charge is, generally, about one penny of our money.

This choultry at Madura is of Hindoo origin, and no doubt was erected for the accommodation of pilgrims to the sacred places in that ancient city, and also to the island where Rama, the conqueror of Ceylon, performed, we fear, his not over immaculate devotions. But, as we hinted before, we cannot enter into minutiae. The architecture of the Hindoos is very peculiar. This much, however, we may say, that the Egyptian, Hindoo, and Arabic, also the Gothic styles of architecture, are not copies of each other, but the spontaneous production of genius in different countries,—the older and younger brothers and sisters of the same family, conceived, and developed to more or less grandeur or perfection, from studies of the models to be found in artificial Egyptian, Hindoo, and other grottoes and caverns.

The pyramid, the obelisk, the spire-steeple, the minaret, are evidently bold imitations of the romantic forms of spire-towering rocks. The flat-roofed, hundred-pillared Egyptian temple, the Hindoo temple and choultry, are evidently copies of the numerous caverns, cool grottoes, and excavations, which are to be found on the banks of the Nile, in Upper Egypt, and in the islands of Elephanta and Salsel, near Bombay. Gloom and darkness are common, and best suited to both; for the imagination is best impressed when involved in the veil of obscurity. The arched vault and lofty dome were suggested to the Hindoos and Egyptians by the natural forms of caverns. And the same may be said of the more modern Moorish and Gothic temples. If the single or grouped pillars in the Hindoo or Egyptian buildings should appear heavy, it must be borne in mind that the idea of them was originally borrowed from the massive props to mountains, and that the first adaptation of a natural form to an artificial purpose would be retained in use until experience and cultivated taste had suggested the more pleasing proportions, lightness, and harmony of the Gothic style.

ALLAN MENTEITH.

In the middle of the fifteenth century, the kingdom of Scotland could not lay claim to the intellectual character for which it is now proverbial among all countries; although, considering its narrow limits and the internal discords with which for centuries it had been agitated, it had nevertheless produced some master spirits, who will for ever live in the records of genius. But a mental darkness prevailed generally over all classes, and especially among the peasantry. Learning existed only in abbeys and monasteries, and it was the interest of the priesthood to withhold it from the people, the better to enable them to exercise their domination, and indulge their sensual appetites. Later times have, however, shown us that "knowledge is indeed power," and that the gown and rosary are regarded with respect, but not terror—that religion is received with a wary yet serious consideration, but that all sectarian intolerance is rebuked with a fearless spirit. "The church and the state," as they are coupled in England, are fast parting fellowship—tithes, stipends, pluralities, and a host of other clerical impositions, are in many cases now merely nominal—and "the fathers of the church" begin to bow to the supremacy of intellect, and are compelled to confine themselves solely to the duties of their spiritual calling. At the period at which we lay our story, it is well known that the Roman church was the religion of the land, and that its priests were arrogant and designing in the extreme. The kingdom of Scotland was also divided by civil discord—and the peasantry of its highlands were the vassals or clansmen of various chiefs. These were a race entirely destitute of mental culture, and plunged in the lowest depths of superstition; even the chiefs themselves were men of little or no learning, and holding their titles from the antiquity of birth and their prowess in arms—yet all more or less tinged with the superstitions and legends of their country. Allan Menteith, the hero of our story, was the second son of a chieftain of that name, whose father dying in his infancy, and the title descending to the eldest son, the care of Allan devolved upon a widowed aunt, who lived on the confines of the Highlands, on a large and wealthy estate. The child of her sister, and almost the only relative for which she retained an affection, it is scarcely necessary to assert that she indulged his whims and caprices to an unbounded extent; and by the time that Allan had reached the age of manhood, he was addicted to every extravagance and vice that the locality of the place afforded him. Through the interest of his aunt and some powerful relatives, a commission was obtained for him in the army of Queen Mary—where, among the younger branches of the noble families of that period, his heedless propensities were encouraged and fostered, till they left him so embarrassed, that his frequent calls upon his aunt for pecuniary relief were ultimately met with a refusal. His credit gone, his desires ungratified, he felt reckless of all around him, and hesitated not, at any sacrifice, to procure the means to carry out his views. At one period he had become acquainted with Murdoch M'Ivor, a man of dissolute habits, and who for many years had been known in the neighbourhood where his aunt resided, as one of the most daring caterans or freebooters which the Highlands held. This individual had been once strongly suspected of having committed a robbery on the premises of Lady Alice, Allan's aunt; and although it could not be brought directly home to him—he having contrived to effect his escape—yet it was firmly believed he was the robber; and indeed such was actually the fact—for, in connivance with Allan, he had been admitted into the premises, and the most valuable pieces of family plate extracted and converted into money, which the two had shared between them. M'Ivor had thus the young Highlander completely in his power; and whenever he found himself in difficulty, he applied for aid to Allan, which if refused, he threatened to reveal the robbery to his aunt. For above two years had M'Ivor thus held his victim in the thrall, and instead of abating in his demands, was only the more importunate and greedy. A sudden cessation of hostilities about this time had given the young soldier an opportunity to pay a visit to his aunt; and he felt grateful, if for nothing else, that he should for a short period thus escape from the presence and demands of the villain M'Ivor. A brief rebuke from his affectionate aunt for his extravagance was all that he received, and her heart was as open to him as ever. For many months he had resided at the home of his childhood, enjoying the sports of the field, and regarded by all the tenantry of his relative with respect and kindness—while his winning manners and bold and handsome figure were admirably calculated to make a favourable impression upon the maidens of the neighbourhood; yet there was ever a thoughtful and moody expression upon his features—his eye, dark as the wing of the raven, was never steadily fixed upon any one object, but its constant wandering betrayed a mind that was ill at ease—yet withal he was a manly and gallant youth. His costume was that of the Highlander of those times. The tartan kilt, which came to the knee, betrayed the proportions of a limb worthy of an Apollo; his coat, of the same material, cut so as to expose his neck, which was of exquisite symmetry, and when not browned by the sun of summer, was as white as the snows of his native mountains. His features were of just and beautiful proportion—his hair was of the hue of the yellow harvest, while the peaked Gaelic bonnet, plumed with the wing of the eagle, surmounted a brow broad and smooth. The chequered hose, which rose midway above his ankle, were fastened with garters of crimson ribbons, a brogue of russet leather encased each foot, clasped by large silver buckles—while overall was thrown, in graceful negligence, a plaid of ample dimensions. Thus equipped, of him it might be said—

So stately his form and so noble his face,
That never a hall such a galliard did grace:

or rather, never were the heather breasts of his mountains trodden by a nobler form.

Among the youthful beauties of Glenlyon valley, was one who was esteemed the gem of maiden loveliness—Catherine Graham. On her had Allan in his days of boyhood looked kindly; and now that he was returned a man and a soldier, he deemed that the simple heart of the maiden would be easily captivated; but pure affection reigned not in his bosom—vice had sapped it to the foundation, and deep and dark designs against her innocence were by him meditated. In vain did he seek to win her ear—in vain did he vow that she was his only idol; but the maiden had already plighted her vows, in the presence of heaven, to Donald Kenmore, cousin of Allan, and also a dependent of Lady Alice. Indignant at thus being foiled in his machinations, a deep and deadly hatred took possession of his heart, and he resolved to blight the character of his cousin in the eyes of his aunt, and thus, if possible, accomplish the easier his design upon the maiden. To effect this, he one night entered the chamber of his aunt while she was bound in slumber, and bore from it a valuable bracelet, the gift of her deceased husband, at the same time dropping behind him the bonnet of Donald—so that suspicion was naturally enough fastened upon the poor youth: who, being accused of the theft, and although no other evidence of guilt could be produced against him, save the circumstance of his bonnet having been found in the apartment, he was condemned, and committed to prison.

Poor Catherine, almost heart-broken, and knowing well that her lover was innocent, pleaded with the Lady Alice for pardon—but the apparent ingratitude of the youth made her deaf to all entreaty; and so, as a last resource, she condescended to make application to Allan to use his interest in behalf of his poor cousin.

"On one condition," he replied, "I will. Transfer your affections from Donald to me, and I will prevail upon my aunt to procure his release from prison."

The eyes of Catherine flashed with contempt, the blood mounted to her face, and her whole frame shook with indignation.

"Mean, contemptible being!" she exclaimed; "none but one who is unworthy of any woman's hand, would dare to proffer such terms to an affianced maiden! What! exchange virtue for vice, truth for deceit, honour for disgrace? Never! sooner would I link myself to the festering remnants of mortality, and be entombed alive, than exchange my Donald's love for the cold and selfish heart that beats within thy bosom!" And, rushing from the apartment, she left Allan confounded and speechless.

He was standing in that position, when a servant entered and placed a packet in his hand. He started when he beheld the superscription. "Ah! 'tis from Murdoch!" he exclaimed, and staggered breathless to a chair. For some minutes he sat with his eyes vacantly fixed upon it, then mechanically broke the seal, and read as follows:

"It is already three weeks past the time appointed when I was to have received the money which you promised. But you thought that, by flying from the city, you would avoid me! 'Twas a vain thought! Oceans cannot part us! The deepest solitude on earth cannot hide you from my searching eye! We are bound together by the indissoluble ties of crime; and when one falls, so must the other. I am now in the neighbourhood. In two days I shall expect the promised stipend: you will find me at the Pine Crag, beyond Saint Swithin's Cave. If you fail me, infamy will claim thee for its own!"

There was no signature; but too well did Allan know the hand, and the truth of its contents. "Horror!" he exclaimed. "I am in the coils of the serpent! 'Tis in vain to struggle! I must bow me to my destiny! But how to acquire the sum? I am almost penniless! And to ask my aunt would but incur her censure—knowing well that I have here no temptation to cause any waste of money. Yet he must be satisfied, at every hazard! But how? By what means?" And he glanced his eyes around the apartment, as if seeking to find an unexpected treasure. At length they alighted upon a large iron chest. "Ah! the fiend is ever with the wicked!" he exclaimed. "That box has stood my friend already! Murdoch and I have revelled jocosely upon its contents! It must serve me again! But how to procure the key?" And he paused, as if communing with himself the means how to obtain it.

At that moment a flash of lightning, followed by a loud peal of thunder, roused him from his reverie. "Ah! the heavens are warning me against the deed!" he cried. "I will seek Murdoch, and brave the worst! But where—where is he to be found?" And he again looked at the letter. "At the Pine Crag, beyond St. Swithin's Cave." "Saint Swithin's Cave!" he murmured to himself. Then started, as if some sudden thought had flashed across his brain. "The time—the hour! Yes, yes; my star is propitious! To-night I will seek the page of futurity! 'Tis the eve of Halloween! and, according to the legend of the cave, the mortal who is bold enough to speak the charm shall find three answers to three questions. If I remember rightly, 'tis thus runs the legend:

He who dares sit in Saint Swithin's chair,
When the night hag wings the troubled air,
Questions three, if speaks the spell,
He may ask, and she must tell.

Yes! by the fiends of darkness, I will dare to know my fate! 'Tis already evening—the clouds are full of storm—no prying fool will be abroad to mark my movements, and unseen I may seek the counsel of the hag! If it be good, then shall I be happy, and life will be worth living for; if evil, why then I know the worst—and better to be mouldering in my grave than to live upon the rack of dread uncertainty—to feel the harpy of crime for ever gnawing at my heart, and know that I am at the mercy of a villain! Yes—this moment will I seek her counsel!" And he rushed from the apartment, pale, haggard, and desperate. The rain fell in torrents. The heavens were wrapped in the sheeted lightnings, and the artillery of heaven rolled louder and louder, as if thundering their vengeance against him who sought to penetrate the secrets of futurity.

The cave of Saint Swithin stood upon the borders of a broad and deep Highland lake, formed of basaltic pillars, through which the waters entered to some depth, and when chafed by a tempest, used to make the hollow arches and rifted crevices echo with a mournful and terrific sound. That night the waters lashed and roared as if the demons of destruction were waging war upon their bosoms. With difficulty did Allan gain the cave by a narrow pathway, which, winding around the base of the mountain, led to a small opening which conducted into its heart. Deep and impenetrable darkness reigned throughout, save when the lightning for a moment irradiated its walls, and showed the waves heaving and swelling, tipped with their feathery foam. In one corner of the cave was a rude seat, formed by nature out of the solid rock, like a large Gothic chair; and, according to the legend which from time immemorial had existed among the inhabitants, had been once the seat of the Saint Swithin, to whom innumerable virtues as well as evils were attributed—but none greater than the one contained in the episode quoted in our story. To this Allan directed his trembling footsteps; and, seating himself in it, with beating heart and trembling lips pronounced the following:

By the sacred blood of Saint Swithin bold,
When his naked foot traced the midnight wold,
I call thee, fiend, to appear this night,
And to me reveal thy promised plight.

Strange and unearthly voices rose upon the blast, the wind swept through the cavern with terrific fury, a bright flame rose from the water, and the form of a tall and hideous-looking woman stood before him. In her hand she held the branch of a pine; her hair was grizzled, and fell in thick masses over her naked shoulders and bosom, displaying only a skeleton form, covered with shrivelled skin; her eyes gleamed with an unearthly brightness, and her deep and sepulchral voice fell on the ear of Allan like the knell of death, while she said:

"Behold! True to the spell thou hast spoken this night, I come to reveal my promised plight."

"Ah! it is so?" exclaimed Allan. "Am I, then, in the presence of the night hag?"

"Yes! Bold mortal, thou hast severed the seal that bound thy future destiny! Speak thy wishes, and I will answer thee."

"Then be it so!" cried Allan—desperation taking the place of terror in his heart. "Tell me, shall I ever not find the means to satisfy my enemy, Murdoch M'Ivor?"

"Thou shalt!" exclaimed the hag.

"And in two days?"

"In two days!" replied she.

"And by what means?" asked Allan.

"By blood!" screamed the fiend; and a loud laugh burst from her bosom.

"Horrible!—horrible! And by whom shall that blood be shed?" cried Allan.

"I cannot tell. Three answers hast thou already had! The spell is broken!"

A loud clap of thunder burst in the heavens; the cave shook to its foundation, as if crumbling into pieces, and all again was darkness.

For several minutes Allan was unconscious of what had taken place; and when he began gradually to recover his senses, and the doubtful issue of his mission flashed upon his mind, he would have given worlds, had he possessed them, not to have pried into the book of futurity. Slowly, and with trembling steps, he regained his aunt's mansion. But sleep was denied to him. His villany to his poor cousin hung upon his heart, and filled him with remorse; and he resolved that in the morning he would solicit for his release. He did so: his suit was fortunate, and before the noon Donald was at liberty.

That day, according to custom, Lady Alice was seated in the family hall, to receive her numerous tenantry, who came to pay their yearly rents. In a corner, apart from the others, sat Allan, apparently perusing a book with intense interest—but his mind was otherwise occupied. The mysterious answers of the fiend, the dread of exposure should he not be able to meet the demands of Murdoch, and the gnawings of a guilty conscience, all were busy within him. Tenant after tenant arrived, each producing his stipulated sum to the Lady Alice. The dark eye of Allan might be seen occasionally to glance to the piles of gold and silver which heaped the table, then quickly turn to the page again.

"Ah!" thought he, "but a little part of that would suffice to set my mind at rest!" and device was soon at work in his guilty bosom.

Before the business of the day was closed the evening had come, and Lady Alice, after bidding her tenantry adieu, who were now enjoying her hospitality, and once more receiving Donald to her bosom—whom in her heart she had never fairly considered guilty—ordered the books and papers to be deposited in the iron chest which we have before alluded to, and where was kept the family plate; then, collecting the money in a leathern bag, she carried it with her to her chamber for better security, till she was able next morning to count it correctly.

To a late hour the guests kept together, and when at last they departed, the only one who remained aloof was Allan. He had retired to his chamber, but his mind was fixed upon the accomplishment of a certain act—an act of crime—the robbery of his aunt. He determined by the deed to evade the commission of murder, which the night hag had prophesied would befall him; and he thought that if he could enter his aunt's chamber, as he had already done, and secure the sum that was necessary for the defrayment of Murdoch's tax, from the money yet unaccounted, he might escape detection, hush the avarice of Murdoch, and again be happy. Foolish hope! what can cover crime? Nothing!

It was now midnight, and with a silent and stealthy pace he descended from his room, and, gaining the door of his aunt's, quietly undid the latch. The low breathing of the worthy matron fell upon his ear like the accusing voice of justice—his heart beat audibly against his breast: he paused, his resolution seemed to forsake him—he was about to return, but the form of Murdoch stood before his fevered sight, the finger of dishonour seemed to point at him: the angel of repentance fled from his bosom, and he was again in the toils of the tempter. He gained the table, and, passing his hand over it, to his confusion found that the prize was not there. Where—where could she have placed it? At that moment the moon burst brightly from behind a cloud, darting its beams into the apartment with a brilliancy almost equal to that of day. Allan beheld his aunt reclining sweetly in slumber, a smile was playing on her aged features, and he thought that in the breathings of her sleep she murmured a blessing upon his name. From beneath her pillow he saw the sought-for treasure; but how to secure it? no matter, it must be done—and cautiously he slipped the wallet from its resting-place; but slight as was the motion, it was enough to awaken the Lady Alice: she sprang from her pillow, and uttered a loud scream. Allan was endeavouring to escape from the room, but the light of the moon revealed his figure.

"Ah! Allan, is it you?" she exclaimed; "would you rob your aunt?"

It was plain he was discovered—disgrace was for ever upon him: there was no way left to bury the secret but by her death. Murder at once took possession of his heart: he seized his dirk, and the next moment buried it in the heart of Alice.

Her screams had aroused the household, who were now heard hurrying towards the chamber. How to conceal himself he knew not—he rushed into the hall: there stood the old iron chest—he knew the secret spring that unlocked it: he touched it, the lid flew open, and, springing into it, drew the lid down, and thus lay secure from observation.

The first who reached the chamber of Lady Alice was young Donald, who beheld the wallet lying on the floor, which in his terror Allan had left behind him. He seized it, and the domestics, entering and finding him there with it in his hand, their mistress murdered, and horror rendering him pale and speechless, at once concluded that he was the assassin. His former crime, which by many had been disbelieved, was now fully credited—and the ill-starred Donald was arrested as the murderer of the Lady Alice.

The authorities of that time were most summary in the execution of the laws; and next day, in the hall, Donald was arraigned for trial. All testified to the situation in which they found him, and it was evident to every one that he had deprived his aunt of life, for the purpose of possessing himself of the money collected for the rents the day previous. But yet Allan was missing—he could be nowhere found. Had he, too, been destroyed for the better purpose of advancing the views of the cruel Donald? Poor Allan! but yesterday he had obtained the release of the murderer from gaol—alas! but to destroy thy aunt, and perhaps thy noble self!

In brief, Donald was doomed the following morning to suffer death; and the poor youth was on the eve of being carried to prison from the hall, when a female voice, in loud tones, was heard exclaiming:

"This way! villain, you shall not escape me! Help—help—help! here is the murderer!"

All eyes were directed to the quarter whence the voice came, and Catherine Graham burst into the hall, pale and almost exhausted, dragging with her the villain Murdoch, and followed by a crowd of people.

"What means this, girl?" exclaimed the judge. "Who is that man whom you have dragged hither?"

"He is the murderer!" cried Catherine; "the assassin of Lady Alice! he that was seen lurking about this place two years ago, when the family plate was stolen from that iron chest!"

Several individuals testified at once to his identity. "Speak, fellow! what know you of the murder?" demanded the judge.

"Nothing!" replied Murdoch, sulkily.

"How came you in this quarter at the very time that murder had been committed?"

"I came to see—to see —," and Murdoch looked around, thinking that he would recognise Allan.

"To see whom? Speak, sirrah!"

"Why to see an old crony of mine, Allan Menteith!"

A deep cry of astonishment ran throughout the crowd, while the judge continued:

"And for what purpose?"

"Why, to receive payment of a small bond which was owing by him unto me!" replied Murdoch.

"What was the nature of that bond?"

"That is a secret between ourselves!" replied the ruffian.

"Were you ever in these parts before?"

"Why, yes—I think I was!"

"And on what occasion?"

"Why to see my friend Allan, to be sure! Have you aught more to ask of me?"

"Yes! and expect that you will answer without prevarication: on your truth depends your acquittal."

"Humph!" muttered Murdoch, doggedly.

"You were in this neighbourhood when the family plate was stolen from yonder chest, some two years ago?"

"I was!"

"And you were the person that did it?"

"'Tis false!" shouted Murdoch, in a voice of thunder; "'tis false! it was not me: it was —" and he paused suddenly, as if afraid of revealing the secret.

"Who? Speak, fellow! your life depends on your answer!" replied the judge.

"Why, then, if I must tell, it was my young friend, Allan Menteith!"

A thrill of horror burst from the crowd.

"How! Allan Menteith! 'tis impossible! you wish to exculpate yourself by casting the guilt upon an innocent man! Were Allan here, you would not dare to say this; besides, I suspect you have murdered him as well as the Lady Alice!"

"Murder! No—no! I am bad enough, but my hands are yet free from blood! Allan not to be found—'tis singular! I could stake my neck against a halter that he is not far from here!" said Murdoch.

"We shall look to that hereafter," continued the judge.

"But you confess that you were accessory to the stealing of the late, some two years since?"

"I do!"

"I remember it was said that there was a secret spring to the chest, which must have been known to the parties; if, therefore, what you say be true, prove it by pointing out that spring."

"Ha—ha—ha!" laughed Murdoch. "That I can easily do! make way there, and I'll show you!"

The domestics stood aside, and the ruffian, approaching the chest, touched a spring: the lid flew open—and the body of Allan Menteith was discovered, cold and lifeless, from suffocation.

Terror and amazement stood on every countenance, and the evidence of Murdoch, with other circumstances, showed that Allan was the murderer, and Donald innocent.

More need not be said: the tale is told, gentle reader, which shows that if there are indeed supernatural agents, and mortals seek their help, they will find that they but "keep the word of promise to our ear, and break it to our hopes."

ESSAYS.

NO. CLXXXVII.—HOW TO MAKE MONEY.

THE reproach implied by the saying, "Get money, honestly if you can—but get money;" no longer applies to the pursuit of wealth, in the estimation of a clear-headed, right-hearted people. For "How to Make Money" is a science governed by exact and rigid principles, and elucidated by unerring rules.

And in order to carry the sympathies of our readers along with us in the course of this article, we must preface it with the observation—that it has been found and tested, by the experience of ages, that the men who have made the most money are the greatest and most useful members of society. And in support of this position, we cheerfully adopt the testimony of Mr. Gilbart, so well known from his treatises on monetary and economical doctrines. In one of his lectures on ancient coinage, he says: "'Tis not correct that the possession of wealth honestly acquired has any tendency either to enervate the intellect, to corrupt the morals, or impair the happiness of man. The fact is the reverse. 'Tis poverty which is the source of crime—'tis poverty which is the great barrier to the acquisition of knowledge—'tis poverty which is the great source of human woe. If you wish to increase your knowledge, increase your wealth—you will then have more leisure to study, and be better able to purchase the means of instruction. If you wish to increase your virtue, increase your wealth—you will then have a higher character to support, and fewer and less powerful temptations to act dishonourably and disreputably. If you wish to increase your happiness, increase your wealth—you will then have more numerous sources of pleasure, and, above all, you will be able to indulge in the luxury of doing good. Away, then, with the notion that wealth is an evil. If wealth be an evil, industry is a vice—for the tendency of industry is to produce wealth. If wealth be an evil, commerce should be abandoned—for the object of commerce is to acquire wealth. But wealth is not an evil. However much the doctrine may have been countenanced by mistaken moralists and dreaming poets, it has never been generally acted upon—for it is one opposed to the common sense of mankind. Both to individuals and nations, wealth is a blessing."

Few in the present day will refuse to acknowledge the soundness of these remarks; but as it is still too much the fashion to decry wealth, and endeavour to refer the progress from savage to civilised life to causes per se extraneous and incidental, we quote the opinion of that polished writer and brilliant philosopher, Sir Humphrey Davy on this extremely important point.

"Persons in general attribute to statesmen and warriors," wrote he, "a much greater share in the work of improving and civilising the world than really belongs to them. What they have done is in reality little. The beginning of civilisation is the discovery of some useful arts by which men acquire property, comforts, or luxuries. The necessity or desire of preserving them leads to laws and social institutions. The discovery of peculiar arts gives superiority to particular nations, and the love of power induces them to employ this superiority to conquer other nations, who learn their arts, and ultimately adopt their manners: so that in reality, the origin as well as the progress and improvement of civil society, is founded in mechanical and chemical inventions. No people have ever arrived at any degree of perfection in their institutions who have not possessed in a high degree the useful and refined arts."

The dignity of wealth, and of every honourable occupation connected with the pursuit of it, having been triumphantly asserted—for no man can start in the race with any chance of success unless he believes in his heart and soul that he is engaged in an honourable enterprise—we are immediately introduced to the question, "how to make money?" that is, how to earn it, how to deserve it, and how to accumulate it. And first of all, we would say, that to make money is not only a natural but one of the highest moral obligations. Not in the shape of the mere acquisition of property, but as a means of obtaining and diffusing happiness. Wealth is valueless, except as far as it will satisfy human wants and multiply human enjoyments. But the pursuit of wealth in itself is a source of happiness. It occupies, invigorates, and enlarges the mind, its usefulness promotes self-respect, and its results, if successful—which they may be under proper management—increase the power of doing the good the brain conceives and the heart desires.

The history of our race is a record of a protracted pursuit of happiness. Men have traversed the whole cycle of imaginary good in search of it: they have sought it in glory, ambition, fanaticism, pleasure, action, repose, science, philosophy—at the shrine of paganism—on the sands of Asia—beneath the banners of the Cross—in the midst of luxurious indulgences—in the cloisters of monks—yea, they have invoked the seven spirits to teach them happiness; and, like the remorse-stricken hunter of the Alps, have been answered—"It is not in our essence—in our skill." Philosophy was summoned, at an early day, to point out the way. For more than a thousand years she preached to men to elevate their minds above all physical comforts—to condemn all useful improvements—to seek their happiness in the study of abstract science and metaphysical speculation; but, alas! it was impossible to "solve insoluble enigmas," or attain unattainable frames of mind. About the sixteenth century, a different doctrine was promulgated. The multiplication of human enjoyments, and the mitigation of human suffering, were held up as the only aims worthy of philosophy; and the invention of things useful as the highest exercise of intellect. In less than two centuries results have been realised that have outstripped human belief, as they have surpassed human experience.

The progress of the age is now a household phrase; and, in so far as happiness depends on the earnest, energetic engagement of the mind in any pursuit—on personal freedom—on good laws—on increased duration of life—on mitigation of pain—on improvements in the healing art—on facilities of locomotion and correspondence—on the comforts and convenience of life—this new philosophy has contributed vastly to the happiness of mankind. But as it owes the greater portion of its splendid developments to the pursuit and consequent increase of wealth, we should not be dazzled by the fruit to the total neglect of the tree that bore it, or the soil in which that tree was planted and flourished.

Take two conditions in the state of Europe to illustrate our meaning. On the 29th of May, 1453, the Turks entered Constantinople by the gate of St. Romanus, and the final destruction of the once magnificent empire of Rome was completed. The crescent trampled on the cross. Now what was the state of Europe at that time, that such desecration should have been perpetrated in Christendom by a horde of rude Asiatic warriors? Aeneas Sylvius, afterwards Pius II., solves the mystery in a few nervous sentences. He describes Europe in the fifteenth century, "as a body without a head—a republic without laws or magistrates. Every state has a separate prince, and every prince a separate interest. What eloquence could unite so many discordant and hostile powers under the same standard? What mortal could reconcile the English with the French—Genoa with Arragon—the Germans with the natives of Hungary and Bohemia? If a small number enlisted in the holy war, they must be overthrown by the infidels—if many, by their own weight and confusion."

In fact, Europe at that time was utterly prostrated. It had no science—no literature—no arts—and, to aggravate its distress, the fall of the Eastern empire ruined its commerce.

At the close of the same century America was discovered, and the new route to India by the Cape of Good Hope adopted. From the year of the latter discovery the power of the Turks declined. They ceased to be masters of the commerce of the age; and commercial enterprise taking and forming new as well as independent channels, formed conditions which necessitated the birth and growth of an enlarged intelligence—the cultivation of the arts and sciences—the multiplication of the means of subsistence—and, above all, created conditions which led to the inventive glories of this and the two preceding generations. So that aggregate Europe now, instead of being, as in the fifteenth century, powerless, only for broils and evil, is almost unapproachably grand. Grand in its commerce—its arts—its sciences—its literature—its intellect—its people are surrounded by the imperishable glories of knowledge and energy. But those glories would waste and fade into dim tradition, were it not for industry—for application—for trade—for commerce—for the powers of production, from the smallest pin-head or fragment of yarn up to the enormous iron girder, or the gorgeous shawl that covers the shoulders of majesty itself.

Labour is the source of all wealth, and when its fruits are properly distributed and rationally enjoyed, must be equally the source of every happiness which man, by his unaided exertions, can realise. When we say this, we do not exclude religion from the category of man's duties. On the contrary, knowing that the most industrious men are the most religious, we believe religion to be an essential element of happiness. Without the religious feeling, a man cannot enjoy any real happiness, though he have the intellect of a Shakespeare, Milton, or Pascal, or the wealth of a Rothschild. But religion, although indispensable, is not all-sufficient for happiness in this life. Man was not created to spend his whole time in fasting and prayer.

A recluse, it is said, living in the early ages of Christianity, betook himself to a cave, in Upper Egypt, which, in the time of the Pharaohs, had been a depository of the mummies; and there lived to pray, to converse with the spirits of the dead, to mortify himself, eating only dates and drinking only the water of the Nile. At length, becoming weary of life, he prayed one day more fervently than ever, and then sinking exhausted into a profound sleep, there appeared to him an angel in a dream, commanding him to rise, and cut down a neighbouring palm-tree and make a rope of its fibres—after which, the angel promised to appear to him again. Upon awaking, the hermit instantly resolved to obey the vision, and, travelling for many days from place to place, in search of an axe, he found himself happier than he had been for many years. His prayers, though shorter and fewer than those he had been accustomed to offer, outmeasured them in fervour and effect. Having returned with the axe, he cut down the tree, and with much labour and assiduity for a long time prepared the fibres to make the rope, and, by daily occupation, after some weeks he had completed the command. According to promise, the celestial visitor that night appeared again, and said: "Dominico, thou art no longer weary of life, but happy. Know, then, that man was made for labour as well as for prayer: the one being not less essential to his welfare than the other. Arise in the morning, take the cord, gird up thy loins, go forth into the world, and let it be a memorial to thee, that God expects from man, if he would be happy, a course duly adjusted both to his animal and to his spiritual nature."

A man who desires to make a wise disposition of his time should so regulate it as to give to each of the great sources of happiness—religion, knowledge, and business—its proportionate share of his attention, and not allow his mind to become absorbed in any one of them, to the exclusion of the others. It is a union that is eminently practicable, and the result will be happiness.

It is a degrading as well as erroneous idea that business—and by that term, of course we include every description of mechanical and industrial labour—we say it is degrading, as well as erroneous, to imagine that business is inconsistent with the highest degree of mental and moral culture.

On the contrary, it has been proved over and over again, that as a nation is rendered prosperous by industry, so is an individual. It is idleness that is the bane of society—the great rat eating his way through the walls, flooring, and ceiling of the soul, and nibbling away the whole structure, bit by bit. What does Solomon, the wisest, and, as Byron said of the great Napoleon, perhaps "not the worst of men," enunciate on this very subject? His Book of Proverbs teems with exhortations to industry as the road to happiness, and denunciations against idleness as the path to misery. Let those who would sillily sneer against trade and commerce—in fact, business, whatever be its nature—ponder over the following gems from the pen of the regal moralist:

He that loveth the diligent maketh rich.

He that loveth pleasure shall be a poor man; he that loveth wine and oil shall not be rich.

The drunkard and glutton shall come to poverty, and drowsiness shall clothe a man with rags.

He that tilleth his land shall be satisfied with bread; but he that followeth after vain persons shall have poverty enough.

He that is slothful in his work is brother to him that is a great waster.

A prudent man foreseeth the evil and hideth himself; but the simple pass on and are punished.

The sluggard shall not plough by reason of the cold; therefore shall he beg in harvest and have nothing.

Love not sleep, lest thou come to poverty. Open thine eyes and thou shalt be satisfied with bread.

In all labour there is profit; but the talk of the lips tendeth only to penury.

But to the wise it is needless to defend industrial pursuits from attacks from any artificial elevation in society. The popular notions that poverty is an evil, and wealth a blessing, are irresistible; but to the wavering, and those who have an imperfect idea of the real nature of business—who fancy that trade and commerce are pitfalls into which it is scarcely possible for the spiritual man to escape falling—we would say that a man must possess great strength of moral principle, and an enlarged intellect, to carry on an extended business with a reasonable hope of success. Business is, in truth, a test of virtue—a fiery furnace to principle. He who passes his days in studious ease—holding converse with the spirits of the great dead, or meditating on abstract truths—and only sees life through the window of his study, knows nothing of trial, of danger, of temptation. He may be a swindler—a forger—a murderer, like Rush, and never suspect it.

But no man can pass many years in business without developing his character to his conscience, at least, if not to the world. If he be a man of weak understanding, he will become an habitual liar—if a man of lax moral principle, he will become a rogue, and consequently a bankrupt. If his conscience tells him that he is still a man of moral uprightness, he need fear no other trial. Let him, then, who is desirous of testing the strength of his principles, or improving and enlarging his moral nature by wholesome discipline, embark in trade. Let him who considers himself a skilful arbitrator, or adjudicator of nice questions in morals or metaphysics, place himself in a position where every day of his life he must adjust those in which he is an interested party. Let him who thinks himself a proficient in moral or mental arithmetic, try calculating a problem in which his liberty, his home, his fortune, are involved. Let him who is firmly convinced, from study and reflection, that business does not call for intellectual ability—that "any fool can get money"—embark his all in some business which cannot be conducted without giving credit, and we will undertake to say that in one year he would wish that whole hecatombs of dead authors might bury him from the sight of living men.

That trade is a severe trial to virtue—too severe for the endurance of all men—is no proof that it is unfavourable to moral growth. Life is a probation, and business may be designed as a means of perfecting the moral nature. But it is a proof that science and religion should come down from their "starry heights," and aid the poor sons of toil in their daily trials—that wisdom should make known not general principles merely, but rules that will be applicable to individual cases as they arise. It is a proof that preachers should preach a practical religion, and teachers teach a practical knowledge.

The steam-engine has been called a democrat. We would call it a radical reformer. It is destined to achieve as grand results in the moral and political world as it has in the material—to annihilate evils, as it has annihilated distance. There is no great social evil that will not disappear when the laws that make industry most productive are understood and applied to practice. The condition of the poor in our large towns no one can reflect upon without sorrow. But are there not millions of acres of uncultivated land in England, Wales, Scotland, and Ireland, without making a single reference to our unbounded colonial possessions? Are there not thousands of farmers who would be richer men if they employed more labour? Circulate, then, a knowledge of the true principles of business—convince farmers that labour will and must pay—and soon the demand for labour will be greater than the supply. There will be agents in all the large towns, whose business it will be to procure labourers for the country. One-tenth of the additional income that men might have, if they were wise in their business pursuits, would support all the unfortunate poor in the world.

Our main reliance, it will be perceived, in the moral progress of mankind, is found in those means which aim at the elevation of the business character. When men discover the great truth that no man is wise or safe but he that is honest—when they perceive clearly that virtue and knowledge will improve their chances of success in this life, and promote their present as well as their future happiness—they will not neglect the acquisition of knowledge, nor delay the practice of virtue. There is an identity of interest, a mutual dependence, an intimate relationship between all things that are good—and business prepares the way for the favourable reception of truth: as truth, virtue, and knowledge are the best friends of business. Idleness is a foe to virtue, and business conquers idleness. Poverty is an evil; but in the house of the industrious man "want may look in, but dares not enter." Charity is a virtue, and business gives the means, as well as the disposition, to be charitable. Public spirit is a virtue, and it flourishes best where trade is most respected. Honesty is a virtue—and the more nations are commercial, the more honest they are in their dealings. Patriotism is a virtue, and it exists in its purest vigour where men are free to get property, and where laws protect property. War is an evil. It is the same "man-slaying, blood-polluted, city-smiting god" now, as in the days of Homer; and we believe the genius of commerce alone can effectually stay the ravages of the sword. Commerce—an important branch of business—extends civilisation, equalises the comforts of life in all parts of the globe, circulates valuable discoveries in the arts and sciences, and stimulates invention. It is favourable to establishments of learning and religion, and everywhere it is identified with improvement—improvement in mind and manners—improvement in arts and letters—improvement in knowledge, in morals, in legislation, in laws, in liberty; and in all improvement it has led more than it has followed; it has been the pioneer much more than the fellow and companion of human advancement and civilisation.

Having, we think, written enough to vindicate trade and commerce—in fact, business of every profitable and honourable kind—from the aspersions which have been cast upon them by superficial thinkers, we will return to our proposition, that it is the duty of every one to endeavour to make money.

As bread is the staff of life, so is money the staff of industry. Every operation, every condition requires its agency. It is not merely the universal agent, the passport to honours, position, rank, opulence—but it is a positive necessity. It must be had; but the first thing to impress upon a young man starting in life is, that as it can be had honestly, so it must not only be acquired honestly, but the desire to obtain it must be founded in an honest feeling, a nice sense of honour. Whatever path he may select, he must start with a determination not only to be honest but honourable. He must bear in mind that, although a man cannot be an honourable man without being an honest man, yet a man may be strictly honest without being honourable. Honesty refers to pecuniary affairs—honour refers to the principles and feelings.

This distinction should be carefully preserved. It is the corner-stone of success in every undertaking.

The second impression to be firmly grasped is respect—deep, ineradicable, proud, lofty-minded, but unsophisticated respect—for the calling or pursuit selected. Without this, success is impossible, for in business, respect for it is the primary attachment that makes it considered worth following. And how can a man hope to accomplish anything for his own or others' benefit, unless he embarks in the undertaking with a hearty good-will, a cheerful disposition—indeed, a feeling or sentiment amounting to affection?

The third indispensable preliminary—probably the greatest—is the judicious choice of a profession or business. We reserve our remarks on the education and qualifications requisite for particular professions, businesses, and trades, for another essay; and on this occasion will only say, after agreeing with Pascal, that "the most important thing in life is the choice of a profession."

Be not over-nice in looking out for what may exactly suit you, but rather be ready to adopt any opportunities that may occur. Fortune does not stoop often to take up any one. Favourable opportunities will not happen precisely in the way you imagined. Nothing does. Do not be discouraged, therefore, by any present detriment in any course which may lead to something good.

The first question to be settled is—what is the object in choosing a business at all? The answer is obvious. To attain an independence. What is independence? The answer is as straightforward and pithy as in the other case. He who can make more than his necessities require him to expend, is as independent as the richest of the land, and generally far more happy. And then comes the grand question—"How can independence be obtained with the greatest certainty? And the reply in this case is equally as certain. No man is sure of being able to make more than his necessities will require him to expend, but he who is able to perform a day's labour. A trade is a sure road to independence." He that hath a trade hath an estate, and he that hath a calling, hath an office of profit and honour." Among the ancient Jews, every one, however well-educated, was brought up to a trade. At Sparta, there was a law declaring every one who refused to support his parents infamous; but, if the father had neglected to bring up his son to some trade, the son was not bound to maintain his father, although in want. We may add, that all useful employments by which a man can earn an honest living, are equally respectable in the estimation of every sensible person, and that all kinds of regular business pay equally well in the long run, to those who are capable of conducting them.

J. P. H.

HOW OLD ARE YOU?

CHAPTER I.

MARY SEYMOUR was a riddle, a pretty and a puzzling one. Her manner was changeable as an April day, and her looks, whether of brightness or gloom, so varied in expression, that it could hardly be told if they spoke the feelings of the woman or the girl. At one time she was seen romping with children, and then Mary almost seemed to be a child—her tossing hair, flushed cheek, and joyous eye indicating the light-hearted mirth of happy girlhood; at another, moving more staidly in the mazes of the dance, her slight but finely-rounded figure, slender waist, and budding bust vying in beauty with the fairest flirt that trod the lighted hall;—or seated, perhaps, at a distant table, her brow resting on her hand, her blue eye calm and thoughtful, and her features reposing in all the pensive sweetness of womanhood. It was hard to guess at Mary's age, and still more difficult to know how to address her. There were times when to treat her in any other manner than as a child would have seemed almost ridiculous; and others, when to do so would certainly have been rude. Her conversation, too, increased the perplexity—the ready laugh, playful remark, and perfect absence of all reserve, gave it occasionally the manner of a school-girl's; when perhaps the next moment it would become polished, sedate, and thoughtful,—and the little beauty a very prude. Everybody was charmed, but everybody was puzzled with Mary Seymour.

"Now, I declare," said Frank Euston, removing his eye-glass, "that girl looks more lovely every time I see her. Eglington, is she not beautiful?"

"Whom do you mean?" said the peer, yawning slightly.

"Mary Seymour, Lady Seymour's daughter —" "Pshaw!" replied the other, listlessly; "a child—a mere child—a 'bread-and-butter' darling! The beauties of the nursery, Euston, like those of the greenhouse, are always to me the most insufferable of bores."

"Nay, my dear fellow, she is without exception the finest girl in the room."

"Then marry her, Euston—marry her!" yawned his lordship; "add Mrs. Trimmer's works to your library, and advertise for a music-master!"

"By heaven, Eglington, I am serious,—I love the girl!"

Lord Eglington turned round in utter amazement.

"Euston," said he, "is there madness in your family?"

"Nonsense, Eglington; on my honour I will offer that girl my hand, and lay my fortune at her feet. I only wish I knew her age, for sometimes she looks so very girlish. Candidly, now, how old would you imagine her to be?"

"Really I have not the slightest idea—you had better ask herself. And, by all the saints, here she comes! and upon my word looks really pretty—very pretty indeed! Nay, I did not think she was a girl like that—There he goes!" soliloquised his lordship, perceiving his friend already at Mary's side. "And the lovely fairy meets him cordially, too—loves him, as I live—that glance and blush speak volumes—Euston is now in a fair way of making a fool of himself!"

Mary's glance was bright indeed, and her cheek flushed with pleasure, as, hanging on Euston's arm, she moved among the gay groups that crowded the saloon. Nor was he less delighted, although his pleasure was somewhat damped by his friend's idea of the extreme youth of his partner. "Mary," said he, almost inadvertently, "how old are you?"

The party addressed exhibited no surprise at the question, but, raising her smiling eyes to his, replied:

"Sixteen and a few months."

A thrill of joy ran through Euston's heart.

"Mary," said he, "I love you!"

Quick as thought the whole appearance of the maiden altered at the words, the blood rushed over her cheek and brow, she looked confused and dismayed, and seemed as though she wished to leave his side.

"Dearly, fondly love you," continued Euston, pressing the soft arm that lay linked within his own. "Wilt thou be my bride, Mary?" But Mary could not speak—her agitation increased, and Euston at her request led her to Lady Seymour, who, leaving the card-table in another room, had come in search of her daughter; and soon after he accompanied them to their carriage.

Euston, however, was not doomed to sue in vain—he inherited an ample estate and a noble name—many a match-making mother looked favourably upon him—and Lady Seymour only begged that a twelvemonth might pass ere he led her daughter to the altar. But Euston would hear of no such delay. Mary but feebly supported her mother: entreaties and protestations carried the day, and in six weeks Mary Seymour was a bride.

CHAPTER II.

"Do you go to the opera to-night, Mary?" said Frank Euston, as he sat one morning in a splendid apartment of his princely mansion in — square, a few years after his marriage.

"Undoubtedly. I take Lady Fairfield down. We return to the Countess of M —'s."

"Morning concert, rout, and opera in one day! Really, Mary, I wish you were more at home!"

"To admire the beauty of your yawns in the morning, and sit up night after night—silent and alone—waiting for your return! The inducements are certainly alluring!"

"There was a time," said Euston, gravely, "when I imagined that even that would have been preferred to the endless whirl of gaiety in which you are now engaged."

"Nay, Frank, dear, we have discussed this subject so very often, that it is needless to recur to it again. You forget I have only turned my twentieth year; and if I deny myself amusements now, pray when am I to have them? I am sure before marriage I had few or none!"

"Humph! before marriage!" repeated Euston, to himself, lolling in his chair. "Where do you go to-morrow?"

"To the Duchess of —'s."

"And next day?"

"I have half promised Mrs. Russell to attend her fête champêtre, which, however, I shall hardly be able to do, as I go to Almack's in the evening; and oh, that reminds me—I have purchased a pair of diamond ear-rings—quite a bargain—and such beauties!"

"Indeed! and pray what did they cost?"

"You'll see when they send the bill. I was so mortified last night with the shabby pair I wore—but these are really superb!"

"I am far from doubting it. But, Mary, you now consult me less and less. You have really forgotten that there is something in the marriage ceremony about love, honour, and obey?"

"My dear, dear Frank, you are strangely sententious this morning! But hark! who knocks? A cab; and your friend Lord Eglington; by-the-bye, they say he is going to be married. But I must be gone, for I have ten thousand little things to do." And away glided Euston's changed, but still beautiful wife.

"Ah, Eglington, how are you?"

"My dear fellow, I am so glad to have found you at home; but with such a wife as yours, one is hardly tempted to go much abroad. You are a happy dog, Euston!"

Mr. Frank Euston stretched out his legs, and looked at his slippers.

"Beautiful wife—young, doating—a first love, too! You have indeed been singularly fortunate!"

"Very!" said Euston, drily.

"You must have heard of my approaching marriage?"

"Only this instant; and I have yet to learn the lady's name."

"Lady Emma Singleton. You know her? Something of a flirt, eh?"

"So much the better, Eglington. It's a good omen."

"How the deuce do you make that out? For my own part, that very circumstance is the only drawback to my happiness."

"My dear Eglington, if you would marry prudently, marry one who has gone through a regular course of flirtation. All women are flirts at some period of their lives; and the disease, like the small-pox, is best to have taken place before marriage, were it only for the opportunity it gives you of judging of the marks. Rely upon it, that after marriage the scars are often plaguey deep."

"Why, now, I don't quite see that, Euston!"

"It's a fact, though, rely upon it. Your wife will have thus learned something of the vanity of these matters, and be disposed to appreciate the more highly your worth and attachment. I am serious, upon my honour."

"Now this sounds strangely enough from you, who, of all men, had used to be so romantic in regard to first attachments, and who it was, I verily believe, that so impressed my mind with the idea that the female heart which had, in the most remote degree, been possessed by another, was a ruined sanctuary, and unworthy of solicitude."

"If I said so, it was a grievous mistake, 'and grievously has Cæsar answered it!'"

"But then, my dear fellow, as to age. Emma is many years older—ten, at least—than Mary Seymour was when you married her; and, without expecting to be quite so happy as you in this respect—"

"It is a moderate wish, and the ambition pardonable," said Euston, leaning back in his chair, and thrusting his hands in his pockets.

"I would, however, prefer, I candidly confess, that my wife were sixteen rather than six-and-twenty."

"You would do wrong, then. Brides of sixteen, after all, answer better in romances than anywhere else; and rely upon it, Eglington, that, as the world goes, it is better that your wife should seek to conceal her age, than answer, without surprise or reserve, the odd and ugly question—"How old are you?"

THE TWO SISTERS.

THE pretty, square farm-house, standing at the corner where Kibes Lane crosses the brook, or the brook crosses Kibes Lane (for the first phrase, although giving by far the closest picture of the place, does, it must be confessed, look rather Irish), and where the aforesaid brook winds away by the side of another lane, until it spreads into a river-like dignity, as it meanders through the sunny plain of Hartly Common, and finally disappears amidst the green recesses of Perge Wood—that pretty, square farm-house, half hidden by the tall elms in the flower court before it, which, with the spacious garden and orchard behind, and the extensive barn, yards, and outbuildings, so completely occupies one of the angles formed by the crossing of the lane and the stream—that pretty farm-house contains one of the happiest and most prosperous families in Aberleigh—the large and thriving family of Farmer Evans.

Whether from skill or from good fortune—or, as is most probable, from a lucky mixture of both—everything goes right in his great farm. His crops are the best in the parish; his hay is never spoiled; his cattle never die; his servants never thieve; his children are never ill. He buys cheap, and sells dear; money gathers about him like a snow-ball; and yet, in spite of all this provoking and intolerable prosperity, everybody loves Farmer Evans. He is so hospitable, so good-natured, so generous, so homely! There, after all, lies the charm. Riches have not only not spoiled the man, but they have not altered him. He is just the same in look, and word, and way, that he was thirty years ago, when he and his wife, with two sorry horses, a little cow, and three pigs, began the world at Dean Gate, a little bargain of twenty acres, two miles off. Ay, and his wife is the same woman!—the same frugal, tidy, industrious, good-natured Mrs. Evans—so noted for her activity of tongue and limb, her good looks, and her plain dressing; as frugal, as good-natured, as active, and as plain-dressing Mrs. Evans at forty-five, as she was at nineteen, and, in a different way, almost as good-looking.

Their children—six "boys," as Farmer Evans promiscuously calls them, whose ages vary from eight to eight-and-twenty, and three girls, two grown up, and one, the youngest of the family—are just what might be expected from parents so simple and so good. The young men, intelligent and well-conducted; the boys, docile and promising; and the little girl, as pretty a curly-headed, rosy-cheeked poppet, as ever was the pet and plaything of a large family. It is, however, with the eldest daughters that we have to do.

Jane and Patty Evans were as much alike as hath often befallen any two sisters not born at one time; for, in the matter of twin children, there has been a series of puzzles ever since the days of Dromios. Nearly of an age (I believe that at this moment both are turned nineteen, and neither have reached twenty), exactly of a stature (so high that Frederick the Great would have coveted them for wives for his tall regiment)—with hazel eyes, large mouths, full lips, white teeth, brown hair, clear, healthy complexions, and that sort of nose which is neither Grecian nor Roman, nor aquiline, nor le petit nez retroussé, that some persons prefer to them all; but a nose which, moderately prominent, and sufficiently well-shaped, is yet, as far as I know, anonymous, although it be perhaps as common and as well-looking a feature as is to be seen on an English face.

Altogether, they were a pair of tall and comely maidens, and, being constantly attired in garments of the same colour and fashion, looked at all times so much alike, that no stranger ever dreamed of knowing them apart; and even their acquaintances were rather accustomed to think and speak of them generally as "the Evanses," than as the separate individuals Jane and Patty. Even those who did pretend to distinguish the one from the other, were not exempt from mistakes, which the sisters—Patty especially, who delighted in the fun so often produced by the unusual resemblance—were apt to favour by changing places in a walk, or slipping from one side to the other at a country tea-party, or playing a hundred innocent tricks to occasion at once a grave blunder and a merry laugh.

Old Dinah Goodwin, for instance—who, being rather purblind, was jealous of being suspected of seeing less clearly than her neighbours, and had defied even the Evanses to puzzle her discernment—seeking in vain on Patty's hand the cut finger which she had dressed on Jane's, ascribing the incredible cure to the merits of her own incomparable salve; and could hardly be undeceived, even by the pulling off of Jane's glove, and the exhibition of the lacerated digital sewed round by her own bandage.

Young George Bailey, too, the greatest beau in the parish, having betted at a Christmas party that he would dance with every pretty girl in the room, lost his wager (which Patty had overheard) by that saucy damsel's slipping into her sister's place, and persuading her to join her own unconscious partner; so that George danced twice with Patty, and not at all with Jane. A flattering piece of malice, which proved, as the young gentleman (a rustic exquisite of the first water) was pleased to assert, that Miss Patty was not displeased with her partner. How little does a vain man know of woman-kind! If she had liked him, she would not have played the trick for the mines of Golconda.

In short, from their school-days, when Jane was chidden for Patty's bad work, and Patty slapped for Jane's bad spinning, down to this, their prime of womanhood, there had been no end to the confusion produced by this remarkable instance of family likeness.

And yet Nature—who sets some mark of individuality upon even her meanest productions, making some unnoted difference between the lambs dropped from one ewe, the robins bred in one nest, the flowers growing on one stalk, and the leaves hanging from one tree—had not left these young maidens without one great and permanent distinction—a natural and striking dissimilarity of temper. Equally industrious, affectionate, happy, and kind; each was kind, happy, affectionate, and industrious, in a different way. Jane was grave; Patty was gay. If you heard a laugh or a song, be sure it was Patty; she who smiled, for certain was Patty; she who jumped the stile, when her sister opened the gate, was Patty; she who chased the pigs from the garden as merrily as if she were running a race, so that the pigs did not mind her, was Patty.

On the other hand, she that so carefully was making, with its own ravelled threads, an invisible darn in her mother's handkerchief, and hearing her little sister read the while; she that so patiently was feeding, one by one, two broods of young turkeys; she that so pensively was watering her own bed of delicate and somewhat rare flowers—the pale hues of the Alpine pink, or the alabaster blossoms of the white evening primrose, whose modest flowers, dying off into a blush, resemble her own character—was Jane.

Some of the gossips of Aberleigh used to assert, that Jane's sighing over the flowers, as well as the early steadiness of her character, arose from an engagement to my lord's head gardener, an intelligent, sedate, and sober young Scotchman. Of this I know nothing. Certain it is, that the prettiest and newest plants were to be found in Jane's little flower border; and if Mr. Archibald MacLane did sometimes come to look after them, I do not see that it was any business of anybody's.

In the meantime, a visitor of a different description arrived at the farm. A cousin of Mrs. Evans had been as successful in trade as her husband had been in agriculture, and he had now sent his only son to become acquainted with his relations, and to spend some weeks in their family.

Charles Foster was a fine young man, whose father was neither more nor less than a rich linen-draper in a great town; but whose manners, education, mind, and character, might have done honour to a far higher station. He was, in a word, one of nature's gentlemen; and in nothing did he more thoroughly show his own taste and good breeding, than by entering entirely into the homely ways and old-fashioned habits of his country cousins. He was delighted with the simplicity, frugality, and industry, which blended well with the sterling goodness and genuine abundance of the great English farm-house. The young women especially pleased him much. They formed a strong contrast with anything he had met with before. No finery—no coquetry—no French—no piano! It is impossible to describe the sensation of relief and comfort with which Charles Foster, sick of musical misses, ascertained that the whole dwelling did not contain a single instrument, except the bassoon on which George Evans was wont, every Sunday at church, to excruciate the ears of the whole congregation. He liked both sisters. Jane's softness and considerateness engaged his full esteem; but

FACETIÆ.

Patty's innocent playfulness suited best with his own high spirits and animated conversation. He had known them apart, from the first; and indeed denied that the likeness was at all puzzling, or more than is usual between sisters; and secretly thought Patty as much prettier than her sister, as she was avowedly merrier. In doors and out, he was constantly at her side; and before he had been a month in the house, all the inmates had given Charles Foster as a lover to his young cousin; and she, when rallied on the subject, cried fie! and pish! and pshaw! and wondered how people could talk such nonsense—and liked to have such nonsense talked to her, better than anything in the world.

Affairs were in this state, when one night Jane appeared even graver and more thoughtful than usual, and far, far sadder. She sighed deeply; and Patty—for the two sisters shared the same little room—inquired tenderly, "What ailed her?" The inquiry seemed to make Jane worse. She burst into tears, whilst Patty hung over her and soothed her. At length she roused herself by a strong effort; and, turning away from her affectionate comforter, said, in a low tone:

"I have had a great vexation to-night, Patty: Charles Foster has asked me to marry him!"

"Charles Foster! did you say Charles Foster?" asked poor Patty, trembling, unwilling even to trust her own senses against the evidence of her heart; "Charles Foster!"

"Yes, our cousin, Charles Foster!"

"And you have accepted him?" inquired Patty, in a hoarse voice.

"Oh, no—no! Do you think I have forgotten poor Archibald? Besides, I am not the person whom he ought to have asked to marry him; false and heartless as he is, I would not be his wife—cruel, unfeeling, unmanly as his conduct has been! No! not if he would make me Queen of England!"

"You refused him, then?"

"No, my father met us suddenly, just as I was recovering from the surprise and indignation that at first struck me dumb. But I shall refuse him most certainly—the false, deceitful, ungrateful villain!"

"Poor father! He will be disappointed! So will mother!"

"They will be disappointed, and both angry—but not at my refusal! Oh, how they will despise him!" added Jane.

Poor Patty, melted by her sister's sympathy, and touched by an indignation most unusual in that mild and gentle girl, could no longer command her feelings, but flung herself on the bed, in that agony of passion and grief, which the first great sorrow seldom fails to excite in a young heart.

After awhile she resumed the conversation.

"We must not blame him too severely. Perhaps my vanity made me think his attentions meant more than they really did, and you had all taken up the nation. But you must not speak of him so unkindly. He has done nothing but what is natural. You are so much wiser and better than I am, my own dear Jane! He laughed and talked with me—but he felt your goodness: and he was right. I was never worthy of him, and you are; and if it were not for Archibald, I should rejoice from the bottom of my heart," continued Patty, sobbing, "if you would accept—" but, unable to finish her generous wish, she burst into a fresh flow of tears; and the sisters, mutually and strongly affected, wept in each other's arms, and were comforted.

That night Patty cried herself to sleep; but such sleep is not of long duration. Before dawn she was up, and pacing, with restless irritability, the dewy grass walks of the garden and orchard. In less than half an hour, a light, elastic step—she knew the sound well—came rapidly behind her; a hand—oh, how often had she thrilled at the touch of that hand!—tried to draw hers under his own; whilst a well-known voice addressed her in the softest and tenderest accents:

"Patty—my own sweet Patty! have you thought of what I said to you last night?"

"To me?" replied Patty, with bitterness.

"Ay, to be sure—to your own dear self! Do you not remember the question I asked you, when your good father—for the first time unwelcome—joined us so suddenly, that you had not time to say 'Yes?' and will you not say 'Yes,' now?"

"Mr. Foster!" replied Patty, with some spirit, "you are under a mistake here! It was to Jane that you made the proposal, yesterday evening; and you are taking me for her at this moment!"

"Mistake you for your sister! Propose to Jane! Incredible! Impossible! You are jesting!"

"Then he mistook Jane for me, last night—and he is no deceiver!" thought Patty to herself, as with smiles beaming brightly through her tears she turned round at his reiterated prayers, and yielded the hand he sought to his pressure. "He mistook her for me! He that defied us to perplex him!"

And so it was: an unconscious and unobserved change of place, as either sister resumed her station beside little Patty, who had scampered away after a glow-worm, added to the deepening twilight, and the lover's natural embarrassment, had produced the confusion which gave poor Patty a night's misery to be compensated by a lifetime of happiness. Jane was almost as glad to lose a lover as her sister was to regain one. Charles is gone home to his father's, to make preparations for his bride; Archibald has taken a great nursery garden, and there is some talk in Aberleigh that the marriage of the two sisters is to be celebrated on the same day.

The man who is always behind-hand, has recently purchased several bottles of catch-up!

"GUILTY or not guilty?" said a judge to a native of the Emerald Isle. "Just as your honour pleases. It's not for the like o' me to dictate to yer honour's worship," was the reply.

WHY is a clergyman who hunts, like an officer who runs away from an engagement? Because he departs from his sphere of action (his fear of action).

WHY are the snows of Mont Blanc like a ship-builder? Because they can avalanche (have a launch) whenever they get ready.

AN unfair dealer is a foul man—but a sportsman is a fowler. An earthquake is a great shock—but the 'ghost of Hamlet's father' is a shocker.

WHAT is the difference between a milkmaid and a swallow? One skims the water and the other skims the milk.

RABBI JOSHUA once met a boy who carried something covered up in a vessel. "My boy," said the rabbi, "what have you in your covered vessel?" "If it was intended for you to know," replied the boy, "it would not be covered."

GREAT men make mistakes, as well as little ones. This was illustrated once by Mr. Calhoun, who took the position that all men are not "created free and equal." Said he, "only two men were created, and one of these was a woman." Tremendous laughter followed the honourable senator's remarks.

A young lady called at the shop of a cabinet-maker in her village, to leave directions with him about making a table which she had previously ordered. Among other particulars, she enjoined it upon him to make the limbs small; adding, after some hesitation, "You know what I mean, I suppose?" With a very vacant look the cabinet-maker replied: "You mean legs, don't you?"

THE difficulty to which a poet may be put in finding words that will rhyme, is tolerably well illustrated by an old epitaph that is extant in a churchyard in the north of England. It runs thus:

"Here lies the body of Nicholas Newcity;
He died t'other day, the more's the pity."

N. B.—The man's name was Oldtown, but it wouldn't rhyme.

A GOOD LEAPER.—An Irish gentleman, well known in the sporting circles for his wit, was accosted by a friend with, "Upon my word, —, you are riding a good horse!" "And why should I not ride a good horse?" "Well," rejoined his friend, "but will he jump timber?" "Timber!" replied the other. "Faith, he'll just over your head, man, in a jiffy!"

"WILL you give us a 'apeth o' what you don't sell?" asked a young ragamuffin, on entering a chandler's shop. "Oh, willingly!" retorted the shopkeeper, on laying a stick rather roughly about the shoulders of the querist. "We always give that gratis!"

STOW PROGRESS.—Such is the slow progress made in the noble art of British ship-building by the master builders of the royal dockyards, that it is suggested, since some of the ships so closely resemble the specimens of Noah, that the science should in future be termed "Naval Architecture!"

PROPER PLACES FOR PROPER THINGS.—Literary men should come from Reading; dogs from Barking; calves from Cowes; corrected schoolboys from Wales; clean characters from Bath and Wells; sight-seers from Eye; gamblers from Poole!

A GOOD IDEA.—There is a gentleman in this city who gives twenty-five cents to some charitable purpose, whenever he uses a profane word! The secretary and general agent of the "Boston Provident Association" acknowledges the receipt of seventy-five cents from this individual. The idea is an excellent one, and might be adopted by thousands in this city, to the advantage of their morals, and to the benefit of our public charities.

"OH, my friend!" said a doctor to an Irish patient, "be composed! We must all die once!" "An' it's that what vexes me!" replied Pat. "If I could die half a dozen times, I'd not care a ha'penny about this time!"

"MOTHER," said a sly urchin the other day, "what does dad do with all the rye he raises?" "O my child, I am sorry to say that he sends it to Deacon Jones's distillery, to make whiskey of." "Well, now, I thought just so, when he came home last night." "Why, how did he look last night, my child?" "O I can't describe him, mother, he had on such a horrible wry face!"

THE New Hampshire State Agricultural Society proposes to offer premiums for the best specimens of patching and darning. It is feared, with good reason, that so much time is bestowed by young ladies upon embroidery, and other flummies, as to cause them to wholly lose the useful art of darning stockings. The ladies who take the premiums will be likely to be in great demand for wives.

A clown, who had a fancy for hearing the Latin ditties of doctors at a University, was asked what pleasure he could derive from them when he could not ever know which party had the best of it. "For that matter," replied the clown, "I am not such a fool but I can see who's the first that puts t'other in a passion."

A GRAND JURY AT FAULT.—A grand jury recently found a true bill against a man for passing a counterfeit note. On the trial of the case, however, not only was the good character of the accused sustained by creditable witnesses, but the note itself was proved to be genuine!

AN exchange says: "The girls in Pennsylvania are so hard up for husbands that they sometimes take up with politicians and lawyers."

"My dear you are not the woman I took you to be. But, my dear, you are the man I took you to be! Go and nurse that child, this minute, or I'll —"

EPIGRAM.

SAID a thief to a wit: "There's no knowing one's friends, Until they've been tried and found steady."

"Very true!" said the wit; "but all yours, I presume, Have been tried and found guilty already!"

SPEAKING without thinking, is shooting without taking aim.

MUSICAL CATECHISM.—1st. "What is a slur?" "Almost any remark one singer makes about another." 2nd. "What is beating time?" "Singing so fast that time cannot keep up with you."

CHOPS AND STEAKS.—We have a friend, a school-master, who has subscribed to a building society. He says it gives him a stake in the country. We are glad of it, as we are confident he is often without a chop!

FANNY FERN says: "It isn't every man who has a call to be a husband." She might have added: "It isn't every woman who has a call to be a wife."

HOOD made a glorious epigram on the clock.

A mechanic his labour will often discard,

If the rate of his pay he dislikes;

But a clock—and its case is uncommonly hard—

Will continue to work though it strikes.

MAKE-WEIGHT FOR ADVERTISEMENT DUTY.—The Chancellor of the Exchequer need not be alarmed about a substitute for the proposed alteration of the duty on newspaper advertisements. One gentleman proposes to levy a penny duty on each railway ticket. This is no bad suggestion; but would it not be more profitable to put a heavy impost on all railway accidents? In that case collisions would be rarely heard of.

THE MARCH OF IMPROVEMENT.—A funny exchange (the Dutchman, if we remember aright) has set the "march of improvement" to the following funny tune: "Since the discovery of the Australian gold diggings, a passion for joint-stock companies has sprung up in London, that threatened to revolutionise the world. Among those just organising is one for a tunnel from Liverpool to China, with a branch running off to Mount Etna, for the supply of ventilation and warmth. Another proposed to throw a suspension-bridge from Cape Horn to the Sandwich Islands, with a lateral connection with the moon. Capital, £200,000,000, in shares of £10 each. 'Subscribers who pay when they put their names down, will not be called on again.' So says the prospectus, and we believe it. The company chartered for giving pigs an extra kink in their tails, by mixing pulverised cork-screws with their feed, is in a most flourishing condition. The treasurer informs the shareholders that a dividend of ninety per cent. will be declared the moment the necessary funds come to hand."

A FRENCH VIEW OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.—The following fabulous description of a sitting in the House of Commons is given in a recent feuilleton by Mery, one of the most amusing writers of modern France: "Speeches are delivered in a psalm-singing tone; members sleep here and there, and everybody yawns; the Speaker does not use a bell, and no one is ever called to order; there is never any agitation on any of the benches; ennui reigns in torrents; Whigs and Tories share among themselves badly baked biscuits; a good deal of Barclay and Perkins's order is drunk; members go out every moment to swallow a basin of turtle-soup; on their return they turn over collections of caricatures; ministers play at short whist in a corner; those who are not asleep read a romance; speakers seem not to care about being listened to."

GENUINE ELOQUENCE.—Leitch, in his "Travels in Ireland," says: In my morning rambles, a man sitting on the ground, leaning his back against the wall, attracted my attention by a look of squalor in his appearance, which I had rarely before observed, even in Ireland. His clothes were ragged to indecency—a very common circumstance, however, with the males—and his face was pale and sickly. He did not address me, and I passed by; but having gone a few paces, my heart smote me, and I turned back. "If you are in want," said I, with some degree of peevishness, "why do you not beg?" "Sure, it's begging I am," was the reply. "You did not utter a word." "No! is it joking you are with me, sir? Look there!" holding up the tattered remnant of what had once been a coat; "do you see how the skin is peeling through my trousers, and the bones through my skin? Look at my sunken cheeks, and the famine that's staring in my eyes! Man alive! isn't it begging I am with a hundred tongues?"

CURIOUS CUSTOM IN CHINA.—When Lieutenant Cunningham was at Hong-Kong, the harbour was often filled with gaily-decorated boats bringing young ladies from Canton, as a mercantile speculation, for the purpose of procuring husbands. "These boats arrived with drums and gongs beating, and colours flying, generally coming to an anchor immediately under my own window; tea-tables were soon arranged, and the young ladies, from twenty to forty in number, arrayed in their smartest jackets and trousers, might be seen endeavouring to bewitch those visitors who flocked to the boats. I was informed that the price, generally speaking, averaged from 100 to 200 dollars: this money was transferred to the mother of the young lady, a due proportion being deducted for the expenses attendant upon the voyage, together with commission, &c., upon the bargain. I have known instances of some of the natives of India becoming purchasers; but in that case, they were solely the refuse of the community. Upon one occasion, a kitmutgar, or table-servant, a native of Bengal, complained to me, and entreated my interference, stating that he had commissioned a friend of his own, who had gone to Macao, with 100 dollars, all his savings, to buy him a nice, comely wife; but when she arrived, she by no means answered the description given of her, being too short and too old, and by no means a 100-dollar wife, but scarcely a thirty-dollar one. Much to his grief, as well as surprise, he only got laughed at for his pains."

At Florence, some years ago, it was proclaimed that every beggar who would appear in the grand plaza, at a certain mentioned time, would be provided by the duke with a new suit of clothes, free of cost. At the appointed time, the beggars of the city all assembled, and the grand duke, causing all the avenues to the square to be closed, compelled the beggars to strip off their old clothes, and gave each one, according to promise, a new suit. In the old clothes thus collected, enough money was found concealed to build a beautiful bridge over the Arno, still called "The Beggars' Bridge;" and the city, for the time-being, was relieved of the beggars by which it had been previously overrun—as none would give to the well-dressed individuals who implored charity, not believing their tale of distress.

THE MORNING TOAST OF THE MAIDS.—A trustworthy member of the Society of Friends, whose informant, an inhabitant of Sunderland, now deceased, was of the same household of faith, communicates to us an anecdote of Dr. Paley, which we do not remember ever to have seen in print. The doctor, while Rector of Bishopwearmouth, was an early riser, but sometimes protracted the pleasure of the pillow; and on one of these occasions he heard two of the maids approaching his bed-room. Pulling the bed-clothes over his head, he lay still. A bottle, containing some cordial, stood in the room. A glass was poured out, and one of them gave a toast: "Here's to our Bill!" and if our Bet was as good a mistress as Bill's a maister, there wadn't be a better place in all Wearmouth!" The toast was drunk "with all the honours;" but before "Our Bill" could return thanks, "Our Bet" rang the bell, and the girls scampered off. The coast being clear, Paley popped out of bed, and slipped into his dressing-room. The same day he had company to dinner; and when the cloth had been removed, and the bottle had made a few circuits of the table, he summoned before him the two girls who had come up to make his bed. Then, pouring out a glass of wine for each of them, he called for a repetition of their morning toast. Abashed at first, they at length complied, and the table was in a roar. But what "our Bet" thought of it, our Friend sayeth not.

THE FIRST MEETING BETWEEN SCOTT AND THE ET-TRICK SHEPHERD.—One day, while Scott was still in Edinburgh, there came into the city a brawny, rough fellow, driving a flock of sheep. It was James Hogg, who, finding himself in the capital, was seized with a violent desire to see himself in print, and accordingly got somebody to strike off some copies of a few of his verses, which, however, made no sensation. "The Minstrelsy of the Scottish Border" set him to work at imitating the old Scottish ballads; and as his efforts were warmly praised by Scott, he came down again from the forest to pay his friend a visit. He, with William Laidlaw and others, was invited to dinner. The worthy shepherd appeared in his ordinary herdsman's dress, with his hands well tarred with a recent shearing. Not being accustomed to the society of "grand folk," he had communed with himself as to how he should act, and had come to the conclusion that he ought to copy the lady of the house in all things. Mrs. Scott, being unwell, received her guests reclining on a sofa, and Jamie accordingly, true to his principle, had no sooner made his best bow than he crossed the room, and stretched himself upon another. At dinner he ate, drank, laughed, and chatted, amusing the guests by his strange, uncouth jokes and remarks, and even songs. As the good wine began to operate, Jamie grew familiar, and, after tickling everybody by his rapid advance from "Mr. Scott" to "Shirra," "Scott," "Walter," and "Wattie," he at last threw the company into convulsions of laughter by addressing Mrs. Scott as "Charlotte."

VOLTAIRE AND HIS SECRETARY.

Voltaire, when on his estate of Ferney, was fond of assuming the air of nobility, and displayed a most philosophical hatred of poachers. One of the poor fellows was caught and brought before him. Voltaire determined to try him in form of law, and took his seat as judge, directing his secretary to act as counsel for the prisoner. The advocate made a long speech in his favour, and suddenly stopped short.

"Why do you hesitate?" asked Voltaire.

"I wish to read a passage from a volume in your library."

He procured the book, and kept turning over the leaves for some time, without saying a word. Voltaire became impatient, and asked him what book he was looking at.

"It is your Philosophical Dictionary," was the answer.

"Well?"

"I have been looking for the word 'humanity,' and I see you have omitted it!"

Voltaire thought the argument so forcible, that the culprit was set free at once.

MOTTO FOR THE EARLY CLOSING ASSOCIATION.—"Shut up!"—Diogenes.

A PUN FOR THE PRIME MINISTER.—"Well!" said Disraeli to Aberdeen, the other day; "How do you feel now?—two defeats in one week!" "Oh!" replied Aberdeen; "just as you may expect; two defeats are enough to make one weak!"—Ibid.

MOTTO FOR DISHONEST SHOPKEEPERS.—"Honesty is the worst policy."—Ibid.

THE SPIRIT RAPPERS.—Mrs. Haydon states as a reason for the heaviness of her charges, that the spirits have unanimously refused to appear to any one who is not "worth a rap."—Ibid.

THE ANTIQUITY OF COALITION.—A newspaper paragraph states, that the ages of the Cabinet Ministers are as follows: Lord Lansdowne, 73; Lord Aberdeen, 69; Lord Palmerston, 69; Lord Cranworth, 63; Lord John Russell, 61; Sir James Graham, 61; Sir C. Wood, 53; Mr. Gladstone, 44; Sir W. Molesworth, 43; Mr. Sidney Herbert, 43; Duke of Newcastle, 42; Lord Granville, 38; Duke of Argyll, 30. If these figures be correct, "Coalition" must be 689 years old.—Ibid.

A LAZY FRAME OF MIND.—When you look out of window.—Punch.

SUPERNATURAL AMUSEMENT.—Spirit-rapping is performed nightly at the Pig and Whistle Harmonic Meeting, after each of the songs and glees, by persons under the influence of Spirits!—Ibid.

OBVIOUS INITIALS.—It was announced in the Times the other day, that "The Chancellor of the Exchequer acknowledges the receipt of £15 in Bank of England notes, from 'D. F.' for additional income tax." No need to ask what D. F. stands for. Decided Fool, of course.—Ibid.

TOPOGRAPHY OF LONDON.—We are credibly informed that, in honour of the London Merchants' and Bankers' Deputation to Louis Napoleon, Spitalfields for the future is to be called Lick-Spitalfields.—Ibid.

RAILWAY SAFETY PUT INTO SOMETHING LIKE A SHIP-SHAPE TRAIN.—Most ships carry, or are expected to carry, "an Experienced Surgeon on board;" why shouldn't railways be made to adopt the same regulation? for, in our opinion, the one requires the services of a surgeon just as much, if not more, than the other. In fact, it is a question whether a medical student wouldn't gain more knowledge of his business by occasionally riding on a railway, than by diligently walking all the hospitals.—Ibid.

A GENUINE STOCK.—We have all of us heard of a "Son of a Gun," but the "Son of a Pistol" must be a new branch of the family tree from which the stocks of firearms are descended: and yet, tracing the pedigree of one of Colt's revolvers, it stands (and, if need be, fires) to reason that a genuine Colt must be the son of a horse-pistol.—Ibid.

GEMS OF THOUGHT.

GENTLENESS and indulgence towards one's self, and harshness to others, is but one and the same thing.

The celebrated Lord Burleigh is recorded to have said: "Never trust anybody not of sound religion—for he that is false to God can never be true to man."

Of all the agonies in life, that which is most poignant and harrowing—that which for the time most annihilates reason, and leaves our whole organisation one lacerated, mangled heart—is the conviction that we have been deceived where we placed all the trust of love.

INTELLECTUAL progress resembles physical. Those who climb heights, move slower than those who cross the plain.

BULWER says, there is nearly always something of nature's own quality in very young women, except when they get together and fall a giggling.

AMBITION, when it is a native quality of heart, is a noble faculty; but when it is engendered by the corruption of vanity, or the mortification of pride, it is a perverse and pestilent spirit.

MISCELLANEOUS.

NORTHCOTE, the painter, once said that the devil tempted everybody but the idle—the idle tempted the devil; and that the inside of the skull was the devil's workshop.

INTELLECTUAL AMBITION.—There are some minds which grasp at destiny with a powerful energy—some intellects that move through life's great thoroughfare with all the freedom and recklessness of an untamed steed. Obstacles are of no moment; the great idea is to go on, reaching toward the temple that glitters in all its beautiful proportions in the distance. Many a heart has toiled, laboured, and longed to inscribe its name upon Fame's temple, and many a heart has never satisfied its longing. There are but few who stand upon the mountain's peak, but there are many toiling up its sides, striving to gain the goal.

INDUSTRY.—To be really and practically industrious, one must improve those minute particles of time, known as "spare minutes." Of all portions of our life, these spare minutes are the most fruitful for good or evil, and are literally the gaps through which temptation finds access to the soul. Spare minutes are the gold dust of time, said Young; sands make the mountains, moments make the year! Idleness wastes a man as insensibly as industry improves him; evil deeds and evil thoughts never creep in upon him who is assiduously, joyously, upon good ones. The mind and body both require activity to keep them pure and healthy in action. Like water, if it runneth free, it is pure and wholesome; but what is there more noxious and pestiferous than a stagnant pool? Diligence of itself alone is a fair fortune, and industry is a good estate to have and to hold.

A man who'd fear God and sleep well, should have as little to do with politics as possible. Remember this, and stay at home with your wife.

The Egyptians are said to have been the first inventors of beer, in the year 1212 before the Christian era. They named it Pelusian liquid, because it was first made at Pelusium, a city near the mouth of the Nile.

The number of letters which passed through the post-offices of the United States, in the year 1852, was ninety-six millions—about one-fourth of the number that passed through those of Great Britain.

WAS NOAH THE FOUNDER OF THE CHINESE EMPIRE?—We have no accurate record that the Chinese Empire was founded by Noah. The Chinese, however, in their traditions, have a clear account of the flood, and their early records state that the empire was founded by one who escaped from the deluge in an ark. Recent discoveries at Nineveh may yet throw light upon this subject, and when we gain access to China, and to the records of the country, the truth may be evolved.

I long not for the cherries on the tree,
So much as those which on a lip I see;
And more affection bear I to the rose
That on a cheek, than in a garden grows.

Randolph.

ADVICE TO A BRIDE.—I beg to remind my new daughter that the husband has a thousand elements of disturbance in his daily avocations to which his wife is an utter stranger; and it will be her privilege, and her title to the respect of all whose respect is worth having, to make his own fire-side the most attractive place in the universe for the calm repose of a weary body or excited mind. The minor comforts, which are the most valuable, because the most constantly in requisition, will depend more upon her look, her manner, and the evidences of her forethought, than upon all the other occurrences of life.—Parental Precepts.

THE DREAM OF HOME.

Who has not felt how sadly sweet

The dream of home, the dream of home,

Steals o'er the heart, too soon to fleet,

When far o'er sea or land we roam?

Sunlight more soft may o'er us fall,

To greener shores our bark may come;

But far more bright, more dear than all,

That dream of home, that dream of home.

Ask of the sailor youth, when far

His light bark bounds o'er ocean's foam,

What charms him most, when evening's star

Smiles o'er the wave? to dream of home.

Fond thoughts of absent friends and loves,

At that sweet hour around him come;

His heart's best joy where'er he roves,

That dream of home, that dream of home.

WHOLESALE MURDER.—One of the most extraordinary cases of murder and suicide on record, was that of Major Johnson, an officer on half-pay in Dublin. He entered the parlour, and gave his two sons (one a lad of ten, and the other of twelve years of age) each a loaded pistol, ordering them to fire at each other, or else he would run them through with his sword. They fired, and shot each other dead upon the spot. The mother coming into the room on the report of the pistols, the major stabbed her to the heart, and then himself. This dreadful affair took place in 1720.

THERE is a curious custom at Havana of laying out bodies in state during the night before burial. They are placed close to the open window, fronting the street, on a couch raised four or five feet from the ground. The corpse is surrounded with high wax tapers, and the whole room illuminated. Frequently, when returning from a tertulia, or a ball, I have been startled by seeing the affixed and rigid features of some old lady or gentleman, dressed in their best attire, and apparently reclining before the window. It used to appear an unnecessary mockery of death, dressing out a corpse in a new suit of clothes, with tight patent leather boots and white neckcloth. I remember one night in particular, I was returning home through one of the by-streets, when, seeing the lower windows of a house illuminated, and concluding there was a body lying in state, I went towards it. There, close to the window—so close that I could have touched it through the bars—lay the body of a young girl about fifteen years of age. She was dressed as for a ball, with flowers in her hair, and white satin shoes on her feet; her hands were crossed on her breast, her eyes closed, and her mouth slightly opened, and altogether her face and expression the most beautiful I had ever seen.—Sullivan's Rambles.

A THOUGHT.

BY EMMELINE S. SMITH.

The rose unveils its bosom to the day,
And freely pours its perfumed life away—
Lavish of sweets, it loads each passing gale
With the rich tide, whose founts are slow to fail.
Yet spite of all it gives, the floweret's heart
Still keeps a portion it can ne'er impart;
Deep, amid folded leaves that sweetness lies,
And lingering there, with the frail blossom dies.

Thus doth the dreaming bard unveil his mind,
And freely give its treasures to his kind;
Thus doth he freight each hour that rolls away
With tuneful tributes from his life of song.
Yet, after all, his soul must still retain Gems brighter far than e'er illumed his strain—
Unuttered music—thoughts so pure and high
They cannot find a voice, but must in silence die.

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

W. S. G.—The height of St. Paul's Cathedral is 340 feet; but to the top of the cross it is 402 feet.

A. R.—The architect of Westminster Bridge was a Frenchman, named Labeleye. The first stone was laid on the 10th of November, 1738-9; and the last on the 10th of November, 1750. The cost of the bridge, which was defrayed by Parliament, was £318,500.

AN INQUIRER.—An apprentice is bound to work for his master at all reasonable times. After nine in the evening is not a reasonable time—and an apprentice requested to work after that hour may very properly refuse to do so.

STRANGEWAY.—Porter should be made from malt, hops, and pure water: but the liquid at present sold under that name is a mysterious compound of Thames mud, treacle, coculus indicus, &c. Brandy should be distilled from the grape—but it is adulterated. Some British brandies are to be preferred to those vended as the best French brandies. This is the age of adulteration. Scarcely any article of diet is pure, and nearly every stimulant is drugged.

ALFRED JACKSON.—The franchise must be enlarged. Only fancy some 800,000 electors—of whom about 600,000 exercise the privilege—deciding who shall represent; who shall control the destinies, improve the resources, and moderate the temper of the vast remainder, amounting to upwards of seven millions of male adults, who constitute the strength and glory of the empire. But so it has been, and so it ever will be, until "England unto herself prove true," and affords to the world an example of what free men can accomplish for their own and their country's good, by union, firmness, and an immensely improved moral and mental status.

GUS.—1. There are no rules laid down for natural politeness, and we trust there never will be—for we should not like to see the etiquette of the heart in a strait jacket. Politeness is one of the first points of civilisation. In your case, be manly and modest. The modest men are the most manly. 2. A master can assign his apprentices. Read the copy, or counterpart of the deed of apprenticeship, and you will find the obligation is to "Executors, administrators, and assigns." But a master can only assign his apprentices along with his business.

EMILY S. is not bound to fulfil an engagement entered into five years ago, when she was too young to have a clear and proper idea of the responsibilities of marriage, if she can now conscientiously affirm that the proposed union is distasteful and odious to her; but for no other reason. Young ladies must not be encouraged in either whims or fastidiousness. However, we presume it is the old story of a first love being extinguished in a new one. First love rarely leads to marriage, we know, and have frequently given explanations of the reasons in these pages, but should like some of our lady correspondents to furnish us with some piquant revelations on the subject.

MANFRED.—There are no giants in the present day. We have neither a Pitt, a Castlereagh, nor a Peel to inspire the nation with confidence. In every quarter mediocrity and its attendant gentleness, doubt, mistrust, and weakness, reign supreme. The political pulse of the nation is feeble. The glory of her trade has blinded it to future exigencies. Cotton and gold lead it by the nose. This, the leaders in Parliament, on all sides, know full well, and hesitate to disturb the brilliant slumber by committing themselves to any novel or decisive course of events. As Cobett used to say: "We are waiting for the straw to move." Probably the nation is benefited by this conduct, but it does not uphold either the independence or the dignity of the people.

EXCELSIOR.—It is immaterial in what language—whether in Greek, Latin, French, Spanish, or any other tongue—or in what hand or letters—whether in Secretary's hand, Roman hand, old English, uncrossing, or any other hand—a will be written, so that it be capable of being read and understood. Neither does it matter whether it is written in words at length, or by notes or characters usual or unusual—as XX for 20—if it be usual in the testator's style of writing, or even if some words be accidentally omitted, so long as the intent and meaning of the testator be apparent. But if it will be so made that it cannot possibly be read, or if, supposing it capable of being read, the testator's meaning cannot be ascertained, then the will is void and of no force.

C. W. F. (Oxon).—We must refer you to a work on "The Sentiment of Flowers," certain to be in one of the University libraries. The lady sent you a bay-leaf—did she? You are a lucky man, and ought to have known that it is an emblem of victory. The late Mr. Loudon, in his fine work, "The Shrubs and Trees of Britain," has collected almost every legend connected with trees and flowers. The laurel, or sweet bay, among the ancients, was always emblematical of victory or of clemency. In later times it was supposed to be a safeguard against lightning; and Madame de Genlis mentions the device of the Count de Danolis, which was a bay-tree, with the motto, "I defend the earth that bears me." It was the custom in the middle ages to place wreaths of laurel, with the berries on, round the heads of distinguished poets—hence the term poet-laureate. But as regards your peculiar position, upon consideration the lady might have intended the present to convey a modern but equally classical meaning. "Students," says Mr. Phillips, in his "Sylvia Florilegia," "who have taken their degrees at the universities, are called bachelors, from the French word bachelier, which is derived from the Latin baccula, a laurel berry. These students were not allowed to marry, lest the duties of husband and father should take them from their literary pursuits; and in time all single men were called bachelors."

G. S.—Emigration has now become a mania in the United Kingdom; and to the lover of his country, it is truly lamentable to see the land despoiled of its best class of labourers, the manufacturers of their most skilful artisans, and all classes in the industrial community weakened by the abstraction of the most industrious and meritorious. It is not the poorest who emigrate—it is the healthiest, strongest, and most moral of our population: the worst are left behind. If the loss tended to mitigate the condition of the suffering classes it might be extenuated—but truly national grounds it never could be defended; but as it does not, it is utterly irreconcilable with the vital interests of the empire. Ship-load after ship-load may be dispatched in frantic haste, but, owing to the imperfect and irregular distribution of wealth and labour, they will leave behind them the union-houses quite as well-inhabited, poverty as rife, destitution as deplorable, and crime as horrible.

J. SHEPPARD.—You say that your mother says the girl to whom you are engaged tipsies, and ask us what your course should be? Why, first ascertain whether the charge is correctly founded. This may be difficult, but in such a case you would be justified in using stratagem and being very cunning. Should your mother's suspicion be verified, break off the engagement at once. Such a habit in a young woman would become a fensish propensity when she became a settled wife. But, in justice to the girl, you should be excessively cautious. Mothers are credulous, and very naturally so—for with them the welfare of their children is the paramount consideration. But as slanderers in petticoats are rather a numerous variety of a very bad species, you must tax your own judgment, and be as discriminative as you can. At all events don't wed while the horizon is darkened.

MARIA.—In taking a house, the first thing to be ascertained is the certainty that it is not damp. The walls should not only look dry, but feel dry. Plates of dry salt placed on the basement floors for a night, will afford a good test—for if the salt be damp in the morning, the house is damp. The next thing to look to is the supply of water. A continuous supply is essential to the preservation of health. The out-house conveniences should then be looked to; but above all requisites is a good kitchen, with range, comprising oven, boiler, &c. A good washhouse, with washing copper, is essential. It is always preferable to take the house for a quarter, each party when quitting to give a quarter's notice. The agreement with the landlord should be in writing.

DAVID M'BURNIE.—Your song, "The Working Men of England," is exceedingly well written; but when you contend that virtue is only to be found in the cottage, you are merely clothing a falsehood in the dignity of good poetry. Virtue is everywhere—it belongs to no particular class—its reign is the universal reign. As a specimen of your powers, we give three verses out of the ten:

The-working men of England,
So loyal, firm, and bold,
The sinews of the nation's strength,
Her wealth more true than gold:
They sow the seed, they reap the corn,
Our gallant fleets they steer,
Bid mines and forests team with wealth,
Draw distant nations near.

They comb the wool, they spin the thread,
They urge the clacking loom,
Fill the world's markets with their goods,
And make the canvas bloom.
Their flag waves proud o'er every sea,
Their voice in every clime,
Sounds high the hymn of liberty,
Eternal and sublime.

Our working men no glory find
In arms strung for the strife;
But in the friendly contests of
An intellectual life.
In rolling back the mists of mind,
And publishing afar
The lights of truth, and science, and
The miseries of war.

P. L. T.—The idlers, in all ranks of society, are a useful body. But in high life they are an incumbrance. As a corporation they are unique in their discipline, for they have entrenched themselves behind every possible precaution, so as to insure a locus standi in perpetuity. Standing high, they stand aloof from every other body; raining, from their elevation, defiance and patrician scorn on every class below them. Like the white elephants of the worshippers of the idol Guadua, they are lodged in abodes glittering with gold, and fed with incense wafted from the mouths and nostrils of a multitude who regard them with awe, and firmly believe that the most tremendous disasters would happen if they were not sacredly preserved for the adoration of infinite generations. So, honoured and adorned by slippery fortune and human faith in circumstances based on long endurance, they prance through life, spurning the plebeian earth from their golden hoofs, and fencing the realm of idleness in a whirling, giddy mass of splendour. They are the worst class of idlers—for, not content with non-production, they are extravagant in their habits, and place before society not only a vicious example, but sow the seeds of discontent, which in time ripen into open, ugly rebellion.

M. W. requests us to insert the following: "If this should meet the eye of C. S., we hope she will communicate with her parents, T. and M. W. They wonder at her long absence from home."

ONKROUS (Glasgow) opened his whole soul to a young woman, in a letter, and received a reply realising—ay, exceeding—his most sanguine expectations. But now that they are declared lovers, she laughs at him when he begins to talk about love, and when inclined to be tender in his conversation, fearfully disconcerts him by the remark "that it's all nonsense and sentimentality." The young lady has got a shrewder head on her shoulders than he has upon his. He is inclined to be maudlin and solemn, and she wishes to regard life with a merry face and bright eyes. Some men really don't know how to court properly. Many of them fancy that, because the girls they love don't rush into their arms every time they meet them, or go right off into sobs and hysterics, their love is not reciprocated. Our correspondent is evidently one of this number. Of course when he "pops the question," he will expect a scene: lady-love writhing on the carpet, and the agonised parents wringing their hands, the maid in a fit, and the drawing-room reeking with vinegar and brown paper; and the overwhelmed lover standing, hair on end, as if he had swallowed a thunderbolt. Won't he be disappointed!

THOMAS.—Any habit injures the memory that impairs any one of the bodily functions. Tobacco smoking affects the memory, so does any indulgence of an artificial character. The best strengtheners of the memory—indeed of the whole of the faculties—are temperance in living, honesty in conduct, and prudence in everything.

A LADY.—A taste for the stage, and the capability of treading the stage successfully, are two very different things. The latter requires intellectual powers of no mean order, tact, courage, assurance, and an adaptive capability, which is the index to great flexibility of character; but of a score debutantes in a year, scarcely more than one succeeds, and certainly not more than three appear a second or third time. To educate a lady efficiently for the stage would require a little army of teachers. First there would be the vocal instructor, the piano-forte teacher, then the elocutionist, the stage director, and last, but not least, the posture-master. And the efforts of all these would be vain, if the pupil had no natural genius for histrionic and dramatic developments.

THE POTTER.—We do not sympathise with those who can see nothing good or meritorious in the conduct of the Emperor of the French. We neither admire nor like Louis Napoleon. He is too calculating and cold-hearted to please our temperament. But we can afford to do him the fullest justice. Placed at the head of the French government, he found her affairs so disordered that she was rapidly consuming herself. Four factions were tugging at her vitals. First, there were the Legitimists, a party wedded to old opinions and antiquated habits, that might have suited the time of Louis XIV., but which are totally exploded in the present day. Then there were the Orleanists, a transitory band of politicians, whose only merit was gratitude for honours received from a fallen house. After them came the moderate men—mere grubs in the political system; and, lastly, the Red Republicans, a fierce and intractable order of men. Added to all these discordant elements, there was the patent fact, that a people reared and trained under a monarchy can never enjoy the freedom of a republic; and Napoleon, after studying these features long and well—after calculating the consequences, and weighing the peril—took the decided step of scattering the whole affair to the winds. He put his foot on the neck of discord, which turned, and while prostrate licked the dust at his feet. His usurpation may be obnoxious to the instincts of the British people; but with the antecedent of Cromwell before us, we should not be too nice or censorious.

CHARLES.—To fix pencil drawings, a thin solution of isinglass answers the purpose. It should be allowed to run over the drawing, or be very softly applied with a camel-hair pencil.

SUNFLOWER is in love's distraction—jealousy. She complains of her lover growing colder as the wedding-day approaches. She must not give way to the craving which, in love, is the same as avarice in money matters. Sensible and prudent young men always become thoughtful and grave for some time before their marriage. Remember that with both the parties, matrimony is a ceremony which should be viewed, even in the delicious ecstasy of courtship, with the utmost solemnity. Anti-nuptial frivolity leads to post-nuptial misery.

JESSICA offers herself to the notice of our bachelor correspondents. She has highly respectable connections, is nearly eighteen, of the middle height, fair in complexion, with dark-brown hair, blue eyes, and considered a fine-looking girl.

AMELIA AND EMILY would not object to become acquainted with "S." and "H." Emily is very fair, having blue eyes, and light-brown hair. Amelia is dark, having black, wavy hair, and beautiful laughing eyes, good teeth, and a very good complexion. They are considered very fine, aristocratic-looking girls, and each will have money on her coming of age.

G. F. M. would have no objection to correspond with "U. C. B." She is domesticated, cheerful, affectionate, and calculated to make a home comfortable. She is rather short in stature, with fair hair and blue eyes. Her age is twenty-four, she has received a liberal education, and is the daughter of a gentleman farmer, residing in the south of England.

W. J. W. TO THE LADIES.

Dear Editor, pray forgive me this trouble:

W. C. is a bachelor, in search of a double.
A soldier I am, and true to my trade,
And as hearty a fellow as ever drew blade.

Now, sir, it's a wife I want, if you please,
From a single, dull life, and its cares me to ease.
My name it is William—and a sweet one 'tis, too—
So, now aid me in this, and see what you can do.

I am thin in my figure, with dark, curly hair,
And bronzed are my features by an eastern sun's glare.
In age, it is true, I'm not thirty years old,
And my pay is, per annum, two hundred, in gold.

The lady I'd wed must be not twenty-one,
Sprightly and cheerful, and full, too, of fun.
A brunette she must be, with dark, sparkling eyes,
Genteel, too, in shape, and comely in size.

Her hair must be dark, her teeth pearly hue,
Her lips like the ruby—for such only I'll woo;
Good-looking she must be, and cash, too, possess,
For, without such to live it is hard, I profess.

She music, also, must be able to play,
To cheer our fire-side on a dull, rainy day.
Her fingers, too, taper, and her feet very small—
So ladies, dear fair ones, attend to this call.

LETTERS RECEIVED.—Rorey (Our French Lessons commenced in No. 312, and terminated in No. 403 of this Journal)—H. W. (The "King's Cross Railway Station Illustration" was published in No. 403 of this Journal)—Throgmorton (Consult an oculist. People who tamper with infirmities are penny-wise and pound-foolish)—W. S. P. (Purchase Dr. Erasmus Wilson's "Treatise on the Skin")—Mary Anne (The best "Cookery Book" is Soyer's)—Rama Krishna (The cost of the copy of a will is generally two shillings for every ninety words it contains, besides registrar's fees, for searching, writing, &c. Write to the registrar of the court)—W. Prescott (Plenty of such books. Peruse the book advertisements in the newspapers)—Dundas (Railway debentures come under the category of personal property. They are in fact money)—Joseph (Purchase one of the numerous treatises on "Ornithology" which have been published within the last five years)—Fanny Platt (We never undertake to return M.S.) R. Yorks (Peruse our remarks on "Pigeons," contained in our recent numbers)—J. G. R. (Novel-writers do not work by line and rule. When they instruct, interest, excite, amuse, or please, they satisfy their readers. Anything in them is excused but dullness and impropriety)—S. * (You sign yourself "A Subscriber." Now, our rule is, never to either answer or acknowledge such letters; but in your case we make an exception, and reply to your query by strongly advising you to remain in England. English mechanical labour is not required in France. Remember the scandalous treatment English workmen received in '48)—Juvenis ("Journal" means the record or chronicle of the day, not a day. It is indefinite, and may be applied as well to a period of a thousand years, as four and twenty-hours)—X. Z. (You will find a table of the fees paid to witnesses, in the Court House, Warrington)—O. P. S. (We know nothing of the "Lists of Heirs at Law," beyond seeing them advertised in the newspapers. We believe the man in the moon could give equally as good information)—E. Brighton (Stay in England. Carpententering is looking up)—George Richard (Flesh-marks, whether natural or artificial, cannot be removed by any known process with safety. They grow fainter as the years of the party accumulate)—Mrs. Fenwick (This Journal is published in New York)—J. H. M. (Order the book from a second-hand dealer)—H. E. The novel was published in the WEEKLY TIMES, and is now out of print)—* (Mr. Rowland Hill introduced the penny postage system. It commenced in 1838)—Tropic (Purchase the volume of the "Modern Traveller" on Brazil, &c.)—E. Palmer (Yes. Send the stamps—one shilling for the numbers, and one shilling for postage)—D. A. G. (See apprenticeships are only for four years)—Typo (The daily Times)—Belphégor (Several works on the "Stage" have been published. Mr. Heywood, of Manchester, will probably have several on hand)—Richard C. de L. (The enlargement of this Journal will be permanent. We move on—we cannot retrograde)—J. O. ("Lines to a Year" are attractive, but too lachrymical for the dignity of print)—A. N. S. Marriages before the superintendent registrar were legalised by the Births, Deaths, and Marriages Act, passed in 1836. The notice of a marriage must be a clear fourteen days: so that the ceremony, at the earliest, can only be performed on the fifteenth day after giving notice)—Lucky (A Lady would not wear a ring with "some of his hair in it." A brooch containing a fragment of a man's whisker is unobjectionable)—A. W. B. (Order the numbers you require from the bookseller)—Byron (South Australia)—Meeran Hafaz (Lord Hardings is the Commander in Chief of the British army)—J. G. (An emigrant, on arriving out in Australia, may go where he likes. Thousands of private individuals, and so chest both government and the private practitioner who assisted them out)—A. Sufferer (Consult a medical professional)—Joseph G. (If a sufficient number for the militia do not volunteer, the ballot can be enforced. Those above twenty-five and under eighteen years of age, or if under twenty-five and married, having three children, are exempted)—Clarence S.—Mary W.—Secunda—Lizzie—Eliza—A. M.—Linney—L. E.—D. Temperley—L. D. P.—W. M. C.—Lina—Dorah—Mercator—Heartsease, Violet, and White Rose Bud—J. S. C.—Harry X.—H. H.—F. H. A.—S. M. Clark—Oak Tree—P. D. A.—G. B. F.—J. F.

London: Printed and Published for the Proprietor by GEORGE VICKERS, at the Office of "THE WEEKLY TIMES," 834, Strand. June 11, 1853.

THE LONDON JOURNAL:

And Weekly Record of Literature, Science, and Art.

No. 434.—VOL. XVII.]

FOR THE WEEK ENDING JUNE 18, 1853.

[PRICE ONE PENNY.]

[MAJOR MOTTRAM'S VISIT TO MR. AND MRS. HERBERT.]

THE WILL AND THE WAY.

BY THE AUTHOR OF

"THE JESUIT," "THE PRELATE," "MINNIGREY," ETC.

CHAPTER XCIX.

Will you not see it, sir? the thing will be Both rare and curious. OLD PLAY.

OUR readers, we feel assured, have not forgotten the elopement of Captain Elton from Bungalow Hall, with the only child and heiress of Sir Jasper Pepper—the sudden death of the bridegroom upon his wedding night—or how the indignation of the enraged little East India director, who had followed the fugitives to London, was suddenly appeased by the words which his old friend and companion, General Bouchier, whispered in his ear: which words were nothing less than an assurance to the angry father, that he would marry the widowed bride himself, and so accomplish the long-cherished scheme of both their lives—of uniting their vast estates.

Had such a thing been possible, the selfish old bachelor would infinitely have preferred that the marriage of the broad acres, five per cents, exchequer bills, and India scrip, should have taken place by proxy; but his nephew's wretched match, as he termed it, with the portionless daughter of Lady Harebell, had deprived him of the only fitting representative on the occasion. In other words, he was compelled either to abandon his plan, or espouse the mourning widow himself.

When General Bouchier—who had never loved any human creature in the world, save himself—reflected upon his engagement, how grateful he would have felt for another nephew, provided, of course, that he was single, and more obedient than Captain Herbert had been. Still he evinced no disposition to retract; on the contrary, as soon as the first three months of widowhood—which is all that is required of those who have time to mourn—had expired, he started to visit the lady—we beg pardon—her acres, five per cents, and India scrip—at Bungalow Hall.

On his arrival, he thought her plainer and more disagreeable than ever; yet his smile was as bland, and his manner as soft as ever. To do the old soldier justice, if his heart was as hard as the diamond, he displayed also the polish of the gem upon his surface.

Sir Jasper and his future son-in-law were at breakfast, tête-à-tête. The young lady, who was anything but in love with her elderly suitor, under plea of indisposition, chose to keep her room. The servant had just placed the post-bag upon the table.

"For you, general," said the baronet, handing him several letters, which he had sorted from the contents of the bag.

His guest threw the first one that he opened impatiently into the fire: it was from his now repentant nephew, and dated from a cottage near Richmond, where he was residing with his bride. The passion which had induced him to brave his uncle's wrath, had yielded to the satiety of possession and the chill of poverty: the lean goddess, after all, is the only test of love.

"The idiot!" muttered the old soldier; "Esau, who sold his birthright for a mess of pottage, was a sage in comparison with him! to renounce such a fortune for a woman!"

"From your nephew?" said Sir Jasper, looking up from the Times, where he had been reading the quotations of the Stock Exchange.

General Bouchier nodded in the affirmative.

"All comes of not bringing young men up to business!" continued the speaker; "if, instead of buying him a commission, you had placed him in my counting-house, we should never have been pestered with such folly—he would have learnt the value of money: city men seldom forget that cash is power—everything."

The soldier winced: he had a profound contempt for trade.

"I must do something for the fellow!" he said; "get him handsomely out of the country!"

Sir Jasper suggested a commercial appointment in India—which was declined. The heartless uncle recollected the rank he had held there—the figure he had made. The idea of any relative of his going out in any other than a high civil or military capacity, was humiliating to his pride.

"Thank you," he said; "but I have already decided on the silly fellow's future career."

"Indeed!"

"Yes! Liverpool promised me a vice-consulship for him at Timbuctoo, or one of the Friendly Islands: he will be out of the way there!"

And with this cool observation the subject was dismissed from his mind: and yet for many years General

Bouchier had considered Herbert as his heir—indulged him in every extravagance—encouraged him in his career of selfishness and vice.

A servant announced Colonel Butler.

"At home!" said the baronet. "What the deuce," he added, as the footman left the breakfast-room, "can bring Butler here at such an extraordinary hour?"

"Are you intimate with him?" inquired his guest.

"Not particularly."

The general shrugged his shoulders, merely observing, that people did such odd things in the country.

The object of Butler's visit was very soon explained: he called to request the presence of his brother magistrate, Sir Jasper Pepper, at the rectory, with the view of witnessing the operation which the Khan was about to perform on poor old Martin, and receiving and witnessing any deposition he might make, should his reason be restored, as they anticipated.

"Is it possible," exclaimed the little East India director, "that you can lend yourself to such a proceeding?"

"Quite possible!" gravely replied the colonel.

"Why, the man has been an idiot ever since the night of Sir William Mowbray's death?"

In reply to this objection, his visitor informed him that he had consulted both Martineau and Dalrymple on the subject: that both those eminent practitioners had admitted the possibility, although they doubted the probability of success.

"At any rate," he added, "the attempt is worth the trial. I consider it a reproach to the county that the head of one of our noblest families should have been murdered—as Sir William is proved to have been—and his assassin still at large!"

The East India director—the man of scrip and consols—appeared undecided. He looked at General Bouchier, as if for advice; but the latter personage seemed plunged in a profound reverie—perhaps he was thinking of his bride.

"I really don't see," began Sir Jasper, "how my presence can facilitate the inquiry! Dr. Orme is himself a magistrate!"

"It certainly is not indispensable!" replied Colonel Butler, with a smile, which he well knew would pique the vanity of the old man; "as an affair in which the honour of the county and the feelings of the oldest families are concerned, I thought you might naturally wish to be present; in fact, that your absence, being so near the spot, would be remarked upon: of course you are the best judge! Good morning, Sir Jasper Pepper!"

And the speaker rose to depart.
"Shall I be indiscreet in offering to accompany you, colonel?" demanded General Bouchier, waking up from his reverie.

The active magistrate assured him that his presence would afford them pleasure.

"I, too, of course, shall be there," said the baronet, addressing his visitor; "from my rank and position in the county—as Colonel Butler justly observes—my absence might be thought strange and unneighbourly!"

In less than an hour the party started for the rectory.

About the same time that the general had been discussing his breakfast at Bangalore hall, his nephew, and a friend well known in the clubs and sporting circles of the metropolis as The Major—but whose real name was Mottram—were strolling, en robe de chambre, in the garden of a pretty cottage ornée, on the banks of the Thames, near Richmond. Isabel had not yet made her appearance. Once or twice in the course of their promenade Herbert paused—looked impatiently at his watch, and cast reproachful glances towards the windows of his wife's dressing-room.

"Too bad, by Jupiter!" he said. "I seldom take more than two hours to dress—nay, I have done it in an hour and a half; and here is Isabel not down yet!"

"So soon!" said his friend, with a smile.
Herbert shrugged his shoulders.

"Your wife is a very charming woman?"
"Humph! ye-es!" observed the bridegroom.

"And ladies have their privileges!" added the major.

"So have husbands," replied the ex-captain of the Guards—for he had been compelled to sell out; "and you forget that I have been a husband these three months! In fact, major, I cannot conceal from myself that my susceptibilities have been played upon—the generosity of my nature taken advantage of—that I have sacrificed myself! I have lost a princely fortune for a caprice—a toy! Isabel," he added, with a gravity which made his companion smile, "has no mind—positively nothing intellectual about her! Now there is nothing I adore so much as the mind of a woman—beauty is insipid in comparison with it!"

As the speaker uttered this, his thoughts reverted, most probably, to the fortune of his uncle, and the five per cents and india scrip of Sir Jasper Pepper—all chance of which he had forfeited by his folly, as he termed it.

"Your uncle will relent," said the major. "We shall soon have you amongst us again!"

"Never!" exclaimed Herbert, passionately. "You do not know what a vindictive, cold-blooded fellow he is! I have thwarted the dearest wish of the shrivelled, selfish thing he calls his heart! He will never forgive me!"

"Pooh! pooh!" interrupted his friend.

"More," continued the speaker; "he is about to marry the daughter of old Pepper himself—he, with his bachelor habits, prejudices and vices! Judge, after that, what chance there is of his ever pardoning the man who mixed such a dose for him!"

"Not much of his pardoning the man who mixed it, I confess," observed Mottram, fixing his eyes with a searching expression upon his companion; "but I think he would prove very grateful to the one who prevented his swallowing it!"

"Prevented it! How?"

"By taking it for him."

With all his love of mind in woman, Herbert possessed but very little discernment of his own. He was perfectly aware, from the tone the conversation had taken, that his friend meant something—but what that something was, puzzled his imagination.

"I don't exactly see," he drawled, at the same time passing his delicate white fingers through his flaxen poodle curls—his usual resource when, to use a college phrase, he did not feel up in his subject—"how any other man's marriage with Miss Pepper—or rather Elton's widow—would to heaven the fellow had lived!—should call forth the general's gratitude! it's the estates he wants to marry!"

"Suppose you were to marry her?" whispered the major.

"If you jest!" exclaimed Herbert; "the law would call that burglary or bigamy—I don't exactly remember which, but something decidedly unpleasant!"

"Suppose," continued the tempter—"of course I only put it by way of supposition—that it were possible to restore you your liberty—place you in a position legally to become the husband of the heiress of Sir Jasper Pepper—do you think such an event would reconcile you to your uncle?"

"My dear fellow," replied the ex-captain, with a sickly smile, "it would enable me to make my own terms with him! He would pay my debts as readily as his laundress's bill—and add at least fifty thousand as a cadeau upon the wedding morning!"

The speaker felt so interested in the conversation, that he ceased to look at his watch, or cast reproachful glances towards the window of his wife's dressing-room. Taking his friend by the arm, he drew him into a retired walk, still further from the house, observing that they would find it cooler there.

"I am quite cool," said the major.

For some time they continued to walk in silence: neither liked to throw aside the mask, and expose the ulcerous thing he called his heart to the other. Herbert was the first to speak.

"What do you mean, Mottram?" he said; "to hear how you rattle out, one would imagine it possible to dissolve my marriage with Isabel!"

"It is possible!" was the reply; and again there was a pause.

"How?"

"In a hundred ways," replied the tempter; "but pardon me, my dear fellow," he added; "my pity for the blight of your hopes has outrun my discretion! I had not the slightest intention to offend."

"I am not offended," answered Herbert; "indeed, it is scarcely possible you could offend me! I could bear much from you—we are such old friends!"

The two gentlemen shook each other by the hand.

"Of course," continued the speaker, "you would not suggest anything improper?"

The major made no reply.

"That is very improper!" added the ex-captain; "but you have roused my curiosity, and I confess I should like to hear one of those hundred ways which you alluded to explained."

"I have observed that your wife," whispered Mottram, "is proud?"

"Very."

"And vain?"

"As most women."

"And a little capricious?"

"True."

"And very resentful—to say nothing of a slight dash of jealousy in her composition. Such a temper," added the major, with diabolical calculation, "might be easily worked upon to forget her marriage vow. I need not point out to you the consequences—divorce, and liberty for both parties to marry again: such are some of the numerous accidents to which wedded life is subjected."

The husband of Isabel had listened with deep attention to the scheme so artfully concocted. He saw not only its feasibility, but the advantage to be derived from it. The character of his friend left no doubt upon his mind but that the major was himself the Lothario he alluded to.

"There is no hope—fear, I mean," he replied, "that Isabel will ever play me false!"

"How so?"

"She is too fond of me."

The major smiled at what he deemed the conceit of Herbert. His companion saw it, but did not think proper to notice it. It was not his game to quarrel with him—at least, for the present. There was a vein of natural cunning in his disposition, which even those who had known him longest, and most intimately, had never given him credit for. Perhaps it had hitherto lain dormant. If so, the approach of poverty very soon developed it.

"I would bet you twenty thousand pounds," he said, "that you could not find a man to rival me with Isabel!"

Mottram quietly took out his pocket-book, and began to write.

"Good gracious! what are you doing?"

"Booking our bet!" answered the major, without moving a muscle.

"No names—the thing is really so ridiculous!" observed the ex-captain of the Guards.

"Of course not!" said the cool-blooded villain. "But, Herbert, recollect there must be no jealousy between us! Give me fair play!"

"You!" observed his friend, with real or pretended surprise. "Why, you can't be serious?"

"Can't I?"

"What, you!—rival me! Oh, come, come, Mottram, the jest has been carried quite far enough! I am not a vain man; but the idea of your rivalling me is really too ridiculous!"

"It may appear so; and, under ordinary circumstances, would really be so," said the major, willing to soothe the mortified vanity of the speaker. "But, as you yourself confessed, Mrs. Herbert is a woman possessed of much beauty, but very little mind!"

"That's true; and I adore mind."

"Like most husbands," continued the tempter, "you are careless?"

"Humph!—a little."

"At times, perhaps, harsh—at least, what wives consider harsh. On these failings I build my hopes. The awakening from the intoxication of the honeymoon to the activity of married life, is, perhaps, the most trying moment of a woman's life. She fancies that she is no longer loved; pouts at being treated like a mortal, instead of being worshipped as a goddess. In short, at such a moment let any one skilled in the heart of the sex step in—grant him a tolerable person, a persuasive tongue—and ten to one but she falls."

Whilst the speaker was thus artfully dictating to Herbert the line of conduct he should pursue, Isabel, who at length had completed her toilette, not finding the gentlemen in the breakfast-room, sought them in the garden. Despite the utter worthlessness of his nature, her unworthy husband could not avoid a blush as she approached.

"Good morning!" said the unsuspecting girl—for in years she was little more—extending a hand to each.

Herbert pretended not to see the action, but looked at his watch. The major raised the hand to his lips.

"I fear I have detained you?" she said.

"Not longer than usual!" drily observed her husband.

"But punctuality is such a vulgar virtue!"

Isabel might have retorted; for Herbert was one of the most irregular persons in the world. On the contrary, she took his arm, and, looking into his face with a smile, sought to woo him into better humour.

"Don't be angry, George!" she said. "I promise you that I will not keep you waiting again. I'll be down at the very first dinner-bell."

"I don't dine at home."

"Not dine at home!" repeated his wife, with a look of disappointment. "Where do you dine?"

"At my club, madam," was the churlish reply. "And very soon I expect I shall be forced to breakfast there; for the irregularity of this house is intolerable!"

With these words, which sounded doubly harsh in the ears of Mrs. Herbert, from being uttered in the presence of a visitor, her husband dropped the arm which still rested upon his, and proceeded, with rapid strides, towards the house.

A deep sigh broke from the heart of Isabel.

"Take my arm, dear Mrs. Herbert!" said the major, in one of his softest tones; "George is terribly out of humour this morning. I never saw him so capricious—so unjust before! Nay, I could almost call him cruel—so soon after his marriage, too! You must show a little spirit," he added, insidiously, "or he will positively tyrannise over you!"

The insulted wife dashed aside a tear, and, taking the arm of her disinterested adviser, followed the steps of her husband to the house. During the breakfast, she did nothing but coquette with their visitor. Poor Isabel she was like a child playing with a rattle-snake.

Directly after breakfast Herbert went to town, without a word of excuse for his unkindness. As his wife, who really loved him, saw him about to depart, she started from her seat, and would have followed him. It would have been, she felt, so consoling to have received one kiss, or even a pressure of the hand. Her visitor, unhappily, restrained the natural impulse of her heart, by observing, "that she really spoiled her husband."

"How?" she inquired, with a look of surprise.

"By showing him the hold he has upon your affections. I need not remind a woman of your discernment, my dear Mrs. Herbert, that my friend George, who is one of the best fellows in the world, is a little vain?"

Isabel could not avoid mentally admitting that he was vain.

"If he saw that you cared for him less, he would be more attentive."

"True!"

"Less capricious: it is the perfect security he feels, which leads him to indulge in these little ebullitions of temper."

"What can I do?" said the inexperienced wife, who, for the first time since her marriage, began to feel very unhappy. "What would you advise?"

"I," replied the major, laughing, "Oh, I am one of the very worst counsellors in the world you can consult! Stay, I have it—suppose you make him jealous?"

Isabel started at the proposition, and was about to repel it, when the recollection that it was by working upon his jealousy she had secured his hand, reconciled her to the idea.

"You are right!" she said; "quite right! Vanity and pride are the keys to his affection: I will make him jealous!"

Major Mottram smiled.

When a woman once decides upon making her husband jealous, she has taken the first step towards the ruin of her domestic peace; and yet how often do we see them fall into the snare, reckless or misjudging of the consequences! Could she have seen the sinister smile of the tempter, as she uttered the imprudent words, the same breath would have recalled them.

"I have been thinking, Mrs. Herbert," said her visitor, "that till you can find a better cicisbeo, you had better put up with me."

Isabel looked at him doubtfully; but there was such an air of frankness in his manner, that her suspicions gradually vanished.

"When you have alarmed George a little," he continued, "taught him to feel that to retain the heart he has won a little more attention is necessary, we can confess our plot."

"That is true!" replied the deluded woman, charmed at the idea of bringing her husband, as she had done her lover, to her feet.

An hour afterwards, Mrs. Herbert and Major Mottram left the cottage, for a stroll in Richmond Park. Guided by her resentment, she weakly permitted her companion to detain her till the hour of dinner: anticipating the mortification which her husband would manifest on her return—an idea which the major encouraged by every means. He was an accomplished man of the world, and knew how to offer that delicate flattery so acceptable to the female heart.

On their return, the servant presented a note to the gentleman. He read it, and appeared both hurt and surprised.

"Has anything occurred?" anxiously inquired Isabel, who had recognised the handwriting.

"Nothing, I assure you—nothing!"

"It is from my husband?"

"Yes!" replied the major; "George merely writes to apologise for not dining at home. He has met a pleasant party at his club, and—"

"Club!" interrupted the indignant wife; "is there no message? Not one word for me?"

Mottram handed her the note. As soon as she had read it, the unhappy woman burst into tears, and let it fall from her hand.

One trace of Eden lingered in that weak heart yet.

CHAPTER C.

As Henry Ashton and his uncle approached the rectory, they encountered Chettleborough the sexton, and poor Martin. The countenance of the idiot brightened as our hero took him affectionately by the hand, and asked him how he felt. In fact, as Joe observed, it almost became intelligent.

"Back! come again!" said the victim of the warreners' brutality. "One! two! All will return with the sweet flowers and birds of spring!"

"Who will return, Martin?"

The poor old man made no reply to the question, but began counting with his fingers—"One! two!" and repeating the words "back again."

"What can he mean?" said Henry, anxiously.

Chettleborough was about to reply, but a look from Matthew Ashton restrained him. The worthy farmer was perfectly aware how necessary it was that the nerves of his nephew should not be unstrung, or his feelings agitated, by the perhaps groundless supposition that Ellen was at the abbey. He had made up his mind not to tell him till after the operation.

"And how has my poor friend been?" demanded Henry of the sexton.

"E'en as you left him," said the old man; "simple as a child; his chief amusement to gather daisies in the churchyard—for he generally accompanies me, and watches by my side whilst I work. At night he will listen for hours to my bells. Of late," he added, "I have observed a change in him."

"How a change?"

"He is more restless than usual, and once or twice has wandered from my cottage. The last time he did not return till morning. He had been, I suspect, to the abbey—for he raved respecting his old master, poor Sir William, and Miss Ellen."

By this time they had reached the rectory, where Dr. Orme, the Khan, Colonel Butler, Sir Jasper Pepper, General Bouchier, and the two medical men were already assembled in the library.

At the sight of so many strangers Martin drew back, with an expression of almost childish terror. It required all the influence of our hero and the sexton to prevent his escaping from the room.

Henry shuddered as he noticed the chair with the frame affixed to it. His tried friend Joe had already explained to him its use.

"Who is that man?" whispered Farmer Ashton, fixing his eyes upon the renegade—who betrayed, however, neither confusion nor the least sign of recognition at the marked gaze of the speaker.

His nephew explained.

Whilst doing so the Khan—whom their arrival had interrupted in a long explanation which he was giving of his invention, and the results he expected from it, to the medical men—renewed his conversation. At the first sound of his voice the farmer started, trembled, and turned very pale.

"What is the matter?" demanded our hero. "Are you ill?"

"Nothing—it is nothing, Harry!" answered the old man, faintly; "at least nothing that I can tell you now. Take no heed of me."

With a look of surprise his nephew left him—for at this moment Dr. Orme beckoned him to his side.

"Do you think," he said, "there will be any violence necessary to induce poor Martin to submit to the operation? In such case, my worthy friend Dalrymple declares that he cannot sanction the proceeding. The excitement might prove fatal."

"The best way to insure its success," replied our hero, "would be for all but Joe, the sexton, and myself to withdraw to the adjoining room: the presence of so many persons distracts the poor old man."

After a whispered consultation between the surgeons and the magistrates, the advice was taken.

"Be firm, Henry!" said the rector, as he wrung the hand of his adopted son. "I shall pray for success!" Turning to the Khan—who maintained his usual cold and impassible manner—he added: "Whatever may be the result, let not the pride of science induce you to prolong the sufferings of your patient after the hope of achieving a cure has disappeared."

"The result is in the hands of God," said the renegade; "man is but an instrument in His hands!"

With these words he retired to a deep bay-window at the end of the room, and began to examine the instrument, which was upon a table under it.

No sooner were Joe, Henry, Martin, and the sexton alone, than the idiot—upon whose brain impressions and recollections were as evanescent as the rainbow—began to count upon his fingers:

"One!—two! back with the flowers and birds!"

"He is quite calm now," said the sexton. "Shall we place him in the chair?"

As unresisting as an infant in the arms of its nurse, the old man suffered himself to be seated. The only sign of fear or dissent which he exhibited was when Joe Beans attempted to remove his cap.

"No, no!" he muttered.

"You had better let me untie it," whispered Chettleborough; "he will not mind me."

"Come, Martin!" he said, "it is time for bed."

"Bells! bells!" exclaimed the idiot.

"What does he mean?" whispered Henry Ashton—who, as the moment drew near, repeatedly asked himself if he were justified in sanctioning an experiment which might possibly terminate fatally. The sexton made answer, that he was accustomed to play his charge every night to sleep with his hand bells; and, having observed that in the severest paroxysm of his suffering they appeared to soothe him, he had sent them up to the rectory, by the son of I clerk, at an early hour that very morning.

Martin still muttered something about bells; but it was evident that the word had lost much of its force—that the idea it had excited became indistinct—for he almost immediately afterwards recommenced counting his fingers and deliberately pronouncing—"One!—two!"

The bells, with the frame on which they were suspended, were brought into the library, and placed at as great a distance from the chair as the size of the room would permit. The eyes of the sufferer glistened with childish pleasure as the sexton began to strike upon them.

"Now, Joe!" said Henry Ashton, as soon as he saw that the attention of Martin was engaged; "whatever we may feel for the pangs of our poor old friend, we must be firm. You will take his left hand, whilst I secure the right."

"Oh, Master Harry!" observed the rustic, with a sigh; "I would give the best year of my life that it were over!"

The two young men each secured a hand of the patient, whilst Chettleborough commenced one of his favourite tunes upon the bells.

The idiot began to move his head from side to side, as if to beat time to the measure. The Khan advanced from the bay-window to the back of the chair, and began gently to turn the screws of the frame. So gradual was the operation, that the circle closed round the old man's brow almost without his perceiving it, so absorbed was he in the music.

As soon as the head of the old man was secured in the necessary position, Henry Ashton looked up in the face of the operator. The courage of his sinking heart revived, as he gazed upon the calm, self-possessed, dignified countenance of the Khan. There was neither hope nor doubt in his eye, but that which at such a moment was invaluable—decision.

At the first movement of the circular saw—whose action was not only to cut through the injured portion of the skull, but at the same time grasp the fragments so as to prevent them pressing upon the brain—Martin started as if he had received an electric shock, trembled violently, uttered a deep groan, and then endeavoured to raise his hands. Poor Joe in his agitation nearly released the one he held.

The sexton continued his tune upon the bells.

The Khan paused.

"One—two—bells!" said the old man, faintly.

The delay was but for an instant, to enable the operator to remove a few of the thin grey hairs which impeded the action of the instrument.

"In the name of humanity," said our hero, "do not prolong his sufferings a single instant after you have lost all hope!"

"In the name of the God of justice and humanity," replied the renegade, in a solemn tone, "I will proceed whilst one ray of hope remains!"

And once more he applied the instrument.

The shrieks and groans of the sufferer soon became heart-rending—but above them, loud and frequent as they were, Henry and Joe could distinguish the hissing of that terrible saw. They felt it in every nerve; it thrilled through their veins like an electric current, jarred the very marrow of their bones; the agony they endured was second only in its intensity to that of poor old Martin.

In his struggles to release his hands from the firm but friendly grasp which retained them, the patient dug his nails into their palms. Our hero felt sick at heart: he would have given worlds not to have been present, or that the operation were over. His companion was pale as death; huge drops of cold perspiration ran trickling down his honest face.

Still the Khan remained unmoved. Calm as the iron statue of Destiny, he continued to ply the saw, whose delicate, sharp-cutting teeth were slowly eating through the shattered fragments of the skull.

Dr. Orme was a man of the greatest humanity; one of those gentle natures which could not endure to witness the sufferings of any living thing. At the first cry of the patient, he offered up a mental prayer; as his screams became louder and more violent, he grasped the arm of Surgeon Dalrymple.

"Stop this!" he said. "I cannot endure the thought of what his sufferings must be!"

The man of science, who held his stop-watch in his hand, looked at his professional brother to answer for him, and went on with his observation.

"Do not let the cries of the patient distress you!" said Doctor Martineau; "Dalrymple will tell you, as well as I, that he considers it a rather favourable symptom than otherwise."

Dalrymple nodded, as if to confirm the words of his confrère.

"Very shocking!" observed Sir Jasper Pepper, who was beginning to look very bilious. "Oh, that saw!"

They could hear it distinctly; for the sounds of the bells had ceased. The sexton's hand trembled so that he could no longer play them: it would not have been of much use if he could.

There was a succession of groans; then a deep-drawn sigh, followed by silence, which would have been unbroken, but for the hissing of the saw, which grated so upon the ears of the listeners.

Judging from the silence that the operation was concluded, the two surgeons entered the room. They were followed by the magistrates and the worthy rector.

They found the Khan in the act of replacing the cap upon the head of poor old Martin, who was insensible.

Dalrymple motioned to him to remove the cap.

"As I anticipated," he said; "you have succeeded perfectly in accomplishing the removal of the fractured parts, but the patient is dead from exhaustion!"

The renegade shook his head mournfully.

"Dead?" groaned Henry, with a sigh of disappointment. "Poor old man! fidelity like thine merited a better fate than this!"

Martineau—who had been feeling the wrist of the patient—suddenly asked for ammonia: he had discovered the faintest possible indication of a pulse.

"Quick!" he said; "he is not gone yet!"

The stimulant was instantly applied; the Khan at the same time taking care to replace the silver plate, to prevent any injurious effect from the action of the atmosphere upon the exposed portion of the brain.

After a few moments of anxious suspense, Martin gave a gentle sigh. His head was immediately released from the frame: and Joe Beans, taking the old man up in his arms, as tenderly as a mother would her sleeping child, carried him into the adjoining room, and laid him upon the bed. It now became the turn of the regular practitioners to take him in their charge.

"If we can only succeed in keeping down the fever," observed one.

"In preventing his sinking," added the other, "there is a possibility that he may live—at least for some time."

"Thank God!" exclaimed our hero, when he heard the opinion; "it has relieved my heart of a fearful load!"

"And mine, too!" sobbed Joe, who had been vainly trying for some time to suppress a convulsive sort of hiccup. "Hang me, Master Harry! when I looked upon the old man's face, so pale and death-like, and heard the whizz of that infernal saw, I almost felt as if I were helping to commit a murder!"

As the Khan, who had remained behind in the library, to gather up his instruments, was about to follow, a hand was laid upon his arm: he looked up—the hand was Farmer Ashton's.

"Not now, Matthew!" he said; "not now! I will come to the farm to-night—that is, if you promise me to be alone!"

"I do promise thee!" replied the uncle of our hero, in a tone of deep emotion. "Thee will not fail me? I long to learn—"

"You shall learn everything which I can or dare impart," interrupted the renegade; "remember this is no place for explanations such as ours!"

So saying, he left the apartment.

"I am right!" muttered the farmer, as he followed him. "I knew that I could not be mistaken; besides, he called me Matthew: how should a stranger know my name?"

Although the operation had been so far successfully performed, the breath of life was all but extinct in the aged sufferer. Both the medical men expressed a doubt whether, in the event of his recovering his reason, he would sufficiently rally to make a deposition.

Dr. Orme observed that he felt inclined to sleep.

"You are right," said the Khan, whose confidence had never for an instant deserted him; "he is about to sleep!"

Henry walked up to him, and gratefully pressed his hand.

"From which sleep," continued the speaker, "he will either awake with reason and memory restored, or in a world where suffering and crime are alike unknown!"

"You, at least, will watch by him?"

"It would be useless, young man," said the renegade, placing his hand upon the shoulder of the speaker, who was no other than our hero. "I can no further serve him; added to which, an imperative duty calls me elsewhere. Doubt not," he added, "whatever betide, my wish to serve you—for I have not forgotten the scene with the warrener, in the grounds of Sir Jasper Pepper: if I live, we shall meet again!"

So saying, he quitted the rectory, but not alone: Joe Beans accompanied him, with the keys of the belfry—the temporary prison to which Will Siderer had been conveyed, to await the result of Martin's recovery.

CHAPTER CI.

O woman, in affection strong,
Weak only in joy's sunny hour;
More than to man to thee belong,
Endurance in misfortune's hour.

OLD SONG.

It is not to be supposed that Zara did not miss the weapon which Ellen had secured on the night when the inmates of the abbey were startled by the visit of the harmless maniac, who, like a restless spectre, haunted the abode of his former master; or that she was at a loss to guess the purpose for which her foster-child had taken it. Strange to relate, far from feeling alarmed, the ayah felt proud of her charge. She experienced emotions similar to those which the spectator feels who assists at the representation of some highly-wrought tragedy, or listeners to the recital of some desperate achievement. With all her faults and treachery, the Indian could appreciate a great and heroic act.

"It was from this source," she murmured, "that the daughter of the pale face drew her resolution! She has less of her mother's blood than mine. I gave her the spirit which danger strengthens—hitherto I have considered her only as a child. Suffering, I find, has changed her into woman!"

From that time her manner became so affectionate to the prisoner, that had not Ellen deemed it a deep-laid scheme to throw her off her guard, she would have welcomed it as the first dawning of a repentant spirit.

"It matters little which!" thought the persecuted girl; "I am mistress of my destiny! They may destroy me—but my enemies shall never make me false to the faith I have plighted—to the man who hath won my virgin heart! Better Henry should mourn me dead, than despise me living!"

On the arrival of Meeran Hafaz at Carrow, Lady Mowbray, who had neither forgotten nor forgiven the spirited interference of the ayah in behalf of Ellen, poured into his ear the poison of her doubts. She felt assured, she said, "that the Indian nurse meditated treachery."

At first the young man smiled incredulously.

"She has been bribed!" urged her ladyship.

"Bribed!" repeated Meeran; "you do not know the character of Zara! There is no sacrifice she would not make for those whom she loves! When she has once given her word, the wealth of Peru would fail to move her!"

"Bribed through her affections, then," continued the artful woman; "but bribed I am sure she has been! See her yourself, and judge if she is not changed! Ask the colonel—"

"I shall do better!" replied the youth, coolly.

"Better?"

"I shall inquire of herself!"

So saying, he traced a single word, in the sacred characters of the Hindoos, upon a piece of paper, and requested her ladyship to send one of her servants with it to the ayah—who in a few moments made her appearance in the drawing-room. Her foster-son eyed her narrowly. There was something in her manner which instantly struck him: it was warm and affectionate, as usual, but a shade of sadness was mingled with it.

"Zara," he said, "you do not seem rejoiced to see me?"

"Not unless I see you happy!" was the reply; "it was an evil hour," she added, "which brought us to this cold, distant land, where hearts and faces are like painted epulchres—masked and deceitful!"

At the allusion to painted sepulchres, Lady Mowbray blushed through her rouge, despite her effort to look as if she did not understand the allusion.

"I am not alone changed," continued the speaker; "although I have given you proofs of my fidelity—suppressed, for your sake, the yearning of my heart for the child I nurtured—you have listened to the tale of the slanderer, and suspect me!"

"Zara!"

"Why, else," added the ayah, sternly, and at the same time casting a withering look of scorn towards her accuser, "is that woman present at our meeting? Do you class me with the vile thing whose service gold can purchase?"

"No, Zara!" exclaimed the young man, struck by her manner; "it is true that I trust but little to humanity—for the more I mingle with mankind, the more experience teaches me to despise it. I doubt myself, and all around me; but not you—not you!"

"What a very weak young man!" mentally observed her ladyship, who could not comprehend the existence of such feelings between the haughty, wealthy Meeran, and one whom she looked upon as little better than a slave.

"You trust me still?" said the ayah, fixing upon him a penetrating glance, as if to read his secret thoughts.

"Still and ever!" he replied.

There was a pause, broken only by a deep sigh from his nurse: some terrible emotion seemed to agitate her bosom—but the struggle was a brief one, for her countenance speedily resumed its impassible expression; and, turning with an air of dignity towards Lady Mowbray, she requested to be left alone with her foster-son.

Boiling with rage and malice, the artful woman bounded out of the room. It seemed a relief to both when she was gone—for both despised her. For some time they gazed upon each other in silence, which Zara was the first to break.

"Meeran," she said, in the low, musical tone which she invariably used when speaking in the language of their native East, "I cannot dissemble with you. A change has come over me. I will no longer serve you in your designs against Ellen!"

The young man bounded from the couch upon which he was sitting with the ferocity of a tiger, his face flushed with passion, and then gradually assumed that pale olive hue which indicated the gathering tempest of his soul.

Zara regarded him unmoved—she had frequently witnessed such changes in his infancy, and was not to be terrified by them in his manhood.

"I have witnessed the sufferings of Ellen," she continued, "her sufferings and despair: she is dying, Meeran—the child I nurtured is dying through our cruelty! Act generously," she added; "achieve man's noblest conquest—the victory over his passions; resign her, and return to India!"

It would be impossible to describe the scorn and impotent rage with which her foster-son listened to the unwelcome words of the ayah—to whom his slightest caprice had hitherto been law, absolute as those of her own caste.

"Resign her!" he exclaimed; "not in the grave! From my funeral pyre my ashes still would claim her! I thought thou hadst known me better! My purpose is immovable—alike in love or hate! Is this your gratitude?" he added, bitterly.

"Gratitude!" she repeated, with a look of painful surprise; "gratitude for having watched over you with a mother's care—for having loved you with more than a mother's love—for having overleaped each human barrier—broken every human tie—to please you?"

"It was your duty!" retorted Meeran, sternly.

Zara smiled in bitterness.

"But it is well that I am warned—for with me to know my enemy is to be armed! Give up the key of Ellen's chamber!"

It was instantly thrown upon the table by the ayah, whose eyes flashed as terribly as his own. There was something fearful in the silent hostility of these two beings, who had hitherto been actuated as by one spirit.

"And now," said the young Indian, "hear my last commands: to-morrow night I expect the arrival of the priest who is to make Ellen mine—for mine, by force or her own consent, she shall be! I have sworn it by myself!"

"The only god you worship!" observed Zara, in a sarcastic tone.

Without deigning a reply, Meeran Hafaz took up the key and left the apartment, without casting a look upon the nurse, who remained or several minutes standing on the same spot, like a person who has received a sudden blow. Twice did the unhappy woman press her hand upon her side, and breathe the name of her foster-son.

"Ingrate!" she exclaimed at last, with a passionate burst of grief; "ingrate! was it for this I stifled the voice of nature in my breast, and lent myself to crime my soul abhorred—practised against the happiness of Ellen, who is as dear to me as if I had borne her? I am rightly served," she added. "My sin is made my punishment! Meeran," she continued, "thou hast seen me strong in vice—shall I prove weak in virtue? How Zara has sinned thou knowest too well! How she can atone, thou hast yet to learn!"

Twice during the day the ayah sought the chamber of Ellen, but found it locked. The second time she called to her.

"They have separated us!" she said, in a kinder tone; "but at night the eyes and arm of Zara shall watch over her charge!"

(To be continued in our next.)

TO-MORROW.

BY E. H. BURRINGTON.

We cheat the heart with waking dreams,

Through all life's rapid range,

And change what is to that which seems

The better for the change.

No swarthy clouds along the sky

Blot out each spot of blue,

But look like net-work to the eye

Of fancy peeping through.

A mother closed her weary eyes,

And they were red with sorrow,

And muttered in her troubled sleep,

"He will be well To-morrow."

She spoke of her poor stricken boy,

Whom pain was sorely pressing,

And though To-day refused a joy,

To-morrow gave a blessing.

Though fast we run, To-morrow still

Unkindly speeds away;

But flings us back the medicine

That soothes our ills To-day.

And like the moon from whom the night

Its fairest look must borrow,

So Hope, an angel winged with light,

Lends glory to the Morrow.

THE FIRST OF APRIL.

It is an awkward circumstance to have been born on the 1st of April. To be made an April fool of once and away might be endurable—but to be made an April fool for life, is enough to try the patience of a saint.

It was no longer ago than this time twelvemonth, that wishing, as most men do, to make merry on my natal day, I invited a company of jolly fellows to dine with me. The table was duly set out—my choicest wines were in readiness—turbot and venison were not forgotten. I waited, and waited, and no one came. I sat the whole evening, chewing the cud of mortification and disappointment. I enjoyed the luxury of feeling myself an ill-used man. It could, should, and would be nothing but a predetermined insult, the result of a conspiracy. One man, or even two men, might have been detained by accident—but the whole of a numerous party! Like Rousseau, I began to fancy myself the object of a world's persecution. "My friends were treacherous, my foes dangerous." But a few days removed me from this pedestal of mock-heroic dignity. My cards of invitation had been written by an amanuensis, and my friends, not knowing the hand, and not being aware that the first of April was really and truly my birth-day, had with one consent treated the affair as a practical joke of the season.

Once, in my youthful days, I courted a fair and learned maiden. She was deeply read in the lore of sympathies, and the mysterious concatenation of days. Often did she declare that her marriage must take place on the anniversary of her husband's birthday. She was persuaded that she would thus nestle herself more closely into his heart, and that their course of life would thereby run more smooth, more untroubled by dissensions. I cannot at this day recall all her arguments—for even then I did not entirely understand them. The first time I heard her sweet, musical voice, my heart died within me. Long did I strive to combat her persuasion—at last I was forced to yield, and reveal my fatal secret. It was exactly as I had anticipated. She loved me dearly, but to marry on the first of April! To afford a standing joke to all the rude and illiterate! To impose upon a man who had the misfortune to be born on the first of April, the additional ridicule of being married on that day! My innamorata fell into a musing, then into a melancholy, and thence into a green and yellow fit of pining, which was only cured by her marrying a gentleman with a more auspicious day of his nativity. Poor Celestina! I believe she really loved me, and that even the three husbands she has since had have not succeeded in entirely filling up the void my loss left in her heart.

On the occasion of my coming of age, there were some deeds of great urgency to be executed. Somehow or other my mercurial spirits—perhaps I owe them to the influence of the season at which I was born—had procured for me the equivocal character of a wag. In consequence of this, I had the utmost difficulty in persuading the grave old lawyer, to whose skill I had committed the guardianship of my legal rights, to draw up the necessary documents. It was provoking beyond all human endurance to hear him, in the most pathetic tones of remonstrance, rebuking me for allowing my madcap humour so far to interfere with my substantial interests, as to lead me to try such a silly hoax. In vain I vowed and protested—he knew better—he was not to be made a young man's jest. I was at my wits' end. To be suspected of quizzing, when I was never more serious in my life,—serious even to anger. And the intolerable gravity and air of superior wisdom of him who was in reality playing the fool he thought I wished to make him! There was nothing for it but to institute a search after the midwife who officiated at my thrice unhappy birth; for not until I confronted him with that venerable beldam, would my man of law credit my earnest asseverations. Even this, however, though certainly provoking enough, was nothing to the mortification I endured from the vulgar, ill-suppressed chuckling of his impertinent clerk, while the deeds were executing.

My sufferings commenced early in life. The secret transpired while I was at school; and from that moment to the time of my leaving, I was incessantly pestered with effusions of schoolboy wit. In general, I was known by the designation of "April Fool." Sometimes I was invested with the dignity of "Dey of Algiers." Nor did the mischief cease with the mortification I then endured, or the black eyes and bleeding noses I incurred, in consequence of my attempts to wreak my indignation on my persecutors. The euphonious epithets I was obliged to endure got wind, and became known to many who neither knew me personally, nor the circumstance to which I was indebted for them. In consequence of this, I have frequently had to struggle against an opinion that I was a silly lad, who had, in all probability, grown up into a sili-er man. Those who know what it is to contend with an unfavourable prepossession, however baseless, will appreciate the extent to which I have, by this means, been a loser.

It is a more serious matter having a bad birthday, than most people will be easily brought to believe. It is like approaching a noble patron's house, the first time you visit him, by the stable approach, and being, in consequence, ushered into the servants' hall, and allowed to remain sitting there for some time before your claims to gentility are discovered. Such an accident, conjoined with your dependence upon the great man's favour, produces an effect on the liveried gentry, which is never entirely effaced by any degree of future success in life. So is it with the unfortunate wight who has had the misfortune to be born on the 1st of April.

It really was a crying shame in my father and mother not to have ordered matters better. It was cruel carelessness to allow a man-child to be born on a day on which a humane bookseller would hesitate to issue a new publication for the first time. Let not my readers fancy that this is attributing an unnatural degree of refined delicacy of feeling to that excellent class of men.

It is provoking, that when there were no less than three hundred and sixty-six days to come and go on (for I was born in Leap-year), the very worst should have fallen to my lot. There are many bad enough. I should not much have relished being born on such a day of mortification as Ash Wednesday. Methinks a man born on that day, must contract a sour, puritanical character from his birth. Neither should I much affect the 29th of February. In that case a man, without having the consolation of remaining young, in consequence would be cheated out of his fair tale of birthdays. But bad though these be, they are nothing to compare with the first of April. A day which sets all the world on the broad grin, is for ever embittered to me by our too intimate connection. When men make mocks at it, I feel as if part of their ridicule glanced by it and alighted on me. My dignity is, as it were, compromised by the ridicule of so important an era in my life. When all the rest of the world are merry, I am dismal and malcontent. When friends seek each other out to wrestle lovingly in the grips of merry malice, I shrink from society and affect solitude. To me the milk of merriment is dashed with gall. To me, whatever it be to others, the first of April is no joke.

WOMAN.—There is a beauty in the helplessness of woman. The clinging trust which searches for extraneous support is graceful and touching—timidity is the attribute of her sex; but to herself it is not without its dangers, its inconveniences, and its sufferings. Her first effort at comparative freedom is bitter enough; for the delicate mind shrinks from every unaccustomed contact, and the warm and gushing heart closes itself, like the blossom of the sensitive plant, at every approach. Man may at once determine his position, and assert his place—woman has hers to seek—and alas! I fear me, that however she may appear to turn a calm brow and a quiet lip to the crowd through which she makes her way, that brow throbs, and that lip quivers to the last; until, like a wounded bird, she can once more wing her way to the tranquil home where the drooping head will be fondly raised, and the fluttering heart laid to rest. The dependence of women in the common affairs of life, is, nevertheless, rather the effect of custom than necessity; we have many and brilliant proofs that, where need is, she can be sufficient to herself, and play her part in the great drama of existence with credit, if not with comfort. The yearnings of her solitary spirit, the outpourings of her shrinking sensibility, the cravings of her alienated heart, are indulged only in the quiet holiness of her solitude. The world sees not, guesses not, the conflict; and in the ignorance of others lies her strength. The secret of her weakness is hidden in the depths of her own bosom; and she moves on, amid the heat and the hurry of existence, and with a seal set upon her nature, to be broken only by fond and loving hands, or dissolved in the tears of recovered home affection.

[ENCOUNTER BETWEEN BASSET AND THE TAPSTER, AT THE FAIR ROSAMOND.]

LIVES OF THE QUEENS OF ENGLAND.

BY J. F. SMITH, ESQ., AUTHOR OF

"ROBIN GOODFELLOW," "AMY LAWRENCE," ETC.

ELIZABETH,
QUEEN REGNANT OF ENGLAND.

CHAPTER XXVI.

Though rude in speech, fashioned in honour's mould,
Loyal alike to friend or foe—a man
Unassailable by passion, or the lust
Of courtly favour.

BEAUMONT.

SIR HENRY BEDDINGFIELD seems to have been perfectly aware of the importance of his charge, and how deeply his honour would be questioned if any evil befel the person of Elizabeth whilst in his keeping: perhaps, also, he was no stranger to the machinations of Gardiner and the heads of the Catholic party, who saw no hope of their faith being permanently established in England, if once the daughter of Anne Boleyn succeeded to the crown.

By those who have imperfectly understood his character, he has been greatly censured for the severe restraint which he placed upon the princess. No one was permitted to have access to her person without his special warrant; and when, after several weeks' close captivity, he permitted his prisoner to walk in the gardens of Woodstock, the doors were carefully locked—sentinels placed at regular intervals, with orders to allow no stranger to approach. The sequel proved that the stern old knight was actuated by better and more generous motives than the mere pleasure of oppressing the enemy of his church, the Protestant heiress of the kingdom.

The health of Mary was already failing. Gardiner, whose enmity to Elizabeth was increased by the dread he felt at the possibility of her accession, repeatedly urged on the council the necessity of bringing her to trial. Paget and others of his party expressed the same opinion: to all of which, however, the queen turned a deaf ear. When it is remembered how little cause she had to love her rival—whose birth had stamped her own with illegitimacy—the character of the sovereign whom history has branded as cruel, bloodthirsty, and bigoted, contrasts favourably with that of her successor, who, in her murder of the unfortunate Queen of Scots, displayed an amount of hypocrisy and vindictiveness, which must for ever tarnish her memory.

Gardiner was seated in his cabinet, towards the close of the month of June: he had that very day been unsuccessful in urging upon his royal mistress the topic nearest his heart—and failed; more—been severely chidden for his excess of zeal. The rebuff had but decided in his own mind his half-stated purpose.

"She must die!" he muttered. What is the life of the heretic daughter of a heretic king, weighed in the balance against the interests of Rome, the salvation of a kingdom, and the safety of its ministers? Mary is doomed to be a childless woman: she cannot long survive, and, failing Elizabeth, the Queen of Scots succeeds! She, at least, is Catholic: and the people will soon be reconciled to her foreign husband. Would that she had chosen any but a Frenchman!

These and similar reflections crowded on the busy brain of the churchman, as he continued to pace the narrow limits of the chamber. He was too astute not to perceive the weakness of the arguments by which he was attempting to justify to himself the crime he meditated.

"It must be done!" he repeated; "necessity and the motive sanctify the crime, and holy church has an absolving power!"

With this convenient reflection, he seated himself at a table placed near the quaintly-carved chimney, and struck, with a small metal rod, not unlike a baton, upon a bell, suspended in an oak frame near him. The arras which covered the door of the apartment was drawn aside, and a young man, in the costume of a priest, made his appearance. His countenance bore the pale, ascetic expression peculiar to the Catholic clergy; motionless as a statue he stood, with his arms folded meekly upon his breast, at a short distance from the table, awaiting the orders of the bishop.

"Francis," said Gardiner, "has the person who during the last week twice visited me, been here to-night?"

"He has, my lord!"

"Left he any letter, packet, or message?"

"He merely bid me say, my lord, that the thing you wish was easy of accomplishment, and that he would return in two hours."

"When was this?"

"About one hour since, my lord!"

"When he comes," replied the prelate, after a pause, "conduct him at once to my cabinet. And, as the affair I have to transact with him is one of importance, see that we are not interrupted."

Francis bowed.

"Take good heed, also," continued the speaker, "that he is seen by none of my household. I have my reasons for wishing his visits here to remain unknown to all."

"They are, my lord."

"Save you?" observed the churchman, suspiciously.

"And I," meekly replied the priest, "have neither ears nor eyes, but as you bid me use them. The reverend general of the order, when he sent me from Rome to assist your lordship in these matters, gave me but one direction."

"And what was that?" demanded Gardiner, with a slight expression of curiosity.

"Obedience to your commands," said the young man; "implicit obedience—life, will, judgment, individuality, and reason, exist only as you bid me exercise them! A word, and they are annihilated!"

The priest was a Jesuit: one of that order whose influence encircled the earth, the more dangerous from being unseen. The Order of Jesus cares little for outward pomp or dignity—it is content to make itself felt.

The dark intriguer waved his hand, and the speaker disappeared as silently as he entered the cabinet. No eastern despot could have dismissed his slave with less ceremony from his presence than the scheming prelate did the priest: he knew, whether for good or evil, that his power was unlimited over him.

"Strange order!" he murmured, as soon as he was alone; "whose sovereignty is in the mind—whose sceptre the will of its subjects—whose agents the passions of mankind! Had Ignatius lived a century earlier, Rome had not been shaken on her seven crowned hills—the pestilential breath of heresy would have been stifled—and England, Catholic in heart, as she is still in name! And shall be in heart again!" he added, striking his clenched hand upon the table. "What is the life of a girl—a king's daughter though she be—compared with the safety or the interests of Rome? Should we fail? Impossible!"

Several times he repeated the word "fail" to himself—for he was one who saw as far as most men into the future. He had noticed on more than one occasion that Elizabeth had regarded him with a look which reminded him of her father, when he signed the death-warrant of the virtuous Fisher, upon whom the Pope had vainly bestowed the dignity of cardinal, in the hope that Henry would respect it. But the lustful tyrant merely observed, when he heard of it, that although the Pope might bestow a hat, it should not interfere with his claim to the head.

Gardiner remembered with what terrible punctuality he kept his word; and Elizabeth, if she succeeded to the crown, seemed very likely to follow his example.

At the end of an hour the tapestry was again raised, and Father Francis appeared at the door of the cabinet.

"He has arrived," he said, in a calm tone—although he knew perfectly well that the purpose for which the visitor whom he announced sought the presence of the churchman, was nothing less than to concert a plan of cowardly assassination.

"Admit him, and leave us!" were the orders of the prelate, who found himself directly afterwards tête-à-tête with a hard-featured, dissipated-looking man about forty years of age, whose dress, although somewhat worn, and not in the most becoming fashion, denoted that its wearer held the station of a gentleman.

"So Basset," said the churchman, "you have considered my proposal, agent which we have several times spoken together?"

"I have, my lord!"

"And the result?"

"It may be done, but not without difficulty and danger: the princess has many friends. It is whispered that the queen herself is opposed to bringing her to trial and punishing her for her treason."

"Openly, Basset! That is openly!"

Gardiner said this to persuade the instrument he was anxious to employ in the furtherance of his dark designs against the life of the heiress of the crown, that Queen Mary was no less anxious than himself for the death of her sister and her rival—only that prudence forbade her to tamper in it in the eyes of the world; but that secretly she had no objection to her being taken off, and was little scrupulous as to the means.

"If I had only some token of her majesty's pleasure," said the adventurer—for such his folly and extravagance had reduced him to.

"Token!" interrupted the chancellor; "thou art mad to dream of such a thing! Where would be the need of an instrument of her will, such as thou art, if the queen could give her mind to give a token of it? What would her sign manual to the Lady Elizabeth's death-warrant be but a token? and has she not the headman? It is because she will give no token that thou art employed. Reflect: thou art not only idle, but steeped in poverty to the very lips; a beggar no less in estate than in reputation!"

"The outcry," observed Basset, "will be fearful!"

"What needest thou care? Long ere the deed can become known, thou wilt be safe in the Low Countries, under the protection of the Emperor Charles!"

"True," said the man, reflectingly; "and the sum?"

"A thousand pounds!" eagerly urged the prelate.

"It is a bargain my lord," exclaimed the ruffian; "but I must have something more than your promise for the payment!"

"Dost doubt me?"

"My knowledge of the world has taught me to doubt every man until I have proved him. It is a hard lesson, but sooner or later we all arrive at the same conclusion; besides, I shall have to engage the services of others, who may feel as little inclined to risk their necks on my promise as I am upon your lordship's: if we had a token from the queen," he added, "the affair would be different!"

Gardiner did not wish to revert to that subject: rising from his seat, he advanced to a strong oak cabinet at the extreme end of the chamber, which opened with a lock of peculiar construction, the key of which he wore constantly suspended by a chain round his neck. The great seal of England was kept by him in the same repository. The eyes of Basset followed him with an eager expression: he would have given ten years of his life at that moment for a rummage in the chancellor's repository—especially when he saw that it was filled with sacks of coin, each one carefully sealed with the prelate's signet, and labelled.

"There are three hundred pieces," said the churchman, placing two heavy bags in his hands, fresh from the royal mint; "the rest of thy guerdon shall be paid thee when thou hast earned it."

The wretch eagerly clutched the gold, and after weighing it in his hand, he dropped one bag into each of the side pockets under the arm-holes of his faded velvet cloak.

"Now," said his employer, closing the cabinet, "tell me thy project?"

"I shall proceed at once to Woodstock, in company with one Chillingworth, a resolute fellow, who served under the emperor in Italy."

"Is he of our faith?" demanded Gardiner.

"Staunch my lord. I remember, at the sacking of Rome, he cut down a Lutheran soldier who had taken a golden chalice from the sanctuary of St. Peter. He was disgusted to see the consecrated vessel of the church in such ungodly hands."

"Did he restore it?" inquired the churchman.

There was a scarcely perceptible smile playing for an instant round the corners of Basset's mouth, as he made answer, "that he could not vouch for that."

"Humph!"

"Then you must consider, father," added the speaker, "that the chalice was already desecrated by passing through such impious hands—and Chillingworth might consider it fairly as legitimate plunder. He did his duty to Mother Church, by cutting down the sacrilegious rebbel!"

"And to himself by keeping the spoil!" observed his hearer; "I appreciate the difference. But away!" he continued; "I have no time to prate upon such matters now. When do you propose to start for Woodstock?"

"With the dawn, my lord!" was the reply.

"Stint not the gold, nor spare your men! See that you are numerous enough for Beddingfield's guards! He is a precise, mawkish fellow, who has no true love to the church or to our royal mistress, or he might have spared both her majesty and the council much embarrassment. When it is done, return at once to London: I will have a vessel ready to convey you and your accomplices to the Netherlands."

"To a prison there!" he muttered to himself, as Basset left the cabinet. "He must not live to tell the tale of my dishonour! I may trust him to the keeping of the Emperor Charles!"

CHAPTER XXVII.

Shall I become a common stabber? take
A hiring's pay to cut the throats
Of wretches while they sleep? OLD PLAY.

ABOUT six miles from the little town of Woodstock stood a solitary hostel, known by the sign of Fair Rosamond, whose portrait, painted by the hand of some itinerant artist, swung from the lofty sign-post erected on the little knoll in front of the porch. The artist had made the hair of the celebrated mistress of Henry as shining and yellow as the broad pieces which Miles Max, the avaricious old host, loved to count. The house was chiefly frequented by pack-carriers and merchants, on their journey between London and Oxford.

The household consisted, first of the landlord himself, next, his wife—a bustling dame—his daughter Mabel, and two female servants. A nephew, who was supposed to be no cold admirer of the pretty Mabel, officiated as tapster. He had a boy under him, whom Miles, as he always stated, had taken to his house through charity; though, considering the various drudgeries the lad performed, the charity of his master must have been rather profitable than otherwise to him. The long oaken table in the kitchen was already spread with bowls of fumety, and savoury meases of pork and beef—the former dressed with prunes, a favourite dish in those days—when a party of twelve persons, well mounted, rode up to the house, and began calling, in a loud, insolent tone, for the landlord, or some one to take their horses. The packmen, who were gathered in the kitchen, ready for supper, appeared anything but delighted with the prospect of such an addition to their company. Bodies of lawless men still roved about the country, taking tithe of honest industry in a most unseemly fashion. More than one of the travellers began to look to their arms; the elders to consider how they could best conceal their well-filled purses—for most of them were on their way to London, to purchase goods suited to the Oxford market.

"Rare roystersers!" observed one. "For my part, I could well dispense with such company!"

"And I also," added another. "They resemble more than is agreeable, the description of the men who waylaid and robbed Mark Lumley, the rich hosier of Olteapside, on his return from Norwich fair."

"What! ho! tapster! ho! knaves!" roared the leader of the horsemen; "is it thus you keep men who ride on the queen's business, waiting like beggars at the gate? Ho, I say!"

The speaker—who was no other than Basset—and a party of ruffians engaged by him as auxiliaries in the desperate business he was concerned in, continued to roar lustily for the landlord and tapster. The former, however, was far too wary a personage to trust himself within reach of his riding-staff. He had met with many such customers before.

"Go, Reuben," he said to his nephew; "tell them that the house is full; that we expect the arrival of my Lord of Arundel—of any one—only rid me of them, in the saint's name!"

"I'll do my best, uncle!" said the young man, whose manner and speech denoted that he had been better reared than to serve all his days as tapster at the sign of the Fair Rosamond. "It is a shame the government does not take strong measures, and rid the country of such extortioners!"

"Hush, boy! hush!"

The youth, with no very satisfied air, advanced to the leader of the party, to endeavour, if possible, to induce him to ride on; for they had hitherto found, to their cost, that such customers were anything but profitable. Before Reuben could speak, Basset, irritated at having been kept bawling so long, struck the young man sharply over the shoulders with his riding-staff.

"That is to teach thee," he said, "to keep thy betters waiting!"

The blood rushed to the countenance of the tapster, and his dark, intelligent eye flashed with passion. Catching up a stable-fork which was standing near to the sign-post, he returned the assault by a blow which made the bullying ruffian reel in his saddle.

"And that," replied the youth, "is to teach thee that Englishmen are not to be beaten like curs at the caprice of every ruffian whose only claim to be considered a gentleman is his sword!"

With a fearful oath, Basset drew his weapon, and, wheeling his horse round, rushed upon the speaker—who, nowise daunted, continued to retreat towards the house; still keeping his enemy at bay with the stable-fork!

The landlord and packmen, alarmed by the cries of the hostess and her daughter—the latter a blue-eyed Saxon-complexioned girl, who evidently took a deep interest in her cousin—ran from the house, armed with such weapons as they could lay their hands on.

Seeing that the numbers were nearly equal, and not wishing to call the attention of the authorities to his being in that part of the country, Basset was the first to propose a truce.

"With all my heart!" said Reuben. "Let him sheath his sword, and I will lay down my stable-fork!"

The terms were agreed upon, and executed accordingly.

"And now," said the ruffian, "I would speak with the landlord of the hostel. Methinks he shows but scant courtesy to worshipful guests who leave the God-penny with him!"

Miles Max advanced, and assured the speaker that he had not a room in the house disengaged; but added, by way of consolation for the disappointment, that there was a house four miles further on the road towards Oxford, kept by a widow and her three daughters, where he could be entertained, to say the least, respectably, if not as well as at the Fair Rosamond.

"I must stay here!" said Basset, resolutely.

"Impossible!" was the unmoved reply of mine host.

"I tell thee that I must! I am waiting for a number of my men to join me here—this is our place of rendezvous. Be reasonable, Miles Max, and thou shalt have little cause to quarrel with thy guests; as for thy malapert tapster, he is safe from my anger—at least for the present," he added, in an under-tone.

What-ever additional arguments the speaker adduced, it appears they were sufficient; for, after a few minutes of whispered conversation with the landlord, they so far overcame his objections, that he ordered Reuben to conduct the horses of the party—most of whom had by this time dismounted—round the back of the house to the stables.

"I will precede you," he said to Basset, "and make it right with my guests—who, to speak the truth, entertain no very excellent opinion of you and your friends."

"Take us for free riders, eh?" observed the agent of Gardiner, with a chuckle.

Miles grinned in the affirmative.

When the landlord entered the kitchen, he had no small difficulty in pacifying the packmen and traders, several of whom declared their intention of passing the night in the neighbouring village, rather than under the same roof with the new comers.

"They are honest men, I can assure you," replied the host, apologetically, "or I would not admit them: their leader has given me proof of that. You need not doubt my word: methinks I have as much to lose by the contrary as any of you!"

The strangers soon afterwards entered, and, seating themselves at the table, commenced a furious onslaught upon the good dame's supper; still, as there was nothing absolutely offensive or hostile in their manner, the traders gradually joined them, and soon afterwards the conversation became general. Confidence was still further strengthened amongst the habitual frequenters of the house, by the readiness with which their host answered the calls of Basset and his companions for wine. The best of his cellar was unhesitatingly set before them.

They knew him to be a prudent man.

Reuben was engaged in the kitchen, when Simon Roach, a respectable trader, who for many years had frequented the hostel, entered the room. After carefully looking round the place, to see that they were alone, he demanded of the young man, of whose discretion and honesty he entertained a much better opinion than of his uncle's, where the captain was to sleep.

"In the chamber above the porch," answered the youth, with a look of surprise.

"Art sure?"

"I heard my aunt direct Mabel to prepare it!"

"I think," said Simon, "there is a kindness between thee and thy cousin; nay, speak freely—I am no tale-bearer!"

"There is," said Reuben, modestly.

"And her father?"

"Seeks a wealthy husband for my pretty cousin!"

"Follow my advice, and he shall be only too happy to bestow her upon thee!" whispered the old trader. "I can make thee rich!"

"Honestly?" demanded the young tapster.

"Honestly!"

The answer was met by the single, but not unimportant query—"How?"

"At night," continued Simon, "climb to the window of the room, and let what passes in his chamber; or place thyself in some situation where thou mayest overhear his words—for I feel assured that he will not be long alone there! Report them to me in the morning, and thy fortune is made!"

"I'll do it!" said the youth, resolutely; and, without another word, his visitor left the kitchen.

SCIENCE.

NEW INVENTIONS, ETC.

OYSTERS.—When oysters, not interfered with, or transplanted by man, take a natural position, and adhere to rocks and other substances, their deeper shell touches those substances; and the flatter, thinner, or smoother shell is presented to the water. Oysters, undetached, and loose at the bottom of the sea, lie with the round shell down, as the tide flows in, but turn themselves on the flat shell on its reflux.

It appears, from a parliamentary return recently issued, that, during the quarter ending March 31, there have been coined at the Royal Mint 4,304,227 sovereigns, 62,260 half sovereigns—in gold; 382,140 florins, 847,440 shillings, 483,120 sixpences, 4158 fourpences, 4488 threepences, 4752 twopences, and 7920 pence in silver. No copper coins have been manufactured.

COFFEE AND ITS ADULTERATIONS.—The Lancet contains a regular statement of the extent and manner in which the recent regulation for preventing the adulteration of coffee is being evaded. Out of thirty-four samples, all purchased as coffee from as many shops in the Borough, Lambeth, and elsewhere, only three were found to be genuine—the proportion of chicory in the majority of cases being equal to about fifty per cent., while in some instances there was scarcely any coffee whatever. Ten of the adulterated samples were altogether without the required label, stating them to be a "mixture of chicory and coffee," and in those where it existed it was generally concealed from immediate observation by the mode of folding the wrapper. The penalty for selling the mixed article without the label is £100, and it is to be presumed that a remedy must also exist for parties who are served with it when they have demanded coffee, even although the label may exist—since otherwise the large number of poor who are unable to read would be wholly without protection.

ORDNANCE SURVEY OF SCOTLAND.—The corps of engineers at present employed in the parliamentary survey of Scotland includes, it appears, about 150 men, under the command of Captain James. About 100 of them are engaged in Fife, and the remainder in Lanarkshire. The survey of Fife, it is calculated, will be completed in about six months; after which Perthshire, it is believed, will be commenced on the six-inch scale, for which the great majority of the counties have petitioned, as most generally useful.

DISCOVERY OF TWO NEW PLANETS.—We have to announce the discovery of two new planets—one by M. Charconac, of the Observatory at Marseilles, the other by M. de Gasparis, of Naples. The former was seen on April 6, and its right ascension then was 224 deg. 43 min. 15 sec., its south declination 16 deg. 52 min. 20 sec. The latter was seen on the 6th and 7th, and the observations taken of it were these: April 6, mean time at Naples, 8 h. 55 min. 34 sec.; apparent right ascension, 11 h. 4 min. 17 sec.—75; apparent declination, 6 deg. 48 min. 40 sec. April 7, mean time at Naples, 9 h. 16 min. 48 sec.; apparent right ascension, 11 h. 3 min. 50 sec.—15; apparent declination, 6 deg. 50 min. 48 sec. M. Charconac proposes to call his planet Phocæa, in honour of the alleged Phocian origin of Marseilles. M. de Gasparis has not yet named his.

A PAINT FOR BRICK HOUSES.—A correspondent has used a cheap and very durable paint for the exterior of brick dwellings, which has already stood several years, and is now quite as fresh as when first applied. It consists simply of lime-wash, with sulphate of zinc as a fixing ingredient. Any requisite shade is given by adding the colours used by house-painters. A clear and rich cream colour may be obtained by applying yellow ochre to the common new brick; a livelier and warmer shade will be added by a little Venetian red. Burnt sienna may likewise be used. This paint is far cheaper than oil paint, and costs but little more than common whitewash.

ARTIFICIAL PRODUCTION OF FISH.—In the late sitting of the Academy of Sciences at Paris, M. Coste, Professor at the Collège de France, gave a long and interesting account of the preparations made, at the expense of government, for establishing at Huningue what he calls a vast pisciculture, or "fish manufactory,"—that is, a place in which the artificial production of different sorts of fresh-water fish, according to the system recently brought into practice in France, can be carried on on a grand scale. This system consists in forcing, at spawning time the eggs from the female, and the milt from the male, in mixing them together, and in then preserving the eggs from the numerous chances of destruction which await them when deposited by the fish themselves in the beds of rivers and streams. "To form an idea," says M. Coste, "of the danger there is in leaving rivers to become depopulated of fish, as they have been for some time past with frightful rapidity, we have only to cast a glance at the most favoured countries—at Scotland, for example, where salmon has always been so abundant that it may be considered food within the reach of every purse. In that country the quantity of fish diminishes so rapidly that proprietors are becoming alarmed, and the government is taking measures. I will cite only one case, because the document to which it refers is of indisputable exactitude—it was Lord Grey himself who gave it to me. In the River Tay, near Perth—a place rendered celebrated by Sir Walter Scott—the fishery of Lord Grey produced in 1830 a revenue of £4000; in 1840 it fell to £3000; and it is now only £1800. This is a progressive decrease which threatens to dry up the source of production, if the cause which leads to it be not removed. The return of the fishery made in the portion of the Tay belonging to Lord Grey during the twenty years which yielded £4000, shows that to obtain that revenue, it was sufficient to have, on an average, five or six thousand large, and eight thousand smaller salmon. Now, if we compare that number with that which our establishment at Hunningen will be able, even at the very commencement, to supply to the rivers of France, we shall see the importance of the wealth it will create. It will not be by six, or eight, or fifteen thousands that we shall count, but by hundreds of thousands and by millions." In this the learned professor is far from exaggerating; for it has been demonstrated that, by the French plan, rivers which have now little or no fish, may, in the course of a few years, be made to teem literally with millions!

VULCANISED INDIA-RUBBER AND GUTTA-PERCHA.—In the course of a discussion at the Institution of Engineers (subject, the concussion of pump-valves), it was stated, according to the "authorised report," that although the use of vulcanised india-rubber had not been found to diminish the shock of the beat of valves, under heavy pressure, it had been very successfully applied to the air-pump buckets of marine steam-engines. It was stated that the vulcanised india-rubber would bear perfectly almost any amount of compression, for an indefinite period; but that, on being subjected to repeated extension for a lengthened period, its elasticity became impaired: this, it was suggested, might arise partly from a portion of the sulphur, which was only held in mechanical combination, being thrown off and also from the substance absorbing heat in contraction and giving it out on distension, and thus producing "eremacausis," which eventually caused its disintegration. It was shown that oil rendered tubes of the material fragile; and that the continued action of light and air upon any india-rubber fabric, sufficed to produce a change, and render it brittle. It was shown, also, that although gutta percha tubes, whilst under water, were very durable, yet that on exposure to the air for a few years unpainted, the substance laminated, and could be rubbed to pieces. The gutta percha covering of the wires of the submarine telegraph was very durable under the sea, but on the face of the Dover Cliff it had soon been destroyed; it was then buried under ground, and had proved perfectly successful.

LOCOMOTIVE TABLES.—The German papers are at present full of articles headed, "Das Tischrücken," "Die tausenden Tischen," &c., detailing experiments carried on in different towns on the locomotive powers of tables, by means of the electrical fluid, or magnetic properties in human beings. Five, six, or more people sit round a table, laying their outstretched hands upon it, and placing the little finger of each hand on the hand of their next neighbour, so as to form a continued and unbroken chain round the table carefully avoiding any other contact with it, either of the person or the clothes. After a certain lapse of time—varying in different cases from fifteen minutes to an hour and a half—the table, it is asserted, turns rapidly round of its own accord, walks backwards or forwards, or makes efforts to rise from the ground, and fly to the ceiling. These experiments are said to have succeeded at Bremen, Munich, Bonn, and several other places. At Bonn, the table is said to have moved about in a most lively manner, and to have obeyed the will of one of the operators: the facts being vouched for by one of the professors of the University. I retail the facts to you merely as I hear them from the mouths of those who say they have witnessed them, and from the newspaper reports. I was myself in a small village one Sunday, and on entering a house found eight persons, men and women—"Bunte Reine," as the Germans say—solemnly seated round a deal table in the attitude above described. They remained thus for an hour and ten minutes; but the refractory table was either too obstinate or too orthodox for such unearthly doings on the day of rest, and refused to budge from its place. I heard that nine such experimental parties had spent some hours of their time and patience that day in the same village, but with no better results.

LEWTHWAITE'S PATENT NUMBERING AND MARKING MACHINE.—Mr. Lewthwaite's patent describes a variety of new operations connected with the manufacture and manipulation of card, including a method of preparing a description of that article possessing a superior surface for being printed upon; a machine for cutting it into tickets, and delivering them when cut into separate compartments; and another machine for marking and numbering them in succession. This last portion of the patent promises to have an extensive application to the important object of numbering, printing, and marking with inks of different colours, the tickets issued to railway travellers, which, for various purposes incidental to extensive traffic, require to be distinguished in different ways. The machine performs this work with perfect precision, and a rapidity more than sufficient for the most pressing urgency that can arise in practice. When impelled by steam power, it is estimated to be capable of printing and numbering 20,000 tickets per hour, though it could never be necessary to drive it at that rate. The basis of the invention is to be found in a previous patent of Mr. Lewthwaite's, obtained in July, 1847, the improvements introduced into which consist in enabling railway tickets to be printed and numbered consecutively, and check-marked with any distinguishing device, at one continuous operation: for this purpose the machine combines printing and marking apparatus with the numbering wheels, and supplies them with ink from inking-rollers provided with means for distributing the ink evenly on their surfaces, and arranged so that the printing, numbering, and marking may be performed in different colours, and the colours transposed and interchanged at will. The machine is also contrived in such a manner that it shall stop working, and strike a bell, when a given number of tickets shall have been printed, numbered, and marked, that in the interval the exact amount of work performed may be readily ascertained; and that it shall stop working, and give a similar notice, in the event of the printed cards not being regularly delivered, in consequence of the introduction of imperfect cards, or any other casualty.

A SCENE IN THE LIFE OF TORQUATO TASSO.

BY MISS PARDOE.

It was evening; and a bright moon, riding through a sky whose deep blue was unscathed by a single cloud, shed its flood of clear, cold light over the city of Florence; brought into strong and bold relief the outline of the lofty hills by which it is partially surrounded; gave to the villa-studded plain which stretches towards Pisa, the aspect of a sheet of molten silver; made the fairy bridge of the Trinity look like a band of ivory linking together the two shores of the lovely Arno, whose mimic waves were dancing and crisping beneath the splendour of the hour; slept upon the lofty tower of the cathedral; and, relieved, by its bright flakes of light, and the long, deep shadows with which they were contrasted, the heavy Tuscan architecture of the ducal palace.

In a spacious apartment of that regal habitation, and beside a high-arched casement, which was widely opened to admit the moonlight that poured across the tapestry-covered floor, sat a lady, so beautiful that, although forty summers had already passed over her head, and that the traces of both care and passion were written upon her brow, she seemed to have defied alike time and trial to rob her of her haughty and excellent loveliness. It was the Grand Duchess of Tuscany, the wife of Francesco Medici, the celebrated worthless Bianca Capella, of whom it has been said by an accomplished writer of the present day, that "her story was a romance, and her death a tragedy." Further within the chamber, and beyond the influence of the cold light which rested upon the person of the lady, reclined a man, some four or five years her junior, whose lofty and well-proportioned figure gave a promise of strength and vigour, which was negated by the worn and languid, although handsome countenance above it. The extraordinary magnificence of his dress, and the majestic grace of his bearing, would at once have distinguished him as the sovereign of the grand duchy, and the representative of the princely line of the Medici, without the witness of the elaborately-carved shield, bearing the arms of his house, by which the tall back of the large oaken chair in which he sat was surmounted, and which was fully revealed in the strong light of a silver lamp, that was suspended from the ceiling immediately above it. He held a paper in his hand, upon which he occasionally dropped his heavy eyes—though rather, as it seemed, instinctively, than from any inclination to decipher its contents.

But there was yet another individual in the chamber, standing a few paces distant from the regal pair, and immediately in front of the grand duchess, whose nobility, based upon a genius which was to render him immortal, was, nevertheless, not sufficiently recognised at that moment to entitle him to a seat in so august a presence. The person in question wore a plain dress of black velvet, fitted closely to his tall and elastic figure, which was gracefully rather than powerfully moulded, and was principally conspicuous for the exquisite symmetry of his limbs, and for a certain expression of lofty and powerful intellect, which made him, despite the elevated rank and sumptuous apparel of his companions, by far the most prominent and interesting figure of the group. If, however, this were the first impression produced by the appearance of the individual under mention, a second glance complicated the feeling of the observer—for there was a wild and wandering expression in his large, deep eye, and an occasional restlessness in his manner, which told that the flame within burned at times too fiercely for the goodly lamp from whence it emanated, and that it had been fed so lavishly as to endanger all within the sphere of its influence.

Such was Torquato Tasso, as, in the year 1585, the immortal author of "Gerusalemme Liberata," stood suppliant before the sovereigns of Tuscany.

The ducal houses of Medici and Ferrara had been long at feud, and Tasso had warmly espoused the party of his friend and patron, Alfonso, Duke of Ferrara, to whom, in terms of grateful affection, he had dedicated his wondrous epic; whose sister he had loved even to madness, and in whose cause he had put forth several writings, in which he had deeply wounded the pride of the Florentine nobility. The aberration of intellect of which he had been occasionally the victim since the discovery of his ill-fated passion, and the imprisonment by which it was followed, had so thoroughly unsettled his tastes and habits, that, pursued by imaginary evils, he had wandered to Turin, to Rome, and thence to Sorrento; but the magnet around which all the deepest feelings of his nature ceaselessly revolved, drew him back once more to Ferrara, where the violence of his passion for the Princess Leonora displayed itself so publicly, that he was carried as a lunatic to the Hospital of St. Anne. The hypochondriacal malady deepened upon him in his compulsory solitude; but conscious that his incarceration, far from originating in vindictiveness on the part of Alfonso, had been designed by that prince rather as a boon than a punishment, he employed his weary leisure in writing letters to the Italian courts, imploring their interference to terminate a captivity which he believed to be rapidly undermining his reason. His entreaties were at length complied with; and on the occasion of the marriage of Donna Virginia de Medici with Don d'Este, Tasso withdrew to Mantua, and a short time afterwards, when a reconciliation was effected between the houses of Medici and Ferrara, the Grand Duchess of Tuscany having expressed a wish to see the author of the "Gerusalemme," he was invited to Florence by the sovereign, who seldom suffered a request of Bianca to remain unsatisfied; while Tasso, on his side, probably feeling that Ferrara was no longer to him the home which it had once been, and still imbued with the love of wandering which had of late years formed so conspicuous a feature in his character, readily yielded himself to the invitation, and was so courteously received by the beautiful Bianca, that after celebrating her attractions in a score of deathless lyrics, he resolved to offer his services to Francis, and to attach himself to the court of Tuscany.

As the project presented itself, he ascertained that the Della Cruscan Academy, which had constituted itself the supreme court of criticism in Italy—perhaps partly moved by a desire to insure its own popularity among the patriots of Florence, whom he had so deeply offended—had resolved to subject to the ordeal of their shallow and verbal analysis the "Gerusalemme;" and great as was the contempt in which he individually held their decisions, Tasso was nevertheless aware that their verdict might operate unfavourably upon the mass of his countrymen, who were either too indolent or too prejudiced to form their own unbiassed judgment upon a work into which he had woven the brightest portion of his genius. Can it be wondered at that this reflection gave strength to his determination? He hesitated no longer. He at once addressed a letter to Francis, in which he implored his protection against the attacks which he had been taught to expect, and which were to involve both his person and his writings; and in return for this condescension, he volunteered to devote all his energies, both of body and mind, to the interests of Tuscany. But the grand duke had severely felt the affront which Tasso had offered to the Florentine aristocracy; and not even the entreaties of his consort could shake his resolution for revenge upon the unhappy poet. Vanity, ambition, and the love of power, alike urged Bianca to persevere in her endeavour to procure the reception of Tasso as an accredited member of the court. Every endeavour, both on her part and on that of the poet himself, had hitherto failed; and it had been with considerable difficulty that the grand duke had been induced to grant the interview which we are about to describe, and which had commenced by a presentation of the petition which Francis held in his hand, and over which as he received it from the poet, he had glanced his eye listlessly, and with a stolid expression of countenance, which almost rendered words superfluous: "I cannot entertain the prayer with honour to myself," he said, coldly, as he slowly raised his heavy eye-lids, and looked from the paper which he held towards the poet; "for not even your skill, sir, can blind me to the fact, that we of Florence are indebted to the reconciliation which we have just effected with the house of Ferrara, for the proffer of Torquato Tasso's services."

"I came to Florence by your highness's invitation," was the somewhat haughty reply.

"I admit the fact; but it is not the less certain that in the feud which has so long divided the courts of Ferrara and Tuscany, you have little served my interests either by word or pen; and surely you, the friend of princes and the lyrist of royal dames, would not lean your fortunes upon the nobili artisti of Florence, or il gioiello della nuova tirannide della casa Medici—I believe that I do not err in thus reporting your own words?"

"We must try to balance the intemperance of his language in the brilliancy of his genius," said Bianca, with a gracious smile, intended to blunt the edge of the grand duke's sarcasm; "Suffer the graceful compositions which he has lately addressed to myself, my lord, to counteract, in your mind, the hasty expressions wrung from him by party feeling."

"If report wrong him not," pursued Francis, who evidently entertained a great distaste to the poet, "his homage to the sex does not always confine itself to adulatory sonnets—even where the strong barriers of birth and station might compel him to a more guarded worship; and your highness has rather to thank his necessities than his sincerity for the verbal incense which he has offered at your shrine."

As the grand duke spoke, Tasso advanced a couple of paces towards him: his eye burnt with light, his lofty figure dilated, and he crushed between his hands the velvet cap which he had withdrawn on his entrance into the apartment. Every nerve quivered, and his beauty was almost fearful as he shook back the dark mass of curling hair which fell low along his cheeks, while a smile, that was half bitterness and half defiance, played about his lip. The eyes of Francis were fixed upon him at the moment; for he designed that not only the irony with which he spoke, but also the subject to which he had made allusion, should wound the sensitive spirit of the listener; yet, nevertheless, there was something so overpowering in the wild emotion which his words had conjured up, that he suffered himself to be interrupted almost unconsciously, when the poet vehemently exclaimed:

"You do well to reproach me, my lord duke, and to cast back upon my spirit the load which it has long been striving to shake off! It is true that I have loved—deeply and passionately—as those only can love who look beyond the earth and earthly things; for fuel to feed the fire which consumes them. I have loved and suffered—the heart does not study place or pedigree when it gives itself away; for where it is warm and honest, it must in every case ennoble the object of its worship. And yet, men who bow down before an ermine-bordered mantle and a glittering star, called it madness in Torquato Tasso to love perfection, because it was so robbed. Out on the sycophants! One throb of such passion was worth the lip-service of a century!"

The enthusiast paused for a moment, and the grand duke was about to speak, when the Lady Bianca, whose flashing eye and burning cheek, betrayed how deeply she had been moved by the energy of the poet, made a gesture of silence, as she looked imploringly towards her consort.

"And what though I stand before your highness, proffering fealty to the house of Medici?" pursued Tasso, proudly; "I am no vulgar plebeian, unworthy of the service that I seek! I am the son of Bergamo Tasso, who, not content with the unsullied nobility of his birth, rendered himself honoured by his virtues, and distinguished by his genius—upon whose tomb it was held sufficient to inscribe the words, 'Ossa Bernardi Tassi.' For myself, my lord, my only crime has been that I have clung too closely to the cause which I espoused; but surely, if your highness hath found it meet to extend the hand of fellowship to the sovereign of Ferrara, it may be also fitly granted to those to whom he has vouchsafed his friendship!"

"Tasso pleads well, my lord," said the grand duchess, "and, I trust, not vainly. As he truly stated, he is no common suppliant: his fame is bruited throughout Italy; and if he be but just to his own powers, he will be an ornament to the court of Tuscany."

"The academy of judges think otherwise," said Francis, drily.

A curl of scorn played about the mouth of the poet.

"And shall a Medici bow down his judgment to such a fiat?" he exclaimed, contemptuously. "Shall a Medici consent to test the outpourings of genius by the verdict of a bench of duffards, who suffer the bright spark of thought, emitted by the spirit, to escape them, while they are struggling amid the sea of words upon which it scintillates? Shall a Medici content himself to deal with those emanations of intellect with which the Creator has permitted his creatures, from time to time, to light up the dull materialism of a sensual and a selfish world, as the school-boy cons his daily task? What are love, ambition, fame—save as the spirit robs them with its own brightness, and invests them with its own glory? What is even life itself, save a hideous skeleton, until the glowing draperies of mind have been flung over it, and lent a grandeur and a grace to the crude mass beneath them? Let the Delia Cruscan sages cavil at words—'tis their vocation—and the extent of their intellectual power will reach no further than the world's gibe; but the house of Medici and the author of the 'Gerusalemme' look for a worthier and prouder immortality!"

"I am content to share mine with the academy," was the cold reply of the grand duke. "We will detain you no longer, sir. Her highness thanks you for the courtly phrases in which you have done her homage; and I add my own acknowledgments for the proffer you have made of your talents and services to the court of Tuscany. While you continue in Florence, all honour shall be paid you as my invited guest, even by the nobili artisti, for whom you have expressed so sovereign a contempt; but I cannot interfere with the decisions of the academy."

"I shall not urge you further, my lord duke," said the poet; "nor will I longer intrude upon your hospitality. Futurity will be the judge between me and my critics. Florence has granted a lordly tomb alike to Michael Angelo and to Machiavel, and perchance Rome will not refuse a resting-place to the ashes of Torquato Tasso."

"You speak gloomily, signor!" said Bianca Capella, in her softest and most sympathising tone.

"Not so, madam! although perchance somewhat solemnly; for such a grave as I aspire to will not be ighly won! Fare you well, lady! This was my last appeal, and to-morrow I depart. I leave my gratitude with your highness; it has been nobly earned."

"At least, sir poet, wear this trinket, to recall sometimes to your memory Bianca of Tuscany," said the grand duchess; and while she spoke she withdrew a heavy chain of gold from her neck, which, as Tasso knelt before her, she flung over his head; and then, extending towards him her small and beautiful hand, which he pressed with reverence to his lips, she added, graciously: "Whatever may be the decree of the academy, rest assured that you leave behind you warm friends in Florence, who will rejoice in your prosperity."

"Heaven prosper the grand duchy!" murmured Tasso, in a low, deep voice; and when he had risen from his knees, and made a profound obeisance to Francis de Medici, which was but coldly returned, he quitted the palace.

Early on the morrow Torquato Tasso was on his way to Rome.

[RUINS OF ST. PANCRAS PRIORY.]

PRIORY OF ST. PANCRAS, AT SHOTOVER, LEWES.

THE monastic buildings of the Anglo-Normans have nearly disappeared, even as sinking antiquities. Bereft of their endowments by the reforming spirit of Henry the Eighth, the buildings connected with religious foundations, which that arbitrary prince bestowed on greedy courtiers, as rewards for their acquiescence in his measures, or sold for the gratification of his own avarice, were quickly despoiled of such constituent parts as were necessary to their preservation. Many of these desecrated structures were disjointed for the value of their materials; parts of some few were altered, and converted into dwellings for gentry subservient to the will of the monarch; and others, tenantless and friendless, were left to moulder quietly into dissolution—their materials affording help to the agricultural builder, or to the mender of the roads, as occasion might demand.

In some instances, however, these deserted remains have proved too massive for fortuitous efforts at demolition; or have escaped through accidental forbearance, arising, perhaps, from a lingering feeling of ancient piety at first, and—although rarely—from antiquarian reverence afterwards. Such fragments unite with the crumbling masses of dismantled castles in adorning this country, above all others, with ruinous but impressive memorials of the manners of past ages. Pictorial in the irregular beauty of their decay, they at once elevate the imagination and instruct the understanding. Enriched with these half-extinct works of art, the landscape imparts a lesson of pensive morality; and the buildings raised by superstition teach—in the august spectacle of their progressive dissolution—a sound practical knowledge of the instability of all forms, modes, and institutions which depend on human art or power.

The Priory of St. Pancras was founded by William, first Earl of Warrenne, and his wife, Gundreda; it was dedicated to St. Pancras the martyr, to whose honour a small chapel had existed on the spot previously to the Conquest.

It was probably begun about the year 1072, and completed about 1078; but so few and imperfect are the remains of this once magnificent structure, that it is impossible to form any tolerably correct notion of its original state. The building was probably an irregular one, varying in its form as the increase of its inhabitants demanded additional room. But though irregular, it was certainly a noble edifice, faced with Caen stone, and richly adorned by the chisel of the sculptor.

The monks placed in it were of the Cluniac order, a branch of Benedictines. They were ruled by a prior, who after times had a seat in parliament, as a mitred prior.

The endowment, originally very rich, was constantly increased by the benefactions of wealthy nobles who desired the prayers of the monks, and a burial-place within their walls, until their manors, granges, fisheries, meadows, woods, benefices, mills, and nearly every other species of property, almost exceeded estimation. Lanzo, the first prior, was a native of Burgundy, and he was brought over by the founders to initiate the monks in the discipline of those of Cluni. On that monastery this house was made dependent; while, in turn, many other convents in England were subject to the Priory of Lewes, as Cells.

According to Dugdale, there are very few of what may be called historical notices of the Priory. "The knight who by mischance shot William Rufus with an arrow in the New Forest, took refuge there and became a monk."

In 1377, at the beginning of Richard the Second's reign, the French, who had made a sudden landing at Rottingdean, carried off the Prior of Lewes as their prisoner, he having risked an opposition to them with too small a force. At the dissolution of the religious houses by Henry the Eighth, the revenues of Lewes Priory were valued at £1091 9s. 6d., a sum equal to at least £12,000 a year in our own times. Crowham, the last prior, surrendered the establishment into the king's hands, November 16th, 1537; and the work of demolition speedily commenced. John Portinari, a minion of Cromwell, the king's vicar-general, was sent down to dismantle the conventual buildings, and he proved a very ready tool for his rapacious master.

Soon after the dissolution of the priory, a portion of the monastic buildings was fitted as a residence for Gregory Cromwell, son of the vicar-general, who married Elizabeth Seymour, sister of Lady Jane Seymour, third queen of Henry the Eighth. In an unpublished letter in the British Museum, this lady speaks in high terms of the convenience and stateliness of this mansion; and from another letter of the same period, it appears that the "bluff" monarch meditated a visit to Lewes, to see his kinswoman. Her husband, however, advises his majesty not to come, as the plague was then raging in the town.

Like most other early monasteries, this priory occupied a low site, contiguous to water. The ruins, though picturesque and pleasing, give no idea whatever of its ancient appearance.

Of the site of the church—a building almost equal in magnitude to a cathedral—the chapter-house, the refectory, and other principal buildings, nothing is positively known, nor is the nature of the uses to which the existing portions were applied at all clear. One or two curious facts, however, may be relied on. The conventual oven was seventeen feet in length. The pigeon-house, which stood to the S.W. of the existing ruins, and was raked down about forty years since, was in the form of a cross, and equalled in magnitude many a parish church; the pigeon-holes were 3228 in number.

On the 28th of October, 1845, the workmen employed in forming a cutting for the Brighton and Lewes Railway, through the ground formerly occupied by the priory, found, covered by slabs of Caen stone, two leaden chests containing the bones of the founders, inscribed with their names. They are not coffins, but cists (or chests), and are both of similar forms and dimensions, ornamented externally by a large net-work of interlaced cords moulded in the lead.

The cist of William de Warrenne measures 2 ft. 11 in. long, by 12½ in. broad, and is 8 in. deep; and that of the princess, his wife, is 2 in. shorter and 1 in. deeper. It is obvious, from the length of these receptacles, that their bones have been transferred to them from some previous tombs; and it is not difficult to suppose that the chapter-house not being built at the time of their deaths, which took place in 1085 and 1088, the founders were buried elsewhere until its completion, and that the bodies were then found so decayed that their bones only remained for removal to a more distinguished situation, and were on that occasion placed in these very leaden chests. Of the genuine antiquity of these reliques there cannot be the slightest doubt.

THE INDIAN LOVER'S SONG.

HASTEN, love! the sun hath set,
And the moon, through twilight gleaming,
On the mosque's white minaret
Now its silver light is streaming.

All is hush'd in soft repose,
Silence rests on field and dwelling,
Save where the bulbul to the rose
A tale of love is sweetly telling.

Stars are glittering in the sky,
"Blest abodes of light and gladness;"
Oh, my life! that thou and I
Might quit for them this world of sadness.

See the fire-fly and the tope
Brightly through the darkness shining,
As the ray which heavenly hope,
Flashes on the soul's repining.

Then haste, bright treasure of my heart!
Flowers around, and stars above thee,
Alone must see us meet and part—
Alone must witness how I love thee.

SILK.—Silk appears about to have, like gold, its California. The French Academy of Sciences have received from New Orleans two species of silk-worm peculiar to Louisiana, which feed on the leaves of ordinary trees—even the willow and the walnut. The larger species produces annually a quantity of strong silk; the smaller produces a silk less strong, and white in colour, four times a-year. If these worms can be naturalised in France, a complete revolution in the production of silk will be effected. At present nineteen departments cultivate the mulberry tree and produce silk. The total number of those trees is about 39,000,000, and they yield 780,000,000 kilogrammes of leaves.

[THE ASYLUM FOR THE INDIGENT BLIND.]

THE BLIND ASYLUM—ST. GEORGE'S FIELDS.

THE institutions in the metropolis devoted to the purposes of charity are exceedingly numerous, and probably the finest in the world. In number and breadth of intention it has been stated they are inferior to those of Paris; but as regards the latter city, it should be borne in mind that the situation and dependence for resources of the population of Paris, are more artificial than those of the British metropolis.

Paris is essentially a capital: its trade and commerce, in almost every branch, are subordinate to the wants and necessities which arise from the residence of a court, and the presence of the noblesse, literati, and millionaires of France. Paris, in some respects, may be compared to a huge lodging-house of fashionables, fringed by the abodes of those who labour to produce what the luxurious habits of the tenants require, as well as to administer to those multitudinous wants which always spring up among densely-located masses of people.

Paris, therefore, may be said to be more dependent on the generosity of fortune than London—and consequently more exposed to its exigencies. For that reason it rather looks to heaping up stores for the future than cultivating a spirit of industrial independence. And we must say that this, in the estimation of some persons, wise forethought—we don't say so—our maxim is, that every age should as much as possible provide for itself, so as to be superior to the preceding one, and all that a generation should leave to its posterity should be its architecture and inevitable accumulations,—we remarked that this so-called wise forethought is characteristic of the policy of all despotic countries, and of every nation in which the Church of Rome has acquired an ascendancy.

Wishing to make the reliance of the people on the government and the church as complete as possible, charity has been elevated to an undue importance in the commonwealth. As a national feeling, it has been thrust into the position which a spirited feeling of industrial independence should have occupied.

Excess of charity always promotes indolence; and when we consider that charity in France is not made an important branch of the legislative care, as in England, we shall not be surprised at the extent and variety of the private endowments and of the Philanthropic institutions of France. Nor shall we much wonder, when we seriously reflect on the mediate operation of all these incentives to an indifference to the future, at the terrible disorders which have affected that country ever since it severed the chains of its submission to an hereditary and traditional despotism.

Short-sighted people, overlooking the possibility of immense future evil in a present gain of good, are in the habit of referring, with some regret, to the fact that Paris, with less than half the population, has one-third more hospital accommodation than London; has its Maisons de Santé, or hospitals for the better classes, which London has not; its general board for the administration of hospitals and asylums, and a score of other advantages denied to London: quite forgetting that all this organised charity is rather a sign of weakness than strength; that it enervates rather than stimulates, and is in fact a tax levied on posterity, in the shape of the perpetuation of a condition invented by mistaken benevolence, which ought only to be accepted in periods of national misfortune or decay.

Montesquieu, one of the greatest of French writers, did not accept the abundance of charity in France as a sign of national vigour; but considered that Henry VIII., by destroying the abbeys, hospitals, and houses of refuge in England, laid the foundation of the future prosperity of this country, by calling forth the resources and energies of the poorer classes, who were no longer able to find the ready charity they had been accustomed to.

But if London is behind Paris in the extent and opulence of its aggregated charities, it is immeasurably before it in the non-necessity for such institutions. London is but slightly dependent on the court, rank, fashion, and the legislative and executive powers, for its vast importance. Nine-tenths of its population are connected, in some way or other, with trade and commerce, and the pursuits those glorious institutions call into existence. The Thames is to London what the Mersey is to Liverpool; and the metropolis enjoys precisely the commercial advantages which, within a century, have made the latter the first seaport in the world. The metropolis abounds in manufactures, which are exported to all parts of the world. Its eastern, southern, and northern divisions are separated by broad barriers from its western; and if the latter were wholly cut off from it, and the court, the Parliament, and the great lawyers, were to betake themselves to Oxford, as they did in the time of Charles I., the former would still flourish, and very speedily take possession of the squares and mansions of the deserted fashionable locality. In short, the trading, commercial, and manufacturing interests of the metropolis dwarf its importance as the once legal and fashionable capital of the empire; and as this magnificence was created, and can only be sustained, by the most untiring industry, the highest inventive and adaptive talent, the most unwearied assiduity, and the most honourable independence of feeling, as well as keen ambition to rise far above the level of general society, we have at once presented to us a vivid explanation of the circumstance that London is not so rich in charitable institutions, or so wise in charitable management, as Paris. London needs them less, because London is more industrious—more profitably productive—more spirited—more free. It is in bondage to neither a church nor a despot.

But, notwithstanding this gratifying disparity, the metropolis of the British empire is enormously endowed with charitable institutions. They are to be observed in every quarter; and foreigners have frequently remarked, that when they searched for our public buildings, they found the most numerous were the hospitals and asylums, and the most distinguished the churches. We have no other architecture in London. Miles of perforated brick walls, millions of glaring chimney-pots, a few hundred steeples, some hundred hospitals and asylums, the Houses of Parliament, seven bridges, and the renowned Tower of London, really constitute the ensemble of metropolitan architecture. And out of the whole, the hospitals and asylums are certainly the most imposing.

There are twelve general hospitals, thirty special hospitals, thirty-five general dispensaries, and twenty-one hospitals of a miscellaneous character, distributed over this great metropolis, whose united incomes amount to £264,000—of which £184,000 is derived from interest on property, and £80,000 from voluntary contributions.

These constitute the charitable institutions of London and we believe the number of in and out-door patients annually relieved is upwards of 600,000—or about one-fourth of the whole population.

The next class of institutions are the asylums established for the protection and education of deserving persons—of the deaf and dumb, the blind, the insane—and the lodging and sustenance of indigent children left as orphans. These buildings are in number about 250, with an aggregate income of not less than £200,000 per annum; and if to them we add 110 sets of almshouses—that is, specific foundations of that description—with an income of certainly £50,000 per annum, and take into consideration the unascertained charities, we shall be enabled to form some idea of the extent, wealth, and unexampled variety of the charities of the metropolis.

The aged, the blind, the deaf and dumb, the insane and the idiotic, are well provided for. This description of charity no person can quarrel with. In our opinion it is the only charity that appeals irresistibly to the national heart; and we have ever thought that it ought not to be left to the casual benevolence of individuals for support, but be adopted by the state as a sacred and primary duty. But the state of no country has ever adopted this view of the matter.

While monasteries and convents have been built and amply endowed for the lazy pious—cathedrals and churches, with the revenues of principalities attached, for the priesthood—palaces for decayed servants of the crown, Lazar-houses for the leper, and refuges innumerable for the destitute, it was not until towards the close of the last century—notwithstanding the frightful affliction had been for generations exaggerated by the ravages of the small-pox—that it was thought expedient to establish an asylum for the blind. For centuries the poor blind man had wandered along the highways of Britain, almost a houseless beggar, with no friend but his dog, no means of living, but the crust of bread and the cup of water given to him by humble charity. Poets and minstrels had lamented his misfortune in undying strains; one immortal man, himself in “darkness visible,” appealed to every sense and every sympathy for suffering, when, with dignified sorrow, he regretted he should never again behold “the human face divine,” or “vernal morn,” or “dewy eve;” but it was not until a few Liverpool merchants—men immersed in all the complications and excitement of commerce—during a period of war, took the matter in hand, that the poor blind found a home and a refuge from the poverty and inclemency of the world.

The Liverpool Blind Asylum was the first of the kind and the example so stimulated the benevolent in the metropolis, that liberal donations were made, subscriptions collected, and an asylum founded in 1799, in St. George's Fields, Lambeth.

We present our readers with an engraved view of this building, as it now stands, near the obelisk, at the foot of Blackfriars Road; but must remark, that since 1799, the original edifice has been considerably enlarged. In “Walks through London,” we find it stated, that “on the site of what was called the Dog and Duck, is the School for the Indigent Blind, which provides for twenty-one boys and fourteen girls." Owing to the increase in the benefactions and subscriptions, the inmates now number generally 85 males, and 89 females. They are boarded, clothed, lodged, and educated, at a yearly charge of £8000, of which £2000 are derived from investments, and £1300 from the sale of work. The residue is provided by the subscriptions of the benevolent, and the chapel receipts.

The education is partly industrial, several trades being taught—such as basket-making, cord working, &c. But all are taught to read, and to the utmost, as far as the facilities will allow, encouraged to develop their talents for music. Some of the most accomplished organists in London were educated at this asylum.

Taken altogether, the institution is one of the best in the metropolis—because it is partly self-supporting, and aims at making the recipients of its bounty not only useful to themselves, but to others. Although blind, they are not cast on the world helpless.

In addition to this asylum, we should mention that the Indigent Blind Visiting Society distributes to about 200 blind persons Testaments in the raised character. Hetherington's Charity gives annuities of £10 to above 600 blind of the better class; and Mr. Charles Day, the blacking manufacturer, left £100,000, from which annuities ranging from £12 to £20, are given to 271 blind persons. The Painters' Company distribute annuities of £10 to 173 blind, and the Clockmakers and Cordwainers, as also the Jews, likewise relieve the blind. Such

Charity is indeed twice blessed—

It blesseth him that gives, and him that takes.

IS PATIENCE A VIRTUE?

INTRODUCTIONS are awkward things enough; necessary evils sometimes, it is true; but always to be dispensed with, if possible. It would not, perhaps, be civil to thrust a mirror before a gentleman's eyes without a preliminary, "By your leave, sir!" But if we are able to place it so that he can catch a glimpse of himself in passing, and thus afford him an opportunity of reforming some trifling inaccuracy of costume, he will be content to avail himself of the advantage, without adverting to the obscurity which may envelope his benefactor. Did it sort with my humour to grope like a mole through the earth that covers a hundred generations, I could make out an authentic pedigree that would rival any in the sporting calendar; but, besides that this deliberate method is entirely foreign to my nature and habits, I cannot but see that there would be about as much propriety in such a mode of introducing one's self to the reader, as there would be in engraving a genealogical tree upon our visiting cards. I shall therefore forbear to gratify my pride of ancestry by enumerating the various generations of the Hasty family. Mr. Wildrake Hasty, after a headlong quarrel with his guardians concerning the amount of his allowance while he was under age, falling head over heels in love, was married in a month, and became the founder of our family on this side the water. Skipping several of his successors, who were not remarkable for anything that ever I could learn, beyond an unusual facility in getting rid of money, I shall mention only Mr. Solomon Hasty (the only Solomon of the name), who happily achieved an heiress; and thus, in some measure, retrieved the rather drooping fortunes of the race, and enabled my immediate ancestors to transmit to me a goodly inheritance, which was considerably augmented by a long (and oh, how tedious!) minority.

So much by way of introduction. I should have preferred omitting even this short specimen of the art of prosing. I love the stirring, abrupt style, where the narrator bounds on in the middle of a scene, brandishing his wooden sword, shaking his cap and bells, and calling "Presto! Presto!" for a continual change of scene. But this sort of commencement supposes the story, or chit-chat, which follows, to be, if not as sparkling as champagne, at least as brisk as bottled ale. I have no wit, and scarcely a wonder in store; and am far too honest to lure the reader on by a promise of turtle, and then set him down to hasty-pudding! So I prose it at the onset, meaning to be rather better than worse than my promises.

When I had reached the independent age, and my guardians had resigned their control over my person and fortune, they very considerably advised me to marry, and settle in life—thinking, perhaps, that so mercurial a character required a wife by way of ballast. But I had other matters on hand. I could not think of "settling" until I had, by a long flight, prepared myself to relish repose. So I dashed over Europe, feeling conducteurs to extra diligence, overturning ciceroni, and lauding valets de place in the impetuosity of my sight-seeing efforts. Like all the rest of the world, I talked large and felt small at St. Peter's—I leaped over the Leaning Towers—I paced and repaced the gallery of the Louvre, and threaded the intricacies of the Palais Royal—I dived under the Thames, peeped from the top of St. Paul's, and said and did all that was proper in the hallowed atmosphere of Poet's Corner—and then came home as fast as winds and waves could carry me, in a violent hurry to "settle." And here began my difficulties. If men could live like albatrosses, for ever on the wing, I should have settled at once, in imitation of that seizable bird; but being resolved to clip my roving wing, and seek a gentle mate, it became necessary to provide a nest for the keeping of so dear a charge. Fortunately for me, a tract of forest-land, which had been purchased by my grandfather as a sort of land-in-the-moon speculation, afforded just the site I wanted for my dwelling, and I was soon involved in all the delightful bustle of building. Plans crowded upon me; elevations without limit exalted my imagination. All and each seemed to promise all that need be promised; yet every new projector found a flaw in the ideas of his predecessor. At length, to cut the matter short, I decided by lot; and, dismissing my theorists, set myself seriously at work to realise "a romance in stone and lime."

This proved the first great lesson of my life. To build in the country! Words fail me, and I pass on.

My house was finished—my shrubberies planted—my garden under skilful hands; and now I set about falling in love with all my heart and soul, as I am said to do everything. Nothing could equal the rapidity with which I lost my heart, save the celerity with which I found it again; and after this process had been repeated some two or three times, I began to fear that my friends had been correct in prophesying that I should never be of one mind long enough to be married. But my time had not yet come. Love had his revenge at last, and when I least expected it! I had taken my gun, and was popping away in the grounds of a cynical old bachelor—my very good neighbour—within whose walls I never beheld the shadow of a petticoat, when I came very near shooting a lady, who sat reading in a summer-house. She was pale with fright, and I scarcely thought her pretty; but as I poured forth my apologies, rich blushes rose to her cheek, and enhanced the radiance of her dove-like eyes, till my charmed senses confessed her the perfection of feminine loveliness. The fair Serena was doubtless my destiny; and, after a few faint struggles, I yielded myself her captive, rescue or no rescue.

Of all the wonders Master Cupid ever performed, certainly this feat was the most wonderful! My fair enslaver was in everything my opposite; or at least the prominent parts of our characters were altogether and strikingly dissimilar: and it was the consciousness of this difference that alone induced my attempts at resistance. Serena was lovely, and well connected: what reasonable mortal could ask more? I was not a reasonable mortal! I sighed for perfect similarity of taste and temperament, of habits and opinions; and I expected some evidences of a reciprocal passion, which, though female delicacy and reserve might restrain, they should not, I thought, be wholly able to conceal. I sighed in vain for anything of this kind. She was won, after an age of wooing; and I ought to have felt assured that she would not have accepted me, unless she had preferred me to all the world. I did at first believe so, when, after having once rejected my suit, on the score of her fears for the stability of my attachment, she was induced to revise her sentence after I had endured a year's probation, and at length acknowledged herself satisfied by my perseverance. But doubts once planted, continued to torment me at intervals. Unskilled in the female heart, I expected the most powerful of all sentiments to exhibit itself nearly in the same manner in all characters—at least, in married life; and it was hard for me to learn to read in my wife's mild eyes, and unimpassioned gentleness of manner, the tranquillity of happy love.

A chilling doubt of Serena's affection caused me to quarrel with her unchanging placidity of temper. I fancied that I should be happier if she were angry, or even jealous—since I should then have some proof of my influence over her feelings. No husband ever took half the pains to soothe the angry passions of his tergiversant spouse, that I tried in endeavouring to discover whether my wife had any passions. I sought occasions to thwart her wishes; I pretended, at times, an indifference I never felt, and even affected to flirt with other pretty women: yet never could succeed in ruffling her temper. Perhaps her nicer tact enabled her to read, through the mists in which I strove to envelope it—the almost idolatrous devotion with which I regarded her. At any rate there must have been a preservative power somewhere, since my waywardness did not estrange her from me. I must often have seemed to her cruelly unobservant of her feelings; yet the same unvarying gentleness—the same cloudless smile—was ever ready to welcome me. Her complexion, indeed, would change, and be pale or glowing according to my mood, and her eyes withdraw from any expression of mine which harmonised not with their own natural dewy tenderness; but never, under any provocation, did I detect a harsh tone in her sweet voice, or mark in those eyes a single look that spoke resentment.

Another difference between us gave me some, though far less uneasiness. I had accustomed myself to do everything with great rapidity. Let me read, write, drive, ride, play, or hunt, I was content with nothing short of racing pace. My wife, on the contrary, was habitually deliberate, and there was a delicate finish about her most trivial actions which often put to shame my more slovenly performances. But my impetuosity was not satisfied with perfection. I flattered myself that love—true love—love such as I was conscious of feeling—would have induced Serena to assimilate her habits with mine; forgetting that this very love had never prompted the slightest change on my part. This was one of my cultivated troubles.

If I were not writing behind an alias, I should shrink from any detail of the expedients to which I was driven by my worthy resolve of transforming my seraph to a mere mortal. Covered by that friendly screen from the indignant flashing of bright eyes, I shall venture upon a few specimens—leaving the intelligent reader to gather from these a general idea of the life she had the happiness of leading with the man whom she had married for love.

I had been shooting in excessively dirty weather, and had brought home almost as much mud on my boots as game in my pouch—every step making a mark that would have done for Gog or Magog—when, as I was passing the front door to reach a side entrance, of which I was accustomed to avail myself at such times, I saw Serena descending the stairs, dressed for an evening party. On perceiving me she approached the door, to remind me that we had invited company, and also to make her kind queries as to the day's sport. I blush to acknowledge that even while drinking in those gracious tones, and meeting those gentle glances, I was devising an unkind return, which I proceeded forthwith to put in execution.

My bolts had hitherto fallen powerless from her armour of proof; but might I not find some point or crevice pervious to a lesser weapon—one which she would scarce think it worth while to guard against? It is often more difficult to possess one's soul in patience under a small provocation than under a great one. Our philosophy is apt to walk on stilts that raise it above our petty needs. The man who can face a shower of bullets without flinching, will be miserable if he be caught in the rain without his umbrella.

My wife, like most married ladies who have no children, was excessively particular—neat to a fault; making a sacred temple of her house, and worshipping its stocks and stones—at least, so I said—in the absence of those living idols which are so apt to engross the thoughts of those who enjoy the name of mother. On this occasion I had observed her, as she descended the stairs, pass her handkerchief over the balustrade, to ascertain whether the duster had done its duty; and this suggested the idea of my ungracious experiment. Instead of seeking a place of less sanctity to cast my slough in, I mounted the steps between a double row of my wife's geraniums and oleanders; proceeded deliberately along the glossy floor-cloth, and, with one foot on the stair-cloth and one on the floor beside it, had ascended half the first flight before my wife spoke. With scarce a glance at the huge black tracks that marked my progress, she only asked, in her usual calm way:

"Haden't you better change your boots, dear?"

I made a rapid toilet, and descended to the drawing-room, with confession on my lips. There I found Serena engaged with a visitor—not one of the expected, but a neighbour who had dropped in, as the phrase is, "sociably." If, however, her coming was a drop, her conversation was a continued stream; and, to pursue the figure, it seemed to have flowed through caverns sulphurous, or marshy beds of roots and herbs medicinal. Her visit was anything but welcome; but the closest scrutiny could not have detected in my wife's manner any symptom of this truth. She was even more attentive than usual, lest her guest should be pained by a suspicion that her coming was mal-à-propos.

I must confess I was far from following the amiable example; and if Mrs. Pyewit did not discover that I wished her at the antipodes, it was only because she had not found time to bestow a glance upon my countenance, and took my statue-like silence as a compliment to her conversational powers.

Serena's polite inquiries after the husband (poor fellow!) and children of this "weariful" woman, unlocked, it would seem, the fountains of her soul. Oh, Esculapius! what a burst was there! Mrs. Pyewit needed no pitch-pipe. Her voice—her practised voice—struck at once upon the key best calculated to implore—nay, to compel commiseration. She described, as having occurred in her own family, diseases enough to have filled every ward of a metropolitan hospital; and enumerated, in the history of their cure, an inventory of drugs that would have set up in trade any village apothecary, and made him the envy of all his contemporaries. Imagine me, O compassionate reader, listening to a detailed account of every pang that had attended the dentition of Malvina; the scarlet fever of Lucius Junius Brutus; and the chincough of Sacharissa Celestina; with their various symptoms, mode of treatment, and progress of cure.

While my wife, with compassionate kindness, murmured, "What a world of fatigue and anxiety you must have suffered!" I, in anything but an amiable mood, listened only for the bell, hoping for the arrival of relief in the form of other guests; but ah! less fortunate than "Sister Ann," I could descry in the moonlight no "cloud of dust," announcing the wished approach, though I leaned out of the window so far as to be in danger of tumbling headlong among the shrubbery below. Our case was harder yet than that of Fatima. Her distress was the punishment of her curiosity; but our Bluebeardess had forced upon us the secrets of the fatal chamber.

Once, and once only, Serena was able adroitly to avail herself of a moment's pause to attempt a diversion in my favour, by inquiring after some gay, agreeable acquaintances of our Ni-be neighbour—but she only stopped one sluice of bitter waters to open the flood-gates of another. Mrs. Pyewit had been unable to see these pleasant people when last they called, because—but I spare you, O fortunate reader! (fortunate in having so considerate a caterer;) I spare you the repetition of that under which I groaned for an endless half hour—a drawing detail of the outrageous doings and misdoings of Mrs. Pyewit's "hired help."

This continued until the expected company had arrived, by which time I was in a towering passion with Serena for not being angry.

Never did I welcome a bevy of guests with half the cordiality that I displayed towards those who now came to my rescue. Men with whom I had never touched palms before, winced at the fervour of my grasp; whilst the ladies, I am certain, would have voted me, nem. con., the most agreeable of men, had the question been called that evening. I think it not unlikely that I owe no small portion of the popularity which resulted in my election to Congress the next year, to the animation which attended the rebound of my spirits on that memorable night. My complacency included even Serena and her provoking patience.

I had brought from the city, not long before, a pair of porcelain vases of exquisite mould, selected with express reference to my wife's delicate taste. They were not only ornamented with beautiful paintings, but the skill of the artist had been still further displayed in the addition of wreaths of flowers modelled in the China itself, to a degree of transparency and accuracy which I had never seen equalled. They were, indeed, the perfection of elegance, and such pets with Serena, that she took the sole charge of them herself, and permitted not the touch of hands profane. Both the specimen and the species were new to most of our guests, and these gems of the plastic art were much admired. Our chronicler of ague-fits, the lugubrious Mrs. Pyewit, nervous, no doubt, from the freshened recollection of her various woes, in attempting to replace one of these vases upon the mantel-piece, let it fall upon the hearth, where the roses, and violets, and trees, and castles, which she had just been admiring, cut a sorry figure enough, not to mention the oil from a small lamp which had been placed inside to give effect to the transparent painting. Serena's cheeks showed a passing flush, but she treated the accident as a thing of small moment, which was all very right and ladylike; but when we were alone, could any one believe she could be so vexatious as to say:

"Poor Mrs. Pyewit—how I felt for her!"

Not a single word of my vexation, or her own regret at the loss of my beautiful gift. All swallowed up in the consideration that that intolerable woman must have felt doubly embarrassed, because she was an uninvited and rather humble guest. Was it not too much—too much for any man—and especially one of the hasty race?

Even on the subject of dress—that weak point of women—I never yet had been able to throw Serena off her guard. When we were one evening preparing for a grand gala, during a visit to the city—an occasion when I was particularly desirous she should be looking her best—and as the hour for the fête approached, I went to Serena's dressing-room, to satisfy myself as to the result of the toilet—and found her arrayed in green velvet, with sleeves of "woven air,"—or, to speak more intelligibly, some perfectly transparent material, under which her white arms lost none of their rounded beauty. A necklace, composed of several strings of pearls, rested its tassels on the emerald bodice, and was clasped midway by a diamond rose. The same brilliant gems supported her abundant tresses; and a single white feather, most tastefully disposed, completed the picture, which I did not hesitate to pronounce perfect. I remember every particular of it, as if I had seen it but yesterday.

My wife smiled at the vehemence of my encomiums; yet smiled in such a sort as showed her not wholly insensible to the advantages which she derived from the simple elegance of her dress. Indeed, her heightened colour and sparkling eyes betrayed a consciousness of beauty altogether unusual in my meek Serena. As I clasped the last bracelet, a cup of coffee was brought, which I must needs present myself; and, being a little pre-occupied with the dress and its wearer, I most awkwardly overset the cup, and sent full half of its contents trickling down the front of the green velvet.

The maid filled the air with her bewailings, and I stood aghast at the mischief I had done.

"Wipe it quickly, Elinor!" said Serena.

I looked at her as the thought struck me that she spoke in a hurried tone. Had I at last found the key-note?

"It will not do," she said; "you cannot make it fit for this evening's wear. But fortunately the injury is confined to a narrow space, and can easily be replaced."

"But not to-night!" I exclaimed, in a tone of vexation—for I was much disappointed.

"No—not to-night, certainly!" she replied; "but I have another dress ready for immediate use—for it was doubtful until a late hour whether this would be sent in time. The other will do just as well!"

"How can you say so," I replied, pettishly, "when you know how much I liked this? Nothing was ever half so becoming to you!"

"How ungallant!" she said, smiling. "Take a book for a quarter of an hour, and see if I do not make you forget the green velvet!"

And the fair Stoic proceeded, with unclouded brow, to substitute paltry blond and white satin frills, flowers, and frillery, for her rich and becoming costume.

While I awaited the re-robing, in no very amiable mood, I must confess—for what man likes to see his wife too sensible?—it occurred to me that the present was an opportunity to try Serena's temper in a way which might not offer itself again. It was too good to be lost; and I quieted some qualms of conscience by resolving, in case this should be as unsuccessful as former ones had been, never to make another. Serena's temper should henceforth be considered a Gibraltar, unassailable either by sap or storm.

When I was summoned again to the toilet, my wife gallily demanded sentence.

"Charming—charming!" I replied; "you know you look well in everything—and if nobody were to see you but myself, I should think nothing could be more beautiful. But two-thirds of the women to-night will be dressed just so; and I confess I would rather stay at home than see you make one of forty or fifty transparencies over white satin, like a row of dolls dressed to order."

"Are you in earnest?"

"Never more so, I assure you!"

"Well, then," she said, drawing off her gloves, "I challenge you to a game of chess; and I shall beat you with all possible pleasure!"

I certainly ought to have been very unhappy, for the next few hours, at least; for I had not only acted like a—(hard name), in depriving my wife of her brilliant evening, but had failed in producing the effect I had intended. But justice yet delayed its stroke, and I do not know when I have spent the hours more happily, thanks to the sunny temper which I so tyrannically strove to render more like my own.

We had been married about three years, when I was chosen delegate to a convention that was called to meet in a southern city; and as my wife had several friends in that place, she consented to accompany me. Our journey was delayed by a variety of vexatious accidents. It was late in autumn, and bad roads and various hindrances of travel conspired to render it very doubtful whether I should be present at the opening of the convention. I was in a perfect fever at the thought. I fretted, scolded, and, in short, made myself very uncomfortable.

"Why will you distress yourself, Frederick?" said Serena; "your colleague being on the spot, it is not possible that any serious injury to the cause can result from your detention."

Now, was not that a very provoking observation? I will appeal to the whole corps of husbands—ought not a wife to have believed that nobody could accomplish the purpose for which we were sent, so well as her own lord and master? I had a short fit of the sullens at this; but my good resolutions were strong, and the evil hour did not last long. I recalled many proofs of devoted interest in Serena, and on the strength of these recollections, I confided to her my intention to make a speech, for which I had been at some trouble to prepare myself, and my fears that I should find the arena pre-occupied. Her reply was like oil upon the smothered fire of my feelings.

"I have heard you say, love, that no converts were to be expected from the eloquence poured forth on such occasions, all minds being made up beforehand. You will therefore have the less to regret if you should be too late."

This vexation, like all others of the same kind, resolved itself into the old conclusion. Serena could not feel the pride of affection in her husband's talents and reputation, or she could never be thus indifferent to his opportunities of distinguishing himself. Such an impression made me, I fear, anything but an agreeable companion for the rest of the journey; though I must own that my wife tried, by every gentle art, every soothing attention, to calm my ruffled spirits.

Thanks to the rapidity of travel on the latter part of our route, it so happened, after all, that I was just in time—so that nought of my purpose failed: my wife's kind inquiries, however, were very coolly answered. I had made up my mind to show her that my happiness was not dependent on her sympathy; and as our time was filled, even to overflowing, with business and pleasure I had ample opportunities to show off my indifference. Yet, unfrequent as were our tête à têtes, compared with our own home life, Serena must, I am certain, have observed the change in my manner; yet she never commented upon it, nor complained of our continual separation. Her manner to me was as usual, except, perhaps, an additional tinge of softness.

"It is plain enough," thought I, "she loves me not. Were she not indifferent to my affection, would she not have murmured at this seeming alienation? If she prized my society, would she not express uneasiness at seeing me so seldom? It is not in human nature (judging by my own), to bear thus calmly the loss of what we value."

Determined to conceal my ill-humour from every eye—and most of all from that of her who caused it—I assumed an appearance of extravagant gaiety—was the life of every party—the roysterer of each convivial meeting, and always the devoted admirer of the prettiest woman present—my wife alone excepted: to her I was only scrupulously polite.

Among the most conspicuous of the gay circle in which we were temporarily moving, was a lady who was known to be living apart from her husband, in consequence of mutual dissatisfaction. This lady, whom I may call Mrs. Beresford, was a beauty and a wit—off-hand and dashing in her manners, free in her conversation, and famous for brilliant sallies and good things that would bear repeating. It is, to be sure, cheap to be witty when we allow ourselves to throw aside the various restraints that curb the wit of others; but Mrs. Beresford's wit was such as often passes current in what is called good society, and she was voted "a privileged person"—in fine, a splendid woman. She was, of course, the centre of attraction to a group of idlers who were ever ready to echo her witticisms, and offer incense to her vanity, in return for the amusement she afforded them, and the advantage of sharing, in some degree, l'éclat.

Into this set I was most graciously admitted, and found myself not a little gratified by the distinction with which I was at once treated by Mrs. Beresford. Whether by the power of sympathy, or the magical influence of some mesmeric contact, I know not, but I found myself suddenly transformed into a wit—at least one whose lively nothings were sure to command applause—which in society does as well. Mrs. Beresford found my most trivial observation worthy of attention, and in matters of taste my opinion very soon became her law. If I praised blue, blue was the only wear until I happened to admire pink, when Mrs. Beresford's ribbons and roses began to blush as if under the spell of an enchanter. The fair ungovernable, who treated her beaux with so little ceremony that they sometimes rebelled, spite of wit and beauty, would endure from me even the intimation that some of her extravagances were neither delicate nor feminine: what could lady more?

My attentions to this dashing dame, prompted originally by the amiable desire of exciting my wife's jealousy, were continued for my own amusement, until I began to be alarmed for their effect upon the lady herself, as evinced in her manner towards me. The confidential tone of her conversation when we chanced to be alone, and her reproaches when I failed in my attendance, became extremely embarrassing; and I began revolving in my altered mind the practicability of retreating with a good grace. Perhaps these reflections would not have come so easily to my aid, if Mrs. Beresford's deportment had been more to my taste. In a neglected wife—one known not to be on good terms with her husband—far greater circumspection would have been more respectable, and some appearance of sensibility, under such unhappy circumstances, far more amiable than the extravagant gaiety she had seen fit to adopt. The retiring delicacy of my wife's manners had especially unfitted me to be long pleased with the society of one who was never known to sacrifice a witicism to decorum, or to suppress a brilliant, piquant thought, because it might wound the feelings of others. My vanity had at first made me overlook or soften these faults, so odious in woman; but when flattery had lost the gloss of novelty, I began to discern the coarse materials of which it was composed, and became sensible that neither wit nor beauty could compensate for the lack of delicacy of feeling and propriety of conduct.

Mrs. Beresford had brought to the matrimonial partnership a moderate fortune, and an immoderate fondness for expense. The first was soon exhausted, the latter seemed to grow by use, and, like the giant in the story, became too mighty to share its habitation with another. This produced reproaches, and reproaches recriminations. Domestic comfort walked out at the door, and love—an old trick of his—flew out of the window. The husband, after submitting to be nearly ruined, cut short the supplies which fed the extravagances of his fair dame; and she, in return, revenged herself for what she called his parsimony, by the most unsparring ridicule of his tastes, habits, and manners: conduct little likely, one would think, to gain admirers, or to retain those whom her charms had attracted. I, for one, began to be heartily tired of my flirtation, and fully aware of the difficulty of retracing my steps; and yet, as it this vexation were not enough, I tormented myself with contrasting Mrs. Beresford's low open partiality with what I called my wife's indifference, and re-olving that the lack of empressement—I know of no corresponding English word—in Serena's manner would always remain a chilling bar between us.

One morning, when my cogitations had, I suppose, somewhat affected my appearance, Serena, as she entered the breakfast-room, instead of taking her place at the table, came to me, and, after a moment's pause, said:

"Frederick, you are either ill or unhappy—yet you say nothing to me! How have I forfeited your confidence? You deny me one of my dearest privileges when you are ill or ill at ease, and shut me out from all participation in what affects you. Say—tell me—what is it? Has anything occurred to trouble you?"

Her beautiful eyes, upturned to mine, were almost irresistible—but I called pride to the field.

"Me!—not at all!—nothing whatever! I am perfectly well, I thank you! How do you find yourself this morning? Ready for breakfast, I trust!"

And I sat down and fell upon the toast as if I had eaten nothing for a week. I could not look full at Serena, but as I stole a glance, I thought her eyes were full of tears. They were downcast, however, and when she spoke it was in her usual manner. That morning I found in the Shakespeare she had been reading, a geranium-leaf laid at that pretty speech of Portia's, beginning:

You see me, Lord Bassanio, where I stand,
Such as I am; though for myself alone
I would not be ambitious in my wish,
To wish myself much better; yet for you
I would be trebled twenty times myself.

and a few lines further down, I could discern a very light pencil-mark at these lines:

She is not bred so dull but she may learn;
Happiest of all is that her gentle spirit
Commits itself to yours to be directed,
As from her lord, her governor, her king.

I fixed my eyes upon the passage, and fell into a long and most unpleasant reverie. We had been engaged out that evening, but Serena declined, on plea of indisposition; and I, not sorry for an opportunity to come down a little from my ungracious altitude, offered to stay and read to her. She thanked me with lips and eyes both; and if I could have freed myself from the consciousness of wrong, I should have had a taste of my former happiness as I sat in her dressing-room, reading from that very play in whose touching lines she seemed to have observed something applicable to her own feelings. As she lay back in her chair, with her eyes closed, I could not but observe that she looked paler and thinner than usual; and my awakened conscience, and my softened feelings, alike urged me to seize this moment for acknowledgment and explanation—when the servant announced a lady, and added, that the visitor wished to see me alone. I went down stairs, expecting to discover that my wife was the person inquired for—and, standing before the parlour fire, I found Mrs. Beresford. She turned round as I entered, and, advancing with a somewhat theatrical air, she broke out into a declaration that she had quarrelled irrevocably with her husband, and had come to throw herself upon my protection. My reply or my manner not satisfying her, she burst into a passion of tears and hysterical sobs, so violent that I became alarmed, and rang for a glass of water.

Here she was interrupted by the return of the servant, and the entrance of my wife, who, hearing sounds of distress, had hastened down stairs. Serena supposing, in the innocence of her heart, that this passionate appeal was intended as much for her as for me, hastened to interpose her kind offices, trying, with her gentle tones, to soothe Mrs. Beresford's agitation, and to prevent her from completing her vows of eternal separation from the man to whom she had promised a life-long affection and duty.

The appearance of my wife just at this juncture, had been at first sufficiently embarrassing, but her simplicity afforded me unlooked-for relief. Echoing her advice, I declared my resolution to avoid all interference which should tend to widen the unhappy differences between Mrs. Beresford and her husband. I begged her to return home at once, before her absence should have been noticed, and put my hand to the bell to order the carriage.

If I had coveted and admired impetuosity of feeling, I had now good reason to be satisfied. A violent fit of hysterics, with all the usual accompaniments of that interesting complaint, was the reply to our urgency. Serena, affrighted, left the room in search of restoratives, and Mrs. Beresford, observing her absence—spite of her hysterics—took the opportunity to overwhelm me with reproaches for having won her affections by the most devoted attention, and then dishonourably failing her when she had cast herself upon my love and generosity. Bitter was the torrent which now pierced my unwilling ears; and, ere I could collect words to reply to the charge—too well deserved, indeed—for though I had never talked of love, I had followed her like her shadow ever since our first acquaintance—I beheld, close at my side, the face of my wife, pale, ghastly, corpse-like; and I had but just time to receive her in my arms to prevent her falling at my feet.

I should in vain attempt any description of my sensations at this moment. Mrs. Beresford's conduct was, perhaps, such as might have been expected from her; but what man ever counts upon utter shamelessness in a woman? That my present distress was no more than I richly deserved, the reader will probably have concluded; but I felt at the time as if the punishment were too heavy for the offence. I never had for a moment contemplated any serious wrong to my wife, and Mrs. Beresford was not a woman whose sensibilities were likely to suffer seriously through the medium of the affections; but how was I to make Serena understand all this? How to tell her that the whole was the result of a deliberate plan of playing upon her affections, and revenging on her unoffending gentleness the wounds which my vanity had received?

I carried Serena to her room, and now it remained to get rid of Mrs. Beresford. And who can tell the humiliation to which a man is reduced who has wilfully put himself in the power of a wicked woman? The very recollection—even at this distant day—makes my cheeks tingle. And I am sure that the reader will believe that my blushes were not all for my own shame, when I confess that it was only upon the promise of a large sum of money, that I persuaded the wretched woman to allow me to hand her to the carriage, and relieve myself of her presence.

To tell Serena all—to implore forgiveness for the wretchedness which I had caused her, and to promise that this last, worst instance should prove the finish of my follies—and then to bear her at once and for ever from the scene of my disgrace,—these were the resolutions which occupied my thoughts, and contributed to moderate the whirl of my brain, as I ascended the stairs to my wife's room. But before I could open the door, I was met by her maid, shrieking and wringing her hands, and calling for help, with the one terrible word prevailing over all:

"She is dead! she is dead!"

I rushed to the bed-side, and, for a moment, thought it was indeed so; but as I raised her frantically in my arms, calling upon the beloved name, and beseeching her to look once more upon me, I perceived that her heart was still beating. Redoubled efforts recalled her to life, but not to consciousness. She opened her eyes, but their wandering gaze recognised no one, and in less than half an hour she was in a raging fever, which the physician declared to proceed from a sudden inflammation of the brain.

What a change now came over my gentle Serena! How did her eyes' fierce glances appal me, and the strained tones of that once silver voice agonise my wretched soul! For ten days and nights did she rave almost without intermission, and her whole theme was misery, disappointment, and despair; while my name mingled incessantly with her incoherent complaints and supplications. Through the whole course of the disease she never once recognised me, though I watched constantly by her side; and when she did show symptoms of returning reason, I was obliged to absent myself, lest the sight of me should recall the distress which had brought her to this condition. I fancy my agony could scarcely have been more intense, if I had been conscious of having taken her life, than it was under the recollection that I had wilfully wounded her mind, and brought her to the verge of the grave, by sheer, deliberate unkindness.

After I had had ample opportunity for self-abasement and repentance, I once more was suffered to present myself before Serena. She received me with her own sweet smile, and held out her trembling hand, but could not speak; and I, obliged to keep down my bursting heart, could only turn away and weep, inwardly renewing, in that moment of mingled joy and anguish, the vows of amendment which I had made during the sad night-watches and long days of almost despairing anxiety.

When at length I ventured to begin the confession which I had been longing to pour out before my injured wife, her generosity could not allow me to proceed.

"It is enough, Frederick!" she said; "I understand it all! We have both been faulty: I, in adhering too closely to the self-command which I had prescribed to myself, on account of the impetuosity of your temper; you, in suffering yourself to doubt the affection of a woman, whose only possible motive in uniting herself to you was—must have been—love, founded on a well-tryed confidence in your worth, and whose only fault (in your eyes, love, I mean), was, that she would keep her temper when you lost yours!"

"You are too good, Serena!"

"No! no! no! Anything but that! I shall take especial care never to be too good again! I will be naughty enough after this—especially if you forget your promise to be reasonable!"

And we were once more happy—spite of repentant recollections on my part—and were preparing to return to our own dear home, when I received a hostile summons from Mr. Beresford. He had only waited to hear of Serena's recovery; and then, with the usual philosophy of men of the world, sought relief for his wounded pride in an attempt at murder—and all for the sake of a woman he detested!

Such a message on the eve of my wedding-day would not have broken in more cruelly upon my dream of bliss. My principles forbade me to lift my hand against the life of another. Must I incur either the guilt of murder or the stain of cowardice? Was this the dread choice? Oh! how my soul loathed the recollection of my criminal folly! I had considered my punishment severe, though just. Here was another consequence—a natural consequence—of my conduct, now hanging over me, with tenfold horror in its aspect, because of its certain effect upon my wife, and my vivid appreciation of our new-found happiness!

I was closeted with a friend, whose counsel I had sought in these unhappy circumstances, when a knock at the door interrupted our conference. I opened it to dismiss the intruder, when Serena—pale and trembling, and supported in the arms of her maid—presented herself before me.

"Why are you here, my love, so far from your own room?" I said, as composedly as I was able—taking her at the same time from the woman, and leading her to the sofa:

"Frederick!" she said, in tones which pierced my heart, "do not seek to deceive me by an assumed calmness! I more than suspected the errand of Colonel Foster this morning; and when I learned that Mr. Hartley was with you, I was convinced that the forebodings which had tormented me were about to be realised. Can it be that you are going to raise your daring hand against life? You! with thanksgivings for my safety yet warm upon your lips! You will not be so inconsistent! You will not make me regret the grave which seemed opening for me a little while since! Oh! my husband, be true to yourself, and do not madly attempt to wipe out one wrong by the commission of another!"

She threw herself, weeping, upon my breast, regardless of the presence of Mr. Hartley, who was much moved by her appearance. I strove to reassure her, but she would accept of nothing short of an absolute promise that I would decline the meeting with Beresford.

"Serena," I exclaimed, "would you see me disgraced before the world—branded as a coward—despised as one who is not afraid to attempt injury, yet dare not face its consequences? I will give you my word that I will not fire at Mr. Beresford, but I dare not promise to avoid the meeting!"

"That would be only changing one sort of guilt for another," she said; "murder for suicide, as well as the yet more dread consequences of adding the sanction of your example to a heaven-daring sin! Oh, Frederick! if if you would wish me ever again to confide in your principles—if you would have me put faith in one of your late resolutions of self-government—make this one sacrifice to your sense of right! Be called a coward, if that must be—but retain the approbation of your own conscience! Fear not man, but God!"

She stopped exhausted, and her head dropped faintly on my shoulder. Mr. Hartley considerably withdrew, giving me a sign that he would return after some little interval. I tried to argue, to persuade, to assure Serena; but she would listen to none of the sophistries prompted by my pride; and I was on the point of yielding to her arguments or her entreaties, when Mr. Hartley returned, and put a paper into my hand.

The note contained two lines from Mr. Beresford, saying that he renounced all claims upon me, and should concern himself no further with Mrs. Beresford's affairs.

Many years have flown by us since this crisis in our destiny. Sons and daughters have grown up around us, and now form the blessing of our declining years; and I cannot but ascribe much of the excellence which is allowed to distinguish them, to the peculiarly placid temper and perfect self-control which I once madly condemned as a fault in their mother.

ESSAYS.

No. CLXXXVIII.—HOW TO MAKE MONEY.

(Continued.)

IN money-making, the educational acquirements are all-important. "Any fool" cannot make money. A money-maker must have tact, shrewdness, courage, and that kind of inspiration which grasps at certainties which shape themselves as probabilities, without being substantially defined. He must also possess varied accomplishments of a mechanical character. He must be a proficient in technicalities, forms, and precedents. Mere learning, although extremely useful, is insufficient. At best it is only the means conducing to an end—an agent. And not only must his mind and morals be practically cultivated, but his instincts and senses. In short, he must be drilled to business, just as a soldier is drilled to fight, a lawyer to plead, a physician to prescribe, or a chemist to dispense. A knowledge of business must therefore be acquired—it never did and never can come by intuition.

What is called genius is an incumbrance rather than an advantage in the transaction of matters requiring the exercise of the more methodical mental powers. Genius, whether inventive or belonging to that more spiritualised organisation which finds expression in matchless prose or deathless verse, is too refined, too subtle in its essence, for that proper and rigid attention which the management of the complications and vexations of business demand. Talent is the preferable term, because it can be extended to every display of mental ability or natural sagacity, and is more consistent with the idea inseparably attached to business, whatever be its branch or ramification.

Therefore it is apparent, that to make money requires an education of an eminently practical description—an education which will enable the mind freely to adapt itself to situations, circumstances, and exigencies as they arise. It must also be varied, sound, and vigorous—for, to carry on an extended business successfully, requires powers of thought and capabilities of endurance that few possess. Business is a "death potion" to many; and a more unhappy situation than an incongruity between the business and the capacity can scarcely be imagined.

A suitable education, then, being the primary and paramount early consideration, it becomes necessary to inquire what kind of education that shall be.

Sydney Smith—we mean the Sydney Smith, the Dean of St. Paul's—said:

"The real object of education is to give children resources that will endure as long as life endures—habits that time will ameliorate, but not destroy—occupations that will render sickness tolerable, solitude pleasant, age venerable, life more dignified and useful, and death less terrible."

Sir Walter Scott has also contributed a fragment on the subject. He says:

"I have rarely seen that a man who conscientiously devoted himself to the studies and duties of any profession, and did not omit to take fair and honourable opportunities of offering himself to notice when such presented themselves, has not at length got forward. The mischance of those who fall behind, though flung upon fortune, more frequently arises from want of skill and perseverance. Life is like a game of cards—our hands are alternately good or bad, and the whole seems at the first glance to depend on mere chance. But it is not so—for in the long run, the skill of the player predominates over the casualties of the game."

This is all very well, and very true, but neither the reverend divine nor the great wizard, nor any other writer, show how parents may give to their children the necessary resources, or the young man, starting in life, may acquire the skill that shall render him superior to the chances of fortune. It is all very well for persons in good circumstances to give their children what is called a liberal education, but that is only putting coal and water into the human engine—it is not showing how the steam should be generated, and, when generated, how it might most beneficially and honourably be applied.

In our estimation, and also in that of the countless numbers who look far beyond the mere superficialities of scholastic attainments, education, both as a principle and a doctrine, is still in its infancy: there is much to learn, and an infinite deal to unlearn on the subject. For the practical purposes of life in the present day, the young man fresh from college, who is intended for the law, and the youth who has just left a charity-school, to enter a machine-maker's shop, are both on a level. Each has to commence acquiring quite new branches of knowledge—each has to fit himself for a position to which he aspires by quite a new course of training, and to be taught, by rough experience, that "everything is bought with a price"—and that the price of education is vigilance and labour. There are no royal roads to knowledge nor patents for learning. Every one whose mind is disciplined to obedience and stocked with knowledge, can call it his own work. All cultivation that is worthy of the name is self-cultivation. Books, teachers, schools, colleges, are only means that render the work less difficult—they surround the student with an intellectual atmosphere that prepares the mind to receive impressions.

Now, as money-making is essentially dependent on this self-cultivation, we would say to all young men—and especially to those whom circumstances as well as duty and self-respect oblige to "buckle fortune on their backs," and face the world with a hopeful, energetic aspect—persevere—but, above all, be resolute. Advance firmly, but coolly, like a veteran soldier amid "the shock of fighting elements."

Resolution is omnipotent; with proper industry, and action, and effort, there is no limit to advancement. It is not well to sit down with folded arms, and point to your past works—"onward" is the word in self-cultivation. Although the last effort was commendable, the next must be better, and the next again better. The arts and sciences, rhetoric and logic, are wide fields for study; but a wider field is man and the business of man. Books, nevertheless, require your attention during the hours of study; but in your hours of pastime, of recreation, and of pleasure, look into the world with a determination to turn every moment to account, to profit by every passing incident, with the old philosopher's motto, "Higher—for ever higher." The observant student must and will attain the highest elevation his intellectual and physical powers are capable of.

The body, however, as well as the intellect, is susceptible of cultivation. Physical exercises are as necessary as mental ones. Firmness of purpose, and a fixed resolution which does not vary, never go hand-in-hand with effeminacy of body. But the leading impression to start with is, that "He who resolves upon any great end, by that very resolution has scaled the great barriers to it; and he who seizes the grand idea of self-cultivation, and solemnly resolves upon it, will find that idea, that resolution, burning like fire within him, and ever putting him upon his own improvement. He will find it removing difficulties, searching out or making means, giving courage for despondency, and strength for weakness."

As the intention of these articles is not to refer to particular trades, or include the professions which require a special training, and, with the majority of young men, an outlay of money totally inconsistent with the parents' means or position, we will at once advert to the requisites we consider essential to success in business—to money-making.

And here we would observe, that as this is a great manufacturing and commercial country—the greatest in the world, and will become greater—there are wide openings to all those young men whose poverty shuts them out from the professions, but whose fervent desire is to rise above the level of the ordinary labourer, by becoming clerks, tradesmen, manufacturers, or merchants—in short, members of that great middle class which in this country holds the balance of power between the hereditary principles of the throne and the aristocracy, and the undisciplined passions and necessities of the majority of the people.

This honourable position in the inexhaustible territory of business—that land richer than California and Australia, if every square foot of their surfaces were one mass of gold—may be earned by zeal, integrity, and talent. But there must be a previous training, a practical education, and a familiarity with habits of business.

The temperament should be first consulted. The perceptive faculties should be large, the imaginative small. Secretiveness should be large, so should firmness; the posterior organs neither large nor small, but equally balanced. But as we believe the brain can be educated either way—for good or evil—probably it would be better to observe, with a late author—"that the best temperament for great affairs is a combination of the desponding and the resolute. Such is the temperament of great commanders. Secretly they rely upon nothing and nobody. There is such a powerful element of failure in all human affairs, that a shrewd man is always saying to himself: 'What shall I do, if that which I count upon does not come out as I expect?' This foresight dwarfs and crushes all but men of great resolution."

These are wise words. He who has an abiding confidence in his good fortune—who is sure that all will end well—that it matters little what he does, the result will be favourable—has the most happy disposition; but it is not a temperament that fits him for great deeds. And a man who wants resolution to try, to try again, will be certain never to do even moderate deeds. A combination of the apprehensive and the resolute is especially necessary in the pursuit of wealth. Fortune is proverbially fickle; business success cannot be guaranteed; and he who suffers his mind to dwell upon his future greatness—who indulges in visions of magnificence and power, and allows the love of money to become closely entwined around his heart—will be tempted to overleap himself, or be lulled into a fatal security, from which he will awake to find his happiness gone for ever, with his dreams. But the true business man thinks not of the end: as there is a "powerful element of failure in all human affairs," he will probably fail; but he is determined to try, and will leave no stone unturned that will give probability of success. His thoughts are on the means, and not on the end; he wishes to hear of the dangers of the road, and the means by which they can be escaped—and not flattering tales of doubtful success. If he fail, as fail he may, he has a reserve at hand which he can fall back upon, without being bankrupt in happiness as well as fortune.

To enable him to direct his energies so as to adopt these means, he must receive a suitable education; and the best is a practical education. This is the cultivation of the senses, or that natural instinct implanted in every human being, and the discipline of the mind by such studies as will be useful in themselves. Every one knows how important a part the senses play in dealing with material objects. They are the instruments by which experiments are to be observed, and discoveries to be made; and in trade, perhaps, not an inconsiderable portion of the superiority is to be ascribed to greater accuracy of taste, smelling, sight, or feeling. Who has not felt it would be an advantage to possess the blind man's acuteness of touch?

"Mankind," says Dr. Hook, "have, by their ingenuity, wonderfully assisted the sense of sight and hearing, and have prolonged to age the advantages of youth; but it remains for them to bring their senses to the highest state of perfection and activity, by judicious cultivation. It is worth remarking, that even common artisans, not distinguished by any superiority of intellect, have, by exercise and patience, brought some of their senses to a degree of perfection truly astonishing. The exercise of the senses is naturally pleasurable to children—and may therefore be easily promoted and improved; and in distinguishing smell, colours, taste, and the touch of various things, the pupil will soon become expert, if he have a sufficient supply of visible and tangible objects on which to exert his attention."

This is a subject, then, which should receive the attention of parents; and in childhood instruction may be combined with amusement.

The discipline of the mind is a work of longer time, and more difficult of attainment; but cultivation will effect it. The mind is naturally like a colt, wild and ungoverned. It must be broken to the bit, and familiar with the rein. The great cardinal powers—attention, abstraction, perception, memory, judgment—are, in a great degree, dependent for their growth and power on culture. This constitutes the great difference between the reason of man and the instinct of brutes. They arrive at a certain point in knowledge, and there stop. The beaver displays no more originality in the construction of his dam in our western forests now, than he did before Columbus landed on our shores. The swallow builds her nest no more skillfully now than she did before the flood. But the human intellect is susceptible of unlimited improvement, and makes the accumulated knowledge of the past the starting-point of future discoveries.

To effectually discipline the mind, the most useful studies should be pursued. The physical sciences, natural philosophy, mathematics, and chemistry, develop the mental powers, and drill them to habits of attention, method, and right trains of reasoning; and at the same time show how to investigate the powers of nature, the properties of material bodies, their action one upon another, and explain the qualities of those substances which the Creator has intended for the use and happiness of man.

As to mathematical studies, they have not only produced some of the greatest men—Euclid, Archimedes, Newton, cum multis aliis—but it has been remarked, that the majority of those who have been distinguished in practical life have also been noted for their love of mathematical studies. Napoleon the Great was an illustrious example. And in England it has been observed, that a large proportion of the most celebrated members of the legal profession has proceeded from the University which cherished Newton—Cambridge—and which is still distinguished by the cultivation of classical studies.

As to chemistry, to the man of business it is the most indispensable of sciences. It ought to be comprised within every practical education. It has not only enlarged our knowledge indefinitely, but opened up to us inexhaustible sources of wealth. As the profits in the old channels of business become gradually reduced, by competition and other causes, we must look to chemistry to discover new mines of wealth; as fertile land becomes scarcer, we must look to chemistry to teach us how to cultivate the field and the garden, so as to secure the utmost produce in quantity and quality. Indeed chemistry enters so familiarly into every department of life, that it is now an economical science of the very highest order.

With respect to languages, a knowledge of the English being a sine quid non, we will do no more than say, that correctness of language is essential to correctness of reasoning, and that not only should the rules of grammar be studied, but an endeavour made to acquire a facility of expressing the same ideas in different words. Dr. Watts, in his work on "The Improvement of the Mind," has made some admirable suggestions for the acquisition of this useful talent—and to them we can refer such of our readers who wish to become not only correct but elegant English speakers, as well as writers.

French being the language of intercommunication between civilised states, and being accepted as the polite tongue of all nations, is also indispensable to the man of business. Our lessons, extending from No. 312 to No. 403 of this Journal, contain all the instructions required by the meanest as well as the highest capacity. German, Italian, and Spanish may advantageously be added—indeed any language; for the more the proficiency is in this respect, the better the guarantee for success in business, and the greater the chance of being constantly employed in a responsible, honourable, and highly remunerative subordinate position.

But with all these attainments, the education or the man of business has not been perfected unless he has seen service. The counting-house is the business man's college. It is there that he will learn order, method, obedience, and acquire a knowledge of life and the business of life; it is there that he will learn the value of time and the value of money—two very important things to know. The boy who enters a counting-house finds himself, perhaps, the youngest member of a large establishment; and whatever conceit he may have brought from the village school is soon rubbed out of him. He learns to obey, to submit, and to be patient; to endure reproof without anger, and to bear contradiction with good humour. He is obliged to keep his wits about him, to decide quickly, to have accurate eyes and truthful ears, to learn that there are just sixty minutes in an hour, and just two hundred and forty pence in the pound. He is compelled to bear and to forbear, to resist temptation, to struggle down rebellious impulses, and to put on the armour of a brave silence. The hours of his day come freighted with lessons of self-reliance and self-command, and the grain of his character grows firm under the discipline of life.

But a counting-house education would not be complete without intellectual intercourse with a man—or, if possible, men—of varied and extensive experience. Therefore it is of immense advantage to a young man to have constant and familiar conversation and correspondence with a man who is practised in affairs, and capable of communicating his knowledge. It is a privilege which cannot be too highly valued. The pupils of the Jesuits were noted for greater presence of mind in conversation, a readier recollection of their knowledge, and were more men of the world than youths brought up by any other preceptors: and this acknowledged superiority was ascribed to the fact that each pupil was allowed a certain number of hours' conversation with his superiors. As the Rev. Sydney Smith said: "A book has no eyes, ears, and feelings; the best are apt every now and then to become a little languid; whereas a living book walks about and varies his conversation and manner, and prevents you from going to sleep."

An ability to communicate varied and practical knowledge by conversation is a great gift. It is the lecturer's art.

A man of sound judgment and some experience should be selected; but it is not necessary that he should be distinguished for any particular success in his own affairs—for such men cannot be had; and if they could, they would very probably be incompetent for the office. It is a singular fact, that those who are the most distinguished for success in their own undertakings, are the poorest of all advisers for others; while many who are keen in the originating of plans, and advising others, seem to lose their power when they come to act for themselves. There are two great classes of men in the world—men of action and men of contemplation. The former can do a thing when they are told how, and the latter know how it should be done, but cannot do it. It is very rarely that these two qualities are united in one person; indeed, we may affirm that, in nine cases out of ten, the idea of those speculations and undertakings for which men have got the most credit came to them at second-hand—they acted while others were debating: hence it is not the most successful whose opinions are always the most valuable. To those who have no special advantages, we say: Cultivate your senses—observe keenly—discipline your mind, especially by mathematical studies—search after and seize hold of every valuable fact—be a constant reader of useful books—and the glory of your triumph will be in proportion to the difficulties you have overcome.

THE SOMNAMBULIST.

LAURENT, a small farmer of Uzel, on the property of Monsieur L—, made a hard bargain with the owner of the forest of Lorges, to fell a very large number of trees within a fixed time.

Some particular circumstances—principally the failure of his crops, and the necessity of raising the means to pay his rent from other sources—which were pressing upon this poor man's pecuniary means, rendered the speedy completion of his task a most important matter to him.

Every evening he reckoned how many trees he had felled, and how many still remained to be cut down; and suffered intense anxiety from the apprehension of failing in his engagement.

One morning, arriving at a very early hour at the forest, he was astonished to find that there were more trees cut down than he had counted the preceding evening; but he rejoiced at what he persuaded himself was an unaccountable mistake on his part. The work did not advance as he had hoped during the day; but he laboured hard, invoking every saint he thought likely to assist him.

When the evening came, Laurent marked exactly the number he had cut down, and what remained to be done.

The next day he found a large oak, that would have occupied him the greater part of the morning, cut down remarkably well, and many small trees round it had been prostrated with the same dexterity; but, strange to say, instead of feeling a comfortable assurance that the saints—or possibly the Dryads, or Hamadryads (though, by the way, he knew nothing of these sylvan deities)—had heard his invocation, and aided him, he felt terribly afraid that the agency of the devil was traceable in the work, and was perfectly miserable in consequence.

Two days previously he would have been delighted to have seen the trees laid low by any means whatever; now he was unhappy, because they fell as if by enchantment. In short, Laurent threw away his axe in a perfect bewilderment, consulted his wife, and then went for advice to the curé.

The curé went to the wood with his breviary under his arm, exorcised the evil spirit and all his adherents, forbade the trees from falling, or even from tottering, or nodding in any degree, by any other agency than that of the axe of Laurent, and left him and his family easy in their minds, and the assembled crowd tranquillised. And lest any mistake or "devilry" should occur, Laurent numbered the trees, both cut down and standing, with the utmost precision.

The following morning, certain that all demons of the wood had been sent about their business, the curé and three-fourths of his parishioners were there at an early hour. But amazement! and horror upon horror! more trees had fallen during the past night than during any of the preceding ones!

The case made such a noise that the mayor was obliged to interfere. That dignitary, the curé, the churchwardens, and vergers went in procession to the forest. But the mayor did not content himself with another exorcism from the curé, nor with counting the trees, but set a watch, and remained with it himself.

Fortunately the night was one of full moonlight, so that any beings, whether flesh and blood or of the spiritual world, provided they assumed even the faintest outlines of form, could be clearly distinguished; nay, even if a troop of merry little goblins, but six inches high, had appeared at work with their elfish axes and saws, they would have been discerned. The mayor and his posse comitatus, ecclesiastical and laical, kept their eyes and ears in a state of nervous vigilance and superstitious terror, and their tongues unmoved, until the clock of the neighbouring village sounded the midnight hour, in apprehension lest that solemn sound from the venerable time-keeper should be "a certain sign that fate would frown."

A certain sign! it was not down. At the first stroke they saw—they saw, clothed in white, a goblin figure at a considerable distance, which appeared at first of gigantic stature; but as it approached, they thought it was diminished gradually to the size of a man, with a blood-coloured turban which covered the head even to the nose, so as to suggest the horrible idea that the creature had no eyes.

"Sathane!" cried out the rector and the curé together, in breathless agitation.

They looked in vain to see if the mayor and his attendants would advance nearer to the monster-fiend with the crimson head and white body. Hark! there was a sound; another and another. It was that of a mortal axe—the nocturnal workman was cutting away bravely; every stroke told upon a tall tree, which creaked, toppled, and then fell, and the voice of the woodcutter was heard to exclaim, "Ha!"

The mayor rushed forward; so did his men, and the curé did not stay behind. The somnambulist, Laurent—for it was he—was secured, and then the mystery was solved.

The poor fellow had been so nervously intent on finishing his laborious contract, that he regularly dreamt of it; and his imagination became so excited, that he had walked out in his sleep repeatedly, and worked all night without once awaking. Some impulse led him to return to his bed, after he had unconsciously laboured for some time, before daybreak; and no one had missed him from his own house, as he opened and shut his cottage door with as much precision as if he had been broad awake. The strength, activity, and correctness with which he executed his work at night, far exceeded his performance by day: a fact which I do not mean to analyse on principles of physiology. Perhaps some unlearned person may assert, without the aid of metaphysics, that a man who was working all night would not be quite so strong, or disposed to labour, on the succeeding day.

HAPPY CHILDHOOD'S HOME.

I wandered over deserts wild,
O'er northern fields of snow;
I've left those scenes a happy child
For lands of brighter glow;
Yet there's no palace of the east,
Or region on the earth,
Can to the heart recall the past,
Like the dear land of birth.
I've linger'd 'neath Italian skies,
And its gay vineyards' bloom;
I've wander'd where Arabia sighs,
Fragrant and choice perfume;
I've gazed on Switz stern scenery,
Its snow-clad mountains high;
But happy childhood's home, for thee
I still in anguish sigh.
Farewell then all ye foreign climes,
I'll seek my village home,
Its ivy porch, its merry chimneys,
And ne'er again will roam.
I'll ne'er more seek for happier spots,
In other climes than mine;
For England's dear and happy cots
Are not surpass'd by thine.

STATUE OF MOORE, THE POET.—It appears, from the report of a meeting of the subscribers to the "Moore Testimonial," which has just been held in Dublin, under the presidency of the Earl of Charlemont, that £1315 had been subscribed—out of which £1161 has been paid up and an expenditure of £138 incurred. A communication had been received from London, through Mr. Longman, announcing that the London subscription for the "Moore Testimonial" amounted to £279. The testimonial is to take the shape of a statue on a pedestal; the figure to be of bronze, and executed from the marble portrait taken of the poet by Mr. Charles Moore. An admirable site has been chosen for the work. It is to be placed in an open space fronting what was the Old Parliament House of Ireland, and close to Trinity College, where Moore received his education.

EXTRAORDINARY INSTANCE OF SELF-SUSTENANCE.—A few weeks ago, as a shepherd, named Greaves, belonging to Ripple Farm, near Deal, was employed in a yard on his master's premises, he was surprised to see a hog issue from a large heap of straw which had been thrown off from the threshing machine. The animal was in a very emaciated condition, and seemed to be suffering from great debility. On closer examination it was identified as a pig that had been suddenly missed about five weeks before, and after which a minute but fruitless search had been made. The owner at length arriving at the conclusion that it had been stolen. It is supposed that the pig was nesting in the yard at the time the threshing-machine was in operation, and that it did not think of moving from its comfortable quarters until the layer of straw became so heavy that it was unable to free itself—an indiscretion for which it paid the penalty of a five weeks' confinement, and the laborious task of self-liberation.—Dover Chronicle.

ONE HAPPY HEART.—Have you made one happy heart to-day? Envid privilege! How calmly you can seek your pillow—how sweetly sleep! In all this world there is nothing so sweet as giving comfort to the distressed—as getting a sun ray into a gloomy heart. Children of sorrow meet us wherever we turn; there is no moment that tears are not shed, and sighs uttered. Yet how many of those tears, those sighs, are caused by our own thoughtlessness! How many a daughter wrings the very soul of a fond mother by acts of unkindness and ingratitude! How many husbands, by one little word, make a whole day of sad hours and unkind thoughts! How many wives, by angry recriminations, estrange and embitter their loving hearts! How many brothers and sisters meet but to vex and injure each other—making wounds that no human heart can heal! Ah! if each one worked upon this maxim day by day—"Strive to make some heart happy," jealousy, revenge, madness, hate, with their kindred evil associates, would for ever leave the earth. Our minds would be so occupied in the contemplation of adding to the pleasures of others, that there would be no room for the ugly fiends of discord! Try it, ye discontented, for ever grumbling devotees of sorrow, self-caused! It will make that little part of the world in which you move as fair as Eden.

FACETIÆ.

We have seen women not only too weak to bear food, but even too weak to bear contradiction.

THERE are two classes of people that can afford to be modest: those who possess a vast amount of knowledge, and those who have but little.

A lady of Malvern, after three months' absence, found in her piano a rat's nest, made of the coverings of the hammers, silk, &c.

THE Times says, "France is no longer governed by established laws or institutions, but by the accidents thrown in her way." In other words, France is governed precisely as if it were an English railway.

It is stated by some wiseacre, that the heart of a man weighs about nine ounces; that of a woman, eight. As age increases, a man's heart grows heavier, and a woman's lighter, after thirty. Some girls lose theirs at sixteen.

A dog that will fetch a bone will take one. No allusion to tattlers.

WHEN does a mastiff become a lap-dog? When he is drinking.

THE greatest pleasure connected with wealth consists in acquiring it. Two months after a man comes into a fortune, he feels just as prosy and fretful as he did when he worked for "four-and-six" a day.

THREE THINGS A WOMAN CANNOT DO.—Pass a bonnet-shop without stopping—see a baby without kissing it—and admire a piece of lace without inquiring "how much it was per yard?"

A man being asked did he understand German, answered, "No; but I have a cousin who plays the German flute." Another going into a book-shop, asked if they had the "Whole Duty of Man," and received for answer, "No, sir; but we have Mrs. Glasse's Cookery."

A new steam apparatus for shaving has been invented, which will shave a thousand at once. All they have to do is to turn first the right side of the face, then the left, and lastly the full face to the machine, and thus they are shaved by three strokes of the razor.

A little girl being sent to a shop to purchase some dye-stuff, and forgetting the name of the article, said to the clerk, "John, what do folks dye with?" "Die with? why, cholera, sometimes," replied John. "Well, I believe that's the name. I want to get three pennyworth."

MIRAVAU—was one day accosted by a sturdy beggar, who asked alms of him. "How is this," inquired Miravaux, "that a lusty fellow like you are unemployed?" "Ah!" replied the beggar, looking very piteously at him, "if you did but know how lazy I am!" The reply was so ludicrous and unexpected, that Miravaux gave the varlet a piece of silver.

COMPLIMENTS MATRIMONIAL.—Says Mr. M. (waxing rather warm) to Mrs. M., "Facts are stubborn things." Says Mrs. M. to Mr. M., "Then what a fact you must be!"

EFFECTS OF FLATTERY.—An unsuccessful lover was asked by what means he lost his divinity. "Alas!" cried he, "I flattered her, until she got too proud to speak to me."

MEN of leisure never find time to do anything. Even our school-books are written by people whose station in life does not raise them above baked potatoes.

LONG MEASURE.—A witty knave coming into a lace shop upon Ludgate Hill, said he had occasion for a small quantity of very fine lace, and having pitched upon that he liked, asked the woman of the shop how much she would take for as much as could reach from one of his ears to the other, and measure which way she pleased, either over his head or under his chin. After some words they agreed, and he paid the money down, and began to measure, saying: "One of my ears is here, and the other is nailed to the pillory in Bristol—therefore I fear you have not enough to make good your bargain; however, I will take this piece in part, and desire you will provide the rest with all expedition."

A SCOTTISH BEADLE.—One of the preachers in a populous parish in Ayrshire, who is not less celebrated for his pulpit exertions than for his bonhomie and obliging disposition, was lately to officiate for a brother in a neighbouring parish. The circumstance being known, attracted a large attendance, as many were eager to hear an orator so famed. As the popular preacher was ascending the pulpit, the beadle, solicitous that he should not disappoint the anticipations of the people, clapped him encouragingly on the back, and whispered, "Now, sir, do as well as ye can, for the folks here have great expectations of you!"

A modern philosopher says, that ready-made fortunes are a good deal like ready-made clothing—they seldom fit those who get them. Fast young men generally inherit mill sites, while the most likely person to fall heir to a gallery of statuary, would be some old fossil who would much prefer the more producible contents of a stone-cutter's yard. Riches are distributed with very little discrimination. To spend money properly requires as much brains as to acquire it; and yet who ever knew a man of brains to have "a rich uncle," or a young man of genius to become the residuary legatee to a silver mine?

A Hampshire farmer, going to a parish meeting, met his minister, and told him that his society resolved to increase his salary. "I beg of you not to think of any such thing," said the minister; "for it is about as much business to collect my present salary as I wish to attend to; if it should be increased, I should be obliged to devote my whole time to collecting it."

It is told of Lord Norbury, that when passing sentence of death upon a man for stealing a watch, he said to the culprit: "My good fellow, you made a grasp at time, but you caught eternity!"

THE NEEDLEWORKER'S COMPLAINT.—A "stitch" in the side.

PATENT SHIP-BUILDING.—To such extraordinary perfection has the noble art of ship-building arrived in her Majesty's dockyards, that in many cases they are obliged to haul the vessels up after launching them, in order to cut them in two, by way of completing them!

DANGEROUS FREEDOM OF DOGS.—Now that government propose to relieve dogs from their burthens, by taking off the canine tax, Mr. Gladstone ought to have an eye to the approaching "dog-days." Let us hope that the freedom of these animals in one respect may not entail on the Chancellor the necessity of muzzling them all!

QUERY.—If the judges are to be excluded from Parliament, will there be less judgment in the Assembly than formerly?

NATIONAL AFFECTION.—Louis Napoleon is so thoroughly beloved by his subjects, that one and all dare not open their mouths against him. Thus "silence gives consent."

GOLD ABOVE ITS LEVEL.—The River Thames has recently been overflowing its banks. We should imagine it was high time that Lombard Street did a similar thing; for, judging from the recent arrivals from Australia, the banks in that locality must be running over with superfluous golden streams.

A PSALM OF LIFE.—A PARODY.

What the Heart of the Young Woman said to the Old Maid.

BY HENRY W. SHORTELOW.

TELL me not in idle jingle,
"Marriage is an empty dream!"
For the girl is dead that's single,
And girls are not now what they seem.
Life is real! life is earnest!
Single blessedness a fib!
"Man thou art, to man returnest,"
Has been spoken of the rib.
Not enjoyment, and not sorrow
Is our destined end or way;
But to act, that each to-morrow
Find us nearer marriage day.
Life is long, and youth is fleeting,
And our hearts, though light and gay,
Still, like pleasant drums, are beating
Wedding marches all the way.
In the world's broad field of battle,
In the bivouac of life,
Be not like dumb, driven cattle!
But a heroine—a wife!
Trust no future, howe'er pleasant,
Let the dead Past bury its dead!
Act—act to the living Present!
Heart within and hope ahead!
Lives of married folks remind us
We can live our lives as well,
And, departing, leave behind us
Such examples as shall "tell."
Such example, that another
Wasting time in idle sport,
A forlorn unmarried brother,
Seeing, shall take heart and court.
Let us, then, be up and doing,
With a heart on triumph set;
Still contriving, still pursuing,
And each one a husband get!

TALLEYRAND'S CUNNING.—A lady who professed to be charmed with Talleyrand's wit, begged of him to write his name in her album. His gallantry could not refuse, and he began to write a verse. "Arretez, MONSEIGNEUR!" exclaimed the lady; "it may be very well for interior persons to write verses, but the name of Talleyrand is enough to appear in my book—it is fame." He fixed his keen eyes on the supplicating fair one, and wrote his name at the very top of the page. The anecdote spread, and all Paris laughed at the happy evasion of perhaps seeing his name in a few days signed to a bill of 10,000 francs!

WANTED, IMMEDIATELY, a physician who never charged an exorbitant fee—a married man who always went the straight way home—a "fast man" who never looked at a girl's heels—an omnibus driver who was never abusive—a merchant who never thought of business on a Sunday—and an editor whose chair was emphatically an "easy" one.

THE "strengiminde d" women are carrying everything before them in America. According to the papers, they hold conventions, make public speeches, deliver public lectures, edit newspapers, practise as doctors, and do numberless other unfeminine things! but this, it appears, is not enough: they have ascended to the pulpit, and now officiate as parsons. They will be in Congress next, and noisy as that body is now, there will then be "confusion worse confounded."

AMUSING PERPLEXITIES.—The French translator of Franklin's Correspondence has made a true French blunder. Franklin somewhere says, "People imagined that an American was a kind of Yahoo." Upon this the translator makes the following note: "Yahoo. It must be an animal. It is affirmed that it is the opossum; but I have not been able to find the word Yahoo in any dictionary of natural history!" This reminds us of an anecdote also founded on one of Swift's admirable works. A gentleman saw a person poring over an atlas, and seemingly disconcerted by some want of success. "Can't you find what you want," said he, "or can I assist you?" "I don't know," was the reply, "for I have been looking two hours through all latitudes and longitudes, and cannot discover this rascally Lilliput anywhere!"

CANONICAL.—The Pope of Rome opening a bottle of ginger beer would be a very "pop-ish" act!

A CHANCELLOR'S DREAM.—When Mr. Gladstone dreamt of taking the duty off soap, it was undoubtedly a "so(s)porific" result.

THE MOST BUOYANT OF WATERS.—The harbour of Cork, in Ireland!

HUNGARIAN OPINION.—Kossuth and his followers incline to the belief that a great many unnecessary "crackers" have been told by the press concerning the recent seizure of war rockets.

HOME FOR IRISH SAILORS.—We hear of such an institution as the Dublin Sailors' Home. Now as the Irish are generally "at sea" when at home, this establishment appears somewhat anomalous. We should say, however, that the real Dublin Sailors' Home of the Irish tar is that part of the ocean where he's "doublin the Cape," with a view to a trip to the land of gold.

EXHIBITION EXTRAORDINARY.—On dit that a certain portion of the building for the Dublin Exhibition will be devoted to the display of native Ribbonism!

LEGAL SHARPNESS.—The attempt of the attorneys to rid themselves of their certificate duty, proves them to be capital solicitors in their own behalf.

A contemporary imagines that gold will go on increasing until it becomes less valuable than old iron. In less than twenty years he expects to see tennypenny nails take the place of breast-pins, while the only jewellery that a fashionable lady will tolerate, will consist of tin earrings and copper-plated head-bands. Gold, in his opinion, is bound to be a drug, and in a century from now will only be used for coal-scuttles and door-plates.

A WAGER WON.—A man once offered to bet that he could prove that this side of the river was the other side. His challenge was accepted; and, pointing to the opposite shore of the river, he asked, "Is not that one side of the river?" "Yes," was the answer, "of course." "Agreed," said the man; "and is not this the other side?" "Certainly," said the other. "Then," said the man, "pay me the wager; for by your own confession I have proved that this side of the river is the other side." The dumfounded antagonist, overcome by this logic, immediately paid the money.

A WELL-DISCIPLINED SOLDIER.—A laughable circumstance took place a short time since. As a soldier was carrying the dinner belonging to his mess from the baker's, one of his companions coming behind him called "Attention!" when this well-disciplined soldier dropped his hands, and at the same time the dinner of his unfortunate comrades.

A NEW DODGE.—A tradesman residing within one hundred miles circuit of Nottingham Exchange pump, lately bought a dozen of Cochon-China eggs, for which he paid 12s. 6d., and so delighted was he with his purchase that he insisted that he and his fair spouse should taste the delicious but expensive morsels in a couple of breakfast. They were boiled, but, when placed on the table, to his great astonishment and chagrin, the beautiful tint that before rendered them so inviting, had changed to common white! On examining the remaining ten, they were found to be nothing more than small, and not very fresh, Irish eggs, which had been tinted to the requisite "Cochon-China" shade, by being steeped in a solution of raw umber.—Nottingham Guardian.

MAN.—A writer says, that the vital difference between man and woman is this—man for ever asks more, while woman is always intent upon making the most of what she has. Man is a perpetual seeker; woman turns whatsoever she finds into a present use and profit. Man's eye is fixed upon the future; woman's upon the present. He sweeps the heavens with his gaze, to see what fairer worlds invite his adventure; she quietly unpacks the trunk of his observation, and appropriates whatever available results it contains to the improvement of his present abode.

THE poultry mania has reached such a height in London, as to become a most pernicious species of gambling—a sort of chicken hazard.—Diogenes.

TO PENNY-A-LINERS.—When a man receives a blow in his eye from one of the conical pieces of wood knocked about by the boys in the streets, the accident may properly be headed, "A cat-astrophe!"—Ibid.

QUITE UNNECESSARY.—A tradesman who advertises "alarums," recommends them to members of Parliament and commercial gentlemen. From our intimacy, however, with these two classes, we know they are always too ready to take alarm upon any subject inimical to their interests. The late Round-Robin affair is a pretty good illustration.—Ibid.

THE CURRENCY.—In England, of late years, light sovereigns have occasioned considerable inconvenience; while in Austria, France, Russia, and Prussia, bad sovereigns have been an intolerable nuisance.—Ibid.

ASTOUNDING.—A hairdresser, whose establishment is situated in one of the narrow alleys of London, has invented a hair-dye of such extraordinary efficacy, that the very atmosphere of his establishment has turned quite dark.—Ibid.

"THE POULTRY."—It is remarkable, that in the very height of the Coach-in-China poultry mania, the traffic in our Coach-Cab-and-Omnibus Poultry is entirely suspended.—Ibid.

ANOTHER RAP AT THE RAPPERS.—Why are the Spirit Rappers like dishonest publicans?—Because their "spirits" are much below "proof!"—Ibid.

CURIOUS RESULT.—A paragraph is going the round of the papers, stating that "a respectable woman, named Wilkinson, who had been totally blind for twenty years, fell down stairs. The shock caused to her system resulted in the complete recovery of her sight." We have heard that the late fall of B. Disraeli has had in his case a somewhat similar effect!—Ibid.

THE KING OF THE ISLAND.—In the case of the Maldon Election Petition, it was proved that an agent for the sitting member went down to the borough, and called at the house of a man who was familiarly known as the "King of the Island," and offered him £150 down for his interest; which was supposed to extend to some twenty or twenty-five votes. There was, however, a larger advance made by the opposing party; for the "King" and his subjects all voted for the unsuccessful candidate! Why this man should be called the "King of the Island" we do not exactly see; but as that title has been adopted, and the fellow lives by selling the rights and liberties of his fellow-creatures, he may as well be called the "King of the Cannibal Island" at once!—Ibid.

WHAT A VEGETARIAN CANNOT DO.—Say grace before meat.—Punch.

ALL SMOKE.—Why is a notorious Professor of pills and ointment like a tobacconist?—Because he thrives by puffing.—Ibid.

MARCH OF POLITENESS.—The cabmen in Palace Yard have profited so much by the remarks of their fares, the members of Parliament and reporters, that in abusing one another they now never say, "You must be a precious stupid donkey," but, "You must be the man wot ventilates the House of Commons!"—Ibid.

QUADRILLES FOR THE CEILING.—We observe that "A great musical curiosity" is announced, under the title of "The Double, or Upside-down Quadrilles, for the piano-forte, composed so that, by turning them upside down, they become another set." We should like to know whether instruction in dancing these quadrilles could be obtained of the gentleman who was lately walking with his head downwards at Drury Lane.—Ibid.

A PHILANTHROPIC PROFESSION.—We never saw the goodwill of a lawyer's practice advertised. Does such a thing exist?—Ibid.

FASHIONS BY A "FIRST" HAND.—The fashions in millinery and dress-making present some of the usual features. Fingers are very much worn—nearly to the bone—skirts and accounts are still very long, while bodies, particularly those that think themselves somebodies, are excessively low, with a great deal of stiffness and a quantity of bone about the place where the heart is likely to come, if there happens to be any. In evening dress the petticoat is usually very full and the pocket often very empty. The material of the bosom is frequently glacé, and covered with a transparent tissue of imitation stuff, which may be seen through easily. Flowers are not much worn this season in the hair, but the cheeks are got up as usual with artificial roses.—Ibid.

GEMS OF THOUGHT.

THE most candid disposition will find it necessary, in its intercourse with the world, on some occasions to conceal what it does feel, and on others to assume what it does not.

AN obstinate temper that can only be swayed by kindness, is like an iron instrument that is rendered ductile by heat.

THE BLIND BOY.

BY MRS. EDWARD THOMAS.

My mother, art thou beautiful?

Oh would that I could see!

Thy voice like whisper'd melody
Sounds beautiful to me.

Thy hand feels beautiful in mine,

So soft, so warm, so bright;

Me thinks like velvet it must shine,

Beneath man's glorious sight.

Thy lips feel beautiful—thy kiss

Sweet as unfil'd flower,

Ere yet the bee has sought its breast

To steal its virgin dower.

Thy love for me is beautiful,

So tender and so true;

That in thy eyes I read it not,

Mother, I sorely rue.

In all thou must be beautiful,

If there is beauty here;

For what save God's most perfect work

Could hold a blind boy dear?

MEN of a materially logical cast of mind are not often brilliant; for the best account of brilliancy is, that it is the truth stated in an illogical form.

THE severest punishment of any injury is the consciousness of having done it; and no one but the guilty knows the withering pains of repentance.

THOUGHTS habitually elevated, always serene, and sometimes dreamy, impart a pure and true gaiety to the soul.

WE celebrate nobler obsequies to those we love, by drying the tears of others than by shedding our own; and the fairest funeral wreath we can hang on their tomb is a fruit offering of good deeds.—Jean Paul Richter.

HE that will not permit his wealth to do any good to others while he is alive, prevents it from doing any good to himself when he is dead; and by egotism, which is suicidal, cuts himself off from the truest pleasure here, and the highest happiness hereafter.

MY friend, hast thou ever thought how pleasant and altogether lovely would be a life of entire sincerity married to perfect love? The wildest stories of magic skill, or fairy power, could not equal the miracles that would be wrought by such a life; for it would change this hollow masquerade of veiled and restless souls into a place of divine communion.

CUNNING.—The greatest of all cunning is, to seem blind to the snares laid for us; men are never so easily deceived as while they are endeavoring to deceive others.

REPUTATION is so tender a flower that it once cropped or blasted, it is out of the power of the most benign sun or genial showers to restore it to its original beauty. How tender, then, should every one be not only of speaking, but even of encouraging the busy tongues and malicious speeches of defamers! for if defamation be a murderess of the reputation, as in other murders every bystander ought to be looked upon as a principal, since the law allows of no accomplices in crimes of that black nature.

MISCELLANEOUS.

A SNAIL RESTAURANT.—A French paper says that snails have become quite a fashionable article of diet in Paris, as they were in the days of the old Romans. There are now fifty restaurants, and more than twelve hundred private tables, where snails are accepted as a delicacy by from eight to ten thousand customers. The monthly consumption of this molluscian is estimated at half a million. The market price of the great vineyard snails is from 2f. 50c. to 3f. 50c. per hundred; while those from the hedges, woods, and forests, are only from 2f. to 2f. 25c. The proprietor of the "snailery" in the vicinity of Dijon is said to net over 7,000f. annually!

KEW GARDENS.—From the Annual Report of Sir W. J. Hooker, we learn the progress made in the Royal Gardens at Kew, during the year 1852. "Some of the palms," Sir William says, "have grown so rapidly as to reach the highest span of the roof (66 feet), and two of them we have been obliged to let down into sunk compartments underground, thus to retain them a few years longer." Of the accessions of moment, Sir William observes: "It were tedious to enumerate the names of a tithe of the rarities we have received; but in gratitude to the donors, I must take leave to mention two plants which our garden alone possesses in a living state: first, a healthy young plant of the double cocoa-nut (the coco de mer of French navigators, the Lodoicea Sechellarum), a palm of the highest interest, both botanically and historically, for it inhabits only one spot in the whole world—a single islet in the Seychelles group. This plant was reared and given to the gardens by Professor Bojer, of the Mauritius, and it was conveyed to England free of expense, by the Screw Propelling Steam Company. The second acquisition is one which has been hitherto wholly unknown to [botanical?] science: though it yields a material of very extended use among the Chinese and other nations, and which, ever since our trade began with China, has been sold under the name of rice paper. This material, in all its various stages of preparation, accompanied by a living plant in the highest health, has been sent to the gardens by Dr. Bowring, from Hong Kong."

A HANDSOME PRESENT.—The Duke of Abrantes was extremely kind to his servants; and it was well known in Paris that they robbed him to a considerable amount. "They may take a few bottles of wine or a few pounds of meat, I believe," said Junot, when his friends referred to the circumstance; "but the real robber is my steward, and I do believe he plunders me by wholesale." "Then why not get rid of him?" "It is of no use," said the duke; "he is in other respects a good man; he is attached to me, and has rendered me some services; besides, if I were to dismiss him, I should be cheated in the same way by another." On the first day of the year, a grand day in France, the numerous servants belonging to the duke came to offer customary congratulations. On each of them he conferred a gift. "As to you, sir," addressing the steward, "I will make you a present of everything you have robbed me of during the past year." The steward made a low bow and retired.

THE THOUGHTS OF A DAY.—If the thoughts which pass through the mind of a person in a day, could be gathered together and placed in the order in which they first appeared, what a mountain of ideas would be brought to view!

WORDS sometimes carry an immense influence with them. The noble lines uttered by "Richelieu" will nerve many a young heart to deeds of desperate daring:

Richelieu—"Young man, be blithe! for, note me, from the hour I grasp that packet, think your guardian star rains fortune on you!"

Francois—"If I fail?"

Richelieu—"Fail—fail? In the bright lexicon of youth, which Fate reserves for a glorious manhood, there is no such word as—fail!"

This thought has often been felt before, but never so admirably expressed. No one can listen to its delivery by the old Cardinal, without finding a momentum given to his courage that will keep him in energy for a lifetime. Another fine sentiment is uttered by Richelieu in the succeeding act: "The husband of a woman should be a man, and not a money-chest"—a sentiment that will stand up between Nature and Usury long after the hand that penned it is cold in death.

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

F. M. J.—The Santissima Trinidad, at the Battle of Cape St. Vincent, carried 140 guns. The Royal Albert, building, is intended to carry 120.

HENRY must look out for a better sweetheart. A girl who trifles with a serious affection, and coarsely holds up his avowals to ridicule, does not deserve the love of an honest man. Turn the tables on the saucy baggage, by showing a little spirit and independence.

S. H.—Beware of man-traps. The party you refer to can no more show you how to realise a fortune than he can fly. We wonder any portion of the press receive his monstrous advertisements.

NAPOLEON LE GRAND asks what is the most appropriate present a lover can make to a young lady on her birthday. Anything of a tasteful and ornamental character. Articles of jewellery are preferred—such as armlets, lockets, pearls for the hair—in fact, anything graceful and pretty, consistent with the gentleman's means, and appropriate to the lady's position and tastes. First-class boxes, handsomely bound, are always acceptable.

ALICE GRAY.—We don't like the conduct of your lover. To say the least, it is suspicious. But wait the twelve months out. Although you have known each other ten years, perhaps he wishes to study you in your new character for a whole year. Some men are horribly suspicious.

A PROFESSIONAL GENTLEMAN.—You are biased by personal considerations. Besides, your law is bad. The Wills' Act expressly declares—"that no form of attestation shall be necessary." But we agree to the necessity for one comprising a mention of all the forms to be observed by the act on executing and attesting wills.

H. K.—You are wrong—the first year began with 0. The second with 1, and as the cumulative days in that year contributed to make up 2, it follows that the whole 2 years were only completed at midnight on the 31st of December of the year 2: consequently we are now in the 58rd year of the century.

J. H. JAMES.—Under the ordinary licence, or before the superintending registrar. The parties intending to be married must have resided in the parish fourteen clear days previous to the solemnisation of the ceremony.

VULCAN.—When two gentlemen meet a party of ladies, among whom there is one who is acquainted with one of the gentlemen only, the best etiquette would be for both parties to walk on, without the lady or gentleman known to each other saluting. Stopping to speak would be out of the question—for that would break up the ladies' party, and cause the other gentleman to walk on by himself.

YORK.—A man is bound to allow his wife a decent maintenance; but when living away from him, he is not liable for anything but the most bare necessities—that is, supposing he has allowed her nothing.

JAMES MERRY.—The young lady is right. To love well and wisely is no laughing matter. Besides, such a display is disrespectful to the object of the professed (?) attachment. Marriage should be approached with the serious demeanour of a right-thinking, warm-blooded man—not the grimaces of a mountebank.

LIZZETTE DE LOHM complains of the conduct of the sisters of her lover: previous to her engagement they showed her the greatest respect, but since they have treated her with studied coldness. Characteristic conduct; but very little. Grown-up sisters are not over partial to their brothers' selections. In the race for the altar, those who are left behind get angry and spiteful. Lizzette must not exhibit any resentment now. When married she may return the "cut" with interest.

ELLEN DE VERE.—The personal property of an intestate who leaves neither wife, children, nor grandchildren, goes first to his father—if none, to his mother, and brothers and sisters, in equal proportions—the mother taking one whole share, and the brothers and sisters one each; and if there be children of a deceased brother or sister, they are included in the division, and an equal portion will have to be divided among each family of children.

BLACKBURN.—If we had the ballot, the motive for bribery and treating would not exist—for all the gold in the coffers of the Bank, and all the beer in the metropolis, could not make a single secret vote a positive certainty. The ballot would make an English election more a matter of conscience and opinion than it is, and prevent disgraceful rioting, drunkenness, and corruption.

CLARISSA.—Having an immediate reversionary interest in the property, you might either sell or mortgage it; but the necessary deed would not be valid until you were of age. Don't anticipate—this practice is the curse of youth, the crime of maturity, and the bitter, unavailing regret of old age.

ROBERT BOYD.—Yeast may be made by mixing two quarts of soft water with wheat flour, to the consistency of thick gruel, then, boiling it gently for half an hour, and when almost cold stirring into it half a pound of sugar, and four spoonfuls of good yeast. This should be placed in an earthen vessel with a narrow neck, and allowed to stand before a moderate fire, so as to ferment. The fermentation will throw up a thin liquor, which must be poured off and thrown away, and the remainder kept for use in a cool place, in a bottle or jug, tied over.

S. T. PAFFORD.—In answer to numerous inquiries respecting the Duke of Wellington screw-line-of-battle ship, we have to state that she is afloat, and all her trial trips have proved eminently satisfactory. She is unquestionably the largest ship in the world, whether propelled by sails, screws, or paddles. She carries 131 guns instead of 140, as originally intended, but the weight of metal is the same. Her engines are of 750-horse power, and were built by the Messrs. Napier, of Glasgow. It will be in the recollection of our readers that we have twice before given a notice of this most magnificent of war-steamer, originally intended to be called the Windsor Castle; but the launch at Pembroke Dockyard occurring on the day the Iron Duke died, her Majesty was pleased to direct that the former name of this leviathan of the deep should be changed to its present one, as a memorial of England's greatest hero, and of the national prowess.

J. G. S.—1. A party may be sued in Australia, under power of attorney. But can the claim be proved at such a distance? 2. A dishonoured bill renewed and received, discharges the indorsers on the original bill from all liability. 3. It will depend on the circumstances of the case whether you can sue the widow of a deceased gentleman for the amount of a debt contracted during the life-time of the husband. If the latter were liable in his lifetime, you may sue his executors, or, if none, the widow, as administratrix.

ABERDEEN.—Eggs may be preserved in several ways. If you rub the shells with butter it will keep them for months. Another mode is to apply with a brush a solution of gum arabic to the shells, or immerse the eggs therein, let them dry, and afterwards pack them in dry charcoal-dust. Steeping them in sweet oil answers the purpose for a year. Boiling for a minute answers for a month.

W. W. is one of those whimsical young men who change just as the weather does on an April day. Talk of woman's inconstancy! Why that of the W. W. tribe of men is ten thousand times worse; it is more hypocritical, more heartless, more cruel. Our correspondent is evidently one of those detestable creatures, a male flirt. He must take care. If he cunningly keeps on the windy side of the law, a horsewhip and a strong arm can reach him anywhere.

S. D. E.—You may obtain a copy of the will at Doctors' Commons, by personal application or through a friend. The usual way is to employ a proctor.

W. B. DARLEY.—Your town agent would not mislead you. Several numbers at present out of print will be re-issued. But we cannot go to the expense of reprinting numbers for parties who may require only one copy, probably two, at the outside.

AN ANXIOUS BROTHER wishes to hear from his sister, who, two years ago, went to Corfu, and in her last letter stated she was in service in the family of a member of the House of Commons.

H. D. B.—"If this should meet the eye of H. W., of Birmingham, who left Manchester in the autumn of 1850, and has not written or been heard of since, he is earnestly requested to write to his disconsolate wife and mother. His silence and protracted as well as unexplained absence, is likely to bring the latter to a premature grave."

CHARLES CRAYEN.—When a love engagement has been broken off, all letters and presents on either side should be returned. It is dishonourable to retain even a single scrap of writing. Besides, not returning letters would particularly lead the other party to suppose that it was desired that the engagement was only interrupted—not broken off—and might be renewed whenever a proper advantage was made.

PRO BONO PUBLICO.—Executors under the wills of British subjects dying abroad, are not obliged to advertise for the whereabouts of the parties interested; but, as men of business and honour, they invariably do so. You may ascertain all the particulars as regards the disposition of the property at Doctors' Commons, if the testator died in a British colony; if within the limits of the East India Company's charter, at the East India House.

J. R.—The derivation of the word "Yankee" has not been determined. The following, by the Rev. James Cork Richmond, of Providence, Rhode Island, is not far from the mark:

At Yankees, John, beware a laugh,
Against yourself you joke;
For Yengees, "English," is but half
By Indian natives spoke."

WELLINGTON.—You must fulfil the engagement. Having won the girl's affections, it would be base to desert her. Supposing she is consumptive, it is your duty to soothe and cheer her few remaining years. Selfish considerations should not thwart the holiest of sympathies.

ALBERT asks what is our opinion of a young gentleman (?) who boasts of his money, dashes about, and travels a good deal, but who calls at a certain house once or twice a week to borrow your valuable Journal. He never buys a periodical or newspaper of any description. What do we think of him, indeed! Why that he is very mean, and shabby, and so forth; but why do his friends tolerate his dirty tricks? Only publicans and news-agents lend newspapers—and lending a periodical which only costs a penny is ridiculous. Perhaps the borrower in this case makes the borrowing a pretext for seeing and mutely adoring some divinity in rich brown curls, blue eyes, and coral lips. Some men are funny creatures. They approach a young woman with as much caution as if she were a boa constrictor.

J. M.—From the ex parte statement before us, we are inclined to think the Master of the Rolls was correct in deciding that the bequest was for the benefit of the next of kin. You may be able to see your way a little more clearly when we inform you that, under the act to restrain accumulations, 39 & 40 Geo. 3, c. 38, no person can dispose by will of any real or personal estate in such manner that the rents or produce thereof shall be accumulated for any longer period than a life or lives in being at the death of the testator, and twenty-one years afterwards.

SABINA.—Can "the young man" reclaim the wedding-ring from the young lady after the engagement has been broken off? Certainly—if he bought the article, it must, until the marriage, be his property. He can recover its value in the County Court. Why keep his trumpery bit of a gold band?

J. M. L.—The idea of religious principles early instilled into the youthful mind carrying it safely through life, is well worked out in your song of the "Good Life Boat." We give one verse.

When buoyantly launch'd on the changeful tide,
My whirling course to steer;
I saw in my way go side by side,
A smile and a pitiful tear,
Sweet garlands of fame would by me float,
Enrich'd from the world's gay store;
But the loveliest gem was the "Good Life Boat,"
That would carry me safely o'er.

ALBERT EDWARD.—In science and learning the middle ages have been grossly under-rated. Had not an unknown burgher of Middleburgh found out the use of spectacles, the world would probably have never heard of the sublimities of Copernicus and Newton. Then the alchemy of those times is the parent of our chemistry. The eager pursuit of astrology opened a way to our knowledge of the heavenly bodies. It is therefore from the middle ages that we have borrowed the wings on which we have soared into the regions of science, and hung high above the loftiest flights of antiquity. And yet it is the fashion with historians to denounce those ages as dark! What a terrible mistake! Why, in architecture the most passionate admirer of antiquity cannot view the gigantic Gothic specimens which have been preserved, without being forced to confess that they were no ordinary men who conceived and executed these prodigies of art. Literature, though not universally cultivated, was by no means neglected. They who followed learning as a profession, showed no want of eagerness in its pursuit. At no time were the schools so filled with aspirants—at no time did the name of a scholar draw to itself more reverence—at no time was the reputation of learning so sure a passport to dignity and honour. So liberal was the encouragement bestowed on learning, that every monastery was filled with students. Oxford is said to have counted 30,000 within her walls. The children of her rival sister on the banks of the Cam were not less numerous. The foreign schools were still more crowded. The professors of Bologna almost sank under the fatigue of giving lectures to 80,000 scholars. As the gentry, dedicating themselves entirely to arms, left the civil professions open to men of humble birth, these seats of learning were not then mere pretences for idleness—they were not filled with the sons of gentlemen only seeking to while away their time—but with poor men, whose sole chance of preferment was in their diligence. From the lower classes almost exclusively proceeded the priests, the lawyers, the physicians, the merchants. The nobility, though they disdained the learning of the schools, were not insensible to the charms of poetry. Every court was proud of being the resort of the muses. Scarcely a castle but counted a bard among the number of its retainers.

LETTERS RECEIVED.—Ivy and Myrtle (For all subsequent correspondence between you, we must refer you both to the daily Times)—Micra (The booksellers have the work on hand) Ignorant (Doctors' Commons offices are on Bennet's Hill, in the City, close to St. Paul's Cathedral. The address from the country is simply, "Doctors' Commons, London")—Albert Lee (The handwriting is good, but must be improved)—A. J. R. (Is thanked for his "acrostic" but we cannot publish praises of ourselves in our own pages)—B. S. (Order the volume from the bookseller)—Hugh Bradshaw (Polygamy is a sin under the Christian dispensation. In Pagan and Mahomedan countries it is a natural institution, and therefore cannot be a sin in those countries)—G. C. (The government commissioners do not send out juvenile emigrants, unless recommended by peculiar circumstances—such as orphanage or destitution)—Gog (Your being to us a myth, will excuse our doubting the originality of your verses on "Destiny." Besides we dislike the tone. You are a fatalist)—M. V. S. (Declined, with thanks)—May Gertrude (The handwriting is very clear, and lady-like in style)—Troublesome (Address the manager of "The Guarantee Society, London")—Mabel Milden (Auburn is the dictionary title. You are "a fine tan colour—a reddish brown.")—Red hair is auburn in colour. Red and black hair are the strongest; the intermediate shades—all sprung from one or the other of the two—the weakest)—Fair Play (Cannot conceal his identity. He writes too earnestly for a friend. We only publish the portraits of celebrities)—H. Lewis (Consult the Treatise on the letter "H" in "Walker's Pronouncing Dictionary")—Henry (Advise your friend to put her novel into the fire, and attend to her husband's comforts, if she has one—if not, to get one as soon as possible)—A. W. W. A. (Can you satisfy us as to the originality of the pieces? Such communications should be authenticated)—T. Bradford ("Walker's Pronouncing Dictionary" is the best Honour to whom honour is due)—A. Hard-fisted Working Man (Writes a sensible and elegant letter. We regret we cannot make use of it)—T. W. J. (Unsuitable)—Abraham Haley (No)—J. S. (Gutta percha may be dissolved in spirits of naphtha)—L. V. (Persons using the word "patent," and the royal arms, without having taken out a patent, are liable to heavy penalties)—Salamander and Alexis (All three specimens made by machinery)—T. C. W. (Purchase our Tenth Volume, containing the "Etiquette of Courtship and Marriage." You will there find all the information you require)—M. A. H. (A cheat, a snare, and a delusion)—W. Richardson (No)—Ada B. (Memoirs of Mr. and Mrs. Charles Kean were published in Vol. VII. of this Journal)—Zithia Zae (Should send something original. His "Seamstress" is almost copied from the "Slave of the Needle," published in Vols. X. and XI. of this Journal)—Joshua Ashley (Quite possible. Arkwright made seven millions sterling after he had passed the prime of life; and you, at twenty-four, ought to be able to learn anything, do anything, or go anywhere)—J. Stocks (Apply to the secretary of the Polytechnic Institution)—A Widow (Your son must serve his time out, but for ill-treatment he has his remedy before a magistrate)—T. F. (No)—Joseph Beadle (The stamp duty on deeds is abolished; apprenticeship where no money is paid as premium, is £1)—Don Cleophas (The wills of persons dying in the service of the East India Company are deposited at the East India House, and may be inspected from ten to four o'clock, except on holidays and other specified occasions, free of charge)—A. H. (Blushing is natural. It is only ladies and gentlemen in bronze that never blush)—A. O. (Apply to the nearest superintendent of Excise)—R. Saiker (Declined, with thanks)—Joe Beans (Appointments under the Hudson's Bay Company, are obtained by memorial to the directors. Some private interest is essential)—A Youth (Enter the merchant service, in preference to the Royal Navy. The pay and the treatment is better)—Sun-flower (Casting nativities, means extracting gold and silver from the pockets of the credulous)—E. D. T. (The "Village Maiden" is good prose—nothing more). Cervantes (You cannot leave without giving the usual notice required by the custom of the trade)—A. Dicky Sam (No. Interpretations of the Scriptures are so variable, that we cannot be more explanatory. We dislike all theological controversies)—Unfortunate (We never reply to letters privately, except when they are on business)—Perseverance Overcome (Go if you like, but do not say we sent you)—P. M. K. (Purify your system, by a thorough course of milk of sulphur)—D. C. H. (Your calculation is ingenious, but all such labours are unprofitable)—F. R. R. (There is no such society in the metropolis)—Agnes Everton (The Electro-plate process is open to all the world. It is the property of mankind)—M. J. and A. H. (Being under age, you could not legally emigrate without your parents' consent)—R. E. (Such questions refer to matters of private agreement)—Veritas (Search "Dodd," "Burke," or "Webster")—Green Man (Take the coin to a collector)—A Student (Resides nearer to the Strand than Durham)—A. Barwick (We must refer you to the Post Office returns, published four times a year in the public newspapers)—A. L. S. (Hereford (You have been deluded by a quack. We shall expose the fellow in another publication. May we use your letter?—Charles Bates (All in print. Order them through your bookseller)—A. Griton (When contributions do not appear within a reasonable time, the presumption ought to be that they are declined)—Taxidermist (Order from a publisher in Dundee)—Joseph Potter (Must apply to a shipping agent, or firm, in Liverpool)—Louisa S. (Consult the advertisements in the daily or WEEKLY TIMES)—J. Howard (Declined)—Dubious (The society advertises its principles and terms in the WEEKLY TIMES)—R. R. B. (Apply at Herald's College. The fees are about 8s. 6d.)—Collings (A deed of apprenticeship to which the father has not been made a consenting party, is void)—A Flute Player (Use cold cream or lip-salve)—Thomas Day (Procure the numbers from the bookseller)—J. Gray (Wait until the duty comes off soap)—Vernon (All the systems of short-hand are good. Those of Lewis, Harding, and Gurney, are the most practised)—Father O'Hara (In the merchant service the lowest petty officer is the second, third, or fourth mate, according to the size of the vessel)—H. H. (We never made any such promise)—J. Horsford (The cost of a monthly part of this Journal is sixpence—by post, one shilling)—R. S. (The work never appeared in this Journal)—Juvenis (Purchase one of the "Treatises on Handwriting," advertised in the WEEKLY TIMES)—W. B. (The Messrs. Clowes's is the largest printing establishment in Europe)—J. Berchall (Order from the news-agent)—Friedland (Marshal Grouchy died in 1847)—Specula (Such a book has never been published. There are thousands of "essays" on the subject)—J. B. P. (One trillion, two hundred and seventy billions, twenty millions, &c.)—S. L. (Glass-staining is a difficult and expensive process. You must consult a work on the subject)—Agnes L. (The pension of the widow of a master in the Navy is very trifling. It would depend on the class)—M. S. S. Sheffield—Jenny—Robert—Evening Star—Charles—Sarah L.—Integrity—Adolescents—Letty—Albert—Carnation—H. Y.—Emma—A Swiss—Queen of the Lake—Helicon—Snowdrop—Alice and Edith—L. E. G.—Just—C. V. H.—See Clear—Kate and Ellen—Ardwick—John—Helen—J. B.—Mary Harris—K. M.—Truth—Sarah—Rosa Violet—Isabel—Wanitia—Auricula—Rosamond—Henrietta—Ann—Lily of the Valley—Miss P.—Solitary One—An Englishwoman—Eugene—Foscari—Jennett—R. A. B.—Anna—Maria—S. C. S.—Rosalina—Inez—A Widow—G. H. E.—Beta and Clarence—Louisa Augusta—The Queen of Hearts—Annie Laurie—M. Tait—The Rose, Shamrock, and Thistle—Miss Ratcliff—Albert—Lily Spey—Heart's ease—Angusta Anna L.—Edward—H. S. L.—Georgiana—W. P.—James Duke—Mariamne—Altamont—Frederick—Augustus—Lizz—A. C.—B. B. W. C.—E. M. Clure—Bay Leaf—Ade-laide—The Lass of Richmond Hill—Annie, Lizz, and Mary—A Scholar—Charles Constance—Gertrude Von Der Wait—T. H. L.—P. A.—F. Annette—Tacitus—Bessie Burton—Glaucus—P. H.—Brython—C. W. D.—W. Lucas—A. M. S.—W. H. M.—H. Gilmore—H. R. Gibson.

London: Printed and Published for the Proprietor by GEORGE VICKERS, at the Office of "THE WEEKLY TIMES," 354, Strand, June 18, 1853.

THE LONDON JOURNAL:

And Weekly Record of Literature, Science, and Art.

No. 435.—Vol. XVII.]

FOR THE WEEK ENDING JUNE 25, 1853.

[PRICE ONE PENNY.]

[ELLEN'S PROMISE TO MEET MEERAN AND THE COLONEL IN THE LIBRARY.]

THE WILL AND THE WAY.

BY THE AUTHOR OF

"THE JESUIT," "THE PRELATE," "MINNIGREY," ETC.

CHAPTER CIL.

Now by my this day's hope, shadows to-night
Have struck more terror to the soul of Richard,
Than could the substance of ten thousand foes
Armed all in proof, led on by shallow Richmond.

SHAKESPEARE.

The belfry of Carrow Church was a lofty, square tower, built entirely of stone and flint, in the florid Gothic style, and evidently of a much later date than the rest of the sacred edifice, in which remains of the Saxon and early Norman architecture might still be traced. The belfry was divided into five storeys or chambers, accessible only by a very narrow flight of stairs, forming a part of the masonry of the north side of the tower, which was much thicker than the other three.

The upper chamber contained a small but not unmusical peal of bells; the second division was the clock-room; the third, to which no particular use was assigned, had been selected as the temporary prison of the warrenner. To judge from appearances, it was not the first time it had been employed for such a purpose: the door being of massive oak, studded with iron bosses or nails, and secured by massive bolts on the outside. The window, with the exception of a small aperture to admit the light, was walled up—so that escape or communication with any one from below were equally impossible.

The groining of the arch which ormed the ceiling sprang from four heads, one at each angle of the chamber. They had evidently been intended to represent the same number of saints, or worthies of the church. In the secluded situation in which they were placed, they were alike defended from the corrosive action of the atmosphere, and the fiery zeal of the iconoclasts of the Reformation—or, what is equally destructive, the mischievous propensities of the truant schoolboys of the present day. Their features were harsh, and sharp as when fresh from the chisel of the sculptor. A pallet and stool which had been placed in the room, formed the only furniture of the place.

At the earnest entreaty of the prisoner, who dreaded the long hours of darkness, the sexton had removed a large iron cresset from the ringers' chamber beneath. It cast a red, lurid glare round the dreary-looking chamber.

Will Sidelier had passed a night of intense anxiety and terror. His feverish snatches of uneasy slumber were broken by dreams, in which the past and present were strangely mingled. Voices whose tones had long been hushed in death, rang in his ears; and menacing eyes were fixed upon him. So strong was the delusion, that when he started from his pallet, he fancied more than once that the four heads in the angles of his chamber were gibing and scowling at him. There was a species of fascination in their gaze, which he could not shake off. His only resource was to hide his head under the clothes, and try to sleep once more.

Again the murderer dreamed. He saw himself wandering on the bank of a turbid stream, whose opposite shore was veiled in misty vapours. By an impulse he could not control, his feet seemed to be impelled towards a crazy old boat, in which a man was sitting. As he reached the spot, the ferryman extended his hand and pulled him in. In an instant the boat shot into the middle of the waters.

Then all was changed. The waters became red like blood—serpents with fiery tongues tried to dart at him from the foaming mists of the waves—the old boat turned to a coffin, and the features of the rower to those of the hangman, Mat Cows.

With a yell the prisoner awoke, and, for the first time for years, the name of his Maker escaped his polluted lips, coupled with a frantic adjuration for mercy.

An owl, whose ancestors from time immemorial had made their nest in the belfry of Carrow Church, answered the word with one of its melancholy hootings. It sounded to the excited imagination of the warrenner like the voice of a fiend mocking the tardy prayer of a too-late repentance.

"I'll sleep no more!" he said, starting from his bed, and pacing the floor of the belfry; "my dream are worse even than my waking thoughts! What do they mean," he added, "by keeping me a prisoner here—here, so near to the vault of the Mowbrays—here, with no sound to break the horrid silence, save the dull ticking of the clock above, whose iron hands measure my sands of life? They wish to drive me mad!" he said, tearing his grey hair; "and once mad, I shall confess! Better that—better that—they can't hang a madman! Tick on—tick on, iron devil!" he continued, apostrophising the clock; "I shall soon be mad—and then defy the hangman!"

Daybreak afforded to the miserable wretch no intermission from his torments. As the first ray of the glorious sun penetrated the aperture in his solitary chamber, it only served to impress him with the terrible conviction that he was one day nearer to his fate.

"I shouldn't so much mind it," he muttered, "if they would hang me anywhere but in Norwich! I have played, when a child, upon the Castle Hill, and should not like to be strung up there like a dog, with thousands of pale faces staring at me—people who knew me when a child!"

The thought that Mat Cows—whom he believed he had strangled on the night of his escape from Newgate—could not get his grip upon his throat, afforded him some slight consolation. From the instant that he learned his real name and character, he had conceived a terror as well as disgust of that cynical old man.

He forgot that there were other executioners in England besides Mat Cows.

When Joe Beans left the rectory, at the termination of the Khan's operation upon poor old Martin, he took the keys of the belfry with him, with the intention of conveying food to the prisoner. From the age of the sexton, he was afraid to trust him with the office of gaoler—so took it upon himself.

As the honest fellow, who was still very pale from the excitement he had undergone, crossed the narrow footpath through the meadows which led from the village to the church, he was startled by an old, familiar voice, calling out to him from the opposite side of the hedge:

"Holloa, Mister Beans! Beest that thee?"

He looked up, and to his astonishment recognised Red Ralph, the cow boy from Mortlake. The red-headed urchin was dressed in a new smock-frock, leathern inexpressibles, highlows and leggings. He had even been guilty of the rare extravagance of having his hair cut: an operation which he never could see the use of, although he sometimes submitted to it for appearance sake; "for," as he used to observe, "the hair wor shure to grow agin!"

"Ralph!" he exclaimed.
"Ees, it be I, sure enough! But thee beant glad to see I!"

"Indeed but am!" replied Joe; "although I can't possibly imagine what caprice brings you into these parts!"
"It worn't no caprice!" said the boy, scratching his head; "it wor the waggon! Stop a bit, and I'll tell 'ee all about it!"

So saying, he first threw his bundle and stick over the hedge, and then, taking a flying leap, bounded over it himself.

"The news!—the news!" said his friend, after he had shaken the boy by the hand.

"I'll tell 'ee," said Ralph, with a grin. "All the people in Mortlake wor after I, to tell 'em all about the old house, and what had happened there! First, master—then missus—then the folks at the King's Arms! But I promised thee to say nought about t' old man and the rats—and I didn't!"

"That was right, Ralph!"

"Thee wor kind to me," continued the boy; "and thof I might have swummed in yale, I wor mum!"

"Good!"

"Ay, good enough for missus and master, and the loikes of the folk at the King's Arms! But Squire Coddle's wife sent for I! She be a mortal curious sort of lady, and so fat! Dick, the butcher, says he'll back her to weigh a score more than the parson's sow—and that wor the wonder of the parish!"

"And what did the squire's wife say to you?" demanded Joe, with a smile—for he perfectly recollected the coarse, masculine woman who used to drive about the village, not only to the risk of her own neck, but the terror of every mother who had young children in Mortlake.

"She said I wor a pretty boy!" answered the urchin, with a grin—"but I didn't believe her—and axed I if I should like to get into service, to look arter a pair of ponies."

"Well?"

"I won't a-goin' into her service!" continued Ralph. "The last lad she had, she all but broke his neck! When her blood is up, for the matter o' that, she don't mind who she pitches into! They do say she horsewhips the squire himself when he runs restive to her vagaries! Poor old man! he be awful henpecked, for sartin!"

"But what has this to do with your journey to Norfolk?" demanded his friend, who began to grow somewhat tired of Red Ralph's prolixity.

"I'll tell 'ee: when she found she could get nothing out of I—and she axed a mint of questions—she fied in such a passion! her nose grew as red as her brandy-bottle—she ordered I out of the house, and swore she'd teach I to be impudent to one of the 'stocracy! I never knowed that wor her name afore!"

"Still you do not explain what brought you from Mortlake?"

"I be a coming to it," said the lad; "dang it, Master Joe! do give I time to tell 'ee! it wor all about a rabbit!"

"A rabbit?"

"Ees. I sold it to the tailor's wife, and Squire Shrimpsley's wife made him swear I poached un. I thought w' a good word from you I might get work down in these parts—so I gave constable the slip, and here I be!"

"Well, Ralph," said his friend, shaking him by the hand, "if it was not the bravest, it was perhaps the wisest step you could have taken! There is no fear of getting you work at Carrow."

"Thank 'ee!" said the boy.

"But how did you find me out?"

Ralph gave one of his merry grins.

"Will 'ee be angry if I tell 'ee?"

"Angry? No!"

"Well, then, I got it out of lawyer's boy. The fine chaps in the office refused to tell I—so I watched for un as he took the letters to post office: and sure enough one wor directed for Mr. Joe Beans, Carrow, Norwich, Norfolk."

"I thought, Ralph," observed Joe, struck by his acuteness, "that you could not read?"

"More I can."

"How, then, did you contrive to make out the address?"

"Lawyer's boy could read," replied the urchin, with a knowing wink; "and that wor enough for I. But if so be thee beest ashamed of I," he added, with a serious look, "I won't stay to be a disgrace to 'ee! I have gotten three guineas in gowd in my waistband, and can look further for work!"

His friend assured him that nothing could be further from his feelings than such a weakness, and that he would do anything in his power to prevent his regretting the change from his native village. If you are not tired," he added, "you shall walk with me: you once invited me to see your trap—I will show you mine!"

"What! hast 'ee got un agin?"

Joe nodded.

"I should like to see un hanged!" exclaimed the boy, as his little, deep-set, ferret-like eyes sparkled spitefully at the recollection of his own narrow escape from the warren: "I should like to see un hanged!"

In which very natural wish his companion assured him he was most likely to be gratified.

On mounting to the prison-chamber of the murderer, Joe found him crouched down in one corner of the room. Much as he disliked the man and his crimes, he could not avoid something like a sentiment of pity when he beheld his blood-shot eyes, pale features, and haggard look. It seemed as if the events of the last few days had added ten years to his age: his hair was evidently whiter, and his whole person meagre and wretched.

"I have brought you some food," said Joe, setting down the little basket he carried.

"I don't want food!" replied Will Sidelers, sullenly; "it is drink that I require!"

His visitor observed that there was plenty of water in the cell.

"Water!" exclaimed the ruffian, passionately; "it's brandy I want! Would you give ice to a man with the ague, fire to the patient with a fever? Besides, I hate water—loathe it!"

"I am sorry I can procure you nothing else."

"Hang you and your sorrow too!" interrupted the old man, who began to recover something of his former tone; "I shall soon be sent back to Newgate, I suppose—I can get what I want there!"

"I don't think, Will Sidelers," said Joe, seriously, "that you will ever see Newgate again."

"Where will they send me to, then?"

"Norwich Castle."

The warren shuddered; his worst suspicions were confirmed: he felt assured that some clue had been discovered to the murder of Sir William Mowbray.

"They dare not keep me here!" he exclaimed, with passionate energy; "I was committed to Newgate for an attempt upon old Elworthy's life! They can't hang me for that: an attempt—only an attempt! I must insist upon being sent back: I shall go mad if they keep me here!"

"Will," said the young man, seriously, "poor old Martin has recovered his senses!"

The intelligence produced an effect similar to that of a powerful electric shock upon the prisoner. For an instant he stood as if suddenly transformed to stone; then trembled violently in every limb, whilst the muscles of his iron visage became painfully agitated.

"My dream!" he said. "I shall swing like a dog, where I played so often as a child! I am struck down at last!"

With frantic violence he threw himself upon the ground, a prey to the combined agonies of remorse and terror.

At this moment the door of the chamber was gently opened, and Red Ralph, who had been listening all the while at the top of the stairs, pushed in his rough, shaggy head.

"Joe's trap be worse than mine!" he said. "Thee hadst better ha' given theeseelf comfortably up to the rats!"

"Let us leave him," said the young man; "a hand stronger than ours is upon him—he cannot escape its gripe!"

"I hope it be the hangman's, then!" growled the boy, as his companion locked the door of the chamber. After which they left the belfry together.

CHAPTER CIII.

Dark gathering clouds herald the coming storm.
HEARDONE.

COLONEL MOWBRAY began to feel heartily tired, though not ashamed, of the part he was acting towards his niece. The death of his brother had placed him in such a position, with respect to his worldly circumstances, that he had no longer the temptation of necessity to excuse his unprincipled conduct. Still he did not retract; two things restrained him: the first was the evil counsels of his wife; the second, the confession of his infamy, which, to avoid exposure, he had signed at the dictation of Meeran Hafaz, and which the young Indian had promised to restore to him the instant the ceremony was completed which made him the husband of Ellen.

Her uncle had long since decided that he would have it before the marriage, or it should never take place with his consent. He was a cool, systematic man of the world, and had reasons for insisting on the point; he had just been considering in his own mind how best to break this resolution to his guest, when the latter, still irritated and vexed from his interview with the ayah, entered the apartment.

"What is the matter?" said the colonel, in his usually quiet tone; "you seem vexed?"

"No!"

"Angry, then?"

"Nor angry," replied the young man; "although I confess I feel surprised—for I have found weakness where I expected only to encounter strength; treachery, where I could have pledged my life I should only meet with fidelity!"

The colonel shrugged his shoulders, and assured him that it was the way of the world.

"Of your world, possibly," observed Meeran; "but not of mine!"

"Ha! I see!" exclaimed his confederate, with a look of surprise; "I see—you allude to the ayah: is it possible, after all, that Lady Mowbray was right? I deemed her suspicions mere caprice or the ebullition of temper; but no matter—here we are secure from interruption: the only man whose presence would be dangerous, is far from England!"

"I trust so!" exclaimed the young Indian, with a bitter smile; "and yet it is strange I have not lately heard from Martingale!"

"He did employ him, then!" thought the colonel; then, speaking aloud, he added: "I have procured the licence, as you desired: to-morrow evening I expect the Reverend Mr. Twintext. He is in full orders, and a person on whom we can rely."

"To-morrow, then," said Meeran, his countenance flushed with joy, "Ellen will be mine!"

"To-morrow!" repeated his friend.

There was a pause: each regarded the other for some moments in silence.

"Why the deuce don't you speak, Mowbray?" demanded his friend—who saw at a glance that something was working in the mind of the colonel; "you forget I am not accustomed to your European diplomacy!"

"It might take a lesson," observed the uncle of Ellen,

"from that of the East! In Europe it is but the undermining of the mole; in India it resembles the gliding of the serpent. But enough of diplomacy—I will speak out, since you wish it. I am naturally frank in my proceedings!"

The speaker's allusion to his frankness put Meeran Hafaz instantly upon his guard: on the same principle that the alarm made by the rattlesnake alarms the hunter.

"Well, then," said the young man, with a scornful smile, "what has your frankness to dictate or propose?"

"I think you will admit," began the colonel, "that I have done everything in my power to advance your success with my niece?"

"I have nothing to complain of."

"In fact, that I have consented to measures which few uncles would agree to?"

"Granted!"

"Lady Mowbray's disinterestedness—"

"Pshaw!" exclaimed the young man, interrupting him. "We will discuss one point at a time, if you please! Her ladyship's disinterestedness and your candour are more than my poor logic can grapple with at once! What is it that you require?"

"A certain paper," replied his friend, perfectly unmoved by the covert sneer contained in his speech, "which you may remember you promised should be delivered up."

"Upon my marriage with Ellen!" said Meeran, impatiently; "together with a renunciation of her fortune. Both the papers are ready. You can peruse the last," he added, "and satisfy yourself that it is binding—not a loophole for avarice or chicanery to creep out of. As for the first, I need not remind Colonel Mowbray of its contents, since—if my memory serves me rightly—he wrote every word himself!"

As he spoke, he drew from his pocket-book two papers, one of which he handed to his confederate, who—after perusing it with a business-like air—placed it in a desk, which he carefully locked.

"Is it satisfactory?" demanded the speaker.

"Perfectly!"

"Anything more?"

"Only the second paper."

"When the compact is fulfilled!" exclaimed Meeran, haughtily. "Do you think I am a child, to be gulled out of the only security I hold for the fulfilment of your promise? Never! the instant Ellen is my wife, I pledge myself that the paper shall be yours!"

"It must be mine before!" said the colonel, in a tone of cool determination; "the possession of the second paper alone can render the first of any value to me: whilst you retain it, it enables you to compel me at any time to cancel the renunciation of my niece's fortune."

The young man started to his feet, and gazed upon him with an expression of mingled scorn and surprise.

"Is it possible," he said, "that you think me capable of such baseness?"

"I am a man of the world!" was the reply.

"True! of the civilised world!" retorted the Indian, bitterly; "and your wisdom has been drawn from its worst school!"

"And where yours?" demanded his confederate.

"From nature! from the untamed passions of my soul from my vices, if you will! But, bad as they are, they are virtues compared with yours! Were Ellen steeped to the very lips in poverty—as abject in the world's opinion as she is raised above it—my heart would but be knit the closer to her. I have sinned," he added; "but those who have felt like me alone can judge me! At least, I have had no mercenary motive."

A deep-drawn sigh startled both the speakers. Meeran instantly sprang to the door, which he threw wide open. He could see no one, and yet his eye commanded a view both of the hall and great staircase.

"Strange!" he muttered.

Colonel Mowbray looked very pale.

"Pshaw!" continued the young man; "it must have been our imagination or the wind which deceived us! It whistles through these old walls as through a broken tomb! Colonel!" he continued, seeing that his friend still appeared sullen and dissatisfied, "answer me one question, and the paper this instant shall be yours."

"Willingly!"

"Have you any other motive than the one you have alleged for desiring to obtain possession of it?"

"I swear by my honour, none!"

Although Meeran thought that he might have sworn a more appropriate oath, he made no further observation, but drew it once more from his pocket-book. The eyes of the colonel sparkled with cupidty.

"Once in your hands, you will perform all that you have promised?"

"To the very letter! How else can I secure my niece's fortune?"

"Take it!" said the young man, placing it in his hand.

"I see I have misjudged you: the hold upon your avarice is as binding as the tie upon your honour!"

There was a knock at the library door.

"Come in!" exclaimed the young man, throwing himself upon a sofa.

The next instant Lady Mowbray entered the apartment. She came to announce the arrival of the valet who had been directed to accompany the warren to Marseilles, and see him safely embarked for India. After the capture of his charge, he had nothing to do but take the next packet for England. Knowing the fiery temper of his master, he trembled to appear before him.

"You seem amazed, my love?" observed the colonel, who had just locked the second paper in his desk; "what has occurred?"

"An arrival," answered the lady.

"An arrival?" repeated both the gentlemen, with surprise—for they imagined their visit to Carrow unknown to every one.

"Victor," said her ladyship, "has returned."

At the name of his valet, Meeran Hafaz started from his recumbent position. There was something in the intelligence to alarm him—for he knew the fellow to be not only faithful to him, but unscrupulous—provided, of course, that he were well paid for his villainies—and he had paid him with more than Eastern liberality.

"Where is he?" he demanded.

"In the breakfast-room."

Without a word, the impetuous youth sprang past her to seek his baffled agent.

"Positively, my love," said her ladyship, "this Meeran grows insufferable! Thank heaven, once married, we shall be quit of him!"

A loud noise of mingled expostulations and curses was heard in the breakfast-room.

"For heaven's sake go with me!" exclaimed the speaker, "or there will be murder done!"

After once more trying his desk, to satisfy himself that it was secure, he accompanied her from the library.

On entering the breakfast-room, they found Meeran Hafaz pacing the floor like a caged tiger, and the valet crouching in a corner where his master had dashed him.

"It was not my fault!" exclaimed the terrified wretch, as soon as he saw the colonel and Lady Mowbray; "indeed it was not—it was all Mr. Ashton's doing!"

"What has happened?"

"My rival has returned!" exclaimed the young Indian.

"More—he encountered the warren and this idiot, whom I trusted, at Calais, and contrived to get the former on board the packet: that is what has happened!"

"Will Siderer, then, be in England?" observed the colonel, with an uneasy look.

"Ay!"

"And Henry Ashton?"

"With him!" continued Meeran. "Perhaps, after all, it is better as it is! I would not win my bride without a struggle! Ellen once mine, I can laugh at fate, and defy its malice! I lacked excitement," he added, "and this has given it me! The thick, damp air of England has chilled my blood, till it oozed, like stagnant water, through my veins—it comes freely now!"

His confederate did not think it better as it was. The return of our hero seriously alarmed him, and he secretly congratulated himself that he had secured the paper before the messenger of ill fortune had arrived.

"I must see Ellen!" said the young Indian.

"Not now!"

"Now!" he repeated, firmly. "The sight of her will calm my brain and still its throbbings: even in boyhood her voice could control my wayward humours! It must be this night!" he added, "grasping Mowbray by the arm; 'She must be mine to-night!'"

"Impossible!" replied the colonel; "you forget that, although we have the licence, Twine-text will not be at Carrow till to-morrow!"

"To-morrow!" uttered Meeran, with a sigh; "I shall never be able to endure this agony of the heart and brain till then!"

Without waiting for a reply, he left the breakfast-room, followed by his confederate: they directed their steps towards the chamber of the prisoner.

CHAPTER CIV.

Eternal Hope! when yonder spheres sublime
Peal'd their first notes to sound the march of time,
Thy joyous youth began. But not to fade,
When all thy sister planets have decayed.
When wrapt in fire the worlds of ether glow,
And heaven's own thunders shake the world below,
Thou, undimay'd, shall o'er the ruin smile,
And light thy torch at Nature's funeral pile.

CAMPBELL.

WHAT a happy thing it is for humanity that, in youth and age alike, Hope is the last friend to desert us. The shipwrecked mariner clings to it as firmly as to the solitary plank which alone sustains him on the boisterous wave—the lost traveller in the desert believes that the next instant he shall hear its voice in the patient camel's bells—the neglected wife dreams of the return of her estranged husband's love—the anxious mother sees it in the hectic flush upon the cheek of her expiring child, mistaking it for the flush of health. Hope, like a pitying angel, smiles upon our cradle—cheers us through the rugged path of life—and, like a friend whose enduring fidelity no reverse can shake, descends with us to the grave.

From the altered manner of the ayah, Ellen saw the struggle of remorse and affection in her heart; and it brought back to her own heart the long absent hope. She knew the courage and indomitable energy of her nurse, and doubted not that, if she once formed the resolution, she would find the means to save her. Had the contest been with Lady Mowbray, or her unworthy uncle, alone she could have calmly awaited the result. All she doubted was, the counterbalance of Zara's devotion to her foster-son.

The captive girl was pouring forth her soul in prayer when the ayah returned to her chamber. She observed with surprise that her looks were troubled; for the Indian woman was not one who wore her heart upon her face.

Zara carefully drew the night-bolt after she had closed the door. Approaching her foster child, she took her hand, and, fixing her dark eyes upon her pale features, whispered, in her low, musical voice:

"Meeran has arrived."

A chill—a perceptible shudder—ran through the veins of Ellen.

"But fear not!" continued the woman, calmly; "I will save you!"

"Nurse! my own true, kind nurse!" exclaimed the captive, throwing herself into the arms of the ayah, and sobbing like a child upon her bosom; "I know you now! Oh! what a fearful time you have been changed to me! The past appears to me as a hideous dream. Often and often have I told Henry that, despite appearances, despite your love for —"

"Curse him!" interrupted Zara, firmly. "He has passed like an ill-omened shadow between the only beings that I love; but for him we might have all been happy—happy in India! I shall never see it more!" she added, with a sigh.

At the imprecation upon her lover, Ellen shrank from her, and regarded her with a doubtful expression.

"Forgive me!" continued her nurse; "it was but a momentary weakness. I recall the words—and that is something for a temper like mine! If I cannot bless, I ought not to curse the being that preserved your life—the man you love!"

"You will love him, too!" said her foster-child, once more twining her arms around her, and reposing her head upon her breast.

"Never! never!"

The words were checked by the glance of Ellen, and the second "never" died upon the lips of the speaker.

"For my sake, Zara!"

"For your sake," replied the woman, "I will not hate him! Ellen," she said, "can you listen to words which will recall the life-blood to your heart—the light to your dimmed eyes—and yet betray no mark of joy—suffer no sign by which the curious eye of jealousy can guess that you possess the knowledge?"

"What mean you?" gasped, rather than uttered, the persecuted girl.

"Henry Ashton has returned!"

A cry like the broken murmur of a wounded dove broke from the lips of Ellen. The words of the ayah did indeed recall the life-blood to her heart—for it beat like a fluttered bird's against the bars of its prison.

"Is he well?" she faltered.

"Well," repeated Zara; "but you do not ask if he is faithful."

"I never doubted that," replied the orphan; "not even your lips could persuade me that Henry could prove unworthy of my love! But, Meeran," she added, and the joyous expression of her features changed to one of terror; "does Meeran know of his return?"

"He does."

"Then he will murder him!" she exclaimed, wringing her hands; "murder him, as he did my generous, noble uncle! warn him, guard him," she added, clinging to her nurse, "as you would guard the life of your poor child! the hand of his enemy fails not twice!"

"I will both warn and save him," replied the woman; "but if you would have him find you worthy of his love —"

"He will find me worthy," interrupted Ellen, if he finds me living!"

"You must dissemble!" added the ayah.

"Dissemble?"

"To-morrow night," continued the nurse, "is fixed for your marriage—they have bribed one of their false priests to perform the ceremony. Meeran will soon be here—every instant I expect to hear his step on the stairs. He is mad, Ellen—mad with jealousy, disappointment, and unrequited love: you, who know his passionate nature—the fire which consumes him—can guess from the past of what he is capable!"

"He can only take my life!" said the orphan, firmly; "I can guard my honour!"

"By the sacrifice of life!" answered Zara; "think you I did not miss the weapon from my side, or was too dull to guess the purpose for which it had been taken? Temptation with him, Ellen. When they call upon you to descend to the library, comply—at the very moment of the sacrifice I will redeem you: it is your only hope!"

"My only hope?" repeated Ellen.

"At least," exclaimed the ayah, "it is mine! you would not force me," she added, with increased agitation, "to shed the blood of him whom I nurtured, when a child, at my breast! Drive me not to it, lest at the moment my arm and courage fail me, and you are lost!"

At this moment the voice of Meeran Hafaz was heard in the picture-gallery, asking Colonel Mowbray for the key of the chamber. At the dreaded sound, Ellen clung to the ayah, beseeching her not to leave her.

"Follow my counsel," said Zara, "and you are safe; at all events, you are armed against dishonour."

So saying, she slid from her embrace, and crouched down behind the draperies of the toilette, but not till she had withdrawn the bolt.

"True," resumed the orphan, recalled by the words of her nurse to something like self-possession; "even the malice of Meeran cannot pursue me further than the grave!"

Seating herself as near as possible to the spot where the ayah was concealed, she awaited the visit of her persecutor, who entered the chamber directly afterwards, accompanied by Colonel Mowbray. Much as she loathed the sight of her worldly-minded and ungenerous uncle, his presence appeared a protection at that moment.

The countenance of the young Indian became comparatively calm, and his eye lost its fierce expression, as he gazed upon the features of his victim: he approached her with a subdued and almost gentle air.

"Ellen!" he said, "it is not thus that we should meet!"

"How else," replied the orphan, mournfully, "can the oppressed and the oppressor meet? Did you expect to see me, when my heart is crushed, with smiles upon my lips? Alas!" she added with a sigh, "it is long, very long, Meeran, since your cruelty banished them!"

The colonel yawned, and took a chair: the conversation had taken rather too slow a turn for him.

"Ellen," said her former playmate, "do not drive me, by this studied, cold contempt, to despair—force me not to become a thing I loathe to contemplate! I love you—love you with the passionate idolatry of my nature! Your image possesses my soul so entirely, that it knows no other dream, no other hope! You loved me once!"

"As a brother, yes," meekly answered the orphan: "it is not my fault that you have changed the feeling to —"

"Hatred?" exclaimed Meeran, wildly; "do not, Ellen, for your own sake, say to hatred, lest you unchain the evil spirit in me! I have borne much—I can bear much from you—but not the avowal of your hate!"

"I pity more than hate you!"

"Bless you!" he continued—"bless you for that word! Would I could induce you to recall the recollection of our youthful days—our childish love and confidence! With you, the impression was a transitory one; not so with me! Like the impress stamped by nature upon the hardened granite, you must destroy my being ere you efface it!"

"Would that my tears could soften it!" observed Ellen, mildly. "Oh, Hafaz! Why seek a love which never can be yours? Why blight the light of my existence? Would your heart feel happier because it had broken mine?"

"Ellen!" said the colonel, "it is time to end this folly! By nature, as well as the laws of England, I am your natural guardian!"

"I know it, uncle!" sighed the orphan.

"This will you do!" he continued, coldly. "I have disposed of your hand to my friend here. The Chancellor sanctions the marriage; I command it! To-morrow night you will be united, in the presence of Lady Mowbray and myself!"

She was about to pronounce a refusal; but there was an expression in the eye of Meeran which froze the words upon her lips.

"He will claim a joyless bride!" she said—"a very joyless one!"

"But still a bride!" exclaimed the young man, sinking upon his knee, and clasping her cold hand in his. "Bless you, Ellen—bless you, even for such cold consent!"

"Consent!" she faltered. "Have I consented?"

"No matter, love, for words! A life of devotion shall woo the truant smile back to your cheek! I will be your slave, Ellen! anticipate each wish—guard you from every care! My mother, too—she whom you love—will welcome you as the preserver of her son!"

"Meeran—Meeran!" interrupted the agitated girl, "I cannot dissemble, or teach my tongue to lie! I cannot break the faith I have plighted to another! I know not what despair or madness may drive me to; but never will my heart pronounce the vow your cruelty would force my lips to utter!"

Terrified at the consequence of the avowal which the horror of deceit had wrung from her, she hid her face in her hands, and sobbed convulsively.

Meeran would have given the world to have dried those tears; but felt that the only sacrifice by which he could have done so was beyond his resolution.

"She yields!" whispered the colonel, with a sneer. "I told you how long her heroics would hold out!"

The youth felt as if he could have crushed him.

"Ellen," he continued, "there is not a tear from those sweet eyes which does not fall like a drop of molten lead upon my heart! A life of devotion shall atone them; and you will pardon, in after years, the violence of the passion which consumes me!"

The orphan remained silent.

"Say that you consent!" he continued, dropping his voice to a whisper. "If not in words, a look—a sign will be sufficient! No reply! Ellen, only promise that you will meet me in the library!"

"That I can promise!" said the maiden, rising slowly from her chair. "And now leave me, unless you wish to see me die with terror at your feet! I would be alone," she added; "alone with my own thoughts and heaven, to ask its consolation and pardon for the resolution I have taken!"

Meeran, who little suspected that the resolution the persecuted girl alluded to was self-destruction, rather than a broken vow to her lover or the risk of dishonour, naturally concluded that she alluded to the promise which he fancied he had obtained. He became almost frantic in his expressions of gratitude and delight; and, despite the scarcely repressed shudder of his victim, pressed her hand repeatedly to his burning lips.

"Leave me!" she sobbed, "if you have any pity for the wreck you have made!"

His companion drew him reluctantly from the apartment. So transported was he at the imaginary prospect of calling Ellen his, that his usual judgment deserted him. He had deceived himself; the persecuted girl only permitted him to do so.

"By heavens!" said the colonel, "but you are more like a great boy than the cool, resolute fellow who once baffled me!" He alluded to the affair of the dice. "As impressionable as a love-sick girl!"

The young man silently shook him off. He longed to be alone, to commune with himself; the presence of the worthless instrument he had used was hateful to him.

"All's well that ends well!" continued the speaker, looking after him; "the consent of Ellen spares us both an unpleasant alternative!"

With these words, he directed his steps towards the library, with the intention of destroying the important paper which he had so lately obtained from Meeran. When he entered the apartment, the desk was gone. Overcome with surprise and consternation, he sank into a chair.

CHAPTER CV.

Plain words bespeak plain deeds; truth wears no mask—
It sullies it. CREON.

FARMER ASHTON awaited with considerable impatience or the promised visit of the Khan; for, although he could not doubt that his motives in restoring old Martin—the only witness of the murder of Sir William Mowbray—to reason were good, still he wished to be assured upon the point. Independent of the strong interest which he felt in the happiness of his nephew, he had another motive: he had recognised in the person of the renegade—changed as he was by time and absence—his long-lost brother.

It required no little tact on the part of the worthy farmer to baffle the curiosity of his wife, and explain why he must sit up to a later hour than was usual with him, and his reasons for being alone. Fortunately the good dame had no spark of jealousy in her composition.

As the hour drew near, Matthew left the house, and wandered up the lane which led to the common. He knew that his visitor must pass that way. He had not long to wait: just as he reached the middle of the lane, he heard a heavy, measured step approaching in an opposite direction.

It was the Khan. By a mutual impulse they grasped each other's hand, and pronounced the names, Philip and Matthew.

"You know me, then?" said the renegade.

"From the instant I heard your voice," replied the farmer. "I might have been deceived by your features—for faces change with time, and my eyes are somewhat dim; but my heart leaped at the sound of your voice—that could not deceive me!"

For some time they continued to walk, side by side, in silence.

"Philip," said the farmer, "you have seen your son?"

"I have seen him," replied his long-absent brother, "and cannot sufficiently thank you for your kindness to the poor abandoned boy. You have done your duty by him, Matthew; not only generously, but wisely; more wisely, perhaps, than if you had known —"

He suddenly stopped, as if he had uttered more than he intended.

"Known what?"

"Nothing—nothing!" said the Khan; "he is all," he added, with a sigh, "that a father's heart could wish!"

"You may say that, Philip!" answered the old man, proudly; for nothing was more pleasing to his ear than the praise of his adopted son; "though the merit is not altogether mine—Dr. Orme has been his tutor."

"I know—I know!"

"I hope thee dost not intend to take him from us, away to India!" continued his brother. "I have heard that thee beest rich, and may be ashamed of having a simple farmer for thee brother!"

"I am not rich!" coolly answered the Khan.

This was a great relief to the heart of the worthy uncle of our hero: not from a feeling of envy—on the contrary, he would have rejoiced at the prosperity of his brother—but that it lessened the distance between them.

"Thank God!" he muttered.

"That I am poor?"

"No, Philip—not exactly for that; though riches do not make happiness! The farm has prospered with me. I have enough, and more than enough, for all of us; but were it less, I could share it with you!"

His brother silently grasped his hand.

"Do you think Harry has any suspicion," continued the old man, "that he is your son?"

"I am sure he has not," was the reply; "and for the present, for many reasons, do not wish him to be informed of it: that was my reason for appointing to meet you here alone!"

Matthew Ashton was puzzled: he could not understand how a parent possessed of such a son as his idol Harry could restrain the natural yearnings of his heart, and treat him as a stranger. An unpleasant suspicion, which made him tremble for the future happiness of our hero, caused him suddenly to stop short in his walk.

"Philip," he said, "I be not curious—but the love I bear the boy gives me a right to speak. I hope thee acted like an honest man to Harry's mother?"

"Like a coward and a villain to her!" groaned the renegade.

"God forgive thee, Philip—God forgive thee!" uttered the farmer, with a groan. "I have often misdoubted it—for neither dame nor I ever heard of thee being married! So, after all, poor Harry is a —"

"You misunderstand me!" interrupted his brother, impatiently. "Whatever my faults, I have not that sin to answer for: Henry was born in lawful marriage."

Never had the delighted Matthew felt a deeper glow of satisfaction than at this declaration of his brother. Satisfied on this one point, he inquired no further.

"I am glad thee beest come back!" he said, with a frank expression of contentment; "thee knowest the world better than I do: though I have been twice to London, and once as far as York!"

"Humanity," observed the Khan, "is much the same, whether in Europe or Asia, a great city or a village: circumstances modify, but rarely change it; its vices and virtues resemble each other closely."

"Likely—likely!" said the farmer, who did not feel perfectly assured that he understood his brother.

"But why at this particular juncture, Matthew?" inquired the Khan.

"I'll tell you," said the old man; "two or three days since, Chettieborough, the sexton, called upon me at the farm: thee must remember him—he wor a tall, gaunt-looking man, when we wor boys?"

"I recollect him perfectly," answered the renegade.

"He came to tell me that poor Martin, whom the rector had placed under his care, had several nights given him the slip, and, he had every reason to believe, made his way to the abbey."

"I see—I see!"

"But that wor not all: from his excited ravings on his return, he had further reason to suppose that poor Sir William's niece, Miss Ellen De Vere, was a prisoner, brought there for some infernal purpose."

His brother reflected for a moment.

"Matthew," he said, "have you named this to Harry?"

"No."

"Or any one else?"

"Not to a creature. Once I did think of trusting Joe Beans with it—but he is so fond of his young master, that, right or wrong, he would be sure to let the secret escape him."

"Everything depends upon the recovery of Martin," observed Philip Ashton, musingly.

"That may be a long time," said his brother; "and if poor Miss Ellen be really there, something ought to be done at once: Harry would never forgive me if anything should happen to the girl he loves; and I," added the old man, feelingly, "should never forgive myself! What had I better do? tell him, or —"

"Not as you value his life!" interrupted the Khan; "his enemy combines with the strength of the tiger the subtlety of the serpent; he is bound by no law save his evil passions, and regards human life as a straw in his path, so little does he reckon of sacrificing it! Leave him to me!"

"To you, Philip?"

"Yes, I alone possess the means to disarm him. Rest assured of one thing—that I will watch over Ellen's safety, for her own—for Henry's sake!"

"Thee wilt want help, Philip?"

"Nor help nor witness, Matthew!" answered the renegade; "both would defeat my purpose! Like the mole, I must work in darkness, and alone!"

"It be queer work, that!" observed his brother, doubtfully; "I do not quite understand you; for my poor part, I have always thought that work of any kind, especially farming, was best done in the light of heaven; but thee knowest best!"

"Neither doubt my prudence nor my regard for your nephew!" said the renegade.

"Regard, Philip! that be a cold word, when speaking of thine own son! love would have been better!"

"Love be it, then!" replied his brother, impatiently; "by twelve in the morning you must be at the rectory!"

"What for?"

"The magistrates will meet there to receive the declaration of Martin. His lips may name the assassin of his master—for he alone was present."

"But can he?"

"Assuredly!"

"Hast thee really restored the old man to his senses?" demanded the farmer; "Oh, Philip, Philip, thee hast won strange knowledge! When we wor boys together, thee wor as simple and ignorant as I am! How didst 'ee learn it all?"

"By suffering!" replied the Khan. "Farewell! I must to the abbey!"

"The doors are all barred!"

"I do not seek to enter it!"

"Windows closed!" urged the farmer, whose affection for his new-found brother trembled at the thought of his exposing himself to the revenge of the terrible enemy he had named.

"I have lived with the Indian and the savage," answered the renegade; "and can read a sign where others would only see a withered leaf on a broken flower. Trust to my prudence: remember," he added, impressively, "that for three days you have promised to keep from Henry Ashton the tie between us!"

"Three days, did I promise? Well, I suppose I did. It will be a hard task, and still harder to keep it from my dame—but I must even try!"

"And now farewell!" said his brother, shaking him warmly by the hand; "if I live, I will repay your kindness as a brother should do; if I fall, it will be in the performance of an act of duty, and my death will pay a heavier debt than thine!"

"Don't talk of dying, Philip!" exclaimed the farmer; "when thee hast a son like Henry and a brother to welcome thee! And as for debt, only prove a kind father to Harry, and all I have ever done for him and thee will be well repaid!"

Without answering, the Khan once more pressed the honest hand which he retained in his grasp, and set forward on his way to the abbey.

"I cannot understand him!" sighed his brother. "I cannot understand him yet!"

(To be continued in our next.)

A FESTIVAL IN SUMATRA.

ON the following day we reached the uta, or village, of Hali Bomar, in whose house I remained till the third day. A buffalo calf was killed to do honour to the stranger, and I was obliged to be present at the slaughtering; which took place, with the accompaniment of music and dancing. The flowing blood having been carefully collected, they cut the carcass in many pieces, and presented me with the liver placed on a plate, as the most delicious part of the animal. Upon this they performed a strange ceremony, very little to my taste, but well intended after all, since it was calculated to propitiate one of their evil spirits. These are the only superior beings whom they worship, because they fear them; while the good ones remained unnoticed, because, they not being bent on doing mischief, there is no occasion to conciliate them. In this instance the evil spirits were made propitious with water and rice-cakes. Two young men opened the dances; and after they had amused the public for awhile with their antics, the elder one seized a buffalo horn filled with water, and, without ceasing to take part in the dance, raised it several times above his head with a mien as if he were beseeching the heavenly powers to bless the contents. Suddenly he poured a portion of the water out against me, another against the musicians, and the rest against the people. He then did the same with a quantity of rice and some small rice-cakes, of which he presented me one on a plate. Shortly afterwards, they exhibited their skill in a sort of dance, with which they generally celebrate public executions, but on this occasion it was performed in my honour. A "sarang," representing a man, having been tied to a pole, which stood for a tree, they danced round it to the measure of their music. After awhile, one of the performers, leaping from the ring, pierced the figure of the fettered man with his parang, or cutlass, and was followed by a second and a third, till the whole set had plunged their swords in the body of the supposed victim. He who deals the first blow enjoys some privileges in eating the dead body. The victim being considered to be dead, they made the pantomime of cutting off his head; then they placed the head of the buffalo-calf on the top of the figure, and continued their wild gyrations round the body. From time to time a performer, leaving the ring, seized the head and sucked the blood which dropped from the severed neck; while others, throwing themselves over a mat on which the head had been lying, greedily licked the gore with which it was covered. There was nothing wild or passionate in their looks, but they appeared to be in excellent humour, as if they amused themselves vastly. Whenever a real criminal or prisoner is put to death in this manner, the Rajah receives the nose, ears, and under-part of the feet, as the most delicious parts; next to which the cheeks, the palm of the hand, and the liver are most esteemed.—Madame Pfeiffer.

WORK!

BY CHARLES SWAIN

Attend, oh Man,
Uplift the banner of thy kind,
Advance the ministry of mind,
The mountain height is free to climb,
Toil on—MAN'S heritage is TIME!
Toil on!

Work on and win!—
Life without work is unenjoyed;
The happiest are the best employed!—
Work moves and moulds the mightiest birth,
And grasps the destinies of earth!
Work on!

Work sows the seed;
Even the rock may yield its flower,—
No lot so hard, but human power
Exerted to one end and aim,
May conquer fate, and capture fame!
Press on!

Press onward still;
In nature's centre lives the fire
That slow, though sure, doth yet aspire;
Through fathoms deep of mould and clay
It splits the rocks that bar its way!
Press on!

If nature then
Lay tame beneath her weight of earth,
When would her hidden fire know birth?—
Thus Man, through granite Fate, must find
The path—the upward path—of Mind!
Work on!

Pause not in fear;
Preach no desponding, servile view,—
Whate'er thou wilt thy WILL may do!
Strengthen each manly nerve to bend
Truth's bow, and bid its shaft ascend!
Toil on!

Be firm of heart;
By fusion of unnumber'd years
A Continent its vastness rears!
A drop, 'tis said, through flint will wear;
Toil on, and nature's conquest share!
Toil on!

Within thyself
Bright morn, and noon, and night succeed;
Power, feeling, passion, thought, and deed;
Harmonious beauty prompts thy breast,—
Things angels love, and God hath blest!
Work on!

Work on and win!
Shall light from nature's depths arise,
And thou, whose mind can grasp the skies,
Sit down with fate, and idly rail?
No—onward! Let the Truth prevail!
Work on!

TO YOUNG LADIES.—"I have found," says Addison, "that the men who are really the most fond of the ladies, who cherish for them the highest respect, are seldom the most popular with the sex. Men of great assurance, whose tongues are lightly hung, who make words supply the place of ideas, and place compliment in the room of sentiment, are their favourites. A due respect for women leads to respectful action towards them; and respect is mistaken by them for neglect or want of interest."

[THE WILMINGTON SQUARE SCHOOLS OF DESIGN.]

THE SCHOOLS OF DESIGN, WILMINGTON SQUARE.

ART in this country has had to struggle with every difficulty; and, as a consequence, all our great artists, like our great mathematicians and astronomers, were self-taught. Their genius had to struggle through all the gloom of poverty, and that still worse gloom—that Stygian darkness—discouragement. Had it not been for the patronage of the noble and wealthy, there would certainly have been no English school of painting. The institutions of the land, down to a recent period, ignored the fine arts. Painting and sculpture did not harmonise with their scope and bearing; and therefore they were left to develop themselves, unsupported by any educational system—unsustained in their pure aims by any national sentiment. Like Topsy, “they grewed,” in despite of every adverse circumstance; and now, after the lapse of a century and a half, with some insignificant as well as tardily-bestowed help from the state, the English schools of painters and sculptors are confessedly the first in Europe.

This non-appreciation of the most humanising of the arts was, to say the least of it, singular, in a country which had risen to greatness solely through its commerce and manufactures, and would only have been a third or fourth-rate power, without the multiplication of the latter by steam power, and their improvement by art.

But so it was. The manufactures of England were rather taxed than promoted by the now happily discarded policy that prevailed in high places. They were snubbed by parvenus, and affectedly contemned by those who mingled in what were called the polite circles. And all this while the increase in our manufactures was doubling the rents of the land; and, by creating a larger social system, enabling the parvenu tribe to spring up like mushrooms—some out of casks of tallow, others out of a coal-pit, or an iron tract.

The manufacturers, however, were too hardy and wealthy a race to be extinguished by the sneers of the high-born or the insolence of the vulgar. They had an empire at their feet, and, knowing that, they found they could best succeed by persisting in a course of sturdy independence. But although they could surmount nearly every difficulty, there was one which they never could entirely overcome—and that was the deficiency in taste and character which marked all their designs. They were far behind their continental neighbours in their application of the fine arts to the articles of utility they produced. Their forms and patterns lacked taste and finish. They were marked by great poverty of invention. Attempts to remedy this serious drawback were made from time to time—but scarcely any of them produced any beneficial results. The self-taught system, by limiting the number of its proficient to a very few, could not meet the demands made upon it by various branches of manufactures that doubled their operations in ten years; and the manufacturers, for the great bulk of their printed goods, were obliged to use the only patterns they could obtain. At length local schools were established—and, better than all, that excellent man and public benefactor, the late Dr. Birkbeck, began lecturing to the working classes on natural philosophy, and its application to the useful arts. Out of his labours arose the Glasgow Mechanics’ Institution, then the Edinburgh one; the London one followed; and we believe to Liverpool belongs the honour of being the fourth to adopt the principle, and the first to any great extent—for its Mechanics’ Institution is the largest in the kingdom. Others followed in rapid succession, and “the Volskians were fairly fluttered in their nests.” Education of the people thenceforward became the rooted determination of the British people. They were not to be staved off any longer; and, following the sound advice of Dr. Birkbeck, Lord Brougham, and other friends of the good cause, they applied themselves to the pursuit of sound, practical knowledge. Every mechanics’ institution had within its bosom a “school of arts,” and to show how consistently—and we have much pride in adding, persistently—the principle has been carried out during the past thirty years, we quote a description of this important feature, as given in an Edinburgh circular.

“The great object of this institution is, to supply, at such an expense as a working tradesman can afford, instruction in the various branches of science which are of practical application to mechanics in their several trades—so that they may the better comprehend the reason for each individual operation that passes through their hands, and have more certain rules to follow, than the mere imitation of what they had seen done by another. It is not intended to teach the trade of the carpenter, the mason, the dyer, or any other particular business; but there is no trade which does not depend more or less on scientific principles: and to teach what these are, and point out their practical application, will form the business of this establishment. He who unites a sound practical knowledge of the principles of his art with that dexterity which practice, and practice only, can give, will be the most complete, and probably the most successful tradesman.”

This goodly tree very speedily bore goodly fruit. Local schools of art rapidly sprang into existence all through the manufacturing districts; and in the course of a few years the progress made was self-evident—too wonderful to be denied. The government at last was obliged to acknowledge that there was something in the system; and in 1837 they contributed their mite to promote the popular desire for practical instruction, by establishing a school to carry out, in a more perfect manner, the Mechanics’ Institution suggestion of a School of Arts.

This school—the Government School of Design—was opened in Somerset House, Strand, in 1837, under the superintendence of the Committee of her Majesty’s Privy Council for Trade. Its purposes were to offer instruction to all who desired to obtain a knowledge of ornamental art, and to supply a systematic course of education in relation to every kind of decorative work, to such persons as intended, as were, or intended to become, designers for the various manufactures of the country. Drawing, painting, and modelling were to be taught in all the branches which had reference to the requirements of ornamental art, or which might be applicable to objects of manufacture dependent on form or pattern. The fees for instruction were fixed at two shillings a month for the morning school, and two shillings per month for the evening school. An excellent collection of designs and casts was got together, a library of armed, competent masters appointed, and the system commenced under the most favourable auspices.

That it succeeded, is amply proved by the circumstance that schools of design, in connection with the original establishment, have been founded in the manufacturing districts, at Spitalfields, and, lastly, in Wilmington Square, the centre of one of the most densely-populated districts in the metropolis. Our engraving exhibits the interior of this school, during a school-hour. It represents a very gratifying spectacle. Here is not to be seen talent making efforts to burst from the shackles of ignorance, by scoring a blind wall over with chalk or charcoal; here is no

“Shepherd boy*
Tracing his idle fancies on the ground;”

but a well-lighted, comfortable room, supplied with fine models, all the appliances of drawing and modelling, attentive and industrious groups of students, and masters admirably qualified, by their previous education, to direct the mind in its pursuit of the true and beautiful—from the hard, straight line, or angle, up to the flowing curve which imparts such loveliness to the cheek of beauty, and such majesty to the brow of a Moses from the hand of a Michael Angelo.

These schools of design rank among the most interesting places in the metropolis; and when we mention that visitors are permitted to view them during the hours of study, by application at the entrance, we are convinced few who have any love for the arts, in connection with the prosperity of this great country, will omit to pay them a visit.

THE FAITHFUL SLAVE.

BY ROBERT MORRIS,

Author of “Sketches by a Travelling Naturalist,” “Lectures to a Normal Class,” “Lights and Shadows of Freemasonry,” &c.

CHAPTER I.

PRELUDE.—DRAMATIS PERSONÆ.

GREAT differences of opinion exist relative to the subject of slavery in its various aspects; but, whatever we may think of its justice or injustice, we must still admit that, as an existing institution extending over nearly half the Union, it presents a field of national manners, which, while it is comparatively fresh, should be interesting to those who prize real life sketches in distinction from highly-wrought, improbable romance. As such, we propose to occupy it in the following pages.

We have thrown but a transparent gauze of fiction over a series of facts that occurred about fifteen years since. Most of the persons are yet alive who acted parts in the drama. The places described still retain the features that we have endeavoured to transfer to these pages. A change of locality, with fictitious names and a little twisting of events to bring them together—that is all we have done.

One word of caution, necessary in these days of partiality. The earnest reader, if any such there be, will look through this sketch in vain for any expression of our opinion as to slavery itself. The subject, politically and philanthropically considered, is too weighty for our pen. To display its rights and its wrongs, forms, we think, no part of our "mission."

* Glotta.

That feature in slave character which most surprises the attentive stranger, is the profound attachment, the spaniel-like devotion which so many of the Southern slaves display towards their masters' interests. This will be found in its highest perfection among the house-servants, and those in general in whom the greatest trusts are reposed by their owners. But it is, on the whole, a feature characteristic of the Southern slave. Many illustrations of it will be given to the traveller, as he sits with his host and hostess, and enjoys his summer evening pipe in the cool area between the two cabins that constitute a Southern dwelling.

Will the reader listen while one of these incidents is rehearsed, in which the author bore a part, and to the general truthfulness of which he hereby offers his personal guarantee.

"Well, go 'long, Uncle Gabe, if you want to. Alf and I will feed the mules to-night, if you want to go. We can do it as well as you can. Go 'long, and kill some squirrels."

These words are addressed by a stout, hearty-looking boy, nine years old, to the plantation ostler, Gabriel. The speaker is John Anson Enloe, eldest son of my old friend, Robert Enloe, Esq., whose cotton plantation it is that stretches out so broadly before us as we walk from the family mansion through the white gate towards the stables.

The lad who has spoken carries but few outward marks of authority—for he is both bare-footed and bare-headed. There is indeed but scanty room for distinction, in the way of raiment, between him, the first-born son of this estate, and the grey-haired slave he is addressing.

But for all that, he wears that indescribable air of command to which they are born who are born masters of their fellow men.

"Go 'long, then, Uncle Gabe, if you want to," is John's kind response to a hint of the old negro that he would like to go down to the "new ground" corn, and kill a mess of squirrels for his supper. "Pa will be glad for you to thin them out a little, for they're mighty bad on the corn. And you can look round the field for the gap where the hogs got in last night."

"And, oh, Uncle Gabe!" is the demand of another hearty-looking fellow, two years younger, who rejoices in the abbreviation of Alf, and a still greater abbreviation of shirt and trousers; "bring me some hazel-nuts, Uncle Gabe: there's a heap of 'em in the hazel-patch below the field, but ma's afraid I'll get snake-bit."

Gabriel smilingly undertakes the various commissions of the lads, and, enjoining upon them sundry precepts of stable lore, such as—"Don't shoo down more'n free bundles a piece for de mewels, Marsar Johnny; and mind, put de poles 'tween em, else dey 'll fight like Samson: you'll see it!" he shuffles away, with the peculiar motion of his class, towards the negro "quarters;" thence, after securing his gun, through "the cotton-patch" to "the new ground," as the place where the rich corn harvest has drawn together a perfect grand lodge of squirrels.

The boys mount to the stable-loft in frolicsome spirit, and shoo down de fodder for de mewels," as directed. This being done, it is suggested by the elder, behind whose merry eye there dwells a mint of fun, that they go on and "founder the stranger's horse."

"The stranger"—no other than myself, honoured reader—called an hour back to spend the night with his old friend Enloe. He has consigned his favourite horse, Pompey, to the hands of the experienced ostler, Gabriel; and as he walks down the long lane, past the stables, he little imagines the trick these juveniles are about to play on him, by over-feeding his greedy brute, even to a "founder."

But so it is. The merry chaps have their jest. Pompey, in the gratitude of his heart, eats all that is set before him, though the sum total be sixty ears of corn and a corresponding amount of fodder.

The penalty of this shocking gluttony follows. He is seized with an acute colic, equal in torture to a whole Inquisition. He is up with a "founder" which detains his master, and likens himself in stiffness to the wooden horse of Troy, for the next four days.

"Uncle Gabe," as the veteran slave is familiarly denominated, shuffles along through the cotton-patch, and crosses the heavy tenral fence that separates it from the county road. Pausing awhile to rest himself—for fifty-five years' hard labour have not improved his power of locomotion—his attention is attracted to one of those sights which more than all others awaken tenderest sympathies in the human breast.

It is that of a beautiful girl leaning fondly upon the arm of her lover, and listening intently to his words; so intently, indeed, that the noisy mocking-bird, which shakes the oak-branch above her head, cannot find a note in all his store that will win her ear as she moves slowly on.

Caroline Enloe is only seventeen; but seventeen under the sun of Mississippi is more than equivalent to twenty passed in the less grateful clime of Massachusetts.

In person, graceful and womanly, but not slender; in features, sunny-fair, but all healthful; in speech, plain, but without any of that grossness too often the result of rural associations; in movement, light but firm,—this sweet young lady is an acceptable type of the country belles of her land.

There might possibly be detected a shade of timidity in that manner of timidity which the sparkling creatures of Saratoga or Newport would indignantly repudiate—but there was no clownishness.

Her words may not be marked with an Italian or French accent; but they are such words as Shakspeare and Sheridan used—such words as her father's old Bible taught her—and the pronunciation is such English as Webster himself would have approved.

She leans—oh, how trustingly, with what a guileless faith, she leans—upon her lover's arm.

At times she glances up into his face—it is the very heaven of her hopes; and ever is the hue on those soft cheeks made deeper as she withdraws her eye and fixes it again, but all abstractedly, upon the ground.

The old ostler, resting upon the fallen tree, his gun lying neglected at his feet, observes the act, and brushes something from his bleared eyes, while he mutters a few words to himself, tenderly and softly.

Her companion has numbered about thirty years of life. Could we examine him with the eyes of Caroline Enloe, we should doubtless see a well-formed figure, fully developed, strongly knit together, and somewhat above the medium size. We should doubtless admire the chestnut hair so exuberantly massed above his forehead, and the small, graceful hand that presses hers, while both are sparkling with the jewelled rings of their betrothal. We should certainly be thrilled with the music of his voice, clear and sweet, almost emulating the middle tones of the flute. Altogether, we should acknowledge that in Oliver Colston are comprised all the manly graces that conspire to win gentlest hearts.

But if we lay aside such partial judgment as hers, we could not avoid noticing that his eye, bent so fondly down upon her, has yet an uneasy cast; we observe it most strikingly when it first falls upon the old negro; then, in its impulse of surprise, it flashes up like a meteor, and in the curl of his lip there seems to us a sensual expression—undefined, yet deeply impressed—and we cannot but feel that his sweet, flute-like voice is artificially tuned.

They come slowly on, this loving pair, basking in the spring-time of life, and the old negro rises to greet them.

Mr. Colston, whose uneasiness of look, if there were any, has quite vanished now, acknowledges his courtesy with a word or two, and urges his companion forward. It is clear that there is no friendship between these two men.

But Caroline resists her lover's hand, until she can ask the old negro a few pleasant questions, not designed to be answered—offer him some merry advice relative to his squirrel-hunt, not designed to be followed—and demand a share in the prospective fruits, not designed to be obeyed. And then, with a laugh at his awkward attempts to answer a dozen thoughts at once, and with a pleasant blow upon her lover's arm, which has been all the time endeavouring to draw her forward, this vision of life and youth moves on.

Is that a tear-drop which rolls down the withered cheek of old Gabriel? Is that a sigh which comes from his labouring breast? Does that cruel expression, "—rascals," which he indulges in, apply to the polished gentleman with the chestnut hair and flute-like voice, who has just left him?

The latter inquiry is unexpectedly propounded to Uncle Gabriel by a queerly-clothed individual, who catches the expletive as he steps into the road from a small school-patch that meets it at the precise point where the negro had sat down to rest.

"What, what, Uncle Gabe!" he observes, in a quick, nervous voice, that reminds one of a frog; "swearing at Mr. Colston, eh? What do you think brother Leever will say to that, at the next class-meeting? Crying, too! Why, old man, what's got into you?"

"Ah, Marsar Blote," sadly responds the veteran, "is dat you? Sorry I said sich a word! Never knew what I was sayin', to be sure! Was holy and soly distracted, to be sure! Didn't mean nuffin disrespectful to Misty Colston. But to think of his—Thar 'tis agin! Can't talk of Miss Carline marryin' that no-count feller, but what it swars, whether or no! Ruther die than have her! You'll see it!"

"O tut, tut, Gabriel, that's all very wrong!" mildly responds the old schoolmaster—for such he is, if ink, pens, and paper are any signs of one; "that's all a notion you've got into your old head! Everything will come right. Mr. Colston loves your young mistress dearly, as you can see, and he will make her a good husband."

But the prophecy so confidently advanced by Mr. Blote is contradicted, as well in the uneasy glance he casts after the happy pair as in the shake of the old negro's head.

"Never 'll come to no good, Marsar Blote! You'll see it! All he's arter is old marsar's money. You'll see it! Dat sort of men's no 'count, nohow. You'll see it!"

With this sad prognostic upon his tongue, and in his face, and in the vibration of his grey head, the negro continued his journey, while Mr. Blote crossed the fence to join the trio, consisting of the overseer, Mr. Allansby, Mr. Enloe, and myself, who are in warm discussion as to the probabilities of the present cotton crop.

A few hundred yards bring him opposite the last clearing, styled, in plantation parlance, "the new ground." This is a tract of thirty acres, cleared and fenced the winter before, and planted in corn. Having its forest moisture and mould still remaining, it is better adapted to that product than the older soil of the cotton-fields. Bring contiguous to the uncleared woods, it affords a favourite resort for bird and beast, of which tribes the partridge (quail), racoon, and squirrel are the most extravagant depredators. At the corner of "the new-ground patch," Gabriel meets another person, who—as we intend to introduce our leading characters in this chapter—must claim the reader's attention.

It is a negro girl, probably fourteen years old; but as no record is kept of a slave's birth, we can only judge of the fact by her general appearance as she comes towards us. She is pure African in blood, with only a portion of that superfluity of nose and lip, however, that is so deforming in the majority of her race. Her figure is graceful and small, even to slenderness, though a skilful eye may detect evidences of maternal fullness scarcely to be expected in one of her age, did we not know that many of her people become mothers even earlier in life.

She wears no bonnet or head-dress of any kind, though the evening sun is still hot enough to crimp the corn-blades which the noontide rays have curled so tightly up. But as the polished ebony of her countenance gleams like a mirror under her closely-knotted hair, we feel that she needs none. Her only ornament is a string of red coral beads about her neck. She is barefoot. Her dress is a closely-fitting frock of home-made stuff, covering the single garment beneath.

On her head is a large tub, filled to the brim with water, and balanced with a skill surpassing that which travellers attribute to the Egyptian women. It does not deviate in the least from its level, though its bearer walks as rapidly and confidently forward as though she were totally disencumbered. In each hand there is a bucket filled with the same.

The person we are describing is Loogy, only child of Gabriel, the ostler, and like himself, a slave of Mr. Enloe. She is by office a waiting-maid of Caroline's, and a great favourite of the whole family. Her mother died a few months before the commencement of this sketch.

As they meet, she sets down her various burthens, and a conversation commences between them, which is carried on in a low tone of voice.

"Are you sure, gal, that 'twas him you seed?"

"Yes, daddy—right sartin sure. I seed him haughn' round de place all Sunday mornin', when de folks to de house thought he was gwine to meetin'. And arter you'd left yisserday, he come all along here, and looked round for your tracks. What he's arter I don't know—but 'tain't no good, sure."

"I ain't no good that Misty Colston wants, nohow. You'll see it, gal, and Miss Carline 'll see it some day, too. I mus tote de money off 'fore he fines it. To-morrow I'll hunt up a good place. Is old missis done gi'n you dat picayune yet?"

"Here 'tis, daddy. She giv it to me las night, and she ax me how much money you had now. Misty Colston was in de room, and heern her ax it. When I telled old missis how much, I seed him look right keen at me. Oh, he's a no-count somebody!"

"I tell you, gal, he's good for nuffin 't all. You'll see it. But it's time to go 'long to de house. Old missis will be waitin' for de water. And mind, gal, don't you say nerry word 'bout de money to nbody, no matter who ax you. It's dangerous, gal. You'll see it."

With this caution the negroes separated: Loogy resuming her heavy burthens as if they were but empty vases—her father pursuing the errand, whatever it was which had brought him from the house. Our story shall still embrace his personal movements.

At the further corner of "the new-ground patch," Gabriel leaves the road, first carefully looking round him lest he might be watched, and then darts into the hazel-thicket with more activity than his acquaintances in general give him credit for. When fairly concealed amongst the dense bushes, he searches for a small gully, whose channel is entirely arched over with the thicket. This he pursues for a quarter of a mile or more, until, by the accession of many others like itself, it forms a ravine large enough to conceal a full-grown man.

At a certain point in this dark place he pauses, crawls, cautiously out to take another survey, returns to the hollow, and at a place where a large, flat rock protrudes edgewise from the bank, he commences digging with his hands. He does not suffer a crumb of the dirt to fall into the ravine. The earth is so soft that he soon makes a cavity large enough to thrust his arm under the rock, and then he brings to light what appears to be an old woollen cap, filled with some heavy metal. Fumbling in his pocket, he draws out a few dimes, the gifts of the many visitors at his master's house, and drops them into the sack, together with the smaller piece his daughter had handed him. To judge from the coins that compose the upper stratum, the whole amount must have consisted of such mites as these.

Carefully re-tying the precious cap, he lays it down, and takes out three others of like size and appearance. It does not appear that any miserly disposition to gaze upon his hoard prompts this examination. But from the anxious look he wears, while he is weighing the bags in his hands and examining their fastenings, one would suppose that he suspected some unlawful visitor had preceded him there.

Reassured, however, he replaced them one by one in the cavity, and, carefully erasing all marks of his visit, even to the prints of his feet, he strikes down the ravine, which soon enters the bed of a considerable stream, and, returning another way to "the new ground," proceeds to fulfil the request of little Alf, by gathering a pocketful of the hazel-nuts that swing in big clusters through all the thicket. Then, as the feeding-hour of the squirrels has arrived, he commences the work of slaughter. While he is killing his intended half-dozen, we will conclude the chapter by explaining the meaning of this out-of-the-way money deposit.

Old Gabriel had been remarkable from his youth for a burning desire for freedom. When first arrived at manhood he several times ran away, and endeavoured, by every plan that his limited information but large native shrewdness could supply, to reach a non-slaveholding state. Being baffled and retaken in every instance, he finally changed his mind, gave up the effort to escape as impracticable, and then for twelve years applied himself with wonderful assiduity to raise a fund and purchase his freedom.

His master—pleased at so great an improvement in a slave, whose equal for honesty and ability was nowhere on his plantation—seconded this laudable scheme in various ways, and put a price upon Gabriel considerably lower than the current rate, that he might have good courage in his undertaking.

Gabriel had nearly made up the amount—eight hundred and fifty dollars—when his wife, who was a slave on an adjoining plantation, was, for some trifling fault, removed by her master to a distant state, and sold.

Being attached to the mother of his child by the warmest ties, this cruel divorce drove Gabriel to frenzy. He ceased to care anything more for his freedom. He squandered away all his money. He became dissipated, idle, and quarrelsome, and, upon receiving a whipping for his misconduct, ran away to the cane-brake.

During an entire twelvemonth he remained in the woods, in spite of every effort to capture him. He sent messages to his master from time to time, through his fellow-servants, declaring that unless his wife was brought back to the neighbourhood he would never work again, and if they caught him, he would commit suicide.

At last Mr. Enloe—worn out by his obstinacy, and unwilling to lose so valuable a slave—sent an agent all the way to Texas, bought the woman at a high price, and gave Gabriel word to come home.

Home he came forthwith, and never after that was there occasion for a blow or a harsh word. He again became animated with the desire to buy his freedom; laid up all the money that came to his hand, and at the time our sketch begins has a deposit of more than eight hundred dollars under the flat rock.

With true African cunning he has selected his own hiding-place, and rejected repeated propositions to borrow it, even at an interest of ten per cent. His daughter, Loogy, is the only person who shares the secret of its locality—nor has he permitted her ever to visit the spot since the first day he pointed it out to her.

The history of old Gabriel's attempt to buy himself, is that of many of a similar effort on the part of Southern slaves to become their own purchasers. Where they have kind and liberal masters, it is much easier than it might appear.

There are many situations in which an active negro may earn for himself two hundred dollars per annum, in the intervals of labour due to his owner. There are but few places, especially in a cotton, tobacco, or corn-growing region, where, by burning charcoal, manufacturing baskets, and cultivating "truck patches," seventy or eighty dollars a year cannot be earned: while all that a slave gains in this manner is his own money, without contest.

There is one incident connected with Gabriel's affair which is interesting. Since he has come to a knowledge of his daughter's approaching maternity, he has determined to expend six hundred dollars—the price that Mr. Enloe has set upon her—and to buy her first—so that her child may be born free! It is true that at his age and with his growing infirmities, there is but little hope that he can ever replenish the vault, and liberate himself. This is a painful thought—for he has lived twenty years on the expectation, and he would fain die free.

But his daughter is younger. Her price now is much less than his, and much less than it will be six months hence. So, after consulting with Mr. Blote, he has decided on this course, and next week will propose to his master the purchase.

CHAPTER II.

NIGHT ON A PLANTATION.—SERIOUS DISASTER.

PROFOUND darkness has curtains the plantation, and the cold dew of a September night are sprinkled upon the snow-white cotton-fields that lie before my window.

All is still except the foundered horse, unhappy Pompey, whose sepulchral groan occasionally arouses my pity; and a score of those vile fowls, kept for eggs and noise, whose name denotes them to be countrymen to the negroes. These, as they occupy the orchard trees, sustain a stream of melody, so to speak, from dark to daylight. At joyful intervals their chorus subsides into a quartette, or even a trio, and my nervous head experiences a momentary relief.

In the present instance my bed is made in one of the disconnected rooms, about twenty steps from the main house, which is occupied by Mr. Enloe and his family.

The night is overclouded, with a prospect of rain. Here I lie, hour after hour, hoping, longing, praying for sleep. Sound after sound has died away in "the quarters," the mansion, and the gin-house. The overseer, with his loud voice, has ceased to issue his mandates, and taken his late supper, hours after everybody else, and has gone to bed in the adjoining room. I can distinctly hear the voice of his slumber, as if mocking the ghost of mine.

The two lovers, whose seat has been at the parlour window, not so far from me but what I can occasionally hear their voices, have at last yielded to the necessity of sleep, and, with many a tender word, parted to their respective rooms.

All night comes, and with the stroke of its coming, one, two, three, ring successively upon the clock-wire in the parlour, and to my weary ears they sound in the distance like a death-watch ticking out my doom.

Suddenly I am aroused by some strange noise, I know not what. I rise up hastily, glad of any excuse to leave my bed, seat myself by the window, and welcome the cold morning air upon my open bosom and burning head. The fowls become noisier than ever, all hopes of quiet in that quarter being entirely at an end.

The house-dogs too, are aroused, perhaps by the same object that startled me, and they commence barking with all their might.

From the stables poor Pompey sends out his solemn groan, that denotes not a shadow of relief.

The parlour clock signals to me once more. It is four, and another hour is day. As the cheering thought couples itself with the divine promise, "Joy cometh with the morning," and my mind expands under the hope, I am startled by the figure of a person rushing from the direction of the house, and passing under my window almost within my reach, towards the "quarters." I am certain that I recognise it as the girl Loogy, and as she passes me she gives utterance to a deep, convulsive sob.

The dogs continue their noise, now taken up by those belonging to all the plantations around. The Guineas fly from their roost, and awaken the other fowls. One aspiring chanticler trumpets forth his own misfortune, and the rest emulate his spirit.

The overseer, who has been uneasy for several hours lest he should sleep too late, rises, lights the gin-house lantern, and, examining his watch, announces the result by blowing the plantation horn until all rings again.

In an instant everything is aroused. The negro men, who do not ordinarily divest themselves of their garments to sleep, are at once on their way to the stables, to feed the stock. The women light up their fires for breakfast, and so the plantation day begins.

With the cold, frosty air, and the departure of night, my nerves gain more composure. I become gradually oblivious, not interrupted until the breakfast-bell awakens me into life.

At the table I inquire for Loogy, intending to question her as to the occurrence of the night before; but she is absent, her young mistress says, upon some household duty.

The care of the foundered Pompey occupies my thoughts for an hour or two. My host has to make a trip to town to pay into the county treasury a large sum of money he has collected, and will not return till dinner-time. Mr. Blote takes the two little boys, heavy with geography and grammar, to his school room, from whence they will not emerge much before owl-time. The lovers occupy the entire parlour, nor would they have room for me in it were it ten times as big. The good dame, amidst her kitchen and garden cares, cannot brook any interruption.

All these things conspire to throw me upon my own resources for amusement. So, when I am done with the groaning glutton at the stable, I walk through the garden, audibly admiring its arrangements and the abundance of its contents, early or late—thereby advancing myself a grade in the favour of Mrs. E.; take a flying visit to the cotton-gin, where the loud buzz denotes a rapid transfer of the great southern staple to an early market; make a call upon the pickers in the field, who are filling their large baskets; and complete my circuit with Pompey again.

In the midst of the fourth round, I catch sight of Mr. Enloe returning home at full gallop, the dusty lane filling up behind him with clouds.

Is there a slave insurrection? Have the Murrell developments really come to a head?

Knowing the staidness of my friend's character, I am instantly persuaded there is something serious, and return swiftly to the house.

Caroline is standing in the front window, anxiously watching her father's approach, while Mr. Colston leans on a chair a step back. I am struck with his death-like paleness—such a contrast to the usual bloom of his cheeks—and can but remark that, while he grasps the top of the chair in his hands, his knees knock together, as though unable to bear his weight.

Some misunderstanding has doubtless arisen between them. How silly are we to permit such trifles to unman us!

As our host alights at the gate, we observe that he does not stop to fasten his panting horse, which hurries off with dauling rein to the water-trough. He runs rather than walks towards us, and springs up the three steps into the passage with a single leap.

Ordering Caroline to summon her mother from the garden, he goes into his private apartment, where he is joined, a minute after, by the two women. Then the door is closed, and Mr. Colston and myself, who are listening with the greatest anxiety, can hear the sound of their feet hurrying to and fro, then the moving of heavy furniture, and after awhile a smothered scream, and the voices of the two women broken with sobs.

Half an hour passes—it seems to my anxious friendship much longer—when Mr. Enloe calls me, with a faint voice, into his room. He shuts the door carefully behind me, that he may not be overheard; but, seated where I am, I feel confident that Mr. Colston has steadily followed me, and that I see the shadow of his feet in the passage.

Mr. Enloe has become strangely altered. He seems years older than he was at the breakfast-table. His wife is reclining upon the sofa, her face hidden in a handkerchief. Her daughter, pale but not so entirely abandoned to grief, is speaking affectionate words to arouse him. What mystery is in all this?

My friend explains.

"My dear sir, I have met with a dreadful loss. Last night I had twenty thousand dollars in my pocket-book—money belonging to the state—and placed it, securely, as I thought, under my pillow. My business at town this morning was to pay it to the county treasurer, for whom I had collected it; but when I entered his office, there was nothing in the pocket-book but a roll of waste paper! I am ruined!"

As soon as I can get words, under this stunning blow, I inform Mr. Enloe of what I had witnessed the night before, and suggest that one of his servants—probably Loogy—has committed the robbery.

"Impossible!" starts up my sweet young friend, in a warm defence; "utterly impossible! Loogy will not steal. If it was done by any of our negroes, it was not Loogy. I would as soon think I had robbed pa myself!"

We agree with the innocent-hearted girl, that Loogy would not be likely to take it of her own accord; but then she might have been put up to it by a second person. Such things are frequently done. But no, Loogy is innocent! Loogy would die before she would steal! Has she not raised Loogy under her own eye, and would not the poor creature do anything to exhibit her affection for her? And then she reminds her parents how Loogy saved her life the year before, when attacked by a rabid dog, and ends her passionate defence of the waiting-maid by proposing to bring her in at once, and let her establish her own innocence.

This is agreed to, and, pending her arrival, I return to Mr. Colston, whom I find standing quietly by the chimney, and inform him that a serious accident has befallen the family, which at present cannot be made public, and suggest that, under the present circumstances, he had better retire until evening.

He adopts my plan with unexpected cordiality, and starts off at a quick pace.

As he goes through the gate, he meets Caroline, and in the whispered conference between them, I have no doubt the dear girl tells him the whole.

Loogy is next brought into the passage, where we have now seated ourselves. But Caroline's prediction concerning her is sadly falsified—as her own disappointed look evinces. For instead of the gay, light-hearted manner so natural to the housemaid, she was found crying, so her young mistress admits, and for awhile positively refused to come to the conference. Her fellow-servants testify that she has been in tears ever since daylight, and would not touch a morsel of breakfast. All this has a suspicious look.

She comes before us trembling like a leaf. She sinks down before us, her matronly promise being plainer than before. She clasps Mr. Enloe's feet tightly, and screams:

"Oh, marser! oh, marser! I didn't tetch de money—'twarn't I—'deed 'twarn't!"

This is very bad indeed. No one has said a word to her concerning the loss, yet she is already cognisant of the fact. What now avail all her wild declarations? How can even her young mistress, with all her maidenly faith, believe her denial?

"Oh, Miss Caroline—Miss Caroline—'twarn't I! I didn't tetch it—'deed I didn't! You doesn't b'lieve I'd steal, Miss Caroline, does you?"

How can the weeping girl reply, save by advising her to make a full confession, and tell her master where she has put the money?

On hearing this, the negro rises at once from her abject posture, loses all her fear, and gazes almost angrily upon Caroline. From this, she glances around to each one of us in turn—never did the sublimity of innocence so light up human face before—casts her eyes upwards, as if appealing to that God who knoweth the truth, however it may be hidden from human knowledge, and then falls heavily forward in a fit.

The attack lasts through the whole day. Physician after physician is summoned from the neighbouring settlements; but with all their skill, it is night before Loogy is able to recognise her young mistress, who has hardly once withdrawn that white arm from under her neck all the while.

As soon as she can speak, she begs to be left alone with Miss Caroline; but this cannot be permitted.

Officers have come from town by this time, to inquire why so large an amount of public money, due this day, is delayed. And when the startling intelligence is communicated to them that it cannot be found, they insist that no means shall be left untried to draw the secret from the reputed robber.

The inquisition, during Loogy's swoon, has only brought two facts to light: that the tracks, which are still visible under my window, are undoubtedly hers, and that the string of coral beads which she has worn from childhood has been found hanging upon a limb in the orchard, torn off, beyond a doubt, in her hasty flight from the house.

The grief of old Gabriel when informed of the robbery, and the suspicion that rests on his daughter, although very sincere, is not equal to his confidence in her innocence. That confidence is really heart-touching. It is useless to point out to him the damning circumstances. He knew that Loogy wouldn't steal; and had the money been found in her hand, he could not be made to believe that she took it.

At length his master becomes wearied with his noisy demonstrations of grief, and orders him out of the yard.

It is past midnight before the examination is closed. Every means of intimidating the negro girl, and inducing her to make a confession, has been resorted to, except force. That is reserved for the last.

Loogy is excessively weak; for she has eaten nothing for twenty-four hours. Her mind has been shaken by the severity of the attack, and this stormy scene quite takes away her little remaining sense. She cannot weep; she cannot answer the questions so frequently and sternly put to her: she can only say, with a monotonous repetition, but with a voice low and mournful as that of a wind-harp: "Twarn't I, Miss Caroline! I never tetcht it! Oh, Miss Caroline, 'deed 'twarn't I!"

My opinion relative to her guilt has undergone a partial change. At first it seemed certain that Loogy was the thief. But that sublime look—it haunts me yet!—which the unsophisticated African girl cast to heaven, when she discovered that even Caroline believed her guilty, had shaken me. It was truly a great mystery!

As I walk by starlight with the old teacher, Mr. Blote, we revolve together every solution, probable or improbable, that occurs to our minds, and re-consider every aspect in which this mysterious affair has been turned towards us. That the girl was aware of the robbery before it came to our knowledge, cannot be doubted; but neither of us believe that she was the principal agent in the affair—though the facts, even at that, make against her. She certainly knew who the thief was, and ought to be compelled to confess it.

I have neglected to say that Loogy's husband, Tom—a slave upon the adjoining plantation—was taken up immediately upon discovering the loss of Mr. Enloe's money—it being reasonably supposed that the girl had intrusted him with it.

No information, however, has been gained from him, and he is now confined, until further orders, in one of the apartments of the owner's house.

To my surprise, Mr. Blote, after a brief digression upon the probable distance of the dog-star, advances the idea of somnambulism.

"If it could be ascertained," he says, "that Mr. Enloe or his wife has ever been accustomed to sleep-walking, what is there incredible in the notion of his removing the money to some other place? Many such memorabilia are upon record. Were such the case, it would be proper to keep a watch over him for several nights, in hopes that he would return to the place of deposit."

"But how should Loogy have known of it?" I ask, in my perplexity.

However, we get the overseer's advice on this head; and, receiving his approbation—though, it must be admitted, rather coolly, for Mr. Allansby had no idea of anything more effectual than the lash—we set a watch upon my friend's apartment.

I may as well dispose of this topic, by adding here that this guard was maintained, by the assistance of gentlemen from the vicinity, for a week; but no one moved in his sleep further than from one side of the bed to the other—and this notable scheme died without fruit.

I should have said before that Mr. Colston returned to Mr. Enloe's in time for supper. I scarcely know why I watched him so closely, but I was sure there was something weighty on his mind. The uneasy manner of his eye, which I observed before, seemed to have increased. Sometimes a gaiety, as artificial as could be manufactured, would buoy him up for a few minutes; then he relapsed entirely into silence. Could it be that he was mentally calculating the value of his betrothed, now that her fortune was gone at a single blow? It was too bad to believe.

He took much interest in the examination of Loogy, and, like the rest of us, asked her many questions. I was standing close to her when he commenced this, and was struck with her peculiar manner of receiving it.

She had been lying on a blanket in the parlour, her eyes closed, and seemingly unconscious of all that was said to her. At intervals, those monotonous words of denial—"O, Miss Caroline! 'deed 'twasnt I, Miss Caroline! I never tetcht it, 'deed I didn't!"—could be heard, but rather as the result of her own thoughts, than in response to our interrogatories.

But when Mr. Colston first spoke to her, she opened her eyes, stared at him a moment, then at her young mistress, who was holding her cold hands, and raised herself up as if about to speak. The rest of us leaned eagerly forward to catch her words. But then, to our disappointment, she changed her intention, whatever it had been, sank back upon the blanket, and only reiterated those listless words.

After midnight we separated, with the understanding that nothing more could be done for the present. Mr. Enloe returned to town with the officers, to take legal advice. The money which had been so mysteriously abstracted from under his pillow was secured to government by responsible indorsers: so that not only was his own fortune involved, so far as it would reach, but much of the property of his friends would be sacrificed to supply the deficiency.

It may appear strange to some that this large plantation, and the gang of slaves that worked it, should not be able to cover a deficit of twenty thousand dollars. But the fact is, few planters in Mississippi, fifteen years ago, were really worth half the property in their hands. The late bank inflations, which had given an unhealthy impetus to all kinds of monetary enterprises, placed much in men's hands only to take it away again, with large interest.

Mr. Enloe had dabbled in various speculations, like the other gentlemen of his standing, and lost much property. That which remained in his possession was largely incumbered, and, sold at the point of law, would not leave him more than twelve thousand dollars to pay this debt of twenty.

This was bad enough, but there was another thing which weighed heavily upon his mind that night.

Mr. Enloe was a stern partisan. None had been more prone to attribute evil motives to his opponents than himself. None had more unscrupulously employed the filthy means too often employed by political hacks. He was even now a candidate for the legislature, and the strife was unprecedented in violence, even in that fervid land. How his enemies would revenge themselves in his present misfortune! How they would gail his sensitive spirit! And when it was charged upon him, as it certainly would be, that instead of being robbed by others, he had in reality defrauded the government out of this large sum to pay his own liabilities, how much worse than a gun-shot would the missiles of slander wound his heart!

CHAPTER III.

MYSTERIOUS ROBBERY.—EXAMINATION UNDER THE LASH.

Just let the reader accompany us in fancy to the corner of "the new ground," a little before sunrise, the day after the discovery of the robbery.

The cool air and the night dews have brought relief to the vegetation parched under yesterday's sun, and there is now a deep green upon the dense corn, that reminds us of early spring.

Looking up the lane towards Mr. Enloe's mansion, we see the form of old Gabriel shuffling along, in his heavy, awkward way, towards us. He has got permission from the stern overseer to absent himself to-day from plantation labour.

As the bands of pickers pass him, their baskets lightly poised upon their heads, on their way to the cotton-patch, they can easily see that the old ostler is weeping. His distress at his daughter's situation has moved even the severe heart of Mr. Allansby—hence this unaccustomed favour.

Gabriel walks this morning with a staff. Has the sorrow of a single day thus unnerved him?

Who can lightly speak of the feelings of this degraded race, when we see in them such evidences of holy grief?

As he approaches us we can hear him, in the usual manner of an African slave, talking to himself about his troubles. In the interval of his sobs, he utters such broken words as these:

"Never did it! Sooner 'd b'leeve I did it myself! Loogy 'll die 'fore she'll own it! You 'll see it! Poor gal! De lash will kill her! You 'll see it! Dead already, I reckon!"

In this slow, unhappy way he came down to the spot where he had left the road on a former occasion. But, instead of taking the same precautions to guard against espionage, he appeared utterly careless as to who might see him.

He turned slowly into the thicket, nervously twitched at a vine that had drawn itself before him, then angrily drew out his knife and cut it in two.

In the same way he severed the branches and briars that came in his way, until his path was so marked that a blind man could well nigh trace it up.

The old negro indeed seemed partially deranged. His hat fell off, but he would not stoop to pick it up; yet he hazel-nuts. He lost his knife, but regarded it not. He muttered to himself with closed eyes, and repeated the words which express the burthen of his grief:

"Poor gal! Tort she'd be free next week! De lash will kill 'em both! You'll see it!"

Thus delaying, and sobbing, and muttering, it is a good while before he reaches the place of his deposit. Can he believe his own eyes? Is he dreaming? What new evil is this? The stone lies flat in the bottom of the ravine, and the money is gone!

The aged African staggers breathlessly against the bank, and well nigh loses his senses. Recovered a little, he takes a second glimpse, and then such a scream, such an unearthly cry as his lungs give forth, how shall it be conveyed to the reader's knowledge?

Again he reclines against the bank, for he feels as if his heart would never resume its beating. Nor does it, until several minutes elapse, and he has exercised a powerful effort of his will to preserve himself from a swoon. Already weakened by a whole night's emotion, he finds it necessary to leave the fatal spot, and totters down the ravine to the creek. Here he bathes his whole head for a long time in the refreshing waters, shuddering to see himself looking so wild and fierce.

He returns to the cavity more resigned, with better eyesight and recovered strength. Perhaps, after all, some animal has broken down the flat stone—the stock often wander up these gullies in search of salted earth, to which their appetite greatly inclines them—and the money may, after all, be hidden under the loose soil that has fallen to the bottom.

So he goes back with a little hope. But a single glance dashes down the hope, and, rising erect, with something fluttering in his hand, he screams even more wildly than before.

It is a handkerchief, one of the coarse, red bandannas so much fancied by the black women, and the old man recognises it as the one worn by his daughter!

Unhappy Gabriel! what means that gesture—those wild blows upon your throat—those eager glances around you, as though you were seeking for a weapon of death? Fortunately for your soul's peace hereafter, the knife which was in your hand this morning has been dropped in the thicket, and you cannot commit suicide.

No, old man, you cannot die yet. But you can reach the Divine ear with those agonised screams. You can excite the sympathy of invisible watchers by those distracted gestures. You can lie there, groaning on that damp earth, and although no man marks your distress, the eye of God marks it.

All becomes quiet again, at least outwardly—for Gabriel has no room for further surprise. No, although the marks of naked feet in the earth are hers—though the imprint of fingers upon the bank are hers—he can suffer no greater grief now, but seeks his staff, and, hiding the handkerchief in his bosom, drags himself away from the spot—cruel, ungrateful daughter, how have you fixed that spot in his memory!—nor once halts nor looks back until he reaches the quarters.

Let us return to Mr. Enloe's house.

The proprietor, with the county sheriff and a large party of his political friends, has come back from town about nine o'clock, to resume the inquisition into the robbery. There is that in Mr. Enloe's look which speaks of despair. He whispers aside to me, while his companions are fastening their horses to the rack, that he apprehends the worst.

Again Loogy is brought forward for examination, but this time the affair is in sterner hands than Mr. Enloe's. The gentle Caroline, who has attended her anxiously through the night, and induced her both to eat and sleep, is forbidden now to remain with her.

The negro girl is permitted to sit with us on a chair in the parlour while the examination goes on. Every one speaks kindly to her—such is the plan laid down to us in private by the sheriff—and a glass of sweetened spirits administered before any questions are asked her. The stimulus brings new light to her eyes, while the kindness of the company, so forcibly contrasted with the severity of their language yesterday, gives her much courage.

But a change has taken place in the appearance of the poor girl. Unfortunate creature! The experience of years has passed over her in a single night. The light-hearted girl is suddenly transformed into a suffering woman, with worse than a woman's lot.

When the experienced sheriff observes from her eye that the stimulus has taken effect, he begins the examination by asking her a few unimportant questions relative to her ordinary work—how she likes to weave—how many knots a day she can spin, and the like.

Turning with considerable ingenuity to the subject of the robbery, he goes on to inform her that Mr. Enloe has lost a great deal of money lately, and will have to sell his negroes unless he can find it again.

Loogy sits smiling under the influence of the spirits, and at the end of each sentence nods her head in token of assent.

The officer observes that everybody knows how full of jokes she, Loogy, is, and that they have had a good laugh together to think that she should go into her master's room when he was asleep, and take his money away, just to have some fun with it.

At this the negro grows somewhat nervous, but when the whole company of us burst into a preconcerted laugh, she relaxes her gravity, smiles, and again nods her head.

The sheriff goes a little further, and says that Mr. Enloe is afraid that the money may be lost if she keeps it any longer; and he tells her an amusing story of how a rat once carried off his pocket-book and gnawed it at one end, and to convince her of the fact, he holds it up before her, and shows her that it is really injured, as he says.

No signs of intelligence follow, but there is a slight air of anxiety on her face at the entrance of Mr. Colston, who has just arrived.

"Tell us, then, my good girl," asked the sheriff, coaxingly, "is your master's money put away where the rats can get it?"

But Loogy answers not.

"Tom hasn't got it, has he?" imprudently inquires that individual's master, who is with us.

"Oh, no, no, no!" stammered the girl. "Tom didn't tetch it, sir; 'deed he didn't!"

The sheriff takes a large chew of tobacco, glances at Mr. Enloe with a half smile, as much as to say, we shall come to it presently, if you'll all be patient—and then draws from his saddle-bags a splendid pattern of alpaca. He opens it, so as to show the colours, and, laying it in Loogy's lap, says, in his kindest manner:

"Here is a dress I've bought for you, Loogy. See how pretty the flowers are!"

With a true feminine love for ornament, the negro holds up the piece, gazes delightedly upon the figures, and wraps it around her, as if mentally calculating the quantity and the effect.

"And here," continued the officer, archly smiling, and speaking now in a half whisper, as though he did not wish for us to hear him—"here is something for the baby."

And then he draws out a necklace, made of the large gold beads coveted more than any other ornament by the blacks.

It is really a magnificent present, or it has been bought that morning for the purpose, at the cost of thirty dollars, while the alpaca was valued at more than two dollars a yard: so important does he think it to propitiate the girl's will.

"Something for the baby, Loogy," whispers the sheriff, and lays the glittering necklace upon the splendid cloth. "Your baby will have the finest necklace in all the land."

How touching is the expression of that young face, lit up by the prophetic impulses of a mother's love! She gathers up the gold beads in her hand so as to conceal them, and turns her face away, as though the subject were too tender for speech.

"And now, Loogy," continues the sheriff, "you must go with your master and hand him back his money before the rats gnaw it. Come, Loogy, get up and go. Your master is ready to go with you."

But Loogy sits still—looks earnestly around her—and answers not a word.

"Oh, you needn't be afraid of the overseer!" dexterously suggests the sheriff. "He shall never know where you put it at all. And he shall never strike you a single blow for what you have done. You won't whip Loogy, Mr. Allansby, will you?"

Mr. Allansby declares, with as much amenity as he can throw into his face at short notice, that such a joke as hiding that money is too good for a whipping. He pledges his word to her—confirming the promise by throwing his whip out of the window, and giving her several pieces of money—that he will never strike her a blow on account of it.

The rest of us imitate his example—make her presents of money—laugh uproariously at the excellent joke—praise her costly presents, and promise that we won't follow her.

"Come, now, Loogy; go with your master and get the money."

Mr. Enloe rose, walked to the door, looked smilingly back, and invited her to follow him.

(To be continued.)

[VIEW OF THE DUBLIN EXHIBITION BUILDING.]

THE GREAT EXHIBITION IN DUBLIN.

THE idea of having expositions of the industry of all nations was borrowed from those immense bazaars and fairs which, from time immemorial, have been held in various countries in the East, particularly India, Arabia, Syria, and Asia Minor. But we are immediately indebted to the benevolent feelings of the charitable for the introduction of the system, on a large scale, into Europe. The French, we believe, were the first to institute bazaars for charitable purposes. An attractive collection was formed of the elegant as well as useful products of industry; and to lend enchantment to its purpose, the fairest and noblest ladies of the land, by their presence as managers and saleswomen, imparted a witchery to the scene, gratifying as it was in its original, unsophisticated intention.

The noble example thus offered to the world by the wealthy and high-born of the polished circles of Paris, was not lost upon England. She instantly adopted it, as an admirable mode of collecting funds to relieve the distressed, and afford consolation to the afflicted. Accordingly, within the past half century, bazaars, in support of the claims of those in need of charity, have been as usual and regular in this country as the annual meeting of Parliament; and people have flocked to them with almost the eagerness with which they would go to a theatre or a concert.

The principle having been thus pleasantly established, that exhibitions, on a large scale, of articles for sale, to raise funds for beneficent purposes, only required good management to be successful, it was reserved for our versatile neighbours to enlarge and extend the idea to an exposition of the useful, beautiful, and instructive in art, science, and manufactures. The first "great" exhibition, therefore, was held in Paris, under the auspices of Louis Philippe. England followed closely behind in this novel attempt to blend amusement with instruction, while appealing to the warmer instincts of our nature in behalf of those least able to help themselves. But in adopting the idea in its new form, we made it more practical. We gave some permanent and productive power to the fruits of its success.

The first English exhibitions of the products of art and industry were held in the manufacturing districts, in connection with Mechanics' and other educational institutions, to whose benefit the proceeds were applied. The first, we believe, was held at Liverpool, in 1842, in the Mechanics' Institution in that town. It was called a polytechnic exhibition, and was eminently successful. A second, held at a rival institution, in 1843, and one at Leeds in the same year, triumphantly demonstrated their utility, and—we must use the phrase—remunerative character. Thousands attended them daily: the number of visitors to the Liverpool exhibition held in the Mechanics' Institution, during the six weeks it was open, was 97,000; besides 20,000 charity children, police, military, and domestic servants, who were admitted gratuitously; and it was acknowledged by even those who have an objection to every species of innovation, that few—very few—could attend them without receiving pleasure of a pure and elevating kind. The trains of thought into which the various objects exhibited naturally led the mind—the healthy curiosity which they excited, and the expansion of thought which such collections of the beautiful and useful in nature and art produced, had a very stimulating and beneficial effect. Their value was at once placed beyond all doubt, and as the idea grew more familiar to the national mind, it came to be eagerly patronised by manufacturers, for the obvious advantages it offered them in a suggestive as well as economical sense—by artists, for the same reason—by promoters of the education of the masses, because it tended to detach them from degrading habits—and by all classes of the people themselves, because they had found in it something which belonged to themselves—something which showed the dignity of labour, and, while affording exhilarating relaxation, imparted to them instruction, without the drudgery of being taught.

In the course of nine years, this latest suggestion in civilisation expanded into a national sentiment, which developed itself in that crowning feature, "The World's Fair," in Hyde Park, whose glories we, among innumerable others, had the happy privilege to enjoy, and illustrate both by pen and pencil. There were seen the might and majesty of industry, the loveliness of art, and the grandeur of human nature in every mental and moral department, when under the god-like influences which teach the philosophy, that the more man is industrious, peaceful, and cultivated, the nearer he approaches the infinitude and the perfection which tremble like whispers, or linger like echoes, in the solemn temple which every man has within him, whether he be saint or savage. Never was a more glorious attitude assumed—never did man present himself under a loftier aspect—since the world began. He was unique in the display of excellencies which instructed while they amused—pleased while they astounded.

And, as this is the age of sober vaticination, founded on sound calculation, it was confidently predicted that such a brilliant success would be followed by many attempts of the same description. In this generation there never will be another world's fair like that of 1851—that was never expected—but that the leading idea of that wonderful embodiment of the industry and civilisation of all nations could be perpetuated, was always cheerfully admitted. But change of scene was essential, and accordingly, on a much smaller scale, we have almost simultaneously presented to us exhibitions of the world's industry in New York, Paris, and Dublin.

With both the former, the government and the wealthy classes—particularly the manufacturers—have largely connected themselves; gratitude demanded no less; but with the latter, every sympathy and every home tie was enlisted in its favour. It was the industrial heart of Ireland speaking to the industrial heart of England; and we are happy to perceive that the appeal has been met by a noble response. The Irish Industrial Exhibition can scarcely fail to be a triumph. It will be held in the capital of Ireland, which occupies one of the finest sites in Europe. No town in England is so finely situated as Dublin. A beautiful river flows through it, and in its architecture and design it is bolder—is spread over comparatively a larger surface—than the majority of the towns in England. It is the seat of the Irish viceroyalty, is surrounded by a splendid country, and enjoys the advantages of a park in which a review on a much larger scale than any ever got up in England can be seen—which is more than can be said of similar displays in the vicinity of the metropolis. The well-known beauties of Irish scenery—the lakes of Killarney—the sweet valleys spread all over the country—the mountains, as rich in minerals as picturesque in appearance—the ruined castles of the feudal ages, the mysterious round towers, the luxuriant plains—all these will tempt visitors—they have, within the past few years, been tempting thousands both from this country and the continent—and as every tourist will be a visitor to the exhibition, the native support will be incalculably swelled. And when we consider the peculiar claims which the undertaking has on the Irish people, the anxiety of Britain to do everything to help Ireland, the cheapness and rapidity of the travelling communications between the two countries, and glance at the adventitious circumstances inseparable from an affair which brings together contributors from all parts of the empire—from America, from the continent—we cannot but come to the legitimate conclusion, that it will not only be a success, but a triumph—a triumph for Ireland, a triumph for the wide realm of industry and art.

The building in which this grand display of Irish enterprise and the world's industry will be held, has been erected in Merrion Square, and, as will be seen from our illustration, is bold and striking in outline as well as proportions. The architect has not copied the far-famed Crystal Palace in Hyde Park; he has chosen a more massive looking style of structure, which, in facial outline, almost reminds us of one of those Patan palaces in India—a description of which we gave in a recent number of this Journal. The roof swells upwards into imposing domes—the central one especially so, for it is a hundred feet higher than the two longitudinal ones, and is composed of twelve semicircular ribs of timbers, each weighing upwards of seven tons, and spanning a hall twenty-eight feet wider than the transept of the Crystal Palace of 1851. The other domes—if domes they may be termed—have central skylights, twenty-five feet in breadth, extending the whole length of the halls which they cover. The exterior dimensions of the building are 425 feet in breadth, and 470 feet in depth: so that the basement portion approaches nearly to a square. The total height from the pavement of Merrion Square to the top of the central dome, is nearly three hundred feet. Taken altogether, it is a handsome looking building, and does credit to all who have been concerned in its erection.

The interior arrangements will nearly correspond with those of its great predecessor. The building is divided into halls or courts, and some idea may be formed of the size of some of them, when we mention that the machinery hall is 450 feet in length. The other courts are devoted to raw materials of all kinds—especially the natural productions of Ireland; to sculpture, comprising casts of finely and curiously engraved crosses, which have lain for centuries in grave-yards; and to the fine arts. Among the gems and jewellery exhibited, is an assemblage of those costly relics of remote ages, when the arts of the lapidary and goldsmith flourished in Ireland. The department of manufactures is peculiarly rich. All the large cities of the continent have contributed, and British and Irish skill and taste will once more be contrasted with that of continental Europe. We may mention that the Emperor and Empress of the French have been exceedingly liberal to the exhibition, and that America has not forgotten the land that has supplied her soil with so many stalwart sons and blooming daughters.

The Fine Arts court, or wing, is absolutely crammed with the rarest productions of art; and it shows how genial was the feeling towards the Dublin Exhibition, when the offerings of pictures from the continent were so numerous, that the committee were compelled to limit their acceptances to half the number tendered. All the schools of modern Europe will be represented; and when we mention that the distinguished contributors are headed by the Duke of Devonshire—who sends the "Bolton Abbey," of Landseer, and the "Boy at the Gate," of Collins—we have said sufficient to justify the assertion, that this will be considered the noblest collection of modern pictures ever formed under one roof.

The mediæval ages—the ages of the Black Prince, Cœur de Lion, Saladin, and the Troubadours—are richly represented. As the eye surveys plumed helm, embossed shield, inlaid armour, and some more peaceful vestiges of an extinct era, placed in orderly array, the mind is enabled to wander to those days when the baron kept state in his hall, or, at the head of his vassals, rode out to battle—not for freedom, but for the rights of kings, or to repel an incursion of a rival—make a foray, or grace the train of a conqueror. And then, reverting to these more illustrious and more promising times, and beholding around him, in every conceivable form, the brilliant evidences of civilisation, cultivated to the highest point hitherto attained, he must feel thankful that his lot was cast in such a happy day, that twenty-four gentlemen, assisted by two indefatigable secretaries, are unreservedly trusted with priceless treasures from the four corners of the world; and at their bidding there arose one of those palaces which will contribute more to the dignity and enduring splendour of the present age than all the embattled towers and stupendous cathedrals did to the stirring periods in which they were reared against the sky. As for Ireland, we sanguinely anticipate the very best results from her metropolitan feast of industry and intellect. It will introduce her people to a knowledge of other countries and other modes of thought; it will show them Ireland as she really is, one of the richest countries on the face of the earth; it will spur on their energies to greater attempts to possess those riches; it will show them that the inexhaustible mine of wealth lying untouched beneath their feet, to be useful, must be diligently and industriously gathered; it will assist in destroying local prejudices, from the number of friendships that must inevitably be formed during the existence of the exhibition; create not only a feeling, but a deep intellectual impression, that peace and industry go hand-in-hand: and this being carried to fire-ides, and village festivals, and town meetings, will not—cannot fail to stir up the warm Irish heart to impulses which will long survive the glowing moment in which they were born.

ESSAYS.

No. CLXXXIX.—HOW TO MAKE MONEY.

(Continued.)

THE thorough business man has generally a good address. Some men may be awkward in appearance, and not very fascinating in manner; but with a good address, these imperfections may be rendered imperceptible; they may be made wholly invisible to the reflective organs, and not obtrusive to the perceptive.

Now, as every man does not possess an attractive exterior, a winning manner, and a musical voice—the latter may be acquired by cultivation—it is indispensable that those who are not so favoured by nature, if they would succeed in any department of business, should endeavour to draw round, and in, and about themselves those urbane qualities comprised under the general term, “good address.”

Awkwardness and shame-facedness are incompatible with success in any pursuit requiring familiar intercourse with other people. Literary men are proverbially awkward and bashful; and that is precisely the reason why they invariably fail when they embark in business. Men of science, from their habit of lecturing in public—clergymen, from their constant familiarity with the amenities of life—men of fashion, and the swarm of idlers whose most serious thoughts are devoted to spending, instead of making money—do not labour under this disadvantage. They are cool, self-possessed, and engaging. They do not repel—they attract—and the whole secret lies in their manner. They have a “good address;” they are not rustic in their behaviour.

For their peculiarity, they are indebted to their imitative powers. By mixing in good society, they acquire its polished manners and unaffected carriage. They are polite: and as politeness is the very foundation, the very cornerstone of good society, no man can have the good address essential to good society, without he is polite: polite to his superiors, without being servile; to his equals, without being familiar; to his inferiors, without being arrogant.

The majority of mankind, being beyond the pale of this good society, are debarred the opportunities of cultivating a good address by genial intercourse with their more fortunate fellow-creatures: therefore they must seek it at other sources, so as to lift themselves up to a more cultivated condition; and to no better can they apply than their own natural capacities—not their perverted and slanted over capacities, but the natural dispositions implanted in them by their beneficent Maker. Politeness is natural. It is oftener found “in lowly sheds, with smoky rafters, than in tapestried halls and courts of princes.” It indicates a good heart and a wise head. It is not limited in its expression to set forms or ceremonies, nor can it be learned by any system of rules. The wisdom that appreciates its value will direct in the choice of external signs by which to manifest it, and form the manners.

It is a matter of daily observation that the Jews are more successful in money getting than any other people. As rich as a Jew, is a proverb. How to account for this—to what cause to ascribe it—has no doubt been a puzzle with many. If the following statement be correct, there is no difficulty in accounting for it: “The politest people in the world are not the French, the English, the American, the Italian, nor the German—but the Jewish. For the Jews are maltreated, and reviled, and despoiled of their civil privileges and their social rights; yet they are everywhere polite, affable, insinuating, and condescending. They are remarkable for their industry and perseverance—indulge in few or no recriminations—are faithful to old associations—more respectful of the prejudices of others than these are of theirs—not more worldly-minded and money-loving than people generally are—and, everything considered, they surpass all nations in courtesy, affability, and forbearance. Few persons excel in address a bright and polished Jew. There is no rusticity among that people.”

But politeness is not inconsistent with firmness. A marble demeanour is sometimes necessary, and it is only the polite man who dares at all times to refuse doing that which his judgment condemns. “Most men,” says Lord Clarendon, “are slaves, because they cannot pronounce the monosyllable ‘No!’” A polite man may pronounce it whenever he chooses, with little danger of offence. But politeness is not inconsistent with a proper degree of spirit—for when we have to deal with rudeness, resistance is our only alternative.

However, as we have already stated, the choice of the external signs or manners is a matter for the exercise of individual wisdom. And it should be borne in mind that, in forming the manners, what is borrowed from study or observation must be adapted to the natural character, or, like a badly cut garment, it will not sit well. That which is eminently becoming in one man is the opposite in another. To have the desire of pleasing always uppermost in the mind, is the main thing. He who manifests a desire to please under all circumstances and to all men, has a good address, whatever may be the want of polish in his manners.

But politeness should not be confounded with what, under the alias of an “obliging disposition,” is positive weakness. The polite man should never omit to say “No!” when he finds it his duty to say it.

But upon borrowing, lending, and giving, we have already written at some length;* and, presuming we have said sufficient to show the necessity of a good address in business, we now proceed to glance at the graver qualities demanded—and those are business habits.

The difference in men and their success may be attributed, in a measure, to a difference in their business habits; and many a man has made his fortune with no other capital than their superior cultivation. In fact, a large capital and excellent opportunities, without them, will only provoke greater disaster, and a more wide-spread ruin. Perfection in most things is unattainable—yet men have attained to a greater degree of perfection in the cultivation of these qualities than in almost anything else; and, at all events, it is certain that he who “aimeth at the sun, though he may not hit his mark, will shoot higher than he that aimeth at a bush.”

The first, best, noblest, business habit—parent of all the rest, as well as most of the virtues—is industry: the power wielded alike by God and man. Listen to the Corn-law Rhymer:

“How beauteous are the dyes
That grove and hedgerow from their plumage shake
And cannot the loud hammer, which supplies
Food for the blacksmith’s rosy children, make Sweet music to thy heart?”

It can—its highest notes are as precious as the rich gushings of the songster who warbles as he soars. “The music of the harp may be better spared in a commonwealth than the noise of a hammer,” said old Fuller—and all must agree with the truism; for industry is the energetic engagement of the mind or body in some useful employment. It is the secret of those grand results that fill the mind with wonder—of the folios of the ancients—the pyramids of Egypt—the temples of the Hindoos—and of those stupendous works for internal communication in our own country, which are so grand in their design and execution. “There is no art or science,” says Clarendon, “that is too difficult for industry to attain to; it is the gift of tongues, and makes a man understood and valued in all countries and by all nations—it is the philosopher’s stone that turns all metals, and even stone, into gold, and suffers no want to break into dwellings—it is the north-west passage, that brings the merchant’s ships as soon to him as he can desire—in a word, it conquers all enemies, and makes fortune itself pay contributions.”

But it requires auxiliaries—such as method, calculation, prudence, punctuality, and perseverance.

Method makes a small head as useful as a large one, to a man of business; indeed, we might say that a man with plenty of method about him may be said to have an extra hat-full of brains in his keeping,—because method apportions time to duties, and keeps an exact register of its transactions; it has a place for every man—a box or drawer for every tool—a file or pigeon-hole for every paper, and a time for every settlement. A perfectly methodical man leaves his books, accounts, &c., in so complete a shape, that if he were to die during the night, everything could be perfectly understood. Books have been called the tradesman’s repeating clock, to tell him how he goes on. The system of book-keeping by double-entry is perhaps the most beautiful one in the wide domain of literature or science: were it less common, it would be the admiration of the learned world.

Business correspondence should also be methodical—that is, plain, clear, and concise. Fine writing is ridiculous in business. The style should be simple, without being curt or affected. The technical terms used in every trade and calling should also be perfectly understood. Ignorance in this respect frequently occasions ludicrous mistakes.

We will mention one: “A brickmaker, being hired by a London brewer to make some bricks for him at his country-house, wrote to the brewer that he could not go forward unless he had two or three loads of Spanish; that otherwise his bricks would cost him much extra coal, and the bricks would not be so good and hard, by a great deal, when they were burnt. The brewer hereupon sends down two drays loaded with about twelve hogheads of molasses, which frightened the brickmaker almost out of his senses. The case was this: The brewers formerly mixed molasses with the beer to sweeten it, and abated the quantity of malt—molasses being at that time much cheaper: and this they called Spanish, not being willing their customers should know it. Again, the brickmakers all about London mix coal-ashes with their clay, and by that shift save about eight tons of coal out of eleven, to the burning of 100,000 bricks, in proportion to what other people burn them with—and these ashes they call Spanish; but neither the brewer on the one hand, nor the brickmaker on the other, understood any other of it than as it related to his separate business.”

This kind of knowledge, however, rather comes under the category of business education, although belonging to the department of method.

* See essays in previous numbers, on “Clarity,” “Money,” “People who never say ‘No!’” &c.

By method in business, as a preliminary to success, we mean proper arrangement. Everything should be in its right place, so as to be immediately found when wanted. A merchant, a lawyer, and a tradesman should know where to place his hand on every paper of importance in his establishment. As much exact formality is required in business as in the management of a printing-office or a library. If the type was all “pie”—that is, jumbled together in a heap—the compositors would never get on at all. As it is, each letter has its own compartment in a case, out of which an experienced hand can pick it up blindfolded. The same regularity prevails in a publishing-office. The publisher of the LONDON JOURNAL has daily to supply back numbers from the first down to the last number of the publication, extending over a period of eight years and a half. Now, if his stock was not nicely arranged, and he did not know where every number was, he would never be able to dispose of half a dozen copies in a week; whereas sometimes he has to supply hundreds in the course of half an hour. It is only by method that in this respect he is enabled to oblige the public and faithfully serve his employer. Some manifest this habit at an earlier age than others, and apparently exercise it with less difficulty; but any one, with attention and diligence, may acquire it.

Calculation is eminently essential to the proper development of industry—not only as a habit, but as a principle. Calculation is the mind of business. A readiness in calculation gives a man great advantage over his less experienced neighbours; and it should be borne in mind that many a man has failed purely from inability to calculate quickly and accurately. To attain the habit of quick calculation, it has been recommended that the learner should seize on every circumstance which occurs in his realising where reckoning is required, and, if possible, stop at once and compute it. Or if not, let the place be marked, and at the first leisure moment let him turn to it and make the estimates.

Suppose he reads of a shipwreck. The crew is said to consist of thirty men, besides the captain and mate, with three hundred and thirteen passengers, and a company of sixty grenadiers. The captain and mate, and ten of the crew, escaped in the long-boat. The rest were drowned, except twelve of the grenadiers, who clung to a floating fragment of the wreck, till they were taken off by another vessel. Now is there a single person in existence who would read such an account, without being anxious to know how many persons in the whole were lost? Yet nine readers in ten would not know—and why? Simply because they will not stop, and use what little addition and subtraction they possess.

Many—indeed most persons who are familiar with figures, might ascertain the numbers while reading, and without the slightest pause; but it certainly requires some practice. And the most important use of arithmetical studies, except as a discipline to the mind, is to enable us to reckon without slates and pencils. He has but a miserable knowledge of arithmetic, who is no arithmetician without a pen or pencil in his hand. These are but the ladders upon which he should ascend to the science—not the science itself.

Punctuality is also an elementary principle in business. No man can get on well without it. A punctual man respects his word, and has a regard for the convenience of others. An unpunctual man is universally disliked; and very properly, because he is sure to interfere with our plans, consume our time, cause us uneasiness, and, by implication, affront us: because he would lead us to believe that in his estimation we are not of sufficient importance to cause him to be prompt. Punctuality in money engagements is all-important—it is the hinge of business. When a man cannot fulfil his engagements, he ought to give timely notice. It is better to fail a dozen times, than keep creditors in suspense.

But a true business man ought to look upon failure as a remote possibility. He ought to have the habit which Lucan attributes to Cæsar—prociat virtus stare loco—first consulting wisely, then resolving firmly, and afterwards executing his purpose with inflexible perseverance, undismayed by those petty difficulties which daunt a weaker spirit. Perseverance means the steady pursuit of anything contemplated; the stern execution of whatever plan is determined upon. This quality must be guided by prudence, supported by a conscientious regard for moral right, and controlled by more than a moderate share of sagacity; but consulting the dictates of prudence will be sufficient for every obvious purpose. And as this is one of the most important of qualities, we subjoin the various definitions of prudence which have been given by writers and moralists of almost every grade of talent.

Prudence is wisdom applied to practice. Under it are comprehended the discreet suiting and disposing as well of actions as of words in their due place, time, and manner. It is principally in reference to actions to be done, and due means, order, season, and method of doing or not doing. A man exhibits the highest prudence who places himself in such a position that, whether the principles he acts upon prove true or false, he secures a happy issue to his actions. In a case where the probabilities on the one hand somewhat preponderate over the other, yet if there be no considerable hazard on that side which has the least probability, and a very great apparent danger in a mistake about the other, prudence will oblige a man to do that which may make most for his safety. It is always prudent, in matters of importance, to conceal intentions, or we may be anticipated by others; and it is generally prudent to conceal motives, letting only friends have a key to our hearts, as to our garden. It is prudent to withhold confidence from an entire stranger, and in some disagreeable cases it is prudent to do nothing.

“When a prudent man,” says Chesterfield, “gets into that predicament that he must ask himself more than once what he shall do, he will answer 'Nothing!' Where reason points out no good way, or at least none less bad than the other, he will stop short and wait for light. A little busy mind runs on at all events; must be doing, and, like a blind horse, fears no danger because he sees none."

"I think a prudent man," says Plutarch, "ought not to permit anything at all to depend on fortune, but to trust some things to his wife, some things to his servants, and some things to his friends, while he is employing his reason about such matters as are most proper for him, and of greatest concernment." Prudence is the result of judgment. Judgment is an original faculty of the mind, which God has given to supply the want of certain knowledge, and by which a man takes a proposition to be true or false, without perceiving demonstrative evidence in the proofs. A total want of judgment cannot be supplied by art; but where the faculty exists, it may be cultivated to an extraordinary degree of accuracy.

Having thus sketched the habits which are not only essential to success in business, but are part of the very discipline of business itself, the next consideration is how to obtain the capital and when to commence. As to the capital, it is impossible to speak definitively. Some commence with thousands, others with nothing beyond the business habits we have recommended, health, a vigorous frame, a clear head, and a stout heart. This is altogether a matter of social position and will—the will is everything; but as a sober, industrious, and saving man, who can calculate that the price of a pot of common beer a day is £6 a year, or more than £60 in ten years, may do anything reasonable, we will only say that, as a rule, it is imprudent in any one to embark in business without that moderate capital ordinarily required in the business. It is also imprudent in a young man to commence with a loan under the security of his friends: because he commences in debt, and with an obligation, the memory of which is never forgotten. We have frequently heard it remarked on the Liverpool Exchange: "Oh, he started with £100 or a £1000, that so and so lent him!" or "So and so put him on his legs!" This should be avoided if possible. In many cases it is not possible, in others justified by circumstances—such as an employer advancing money to a clerk who has materially contributed to his own elevation. But, whatever the pecuniary condition may be, the proper application of the meaning of that little word "try" can accomplish wonders. The secret of each man's success is in himself, and there is true wisdom in looking forward, instead of wasting time in idle despondency. The most opulent of the Liverpool banking houses was started by a man who, when a shoeless boy, began business on the profits of the sale of a solitary goose. He died worth three millions sterling—and yet the nest-egg was only a shilling or eighteenpence.

But supposing that a young man has capital to set up in business. When should he commence? This also is a matter of convenience as well as of opinion. A good deal depends on the previous education and the extent of his knowledge. But a natural shrewdness and adaptiveness for business will carry him safely on—for experience is only one of the many ways of arriving at knowledge. "Wise men are instructed by reason, men of less understanding by experience; the most ignorant by necessity, and boasts by nature."

In war, literature, and statesmanship, the greatest exploits of the most renowned men have been performed at an early age. Hannibal crossed the Alps before he was twenty-four. Alexander the Great died at thirty-three. Byron wrote "Childe Harold" at twenty-one. Bonaparte was First Consul before he was thirty.

"Of all the great human actions ever heard or read of," says Montaigne, "of what sort soever, I have observed, both in former ages and our own, more have been performed before than after the age of thirty; and oftentimes in the very lives of the same men. May I not confidently instance those of Hannibal, and his great competitor, Scipio? The better half of their lives they lived upon the glory they had acquired in their youth; great men, it is true, in comparison with others; but by no means in comparison with themselves."

So that age has less to do with talent or business aptitude than is imagined. Napoleon at twenty-one had a wiser head on the top of his little body than all the talking and slaying heroes of the Republic put together; and there are young men in the City of London, and our great commercial and manufacturing marts, who know how "to take time by the forelock" with men double their age. It is the capacity, the position, and the chances that must determine this question; but it is the energetic cultivation of business habits that must improve and consolidate the opportunity.

There are only two remaining points to be noticed, and on these we can pronounce a decided opinion. Never have a partner if you can avoid it. Co-partnerships are more speculations, and have blighted more prospects than either improvidence or deficiency in ability. The only partner a business man requires is a wife who will mind her own business, and never interfere with his—keep his house in order, love him, sing him a good song when necessary, prattle to him—as only a good wife can, when she is in a good humour—and never, oh never, never, under the most irritating circumstances—"nag" at him. There is more venom in the tongue of a "nagging" wife than in the stings of a thousand wasps. Wives have much to learn in this respect; for most husbands would prefer being dragged at the tail of a mad bull, over ten miles of rough country, to being condemned to sit a whole evening in the company of, and listen, as Shakspeare ought to have written it, to,

The venom clamours of a "nagging" woman—
Poison more deadly than a mad dog's tooth.

THE MASKED BRIDE.

THE level beams of the sun were sleeping on the bosom of the Rhine, which was blue and unruffled as the summer sky it mirrored, save that here and there a long, scintillating line of light was merged in one of those sparkling expanses, where it seemed as if thousands of winged diamonds were fluttering with a rapid and ever-changing motion. Carlos Gonsalvo, a young Spanish gentleman, who had been refreshing himself at an inn discernible in the distance, stood on the margin of the river—which in that place spread into an area of some magnitude, smooth and level—with his eyes fixed on a castellated tower, which rose from the verge of a bold precipice, and which, although on the same shore, was, by an abrupt turning, brought nearly opposite to him. The tower, which had been built at a remote period, appeared singularly picturesque, as it shot up against the ruddy western sky, and the young traveller felt an unaccountable, yet irrepressible desire to view it more nearly. A skiff, moored at a little distance, afforded him the means of gratifying his inclination, and in a few minutes he was gliding lightly over the water. On arriving at the foot of the rock, he found that it was so high and steep as to be inaccessible. He spent considerable time in trying, if possible, to find some point where he might scale the precipice—but without success. The last vestige of day had now departed, and he was thinking of returning, when a light from the tower cast a bright gleam along the water. On turning to see from what part of the building it proceeded, he found it came from an open lattice window, at which stood a young girl so beautiful, as to at once put to flight all thoughts of returning to the inn. She had the dark, lustrous eyes of the daughters of his own sunny land; but the "cheek of cream," glowing with a slight rose-tint, which gleamed through the rich mass of golden curls, that, secluded as she was in her lonely tower, she suffered to fall as graceful nature willed, must—so imagined the young Spaniard—have ripened beneath some sky less fervent. It was only for a moment that he had an opportunity to gaze at her—for, probably on account of observing his boat, she withdrew from the lattice. He lingered in the vain hope that he should obtain another glimpse of her, for more than half an hour, and then slowly and reluctantly commenced propelling his boat towards the point whence he had started. Often did he look back to her window, from which, much to his chagrin, the light soon vanished. Once he thought that he saw the gleam of a snowy hand and arm, or of a white handkerchief waving at the lattice—but this must have been the illusion of an excited fancy, as no object could be discernible through the gloom that rested so heavily upon that side of the tower.

All the intelligence that Gonsalvo was able to gather from the host of the inn concerning the tower was, that it belonged to a Spanish nobleman, whose name he had forgotten, who inherited it in right of his wife, a German lady.

"But who are the living inhabitants?" said Gonsalvo, impatiently interrupting him, as he commenced relating a ghost-story connected with the old tower—"that is, what ladies—what females inhabit it?"

"Why, there is old Maggy, the —"

"I care nothing about old Maggy. The lovely creature I saw there to-night, who is she?"

"Oh! you must mean Maggy's daughter, I think; but I never thought her anything more than common. And since she has got on the wrong side of forty —"

"The wrong side of forty! Why, the lady I mean must be on the right side of twenty!"

The host shook his head as he replied: "Your eyes must have deceived you, sir! or it must have been the apparition of the young lady who was murdered more than a hundred years ago by a cruel uncle, for the sake of obtaining her fortune!"

Finding that he was unable to obtain the information he desired, his next care was to secure an apartment which commanded a view of the tower; and to his great delight, the lady's lattice was again brilliantly illuminated.

The night was calm and beautiful, and so still, that the "floating whisper"—heard only when all sounds of animated nature and the lightest breeze even are hushed, and which fancy might deem the mingled breathing of the sleeping flowers—filled the air with its mysterious and dreamy melody. A light slumber stole over him, and the lady of the tower seemed hovering near, when a strain of beautiful music

Rose like a stream of rich distilled perfume,
And stole upon the air.

Fortunately his apartment was on the first storey—otherwise his limbs might have been endangered; for, feeling convinced that such entrancing music could proceed from no other place than the chamber of the lovely unknown, he sprang from the window, and, with all the speed of which he was capable, ran to the shore of the river. Here, owing to the sudden bend of the stream, and the projection of the precipice on which the tower was situated, he was within a comparatively short distance of it, and could not only distinctly hear a female voice, which was accompanied by a guitar, but could without difficulty distinguish the words. A few strains closed the song she was then singing; but after a short prelude on the instrument, her voice again came over the waters, singing the subjoined stanzas:

The star of Love looks down,
And sees its own bright beam,
Deeply and softly mirrored
In the bosom of the stream;
And the stream, though bright before
With a fuller radiance glows,
And sends forth glad, sweet music,
As onwards still it flows.

The star of Love has now
Withdrawn his brilliant light,
And its cheering smile no longer
Makes the mournful river bright
And its voice has now a tone
Of sadness in its flow:
Oh, star so softly radiant,
Why didst thou cease to glow?
And there was one most fair,
Who lived in days gone by,
Hov'ring 'tween youth and childhood,
When Love's deceiving eye
Met hers—and flowers sprang up,
And in her young heart bloomed—
Love turned away; the blossoms
To an early death were doomed.

It was well that the fair minstrel grew weary, as otherwise Gonsalvo might have spent the night by the river's brink, at the risk of endangering his health. After remaining a long time uncheered by a single additional note, he slowly returned to the inn.

The next morning before sunrise he was in the boat, directing its course towards the tower: "For certainly," thought he, "she must be an early riser, as nothing but the balmy morning air could have produced that soft, rich bloom upon her cheek." He was not wrong in his conjecture, and the lady, who could not have anticipated seeing any person at so early an hour, soon after he had steered his boat under the shadow of an overhanging cliff, threw open the lattice and seated herself near it. Gonsalvo, who had now a distinct view of her features, found her even more lovely than he had thought her the night preceding. Though so well screened by the deep shadow of the cliff, an inadvertent plash of an oar betrayed his proximity, and she would have instantly withdrawn, had not an earnest and imploring gesture induced her to remain, as she imagined that he must have something of great importance to communicate. He rowed his boat under her window, where, without raising his voice above its natural tone, she could distinguish what he said. He then, urged on by the impetuosity of his passion, which had already taken such deep root in his heart, after informing her of his name and rank, avowed his love, and entreated hers in return. Her varying complexion evinced considerable agitation as she listened to him, which he interpreted as a favourable omen.

"I have already heard of you many times," said she, when he had ceased speaking; "and I have likewise heard of what you appear to have forgotten—that you are betrothed to Theresa, daughter of the Marquis de Nevada."

The face of Gonsalvo became crimson, as he listened to these words; and it was some time before he replied. "I confess," he at length said, "that what you have said is true; but when I consented to become thus entangled, in compliance with the earnest wishes of my father and hers, I knew nothing of love, except its name."

"Have you ever seen the lady?"

"Never! Her mother having died in her infancy, she has always resided at a distance with an aunt, which has given my friends an opportunity to deceive me with respect to her person. Fortunately, about a week since I fell in with a friend, who told me that which made me determine never to fulfil the engagement, even before I beheld you!"

"Is what he told you a secret?" inquired the lady.

"By no means. As good fortune would have it, he happened to obtain a sight of my betrothed, whom he declares to be absolutely frightful. She is not only hunchbacked, but her features are hideous, and her skin yellow and shrivelled, which I suppose must have been occasioned by disease, as my father has often told me she is not twenty."

The lady could not help laughing at this description, but, almost instantly assuming a serious air, she solemnly assured him that she would never consent to be in any way instrumental to his breaking his engagement. "It would be useless to repeat his many passionate appeals to her generosity; for, although she would not deny that, had they met under happier auspices, she might have listened to his suit, she told him that it would now be in vain to attempt seeing her again. She bade him adieu with emotion she could not disguise, and this was the only solace for poor Gonsalvo the subsequent week; during which he became perfectly satisfied, by his repeatedly baffled attempts to obtain another interview, that the resolution of the lady was not to be shaken.

"I might at least," thought he, "have ascertained her name; and then, should I be so fortunate as to get released from this hated engagement, I could write to her!"

At length his impatience became insufferable; and he resolved one morning, even at the hazard of incurring the displeasure of the unknown lady, to ride to the old tower, and make some inquiry of the inhabitants respecting her. He was informed that she had taken her departure that very morning by break of day, in company with a gentleman, handsome and richly dressed—but not a word more could he learn; and he found, to his vexation, that old Maggy, as well as her husband, could keep a secret.

When he returned to the inn, a letter was handed him, which he found to be from his father. It requested him to hasten home, as the Marquis de Nevada had gone for his daughter; and it was thought best by his friends, as well as hers, that the marriage should be immediately solemnised.

As there was nothing now to attract him to the spot where he was, he commenced his journey without delay, though he felt determined never to fulfil his engagement. His father received him with the greatest joy. "You have," said he, the moment they were alone, "saved yourself from ruin; for the uncle of Theresa, who is a member of the Inquisition, having received a hint that you intended to elude the engagement with her, has already marked you for a victim."

"I am ready to meet his anger," replied the son. "I had rather suffer torture, and even death, than do such violence to my affection as to marry his niece!"

The following letter from Theresa caused him to alter his mind:

"I am aware, Gonsalvo, of the repugnance you feel relative to fulfilling the marriage contract existing between us, entered into several years ago by our parents, from pecuniary motives, and to which at that time we both consented. I, moreover, know the cause of your unwillingness to fulfil it, being intimately acquainted with the lady of the tower, who wishes you to be informed that the sentiments she expressed to you during your interview with her, have undergone a change. By breaking the engagement you cannot secure her. I understand that you have received an account of my personal defects, which I hope, should we meet, you will find was exaggerated. If you can prevail on yourself to comply with the earnest wishes of your friends, that your feelings may not receive too great a shock at the moment of our meeting, I beg that you will consent for me to hide those features beneath a mask, which appeared so hideous to your friend, till after the performance of the marriage ceremony. Immediately after its conclusion, I give you my word, should it be your wish, to retire to a convent, to remain for life. Weigh well what I have written, and resolve not to brave the vengeance of my vindictive uncle."

"THERESA."

Gonsalvo read and re-read this epistle, which was written in a very delicate, lady-like hand. He felt flattered by its tone of submission, which he contrasted with the unbending resolution of the lady of the tower, and he caught himself wondering whether she might not possibly prove a temptress. The threats of the uncle, likewise, had their proper weight in turning the scale. Before he slept, he dispatched a note to Theresa, informing her of his readiness to fulfil the engagement upon the conditions she had named, and that his father had suggested, that as the marriage had already been considerably delayed, the ensuing day, if it met the approbation of her and her friends, would, in his opinion, be a proper time for it to take place. By the messenger who conveyed his note, an answer was returned that the lady and her friends would be in readiness to receive him and his retinue at the proposed time.

Early the following morning, Gonsalvo, attended by a numerous cavalcade, set out for the residence of the Marquis de Nevada, which displayed a style of magnificence suitable to his great wealth. They proceeded immediately to the family chapel. Gonsalvo recognised the bride by her mask, who was attired in a travelling dress, ready to step into the carriage in waiting, which was to convey her from the chapel to the convent, should it be the wish of the bridegroom. He was agreeably surprised by perceiving, contrary to the description given by his friend, that, far from being hunchbacked, her form was uncommonly fine. As his eyes wandered over the assemblage, they were arrested by a little hunchbacked woman, apparently upwards of forty, with a crooked nose, small black eyes, and a yellow, shrivelled skin. So completely did she correspond with the description he had received of his intended bride, that he was resolved to inquire her name; but was prevented by being required to take his station before the altar. He was much agitated himself, but Theresa trembled so excessively as to awaken his compassion, and he mentally determined that unless on removing her mask she disclosed a countenance still more repulsive than the little crooked-nosed, yellow-skinned female, who had kept her small black eyes fixed upon him ever since he had been in the chapel, that he would not mention a word about her going to the convent.

The ceremony was concluded, the mask was removed, and the lovely lady of the tower stood before him. Gonsalvo, who had been fortifying his mind, so as to behold without recoiling a countenance similar to that of the hunchbacked lady, with difficulty suppressed a cry of mingled surprise and joy. When he had recovered himself, he pointed to the little personage who had for the last half hour attracted so much of his attention. He inquired who she was.

"Oh, that," said the bride, with an arch smile, "is Theresa de Nevada, my aunt!"

SCIENCE.

NEW INVENTIONS, ETC.

TO MEND IRON POTS.—Mix finely-sifted lime with some white of eggs, till a thin paste is formed, then add some iron-filings. Apply this to the fracture, and the vessel will be found to be nearly as sound as ever.

DISCOVERY OF NEW SULPHUR AND SALT MINES IN IRELAND.—The Galway Packet states, that a sulphur mine, of very superior quality and unusual extent, has been recently discovered at Glan. The lode, even at the surface, is of the extraordinary breadth of eight feet. The miners are at present "working down," by which the extent of the mine will be ascertained. If the deposit of sulphur be of a length proportioned to the breadth already ascertained—which cannot be discovered until a considerable depth has been arrived at—this will be one of the most extensive and valuable sulphur mines in Europe.

NEW COMPOUND OF CAOUTCHOUC.—Mr. Goodyear has just patented a new compound of caoutchouc, which is produced by combining therewith a product of coal-tar and sulphur, alone or in combination with metals and other substances used in manufacturing compounds of caoutchouc. The product referred to is obtained by heating coal-tar in an open boiler, until it acquires a consistency about equal to that of resin, and it is mixed with the caoutchouc in proportions which may vary according to the character of the material to be produced. The sulphur, or compound thereof, is used for the purpose of vulcanising the material, which operation is performed by the application of heat in the ordinary manner.

THE DEGREES OF SLEEP.—Few of our readers, perhaps, are aware that the human body falls asleep by degrees, according to M. Cabinia, a French physiologist. "The muscles of the legs and arms lose their power before those which support the head; and these last sooner than the muscles which sustain the back; and he illustrates this by the cases of persons who sleep on horse-back, or while they are standing or walking." He conceives that the sense of sight sleeps first; then the sense of taste; next the sense of smell; next that of hearing; and lastly, that of touch. He maintains, also, that the viscera fall asleep, one after another, and sleep with different degrees of soundness.

COMMUNICATION BETWEEN THE SUFFOLK COAST AND THE NORTH OF EUROPE.—The Electric Telegraph Company is about to convey electric wires from the Colchester station to Orfordness, in Suffolk; and from thence a submarine cable will be laid down to Scheveningen, on the coast of Holland—thus giving this country another valuable means of communication with the continent. It will, of course, be necessary to break up a line of roads through Ipswich, in order that the wires may be laid down from the Eastern Union station to the Woodbridge Road, &c.; and notice of this intention having been given to the Paving Commissioners, a committee of that body met a few nights since to deliberate on the matter. It is believed that the Electric Telegraph Company have selected Ipswich as the locality for their principal office, which is to be situated on the Cornhill. Active operations for laying down the wires, through the whole route, will be commenced as soon as the Messrs. Ransome are able to supply the requisite pipes. These will be sunk underground, to the depth of about two feet, and will thus furnish, for some time, a large source of employment to the neighbourhood.

IMPROVED CRUSHING AND AMALGAMATING MACHINE.—A circumstance connected with the first gold deposits discovered in the United States, particularly shows the desirability of a thorough amalgamating process. From the workings at Gold Hill, Rowan County, North Carolina, commenced in 1799, a vast amount of halvans, or "tailings," have accumulated, and have long been considered an incumbrance on the land. A Mr. John Williams, a gentleman long engaged in mining, recently visited the state; and having taken fair samples, purchased 300,000 bushels of it at a ridiculously low price, as compared with the results as stated to have taken place by Berdan's machine, which shows that, by the old method of working, only one-sixth part of the gold was extracted, and that it now yields, by Berdan's machine, 28½ dollars per bushel. We are informed that a company has been formed for buying up all the refuse of the gold-workings from the old discoveries in North Carolina and Virginia; and a number of machines have been ordered for those states, as also for Australia and California.

IMPORTANT DISCOVERIES IN CRYSTALLOGRAPHY.—We have had the pleasure of seeing some of the results of the wonderful discoveries of that eminent philosopher, Andrew Crosse, Esq., of Taunton, in the science of crystallography. They consisted of beautiful artificial crystals, resembling ruby and native copper, presenting all the phenomena observable in nature. One specimen was the red oxide of copper, in crystals, attached to a copper sheet that had been subjected to long voltaic action. On this the crystals were small but well defined. Another presented a similar appearance to that singular and rare variety of copper termed moss-copper, and was of a beautiful description. The third was a cylinder of porous earthenware, studded with groups of crystals of pure copper, overlaid in places by ruby copper, also in crystals. These extraordinary researches, together with his other discoveries, have earned for their author a world-wide celebrity. Among other curious specimens was a piece of marble, into which a sovereign had been sunk by galvanic influence, leaving a very perfect impression. These unique and valuable specimens were presented by Mr. Crosse to Mr. G. Henwood, of Leeds, on a recent visit to Broomfield Hall, the seat of the celebrated savant, who, we hope, will one day favour us with an exposition of his labours at one of our public institutions. Mr. Henwood feels justly proud in showing these curiosities to any one who is desirous to see them.

EFFECTS OF CLOTHING.—Let a person in bed be covered with sufficient blankets to promote perspiration, and let these blankets be covered with an oil or India-rubber cloth, or other impervious fabric—in the morning the blankets will be dry, but the under surface of the India-rubber cloth will be quite wet. The blankets, by their dryness, show that the exhalations of the body pass through them, and would pass through them to the surrounding air, had they not been intercepted by the impervious outer covering. Thus it is inevitable that the habitual use of an impervious covering is injurious. Its effect must be to place the body in a constant vapour-bath, in which the insensible or healthy perspiration is constantly becoming condensed into the form of humidity, and, being prevented from passing off in its elastic and invisible form, the perspiration is thus constantly checked, and skin eruptions must be the result. Nevertheless, it must be less injurious to check perspiration, in some degree, by a water-proof over-coat, than to get soaked with rain. There can be no doubt but water-proof fabrics may be made very light, and so formed as to be worn in wet weather, and yet allow some room for perspiration. But still they are not healthy, and should never be put on but in cases of extreme necessity. Any person who has worn a water-proof outer garment for some time knows, by experience, that it causes weakness and chills. No person should wear a garment but such as allows the vapour or perspiration, which is continually exuding from the skin, to pass off freely. For this reason, a frequent change of entire clothing conduces to health. Clothing should be light and warm, and not too tight. A happy change in the fashions has taken place within a few years: it is the substitution of loose outer garments for the old-fashioned, tight, close, and pinching over-coats. Too few flannels are worn in America, especially along the eastern coasts, where sudden changes are frequent, and where many cold rains fall during the winter season. Children should always have their outer garments for winter made of woollen materials. Although India-rubber over-shoes are excellent for walking in the streets in wet weather, or when there is a thaw, with snow upon the ground, they should never be worn at any other time, and should be taken off as soon as the wearer enters a house. They prevent perspiration in a great measure, and are only useful as a lesser evil than getting completely wet from outside water.

SANITARY DANGERS.—A recent discovery with respect to iodine in water, and its influence on the human organisation, is of too great an interest to be passed over here—the more so, as it may lead our sanitary philosophers to some fresh considerations. The afflictions of goitre and cretinism, painfully familiar to all Alpine travellers, has always been attributed to the water drunk by the inhabitants of those districts which are the homes of these cretins. M. Chatin many years ago announced, as the result of his investigations, that the absence of iodine from the water was the predisposing cause of the disease. He has recently placed this hypothesis beyond a doubt. Fully and Sallion, two villages on the right bank of the Rhone, although almost touching each other, have long been remarkable: one village, Fully, being a notorious cradle of cretinism, the other Sallion, being as notoriously free from goitre or cretinism. Of late years, however, Sallion has in its turn become infected. And the reason, say the inhabitants, is none other than the sanitary measures recently taken to purify the water! Formerly the water of the Salente, before reaching the village, was wont to mingle with the streams of a hot spring, named source de fer. To bring purer water into the village they altered its course, and turned it away from the hot spring. Observers declared that the date of the appearance of goitre in Sallion coincides pretty nearly with that of their being blessed with "pure water!" M. Chatin investigated the matter: he analysed the water of the Salente, the water of the hot spring, and the water where the two streams mingle: the results confirmed his previous publications; he found the Salente water free from iodine, and the water of the hot spring and of the two mingled strongly impregnated with it. The conclusion is irresistible: wherever the water in these districts is free from iodine, cretinism and goitre are observed among the inhabitants; wherever it is impregnated with iodine, these diseases are absent. To "purify water" is not always to make it better adapted to our organism; and there may be some physiological instinct in that paradoxical lady's announcement, "I like water with a dead-cat-and-dog flavour in it."

BAD LUCK!

A BALLAD FOR THE RICHER DIGGINGS.

BE it what you will, brother—worse than what you say—
Try to make the best of things, or beat them as you may!
For never have I read in books, or heard, or seen ill luck
That didn't mend apace, when met by hearty English pluck.

I vot you've come a longish way, and watch'd a longish while,
And long'd in vain, from day to day, for crabbed Fortune's smile;
But cheerly, man! the longer you have look'd for luck in vain,

It must be something nearer now—so look for it again!
The blackest cloud that ever was, eclipsing summer light,
How looks it on its other side? all beautiful and bright!
The darkest providence there is, beheld by Wisdom's eyes,

Is merciful, and just, and kind, and excellent and wise!

So, friend, though disappointed hopes be bitter in the mouth,
Hope on! for Nature's very heart is hopeful in the south Australia, with her tempered clime, and richly teeming soil,

Will well repay with golden luck for hopefulness and toil.

Try labour! No more lottery-work in digging pits for gold,
But honest, well-paid labour, in the field and in the fold.
The luck that lives on nuggets is but poorly off for health
But wheat, and fruits, and wholesome roots, are food as well as wealth.

—Tupper's Ballads about Australia.

[MABEL'S JEALOUSY.]

LIVES OF THE QUEENS OF ENGLAND.

BY J. F. SMITH, ESQ., AUTHOR OF

"ROBIN GOODFELLOW," "AMY LAWRENCE," ETC.

ELIZABETH,
QUEEN REGNANT OF ENGLAND.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

The simplest means will oft overreach
The deepest cunning.

OLD PLAY.

On the following morning the young tapster descended at the usual hour, his mind evidently pre-occupied by some weighty matter. Even his pretty cousin failed to rouse him from the waking dream in which he was plunged, and more than once he had to endure the reproach of the host and his bustling dame, for permitting the guests to call for liquor without attending to them.

"Reuben!" said the pouting Mabel—perhaps she missed the sly kiss which her lover generally contrived to steal before his uncle and aunt made their appearance—"had you an evil dream last night?"

"I had, indeed!" was the reply.

"Oh, do tell me!"

"It is not suited for thy ears, my pretty coz!" answered the young man; "Mab!" he added—Mab was the pet name by which he generally called her—"I am in a strait!"

"A strait, Reuben?"

"Ay, a cruel one: I want to absent myself for three hours—and how to account for my absence I know not, unless you will assist me."

The daughter of the host of the Fair Rosamond, like most young girls, was a little inclined to be jealous. She remembered, with a pang, that her lover had admired the sparkling eyes and jetty locks of a certain miller's daughter, at Woodstock.

"I assist you!" she answered, pettishly; "you require no assistance or permission from me! I dare say they will not miss you in the house!"

"Do you think so?" said the young man, with an air of abstraction.

"And if they do," continued the girl, the tears starting to her eyes at what she considered the premeditated unkindness of her cousin, "the cause will amply justify you, no doubt!"

Reuben started, and, taking her by the hand, demanded, in an agitated tone, if she knew the cause.

"I can guess it!" answered the maiden, bitterly.

"Then I am sure," he said, "you will assist me! But how came you to know—did you overhear?"

"I am no eavesdropper!" interrupted the girl, proudly.

Reuben was more and more surprised—he could not understand either her words or manner: it was evident there was a game of cross purposes between them.

"You speak unkindly, Mab!" he replied, "and yet I am sure you do not feel so—for your heart is too good not to feel for one of your own sex, as young and beautiful as yourself!"

"Young and beautiful she is!" exclaimed the girl; "but not good: were she, I should not feel your unkindness! Alice Maythorn, the miller's daughter, may be all you fancy her, but I do not believe it! She flirted with Farmer Ebbs, till all Woodstock cried shame upon her; and they do say, the captain of the guard at the palace spake more freely of her name than befitted an honest girl!"

"Alice Maythorn!" repeated Reuben, a faint glimmering of the delusion under which the pretty Mabel was labouring for the first time dawning upon his mind; "who spoke of Alice?"

"You did: your dream has been of her—your visit doubtless intended for her!"

The young man stole his arm round her waist, and gently drew her towards him: she resisted sufficiently to show her wounded pride, but not to disengage herself from his embrace.

"I see, Mab," he said, "that I must trust you!"

"As you please, Reuben!"

"You know," he continued, "that I have no thought of the miller's daughter—that all my love is centered here—here where you are! What else, think you, has bound me so long to a home which is not mine? You are not jealous, Mabel—you only pretend to be, to draw my secret from me!"

The heart of Mabel fluttered less violently: she was convinced—but, like most maidens, required to be persuaded: it is so sweet to hear the proof of affection iterated from the lips of those we love.

"I am sure, Reuben, I am not curious; and if I do wish to know the object of your journey, it is for your sake more than mine—but you know best!"

"Dissembler!" cried the young man, stopping her words with a kiss; "you know that I have not a thought I would conceal from you!"

His cousin remained silent: woman like, she waited for the proof.

"You noticed the strangers who arrived last night?" he continued.

"The fierce, rude men," exclaimed the girl, "who drank so much wine, and swore so terribly? I did. But what of them? My father knows them: he would not draw his best sack and Bordeaux upon the credit of their swords and swaggering words. They are soldiers, I heard their leader say, recruiting for the service of the queen."

"Now, heaven forbid!" exclaimed the youth, crossing himself—for he was Catholic—"I would rather than a hundred golden nobles that she knew nothing of this matter!"

"What matter?"

Not to keep the poor girl longer in suspense, her lover proceeded to explain to her how, following the advice of the old trader, he had, during the night, climbed up the old porchway to the window of the chamber in which Basset and two of his companions slept; and that he had overheard sufficient of their conversation to know that the object of their visit was nothing less than to assassinate the Lady Elizabeth—now a prisoner in the old palace of Woodstock.

The countenance of Mabel grew pale as she listened to the tale: young as she was, she had seen sufficient of the troublous times which followed the close of the last reign, not to tremble at the importance of such a secret.

"Alas, Reuben!" she said, "what can we do?"

"Our duty, Mabel," answered the young man, firmly; "and leave the rest to heaven. From what I overheard, Sir Henry Beddingfield is no party to this infamous conspiracy—for the ruffians spoke of him as a precise and formal man, full of vain scruples touching his prisoner's safety."

"He is the friend of the queen?" timidly observed the girl.

"And therefore I will trust him!" answered her lover, with determination. "Mary cannot have consented to the murder of her sister; and if she has, my course would be equally clear. I must see Sir Henry, warn him of the danger, and leave the rest to heaven. I can no more!"

"You are right, dear Reuben—always right! I but conspire against my own happiness when I doubt you!"

The voice of Basset was now heard, calling loudly in the stables for some one to take his horse to Woodstock: the animal had cast a shoe, and the ruffian knew too well the service his steed might render him at a pinch, not to provide against the accident.

"There, Reuben," whispered his cousin, "the opportunity you wished for has arrived! But, for my sake, be cautious; for I would rather see you the husband of Alice, although I feel she is unworthy of you, than any misfortune should befall! It would kill me!"

With an adieu such as lovers whisper, her cousin left the kitchen, where the above conversation had taken place, and made his way to the stable, where the emissary of Gardiner was still calling for some one to take his horse.

"What is your pleasure, sir?" demanded the tapster, civilly, although his blood boiled at the sight of the ruffian.

"My mare has cast her shoe!" exclaimed Basset, with an oath; "these infernal roads would destroy the best steed in her majesty's stable! Mort de ma vie, that such an accident should occur in this out-of-the-way place!—where one might as easily expect to find a civil tapster as a skilful smith!"

This last remark was intended for the young man—with whom, our readers may remember, the speaker had exchanged something more than words the preceding night, on his arrival at the inn.

"I trust," said Reuben, "that both may be found!"

"Where?"

"The first at the Fair Rosamond," replied the young man; "and as for the second, you will find one of the most skilful smiths in all the country no further off than Woodstock. The boy can take him for you."

Basset shook his head disapprovingly. He did not like to trust his horse—the only thing in the world, perhaps, for which he felt regard—to the care of the rough-looking urchin who, at the call of the tapster, made his appearance from the kitchen-door; neither could he go himself—for he expected others of his confederate ruffians to join him; added to which, his presence was necessary to maintain anything like order amongst those who were with him.

"No," he said—"no; I cannot consent to trust Jovial with an ill-begotten whelp like that! If you could take him, now?"

It was not the policy of the tapster to appear too anxious upon the matter: he therefore answered warily.

"I should not mind the ride so much as my uncle's anger—who, in my absence, could not wait upon his guests."

"I will make your peace," urged Basset.

The young man shook his head.

"And add a crown piece to drink my health," added the speaker, "to pay you for your trouble, and as a plaster for the hard rap I gave you yesterday!"

Reuben suffered the offer of the coin apparently to influence his resolution; and, after a few more hesitations and difficulties—all of which Basset pledged himself to make smooth with the host—the young man finally consented.

"I suppose you can ride?" said the ruffian.

"Well enough for a tapster. When a boy, I was in the habit of galloping the farmers' colts over the common. Fear not," continued the youth, "I will bring you back Jovial safe and sound, after the smith has shod him; but I had better be off before my uncle comes!"

So impatient was the owner of Jovial to have him once more in a state fit for service, that he actually assisted the speaker to saddle him with his own hands, adding, all the while, numberless cautions for his management, all of which Reuben listened to with the greatest show of respect.

"How soon will you be back?" demanded Basset.

"In about four hours," was the reply.

"Make it five; and hark'ee, contrive to ascertain—but without naming me—at what hour Sir Henry Beddingfield usually hunts in the forest. Bring me sure word, and perhaps I may find a fellow to the crown piece I promised you, in my purse!"

"I can easily ascertain that," said the tapster, as he vaulted into the saddle, "of the first idler in Woodstock. Do you know what the country people say?"

This was asked in a confidential tone, which completely threw the emissary of Gardiner off his guard.

"No! what do they say?"

"That the queen's sister is a prisoner at the palace," said the young man; "but whether true or not, the Lady Elizabeth, I should think, will not be permitted to remain a captive long—so nearly related to her grace!"

"Perhaps not!" muttered Basset, with a sinister smile; "one way or another, her grace, in all probability, will speedily be released. But away with you! I am a soldier, and have nothing to do with politics!"

"Nor I," answered the youth, in a careless tone; "only as you are a stranger in these parts, I thought the rumour might amuse you!"

So saying, he set spurs to the horse, and cantered at a gentle pace in the direction of Woodstock.

CHAPTER XXIX.

I act thus for mine honour and your safety.
Harsh words, like rough shells, oft hide the Sweetest kernel.

MALONE.

The stern old knight, Sir Henry Beddingfield, was seated in his private apartment in Rosamond's Bower—as the north wing of the palace was called—in the royal domain of Woodstock. His morning meal of manchet bread, and a silver flask filled with wine, stood upon the table beside him. He was busily engaged in looking over some reports which an officer had brought him, and the repast had been suffered—although considerably beyond his usual hour—to remain untasted.

"Mine is no common charge!" he murmured, pressing his hand to his wrinkled brow, and pushing back the straggling grey hairs which fell upon his forehead. "The safety not only of my royal mistress, but of the kingdom, is in my keeping! Would the Lady Elizabeth were fairly wedded, and out of it!" he added. "If aught should happen to her in my ward, I should never forgive myself! My children would never forgive me; for a father's honour is the inheritance of his sons! Would I were quietly at home at my poor house of Kingrave! I am not at ease in courts!"

The meditations of the old man were interrupted by the entrance of a young officer, who was distantly connected with him—Frank Jerningham—a fine, noble-looking fellow—a devoted adherent of the Catholic party and the queen, like himself.

"Well Frank!" exclaimed Sir Henry, shaking his head reprovingly; "what squire's errand have you come upon now? Of late you seem to have had no other employment!"

"You mistake, kinsman!" said the young man, with a slight hesitation. "I cannot refuse to bring the messages her grace may charge me with!"

The old knight gave an inarticulate growl.

"Do you doubt me?" said the officer, in a tone of wounded pride.

"No Frank—no!" answered his relative; "I know you too well for that—yours is not the face that could mask a traitor: it is too eloquent, too truthful; but others may."

"So you acquit me, I am satisfied."

"Frank, Frank!" said the knight, "what I am about to say is not intended either as a caution or reproof—and yet I feel it necessary to say it—so understand a plain man in his plain meaning. The Lady Elizabeth is dangerous both to our royal mistress and the state. Many there are—may the saints confound their policy—who would persuade her majesty to bring her sister to trial and the block; others, still more base, urge a surer method. So you see how I am hampered—I have to guard alike against the escape of my prisoner, and the machinations of her enemies!"

"Surely you do not mean," exclaimed the youth, with a burst of indignation, "that they would dare to—"

"But men dare do all things but be honest!" quietly observed his relation; "knowing how I am engaged in honour, no less than loyalty, you will make no request, I am sure, which my duty to the queen will not permit me to say 'yes' to?"

"Fortunately," observed the officer, "the present one that I am charged with, will not interfere with either. The Lady Elizabeth merely wishes permission to take the air in the private gardens of the palace. Her health," he added, seeing the refusal rising to the lips of her guardian, "I fear, begins to fail her! Her cheek grows pale, and her eye dim as an imprisoned bird's."

"That regards her physician," observed the knight.

"Pardon me, Sir Henry!" replied the petitioner, firmly; "but her highness's health, equally with her safety, regards your honour. What would evil tongues not whisper, should she die under your ward?"

The last consideration evidently moved the old man, and he gave the required permission; at the same time charging his kinsman to take such precautions as would render escape or communication with any emissary of the Protestant party impossible.

As Frank Jerningham was about to leave the room, he suddenly recollected that he had left a young man in the guard-room, who had been anxiously inquiring to see him.

"Send him up to my chamber!" said Sir Henry. "And do not forget my words. So," he continued, as soon as he was alone, "that affair of Frank's being off my mind, like a good Christian I'll even attack my posset!"

The stalwart knight had barely time to finish his manchet and wine, before Reuben was marched into the room, between a file of men.

"So," said the adherent of Queen Mary, throwing himself back in his high, leathern-covered chair, "you have been inquiring for me?"

"Most anxiously!" cried the youth.

"You would speak with me?"

"At your pleasure, Sir Henry. But it must be alone!"

"Alone!" repeated the knight, suspiciously. "And what can a springall like thee have to say to the governor of Woodstock, that his soldiers may not hear?"

"Fear nothing!" exclaimed the young man. "Believe me, my purpose is a friendly one!"

"Fear!" repeated the old soldier, with an expression of mingled scorn and amused surprise. "Ha, ha! Gad's life, but the brat thinks he is talking with some village lout, or raw recruit! Fear, boy!" he added, sternly, "I have looked upon death in many a well-contested field! My hair has blanched with time: but no man living can say that the cheek of Henry Beddingfield ever grew pale with fear!"

Poor Reuben coloured to the temples, and muttered something about his meaning having been misconstrued.

At a sign from their commander, the soldiers left the apartment; and the knight and his visitor were left together.

"Now, boy," said the former; "out with thy speech; but look," he added, "that you do not try to deceive me! I have dungeons at Woodstock, which open at my word; and, if necessary, a gibbet to reward the spy and traitor!"

Unmoved by the threat, and confident in the integrity of his purpose, Reuben proceeded to relate all that he had overheard the preceding night at the window of the Fair Rosamond. Sir Henry Beddingfield listened with deep attention; not a muscle of his iron countenance moved, as he listened to the plan of murdering his charge under his very guard. When the tapster had finished, he asked him the name of the party, and a description of his person.

"His name," said the youth, "as it be his right one, is Basset. In person he has an ill-favoured, swaggering air, something between a half-gentleman and one of those foreign mercenaries engaged in the pay of the Protector, Somerset, during the last reign."

His hearer acknowledged that the description was a correct one.

"Return to your inn," he said, "and suffer not a word to escape you by which these ruffians may suppose you have held communication with me. Inform the knave who sent thee, that I start to-morrow to meet her majesty at Windsor, and that the palace here will be left in charge of my kinsman, Frank Jerningham."

Reuben promised to fulfil his orders to the letter.

"Do so, and thou shalt thrive. I say nothing to thee of reward; for I have discerned a better motive in thee than the mere lust of gold: in three days we will speak together again."

The speaker struck a bell which was upon the table near him, and commanded the orderly, who answered it, to conduct his visitor from Woodstock, and to be careful that he spake not a word with any one within the walls.

"So, so!" said the old knight, musingly; "Gardiner has given me a tangled web to unravel—but I'll disappoint him! A churchman, too! Fie! fie! for what sayeth the canon of our holy church? 'The priest shall be innocent of blood.' If the Lady Elizabeth end her ambitious dreams in the grave, it shall not be whilst she is in my keeping! Our Blessed Lady guard my honour and the queen's dignity!"

With these words, he took up his beaver, and descended to the private garden of the palace.

The royal captive was walking pensively under the shade of a broad avenue of sycamore trees, when her stern old guardian approached; he had assured himself on his way, by personal examination, that his kinsman Frank had taken every precaution against entrance from without; and the conviction annoyed him—for it left the burthen of the ungracious resolution he had taken upon himself.

"It must be done," he said, "even for her safety!"

Elizabeth met him with a gracious countenance, and thanked him for enlarging the bounds of her captivity.

"Which I am sorry," replied the old knight, with an air of embarrassment, "my duty obliges me to restrict again!"

"Sir Henry!"

"Your grace must return," he continued, bowing very low, "to your lodging in the palace—it is my humble duty to attend you!"

The haughty spirit of the future queen was deeply wounded at the apparent caprice to which she was subject, and tears of mortified pride dimmed, for an instant, her flashing eyes.

"This well!" she said; "you are the master; but you may one day repent this insult offered to the sister of your sovereign! I had almost taught myself," she added, "to look upon you as my host—I perceive my error: from henceforth I know you only as my gaoler!"

As the bitter word fell from her lips, the stern old knight drew himself up erect before her: his features, usually so calm and immovable, were flushed almost as deeply as her own.

"Madam," he said, "I pray to God that your grace may never have a worse gaoler! To speak the truth, I have to guard you not only for the queen's pleasure, but against your enemies! The time will come when you will do me justice! I repeat my request—if necessary," he added, "my command! Had you the queen's permission to walk in this garden—nay, to quit Woodstock this very instant—despite her hand and seal, for four-and-twenty hours I would hold you in close ward!"

The clear-headed Elizabeth saw at once that her safety was the speaker's motive.

"Forgive me!" she exclaimed. "God help me! I am sore beset, and scarcely know my friends from my enemies! But I feel assured that Sir Henry Beddingfield is not amongst those who would tamper with his own honour, or a helpless woman's life!"

The old man kissed her extended hand. From that time there was a degree of confidence established between them.

FACETIÆ.

WILL, WIT, AND JUDGMENT.—At twenty years of age the will reigns—at thirty, the wit—and at forty, the judgment.

WHY is water in a ship's hold like a man in prison?—Because it wants to be bailed (bailed) out.

AN American mechanic has invented a machine which is to be driven by the force of circumstances.

IF the Doge of Venice were to lose his sight, what useful article would it be converted into?—A Venetian blind.

A genius has just invented a new rat exterminator. It is a sort of snuff, of such power that one smell gives a rat a fit of sneezing that continues till he jerks his head off.

BAD thought's a thief! He acts his part,
Creeps through the window of the heart;
And if he once his way can win,
He lets a hundred robbers in.

THERE lately resided in an Ayrshire village a man who proposed, like Leman, to write an etymological dictionary of the English language. Being asked what he understood the word pathology to mean, he answered, with readiness and confidence, "Why the art of road-making to be sure!"

"NEVER MADE HIS MOTHER SMILE."—What a unique and meaning expression was that of a young Irish girl, in giving testimony against an individual in a court of justice the other day. "Arrah, sir," said she, "I'm sure he never made his mother smile!" There is a biography of unkindness in that short and simple sentence.

IF all the world were conservative, society would be like a long train of cars without an engine. And if everybody were radical, it would be like a train of engines without cars, rushing furiously ahead, bound for progress as long as the track holds out!

A man in the habit of travelling, complaining to his friend that he had often been robbed, and was afraid of stirring abroad, was advised to carry pistols with him on his journey. "Oh, that would be worse!" replied the hero; "the thieves would rob me of them also!"

LOVERS' MADNESS.—A man who has loved madly will laugh at his madness as soon as he has got cured of it; but a woman never laughs upon such a subject. With her love is a madness of which she never sees the folly.

QUEER.—There is one remarkable feature in the Isle of Wight, not generally known, which is, that any person who visits there may obtain mutton from Coves.

BETTING HOUSE NUISANCES.—If the owners of these dens of gambling continue their reckless speculations, it is not improbable that they will be more closely connected with "Tatters all" than they anticipate.

"HAIT!"—One Mr. Still has been gazetted to a cornetcy in the 3d Dragoon Guards. Query. How can he be still when on the march?

A HUMAN GOOSE!—A weekly paper speaks of "an extraordinary gosling, hatched by Mr. J. Palmer, of Lockington. It is to be presumed from this that Mr. Palmer was the goose. Flattering!"

A NEW READING.—The Law of Settlement—a police-man's truncheon!

DROPPING DOWN IN PRICE.—The Crystal Palace magnates have thought proper to tax each visitor desirous of inspecting the operations, with a fee of five shillings on entry. However, this is coming down in charge—since, on the occasion of the Queen's visit to Sydenham, lately, the contractors received a whole Sovereign for a peep!

PALMERSTONIAN POLICY.—On dit, that since the pretended discovery of the Kossuth gunpowder plot, on the premises of the Messrs. Hale, at Rotherhithe, the Home Secretary has it in contemplation to prohibit livery servants from carrying powder in their hair, for fear some of Kossuth's hot-headed admirers should cause a popular explosion.

NOT TO BE ENDURED.—A number of shopkeepers have been recently fined and exposed for using short weights and measures. Tant mieux! these dishonest tradesmen ought to be punished for thus keeping up a constant "counter-irritation" of the poorer classes.

A "STRIKING" SIGNBOARD.—Not many years ago, the following inscription was exposed on a signboard at Oxford, by a watchmaker: "Here are fabricated and renovated, trochilic horologies, portable and permanent, linguaculous or taciturnal; whose circumgrations are performed by internal spiral elastic, or extensive pendulous plumbages; diminutives, simple or compound, invested with aurent or argent integuments." Doubtless the watchmaker of classic Oxford was a college man—for decidedly a similar puff would not be met with at the present day in that part of the metropolis called the Seven Dials!

NOT LIKE ME.—Gilbert Stewart, the celebrated portrait painter, is said to have once upon a time met a lady in the street in Boston, who asked him with: "Ah! Mr. Stewart, I have just seen your likeness, and kissed it, because it was so much like you." "And did it kiss you in return?" "Why, no." "Then," said Stewart, "it was not like me."

A wag a few years since procured some eye-wash of a quack oculist, to be applied to a glass eye which he wore. The oculist, not being very sharp sighted, discovered there was some defect in the eye, but thought it so trifling that he warranted a cure or no pay. The wag took the wash and departed. In a week or so after he returned with the empty phial, and apparently in great distress. "Oh, doctor! doctor!" said he, "your stuff has wholly destroyed my eye!" at the same time opening the lid of the empty socket with his finger, to the horror of the gasping and staring oculist. "Is it possible? can it be possible?" exclaimed the eye-tinker. "I never knew my medicine to operate so before! Well, my dear sir, I can do nothing less than return you your money." "But you must do more, sir. What is five shillings to be compared with the loss of an eye?" replied the wag. "If you will give me two hundred, I will sign a pledge never to expose you; but if you do not, I will prosecute you forthwith, and you are a ruined man." The quack handed over a check for the amount.

SENSIBLE DOCTOR.—A handsome young widow applied to a physician to relieve her of two distressing complaints with which she was afflicted. "In the first place," said she, "I have little or no appetite. What shall I take for that?" "For that, madam, you should take air and exercise." "And, doctor, I am quite fidgetty at night, and afraid to lie alone. What shall I take for that?" "For that, madam, I can only recommend that you take—a husband!"

MILTON was asked by a friend whether he would instruct his daughter in the different languages; to which he replied: "No, sir, one tongue is sufficient for a woman."

HORRIBLE REVENGE.—Dr. Radcliffe, who was fond of the pleasures of the table, was one afternoon comfortably disposing of a bottle of wine, when a countryman entered the room, and begged him to come immediately to his wife, who was dying. "I can't help it, my fine fellow: I can't move till I have finished my bottle." Now it happened that the countryman was a large, strong man, and the doctor a very small one; so it occurred to the former that his best plan was to seize the doctor and carry him off on his shoulders. He did so; and while he was bearing him along, the doctor, bursting with rage, exclaimed: "You villain, I'll cure your wife!" and he was as good as his word.

When Horne Tooke was called before the commissioners to give an account of the particulars of his income, having answered a question that was asked, one of the wise men said peevishly, that he did not understand his answer. "Then," said Tooke, "as you have not half the understanding of another man, you ought, at least, to have double the patience."

A WIDE-AWAKE IDEA.—Dr. Layard says: "The Bedouins are acquainted with few medicines. The desert yields some valuable simples, which are, however, rarely used. Dr. Sandwith, hearing from Suttum that the Arabs had no opiates, asked him what they did with one that could not sleep? 'Do!' answered the sheikh, 'why, we make use of him—we set him to watch the camels.'"

The Vincennes Patriot relates the following incident in the history of an old well-known citizen (now deceased), for many years engaged in the fur trade of Vincennes: On a certain occasion he sold a gun to a customer, which was to be paid for in fur within a certain time. The time passed by, and nothing was heard from the buyer of the gun. It was ascertained that he had left the country. Several months afterwards the following letter was received from him: "Mr. M. S.—Dear sir; I am out here in Iowa, four hundred miles from Vincennes. If this is not fur enough to pay for that gun, I will go fur-ther. Respectfully, &c., —" Of course that was considered fur enough, and a receipt in full was sent.

A wag sent to a tailor to make him a coat out of a piece of cloth he had purchased. "Can't do it," said snip, after measuring the cloth; "can't do it: there isn't stuff enough!" He then sent for another tailor, who, after carefully measuring the material, undertook to make the coat. In due time the garment was delivered, and he stuck himself into it. His first visit was to the tailor. "Well, sirrah," said he, "behold me in the coat from the very stuff you said was insufficient! You see that there was stuff enough, after all!" "Very likely," said snip, with imperturbable sang froid; "very likely; but the son of the tailor who made it, is not so big as mine!"

INVITATION TO TEA.—"Sally," said Mrs. Hammond to her maid-servant (a rather original character). "Sally, go to Mrs. Gaskill's with my compliments, and I shall be happy to see her and Miss Gaskill at my house to tea this afternoon." "Yes, mem," answered Sally; "but if the ladies can't come, what shall I say?" "Go along, girl!" replied Mrs. H.; "they'll be sure to come." Away went the wench, and delivered her message in due form. "Give my compliments to your mistress," said Mrs. Gaskill, "and I and my daughter will be sure to come." "Ay," quoth Sally, "missus said you would."

An ironmonger, who kept a shop in the High Street of Edinburgh, and sold gunpowder and shot, when asked by any ignorant person in what respect patent shot (at that time a novel article) surpassed the old kind—"Oh, sir," he would answer, "it shoots deader!"

A parcel was recently received at the National Bank, Rosera, containing a fine infant, three months old, bearing on its neck a written note, gently intimating that the mysterious stranger might be placed to the credit of Mr. —, a gentleman having an account open with the bank.

CAPRICIOUSNESS OF THE MEMORY.—A young boy was sent to school, and commenced learning the alphabet. He readily mastered the "list of letters," save one—the B was a poser. Do what he could, he was unable to retain its name. His industry and application were strengthened by the frequent mementoes of the rod, but all to no purpose—he could not remember the B. At close of school, one evening, after his body had suffered martyrdom for his mind, he passed along the road tending homeward, dropping walnut-sized tears the while, when one of his comrades accosted him with, "Bill! what are you crying for?" "Can't remember the B," says Bill. "Well," rejoins his companion, "don't cry; and if you can forget it by to-morrow morning I will give you three fish-hooks." The result was that Bill tried so hard to forget the fatal letter, that he always remembered it from that day to this.

A gentleman lately complimented a lady on her improved appearance. "You are guilty of flattery," said the lady. "Not so," replied he; "for I vow you are plump as a partridge." "At first," said the lady, "I thought you guilty of flattery only, but you are now actually making game of me."

EPICURAM ALL THE WAY FROM BELGIUM.—The following epigram is written in the travellers' book at Hans-sur-Lesse, in Belgium:

"Old Euclid may go to the wall,
For we've solved what he never could guess—
How the fish in the river is small,
But the river they live in is Lesse."

THE LONG AND SHORT OF IT.—Though dry measure and long measure are not the same, it is a curious fact that wet measure—in bottles—and short measure are equivalent.—Punch.

BOARD AND LODGING FOR MURDERERS.—An unfortunate scamp gave himself up the other day to the police authorities, on the charge—supported by his own confession—of having murdered somebody in Edinburgh. The self-accusation turned out to be a hoax, and upon inquiry it appeared that the pretended murderer had no other object than board and lodging, which he obtained readily enough when he was supposed to have committed a murder, though, to use his own words, he had been "kicked out" when he offered himself up in a state of innocence to the "proper authorities."—Ibid.

HARMONIC RAPPING.—If spirits can rap upon a table, it stands to reason that they are also able to strike the keys of a piano. The rappers should therefore extend the range of their entertainments by adding a Broadwood to their mahogany, and by combining the harmonic meeting with the spiritual stance. Weber, who was such a capital hand at supernatural effects, and whose amiable character during life renders it probable that his disposition is accommodating after death, would doubtless willingly oblige the company with an air or two from Der Freischütz, or Oberon, or perform the overture to the Ruler of the Spirits. The ears of the visitors might also be gratified with a genuine "Ghost Melody," the effect whereof upon those organs would probably be to add, in a preternatural degree, to their natural elongation.—Ibid.

THE ELECTRIC PARLIAMENT.—An Electric Telegraph is now laid down from the House of Commons to the principal railway stations, and the echo of a legislator's wisdom has hardly died upon Mr. Barry's rafters, when the wisdom itself is crying aloud in the news-rooms of York and Edinburgh. Fine-Bar himself is beaten dead by a score of telegraph clerks scattered over the kingdom. It is also announced not only that wires are being arranged all over that vast labyrinth of the New Palace at Westminster, so as to summon the members, in whichever of its thousand cells they may be hidden, when wanted for divisions, but that lines are being laid down from the House to the Carlton, Reform, and other Clubs—so that men may dine in peace, and yet save their country. Is not the orator's trade made easy—"as easy (as Hamlet says) as"—we really forget the simile. But why not carry out the plan a little further? Instead of merely sending electric messages to the members at the clubs, why not make the members send their speeches down to the house by the same medium? The Speaker and a couple of clerks might then do all the work at Westminster. And how oratory would gain by the abbreviation which would ensue on a member's finding he had to pay for every word he sent down. How prating and platitudes would be checked, when a cheque was necessary for their utterance.—Ibid.

MISCELLANEOUS.

In 1838, corporal punishment was inflicted, in the English army, eight hundred and seventy-nine times; in 1852, ninety-six times.

"ONE hour in the bath," Napoleon used to say, "refreshes me more than four hours of sleep." A saying worth quoting at this season.

CHINESE ingenuity is said to have succeeded in teaching monkeys to gather tea on those spots which are not accessible to man but at the hazard of life.

As ladies are proverbially fond of looking-glasses, they should be made acquainted with a fact but little known or attended to: that the beauty and truth of their reflected images very much depend upon the quality and colour of the glass itself, which are easily detected by merely holding white paper edgewise to the glass; and just so much as the reflected paper varies in colour from the paper applied, in the same proportion are their complexions apparently tinged or blackened by it.

VESTIGES OF CREATION.—"The author of 'Vestiges of Creation' was Frederick Augustus Kentish. Before the work was printed, he proposed sending the manuscript to America; but it was ultimately agreed that Chambers, the printers of Edinburgh, should print it. Thousands of individuals, from different parts of the world, have applied to them for information as to who the author was—but they have kept it a profound secret.

"LADIES BEWARE!"—A lady, well known in the first society of Paris, has just died of an unknown and mysterious malady. On a post-mortem examination it was discovered that THREE RIBS were crushed into the liver—the result of tight lacing.

SECRETS WORTH KNOWING.—In the Insolvent Court, some information was lately given of public importance, respecting the comparative expense of the Superior and County Courts. An attorney stated that in cases under £20 judgment could be obtained now in a Superior Court, where no appearance was entered, for £2 16s.; whereas in a County Court it would cost £4. Another attorney said, that in the County Court the fees out of pocket were upwards of £3, and in the Superior Courts only 5s. For a summons to £20 in a County Court, the fee was £1 13s. and the hearing fee upwards of £3, even by consent; whereas in the Superior Court an order could be drawn up for 4s. Mr. Commissioner Phillips was not aware that such a material difference existed, and he had no doubt such information would be quite new to the public.

THE NEEDLE is at this day a worse death-dealing implement than the sword. For while the sword runs in its scabbard throughout nearly all Christendom, and when it is used only cuts off a few men, the needle is actively plied by vast multitudes of women, the present and prospective mothers of our race; and it bows down, weakens, and blights their physical frames, causing them to bear families of puny and short-lived children. And how large a part of the "stitch, stitch, stitching," that produces this deplorable result is for vanity, rather than necessity!

THE SUDDEN RISING OF AN AFRICAN DESERT STREAM.—About four o'clock in the afternoon, there was a cry in the encampment, "The Wady is coming!" Going out to look, I saw a broad white sheet of foam advancing from the south between the trees of the valley. In ten minutes, a river of water came pouring along, and spread all around us, converting the place of our encampment into an isle of the valley. The current in the deepest part was very powerful, capable of carrying away sheep and cattle, and of uprooting trees. This is one of the most interesting phenomena I have witnessed during my present tour in Africa. The scene, indeed, was perfectly African. Rain had been observed falling in the south; black clouds and darkness covered that zone of the heavens, and an hour afterwards came pouring down this river of water into the dry, parched-up valley. This incident of Wady Tintagoda explains the Scriptural phrase, "rivers of waters;" for here, indeed, was a river of water appearing in an instant, and almost without notice.—Richardson's Narrative of a Mission to Central Africa.

A GERMAN TEMPLE OF FORTUNE.

"The Rooms," the Temple of Fortune, the ordeal of destiny, Bob, is held here; and the rake of the croupier is the distaff of the fate. Hither come flocking the representatives of every nation of the world, and of almost every class in each. Royalty, princely houses, and nobility with twenty quarters, are jostled in the indiscriminate crowd with houseless adventurers, beggarly spend-thrifts, and ruined debauchees. All who can contribute the clink of their louis-d'ors to the music are welcome to this orchestra! And women, too, fair, delicate, and lovely, the tenderest flowers that ever were nursed within domestic care, mixed up with others, not less handsome, perhaps, but whose syren beauty is almost diabolic by comparison. What a Babel of tongues, and what confusion of characters. The grandee of Spain, the escaped galley slave, the Hungarian magnate, the London 'swell,' the old and hoary gambler with snow-white mustaches, and the unfledged minor, anticipating manhood by ruining himself in his 'teens.' All these are blended and commingled by the influence of play; and, differing as they do in birth, in blood, in lineage, and condition, yet are they members of one guild, associates of one society—the gambling-table. And what a leveller is play! He who whispers in the ear of the crown prince yonder is a branded felon from the Bagnes de Brest; the dark-whiskered man yonder, who leans over the lady's chair, is an escaped forger; the Carlisle noble is asking friendly counsel of a Christiano spy; the London pickpocket offers his jewelled snuff-box to an archduke of Austria. "How goes the game to-day?" cries a Neapolitan prince of the blood, and the question is addressed to a red-bearded Corsican, whose livelihood is a stiletto. "Is that the beautiful Countess of Hapsburg?" asks a fresh-looking Oxford man; and his friend laughingly answers: "Not exactly; it is Mademoiselle Varenne, of the Odeon." That fine-looking man yonder is a Mexican general, who carried off the military chest from "Guano guato," the pompous little fellow beside him is a Luchese count, who stole part of the crown jewels of his sovereign; the long-haired, broad-foreheaded man, with open shirt-collar, so violently denouncing the wrongs of injured Italy, is a Russian spy; and the dark Arab behind him is a Swiss valet, more than suspected of having murdered his master in the Mediterranean. Our English contingent embraces lords of the bed-chamber, members of Parliament, railroad magnates, money-lending attorneys, legs, swells, and swindlers, and a small sprinkling of university men, out to read and be ruined—the fair sex, comprising women of a certain fast set in London, divorced countesses, a long category of the widow class, some with daughters, some without. There is an abundance of good looks, splendid dress, and money without limit! The most striking feature of all, however, is the reckless helter-skelter pace at which every one is going, whether his pursuit be play, love, or mere extravagance. There is no such thing as calculation—no counting the cost of anything.—The Dodd Family Abroad.

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

LEILA.—When a person bears several baptismal names, one is adopted as the distinguished appellation. The Empress of the French has selected Eugénie in preference to either Maria, Francisca, or any of her other numerous names. The same with our Queen. She is called Victoria, although Alexandrina is her first name.

J. P. D.—No such orders were ever issued by the most despotic government. The Metropolitan Police are under the supreme management of the Commissioners in Scotland Yard. The City Police are under the City Commissioner, D. W. Harvey, Esq.; but both forces are immediately and immediately at the service of the crown.

F. C.—Crochet work was re-introduced into England from France, but it is as old as the art of knitting, itself—indeed it is the most primitive mode of knitting, because only one needle is used. The Jews, the ancient Egyptians—and, to go further back, the Hindoos—were crochet workers. It is not half so respectable, because not so useful an occupation, as making baskets. Doing a bit of "crochet" is too frequently an excuse for not being wholly unemployed.

BUSH.—The Government School of Design, Somerset House, Strand, was opened in 1837, as a national institution to offer instruction to all who desire to obtain a knowledge of ornamental art, and to supply a systematic course of education in relation to every kind of decorative work to such persons as are, or are intended to become, designers for the various manufactures of the country. Drawing, painting, and modelling are taught, in all the branches which have reference to the purposes and requirements of ornamental art, or which may be applicable to objects of manufacture dependent on form or pattern. The fees for instruction are two shillings a month for the morning school, and two shillings a month for the evening school.

JOHN SMITH.—1. The betrothal finger is the same as the wedding-ring one. A lady may wear what ring she pleases besides the "broad gold band" and keeper, without anything being meant except her love of ornament. 2. You are in love, you say, with a woman seven years your senior. The sentiment is not love—it is merely a penchant—conquer it. Besides, if you cannot afford to "keep her as a lady," why risk a rejection? The brother gives you good counsel.

DISCRETION, JUN.—We detest your philosophy. A lie is a lie, and all the equivocation in the world cannot make it anything else. The only offence Lord Byron never forgave in a servant was a lie. "What constitutes a gentleman?" asks the Englishman. "Not his station, for he may disgrace it—not his power, for he may misuse it—not his graces and endowments, for you may despise them. It is in the nakedness of truth, because he possesses qualities which ennoble him, and shed a lustre over his actions, in their utter separation from those of the common herd by whom he is surrounded. Because you see in that man a depth of feeling and right principle, which you look in vain for in the ordinary run of the men you meet."

CHURCHILL.—You inform us that you have a strong desire to be something more than common—that you are perpetually attempting to do something novel, and, as you imagine, good; and then ask us whether we think you are in a healthy state of mind. We presume your question is, whether you should confine yourself to one particular study? We firmly reply in the negative. Talent should never be fettered. The greater the diversity, the greater the exercise of the powers of reasoning. A general acquaintance with history, political economy, mathematics, and moral philosophy, will fit you for any employment. Never mind the Greek and Latin—they are dead languages, and are of not the slightest use in these days of illimitable developments of every species of knowledge upon which the intellect can fasten itself. Greek and Latin have done good service, and ought to be respected as old and faithful servants; but they ought to be treated as old and faithful servants—that is, decently pensioned off. Persevere in the course into which your good fortune has led you. Remember the example of Lord Bacon, when taunted with your miscellaneous acquisitions. He had Greek and Latin in abundance, but he did not revolutionise the world with his classical attainments—the mere agencies of thought, just as iron, coal, water, and fire are the mere agents in making a locomotive travel at the rate of sixty miles an hour, at the bidding of the Watts, Stephenson, and Brunels of the mechanical world. Lord Bacon was a great lawyer, as well as a great philosopher; but he lived by the law, and earned immortality by his philosophy.

ALFRED.—We must maintain our opinion of what are styled the dark ages. They were not dark, for to them we are indebted for the germ of all our modern institutions. Freemen legislating for freemen, first created civil liberty. By abolishing slavery, they first brought the great body of the people within the pale of society. By creating a middle class of men, unknown to all former times, who, neither masters nor slaves, were to fix their own rank in the world, by their industry and activity, they gave new energy to the human mind, and called forth all its latent faculties. By raising women from the degraded state to which antiquity had sunk them, and making them the companions of man's virtues and talents, they imparted to all the social relations that tone of politeness and sentiment which we should in vain look for among the most illustrious Greeks and Romans. They were surely not barbarians who first gave dignity to the intercourse of the sexes, by bestowing on it the delicacy of feeling which constitutes the charm of love? The age of chivalry surely was not a dark one? But the history of at least twelve centuries after the Christian era is such a tangled mass of fable, prejudice, and ignorance, that we shall despair of justice being rendered to the middle ages, until quite a new school of writers shall have sprung into existence—a school which will seek to deliver truth from the insensate category of intolerance and fiction.

F. (Brompton).—The question raised as to the opening of the Crystal Palace on Sundays, ought, we think, to be made auxiliary to the settlement—the final settlement—of not only what is Sunday, but whether it is expedient to have a Sunday at all. At present it would appear there were two Sundays in England—an Act of Parliament Sunday and a voluntary Sunday. Neither of them are binding, except on the conscience; and, as we have a strong opinion on the subject, we publish a portion of your communication—not in the hope that it will still further weaken the moral idea, in the popular mind, of what Sunday should be, but to show what we fear is the most prevalent opinion on the question, and the innumerable difficulties that lie in the way of its satisfactory, its religious adjustment. You say—"There certainly does appear, at first sight, something awkward in taking money at the doors of the People's Palace on a Sunday; but, if carefully scrutinised, it will be found a vast improvement upon many of the now existing government licences. The government grants licences to omnibuses and cabs, and we pay our money at their doors without feeling awkward. Government grants licences to public-houses (or rather magistrates, who, I presume, act from the government), to take money at the counters on Sundays, without scruple; and, further, how often is money taken at the church doors, and even at the altars of churches, on administering the sacrament? I will take it for granted the latter is intended to benefit the soul—where, then, is the terrible sin of benefitting the body? You observe, in a late number,

"the Sunday opening of the People's Palace is a wide question," but it appears to lay in a small compass, if looked at disinterestedly. If it is to be the People's Palace, let the people see the inside of it. Now the majority of the people cannot see it unless it be opened on a Sunday. It is very well for those to rail against its being opened on a Sunday who can conveniently spend three or four days in the week to see it. Let any of such advocates be placed like me, or like thousands who are in the same position as myself, confined in-doors, daily, from seven in the morning until nine at night. Let them answer conscientiously—would they consider they would be committing any sin by entering the palace on a Sunday? If so, I am in ignorance where it lays. It may be argued—it would be as sinful to enter the palace on a Sunday as to enter Cremorne Gardens, the Grecian Saloon, or other places of public resort: if so, would keeping the palace closed deter the people from flocking to them. If there is an evil in attending the People's Palace on a Sunday, surely it is a less one than attending such places as above-named; and if the church and its ministers cannot deter the people from attending such places, entice them by throwing open the People's Palace, and let them see and know the wonders of God and the works of their fellow-men."

M. R.—Your brother, being illegitimate, has no claim whatsoever to the property. It is divisible equally among the three sisters, and you, as the oldest, should administer, so as to be legally authorised to interfere, and take possession of your deceased father's effects.

ELLEN GREY AND OTHERS.—Freckles may be removed by a lotion made of one ounce of rectified acid of pitch, and one pint of distilled water.

FANNY MASON.—There would be no impropriety in your making a present of a small drawing to the clergyman whose ministrations you attend. The etiquette would be to write to him, asking his permission. Clergymen are sensitive mortals.

E. D.—The crested helmet, worn by the soldiers or nearly all nations, is of Roman origin. The Roman soldiers took great pride in their cresta, or crest. In the time of Polybius they wore plumes of feathers of various colours, to render them attractive at home, and terrible to their enemies—just as the Turks and our own Horse Guards do in the present day. Virgil describes Mezentius's crest as made of a horse's mane:

Christaque hirsutus equina.

W. H.—In the case of one of the parties absconding—as you state, running out of the church immediately after the conclusion of the ceremony—the marriage is not complete, and it might be annulled by application to an ecclesiastical court.

L. L.—Damp walls should be coated with cement—but where that cannot be done, they should be washed with a strong solution of alum. This converts the deleterious salt into an efflorescent one. Alum added to the plaster in the first instance, will have the same effect.

T. K.—Varnish for coloured drawings: Canada balsam one ounce, oil of turpentine two ounces. Dissolve. Size the drawings first with jelly of isinglass, and when dry apply the varnish, which will make them look like oil-paintings.

ABSENT.—When a legatee is abroad or cannot be found, the act 36 Geo. III. c. 52, s. 32, authorises the executor to pay the legacy into the Bank of England. But no legacy can be sued for after twenty years from the time of its becoming due to any person capable of giving a receipt for it, unless in the meantime some portion of principal or interest shall have been paid, or a written acknowledgment of its being due shall have been given to the legatee, or his representative or agent, by the person from whom the legacy is due, or his representative or agent.

WILLIAM BALFOUR.—Counting a Billion—What is a billion? The reply is very simple—a million times a million. This is quickly written, and quicker still pronounced. But no man is able to count it. You count 160 or 170 a minute—but let us even suppose that you go as far as 200—then an hour will produce 12,000; a day 288,000; and a year, or 365 days, 105,120,000. Let us suppose now, that Adam, at the beginning of his existence, had begun to count, had continued to do so, and was counting still, he would not even now, according to the usually supposed age of the globe, have counted near enough. For to count a billion, he would require 9512 years, 34 days, 5 hours, and 20 minutes, according to the above rule. Now, supposing we were to allow the poor creature 12 hours daily, for rest, eating, and sleeping, he would need 19,024 years, 69 days, 10 hours, and 40 minutes.

T. J.—The memory, according to Sydney Smith, may be wonderfully strengthened by referring single facts and observations to one simple principle, and by these means we can either remember the principle by remembering the fact, or the fact by remembering the principle. Thus, if we were to prove that democracy leads to despotism, we may refer to Julius Caesar, Cromwell, and Bonaparte. What is of importance to the memory is a philosophical arrangement of facts, so that they may re-appear when wanted, which they will not when promiscuously scattered through the understanding.

J. W. D.—We are obliged by the information, and now give as complete a list as we can of English actresses who married from the stage: The Duchess of Bolton, the Countess of Derby (Miss Farren), Lady Boothby (Mrs. Nisbett), the Duchess of St. Albans (Miss Mellon), the Countess of Craven (Miss Brunton, aunt to the present Mrs. Yates), the Countess of Essex (Miss Stephens), the Countess of Harrington (Miss Foote), Lady Wrixon Beecher (Miss O'Neill), Lady Morgan (Miss Owsen), Lady Bishop (better known as Madame Bishop), and Lady William Lennox (Miss Paton, since divorced and married to a Mr. Wood, a vocalist).

NEMO.—A person dying some years ago, left a will, in which he bequeathed to his widow the interest of a certain sum of money, the principal, on her death, to be divided amongst a certain number of nephews and nieces, the sum being stated that shall be received by each. Now, prior to the death of the widow, the eldest nephew dies, leaving a widow and children; the second nephew also dies, not having been married, but leaving illegitimate children. As both the nephews survived the testator, their legacies became vested in them, and, unless they made wills, are distributable among their next of kin. The widow and children take one whole share between them.

EBULUS.—We must refer you to our Essays on "How to make Money." But while earnestly protesting against the arbitrary authority of parents in the selection of a business or profession for their children, we must say the following remarks of yours show a rebellious spirit. You say—"This is called a free land, where parents exercise full dominion over the destinies of their children, and have it in their power to place them in any employment their chimeras may lead them to. How much more liberty was there in the law of ancient Spartans upon this subject, among whom it was not lawful for the father himself to bring up his children after his own fancy. Why not a youth himself be allowed to choose that situation in life to which his own peculiar genius and disposition lead him? He would then follow his employment with an energy and willingness of mind unknown to him, if the business were forced upon him." There is some truth in these remarks, but much error. Our correspondent looks at himself from one point, and because his parents will not, or cannot look at his future from the same point, he jumps to the conclusion that he must be right. He is wrong, both in logic and duty. When we say a parent should consult his child's natural disposition and capability for a particular profession we also say that the child should consult his parents' wishes. The obligations between parent and child are reciprocal. In cases of disagreement, it is better to refer to the judicious arbitration of a clear-headed and disinterested third party. You want to be a sailor, and your father wants you to be a lawyer. It is a nice point, and can only be settled by a fair trial. Suppose you try the experiment, just to please your father. If, at the end of three months, you don't like the desk, tell your father so; but don't be rebellious. Remember the prodigal son!

PHILLIPS AND CO.—Your little book on "The Philosophy of Smoking," which confirms us in our opinion of its injurious effects. You say: "The absorption of the poisons in smoking is an increasing evil, slowly but surely advancing with the indulgence, and the effects will unquestionably, sooner or later, appear in the injured health of the smoker. In our wisdom we condemn the chewer and smoker of opium, as one fatally blind to the deadly effects of the practices he indulges in; yet there is little doubt, from the universal extent of smoking, that the sum of its evil effects far exceeds that of chewing and smoking opium. In Germany, some of the most eminent of the medical profession have estimated that, in the aggregate, it shortens the duration of life ten years. In France, America, our own country, and others as well, the evil effects of the poisons imbibed in smoking are well understood. The worst feature in modern smoking, is that of short pipes; which are unquestionably the most injurious and truly unscientific of all the modern productions invented for smoking; and yet, injurious as they are, they have been extensively used, and have had many advocates, who appear to think they have some extraordinary power of abstracting and secreting an illimitable quantity of the poisons—"oils," as they are commonly termed, which are believed to exude from the tobacco in smoking. The idea that the poisons exude from the tobacco in smoking, appears to have been a prevailing one, amongst those who have hitherto attempted to correct the evil effects of smoking: hence, a soft pipe that coloured well, or a reservoir to receive the supposed exuded 'oils,' was all that was thought necessary to render smoking healthy. This notion of exudation, however, is a fallacy, and the sooner it is exploded, the better it will be for the health of the smokers who believe in it. Let all smokers, then, distinctly understand, that the poisons cannot exude from the tobacco—they must be vapourised to be separated from it: and, consequently, they always form a part of the smoke, and in ordinary smoking enter the mouth of the smoker." You might have added, that smoking also poisons the moral system. It induces indolence both bodily and mental. But your essay is well worth a perusal.

ALICE DE BUGH very delicately hints, that if she could get a good husband she would be a very good wife; she is of the middle height, is small in figure, with dark-brown hair, blue eyes, and small mouth. Her complexion is delicate, and she is generally considered pretty. Her age is twenty-one, and she possesses an income of £180 per annum, derived from freehold property.

ALICE BRAND is twenty-five, and possesses great personal attractions; she has been gently educated, is a good horsewoman, and has property of her own. Having a wish to go abroad, she would be happy to correspond with "A. B. C.," or any other gentleman reader of this Journal.

NIGHTINGALE, a solicitor's daughter, aged twenty-five, would like to exchange her present home for one of her own. She feels she could love most devotedly, if she could meet with a gentleman about twelve years her senior, tall, dark, and thin, with a pensive countenance, and possessing an income of from £200 to £300 a year. She is fond of a domestic, quiet life, and understands both the kitchen and the drawing-room. Nightingale is very cheerful, musical, and no discredit to her name.

THE QUEEN OF OTAREITH is in her nineteenth year, and thinks she would make the "King of the Cannibal Islands" a faithful and loving queen. Her maids of honour tell her that she is a perfect Venus in form. She has dark eyes, long, wavy, brown hair, and cheeks which rival the blush of the rose; is of a cheerful and amiable disposition, and has £600 per annum.

ANNIE LEE, the eldest daughter of wealthy parents, is desirous of meeting with a young gentleman answering the following description: he must have black hair, dark eyes, good figure, and be steady and loving. Annie is about nineteen, with brown hair, dark eyes, and rosy complexion. She is tall, called handsome, knows she is accomplished, thoroughly domesticated, and an heiress.

LETTERS RECEIVED.—J. Smith (A subscription was collected for the "Widow Lee." First page of the Times of February and March)—Frederick Jackson (Alive, certainly! Quack doctors do not die so easily as the credulous people who swallow their nostrums)—J. L. T. (You must fulfil your engagement)—E. W. (We will inquire. The same query has often struck us)—Slender (Send one shilling and sixpence in postage stamps, with the name of the book, &c.)—A. H. (The first Enlargement of this Journal commenced with No. 368, and the second with No. 420)—Edwin J. Yates (Too lengthy. The reading public dislike dismal odes)—A. A. D. (All appointments under a railway company are made by the board of directors)—Non Placitor (We must refer you to a cookery book)—J. W. D. (By application to a Lord of the Admiralty)—E. L. (See the "London Directory.") We never publish addresses—T. B. (Declined, with thanks)—Isaac Walton (The latest editions of the modern English Dictionaries contain nearly all the words in use up to the date of publication)—A Welsh Girl (An advertisement in the Times would be advisable)—M. N. (Unlawful. Consult the list of prohibited degrees in the English Canon Law)—Mountain Heather (Should consult with her parents on the propriety of being allowed to attend the School of Design, in Somerset House. There are classes for females, under the superintendence of parties accomplished in drawing and designing)—S. C. C. (The Duke of Wellington is the largest ship of war ever launched in the United Kingdom—probably in the world; for, although the French and Spaniards constructed monster vessels, carrying 140 guns, the weight of metal carried was considerably less than what is now carried by one of our seventy-fours)—Mrs. Coulter (Declined, with thanks. Some of the extracts have already appeared in this Journal)—A. P. T. (Summons your late master before a magistrate. He cannot legally detain your tools)—John Richardson (We are overburdened with stamps)—Alfred (Pretty, but used up previously by Joanna Baillie and Lord Byron)—E. R. W. (You are too short for the Army. Sow your wild oats, and become a respectable tradesman. Industry and perseverance will place anything reasonable within your reach)—W. Richardson (Depilatories will destroy the hair, but they are dangerous to the health, and we never recommend them)—A Clerk (Peruse the advertising columns of the WEEKLY TIMES)—Donald McGregor (Yes, in ancient days there was a clan "Ross")—John Craig (Get your invention patented, and, if worth anything, you will soon be rewarded)—"S." (Some foolish young person has sent us Southey's lackadaisical "Complaints of the Poor," as original)—J. D. P. (Get your uncle to execute a deed of renunciation in your favour)—Dawson (Declined, with thanks)—X. Y. Z. (What does your rhapsody mean?)—J. A.—Walter Hugh McCulley—F. Hubert—Frank—Fanny Faithful—Fidelis—G. W.—John Single—J. M. R.—N. M.—H. S.—Alice—Henrietta—Lady Ellen—Sincere—Rose, Violet, and Snowdrop—J. S. R.

THE LONDON JOURNAL:

And Weekly Record of Literature, Science, and Art.

No. 436.—VOL. XVII.]

FOR THE WEEK ENDING JULY 2 1853.

[PRICE ONE PENNY.]

[OLD MARTIN POINTING OUT THE MURDERER OF SIR WILLIAM MOWBRAY.]

THE WILL AND THE WAY.

BY THE AUTHOR OF

THE JESUIT," "THE PRELATE," "MINNIGREY," ETC.

CHAPTER CVI.

There is a judge from whose all-seeing eye
Man cannot hide himself. He needs
Nor witness nor confession—in secret
He prepares the punishment reserved
For crime—bursts on him in a thunder-cloud,
And he is gone.

OLD PLAY.

No sooner had the Khan succeeded in performing the operation which was to restore old Martin to reason, than he left him to the care of the medical men, whose presence had in some degree sanctioned the hazardous experiment: under their care, the patient gradually recovered his memory. At first his recollections were confused and indistinct as some hideous dream which had oppressed his sleeping hours; but the second day they returned with terrible reality. The scene of the murder—the victim and his assassin—all were remembered; and a second time the reason of the faithful and attached domestic all but sank beneath the excitement they produced.

After a consultation with the surgeons, it was decided by Colonel Butler and the rector, that he should be questioned magisterially before them.

A note was accordingly dispatched to General Bouchier and Sir Jasper Pepper—who were both in the commission of the peace for the county—to attend.

The library at the rectory was accordingly arranged for the occasion. A table and seats were placed for the magistrates, and Dr. Orme's large easy chair for the witness.

Colonel Butler, who presided, opened the proceedings, by reminding his brother magistrates of the mysterious death of the late Sir William Mowbray, and added, "that evidence had been unexpectedly obtained, to bring the murderer to justice." The minutes of the coroner's inquest were then read, as well as the verdict of "Wilful murder against some person or persons unknown," returned by the jury.

At this stage of the proceedings Will Siderer was led into the room, in charge of Joe Beans, the sexton, and the village constable. The countenance of the ruffian was haggard—terror, remorse, and despair had ploughed deep furrows in his iron visage—his glance, usually so bold and fierce, was humble and subdued. He evidently felt like a man over whom tardy but sure-footed justice had visibly suspended her avenging glaive.

No sooner did Henry Ashton, who was standing close to the chair of the rector, behold the man by whose hand the thread of his benefactor's life had been so rudely sundered, than his countenance became suddenly flushed, and his eyes lit with a fire which betrayed the feelings of hate, disgust, and indignation which took possession of his soul; those of the warrenner sank beneath his avenging glance.

"William Siderer," said the presiding magistrate, in a tone which fell like the sound of a death-bell upon the assassin's ear, "you are brought before us to answer the accusation of murder—cruel and deliberate murder—perpetrated upon the person of your late master, Sir William Mowbray. It is my duty to warn you that any statement you may choose to make will be taken down, and used as evidence upon your trial."

"I have nothing to state," answered the prisoner doggedly, "but that I am innocent! This is an idle accusation trumped up against me by a madman and my enemies!"

"Whom do you consider your enemies?" demanded General Bouchier.

"Joe Beans and that young man!" exclaimed the ruffian, pointing at the same time to our hero—who noticed the accusation only by a calm but bitter smile.

"And the madman?" inquired Sir Jasper.

"Martin the groom," replied the warrenner; "from boys we were enemies—we both loved the same girl." It was my quarrel with him which drove me from my service with—

The ruffian hesitated. He could not bring himself to pronounce the name of Sir William Mowbray.

"Your victim!" added Henry Ashton, for the first time breaking silence. "No wonder that his name falters on your tongue; it was his image which haunted you upon the pier at Calais—it will stand beside you at the hour of death, and accuse you at the judgment-seat of heaven!"

The prisoner shuddered so visibly, that a similar feeling ran through the veins of the magistrates. The sensation was like to that which the sight of some loath-some reptile produces the first time that it meets our sight.

"You are well acquainted with Carrow Abbey?" observed Colonel Butler, resuming the examination.

"Yes."

"Are you aware of any secret passages or entrances to the house or apartments?"

"No."

"How came this gibbern, then," exclaimed Dr. Orme—"which twenty witnesses can prove to have been yours—to be found in a vaulted chamber, at the end of a passage or recess opening from the library, the scene of the murder?"

Every eye was bent upon him; twice the warrenner essayed to speak, but the words died away upon his tongue.

"You cannot answer!" continued the speaker. "The letters it contains, prove how long and foully you have conspired against the honour and happiness of the generous man whose bread you had eaten from childhood!"

"I know not how they came there!" said the accused, endeavouring to assume a firmness which his whole demeanour gave the lie to; "but it is my firm belief my enemies placed them there to blacken me!"

"Whom do you mean by your enemies?"

"Joe Beans and Henry Ashton," was the reply.

No sooner had the ruffian pronounced the name of Joe Beans, than the honest rustic, indignant at the villany of such a charge, burst out in a passionate but unnecessary denial.

"It be a lie!" he exclaimed; "a wicked, infernal lie—and will not serve thee, Will! Till the night I accompanied poor old Martin and the sexton, I wor never at abbey twice in my life—once when a boy and once since! Thee wor always a bad, revengeful man, but I never had concern or quarrel with thee! I would not raise my hand against a dog, unless he deserved it—much less a fellow-creature! Ask Chettleborough, your worship," he added; "he will tell 'ee how we found the bag: it's my belief it wor the finger of God—not our poor wits!"

The deep earnestness with which these few and simple words were uttered, must have convinced his hearers—even if they had previously entertained any doubt upon the subject—that he had spoken nothing but truth.

Henry smiled upon him, and his humble friend received that smile as the proof of his integrity and honour.

It was now agreed that the witness should be called into the room, to make his deposition. On Dr. Orme ringing the bell twice—the signal agreed upon—the door of the library opened, and Martin, supported on either side by the surgeons, made his appearance.

The countenance of the old man was ghastly pale from the sufferings he had undergone, but his eye was clear and intelligent; whilst the compression of his thin, parched lips, denoted alike reason and resolution. An idiot or insane person is rarely, if ever, seen with the lips firmly closed.

"Thank you, Master Harry—thank you!" he faltered, as our hero, with almost a woman's gentleness, assisted him to his seat—which he had no sooner taken, than he fixed his eyes upon the warrener, and never once removed them from his blanched countenance till the end of the examination.

In answer to an inquiry from Colonel Butler, both the medical men assured the magistrates that their patient had perfectly recovered the use of his reason, and was in a fit state to make a deposition.

There was something fearfully distinct in the deliberate and scarcely earthly tone in which the old man related all that had passed on the evening of the murder. His voice never once faltered, nor did his memory fail him. The words issued from his lips as from those of a corpse.

He began by relating the fright which Ellen had received in the picture-gallery, and his own determination to watch in consequence: which he did, night after night, in different parts of the abbey.

"I believe," said Colonel Butler, interrupting him, "that the house at Carrow, like most old family mansions, contains many secret passages and recesses, which few are so well acquainted with as yourself?"

"None," replied Martin, firmly; "except one man!"

"And his name?"

"Will Sideler. His father was an ancient servant of the Mowbrays, and showed him, when a boy, the entrances to most of them. But not all," he added, with a faint smile—"not all! Thank God, not all!"

This was doubtless an allusion to the recesses in which he had assisted his late master to conceal his will, together with the family jewels and title deeds of his large estates.

"Whom do you suspect to have been the person who frightened Miss De Vere in the picture-gallery?" inquired Sir Jasper Pepper.

"Will Sideler!"

"And what did you do in consequence?" added Colonel Butler.

"Watched night after night," replied Martin, "as the old house-dog watches the house of those who feed and shelter him! It was all I could do to prove my fidelity," he added, with a sigh; "for I am old—very old!"

"And what took place on the night of the murder?"

Twice the aged domestic essayed to speak, but his feelings overcame him, and he raised his withered hand to his brow. Henry gently took it in his own, and pressed it kindly. The touch of human sympathy and love nerved the sufferer to proceed.

"I was walking in the picture-gallery," he continued, "from which there is a passage, known only to Will Sideler and myself, which communicates, beneath the great staircase, with the back of the library. The entrance in either apartment is concealed in the carved panelling, and opens with a secret spring."

"At what hour were you in the gallery?"

"It had just struck midnight."

"Were all the family at rest?"

"All but my dear, kind master!"

"Relate to us what followed."

"Whilst walking in the gallery," continued Martin, "I heard the peculiar click made by the sudden closing of the spring. I placed my ear to the panel, and fancied that I caught the echo of a retreating footstep. I waited for a few minutes, reflecting whether I had better follow, or at once alarm the household. Had I done the latter," he added, bitterly, "Sir William might have been living still!"

All felt for the poor fellow's regret—not that he had much to reproach himself with: few men placed in a similar position would have acted with the self-possession he had displayed. The prisoner, more than any one present, wished in his secret heart that the old man had alarmed the family.

"Perhaps," observed the rector, who had noted the deadly pallor which overspread the features of the sufferer and his repeated attempts to raise his trembling hand to his forehead, "we had better adjourn for half an hour."

The rest of the magistrates looked anxiously towards the medical men, as if to ask their opinion; but Martin decided for them.

"No!" he said, with recovered firmness. "I am ready—quite ready! I shall be better when I have done justice to my master's memory, and denounced his murderer!"

Again the warrener shuddered.

"I opened the panel," continued the speaker, "and carefully threaded my way along the passage: when I arrived at the little vaulted chamber, between the gallery and the library, I heard a deep groan. Oh, how my heart echoed it! I rushed forward—the door at the end of the recess was closed—my hand trembled so I could not find the spring! I peeped through the crevices, and saw my master—my good, kind, suffering master—the poor man's friend—whom all who knew him loved and revered—seated in his chair—a man!—here the eyes of the speaker glared like those of an accusing spirit upon the prisoner, who was so fascinated by his gaze that he could not avert his own—" with his ruffian hand twined in his victim's hair—the knife reeking with Sir William's blood still in his grasp—I—O God! my brain went round and round!"

Overcome by his emotion, the faithful domestic sank, with a faint groan, back upon the pillows. At first all thought that he was dead, and the eyes of Will Sideler flashed with a sudden hope—for as yet the accuser had not named him.

"Monster!" exclaimed Henry, regarding him with an indignant look; "think not to escape—dream not of it—the hand of the Deity has already traced thy punishment! Even if the victim of your brutality expires, heaven will raise a witness—for none may efface the judgment of the living God!"

Joe Beans, who was blubbing like a child, felt so indignant at the sight of his old friend's sufferings, and the triumphant look of the prisoner, that, as he afterwards confessed, he felt monstrously inclined to strangle him with his own hands.

It was some minutes before Martin gave the least sign of returning consciousness. By the use of ammonia and wine, which the surgeons had provided, he gradually recovered; but more than a quarter of an hour elapsed before the examination could be continued. Short as the time was, it seemed an age to all.

"A very interesting case, Sir Jasper!" whispered General Bouchier—to whose mind, palled and blasé with the artificial pleasures of the world, excitement was a novelty.

"Very!" replied the little East India director. "I remember nothing like it since Warren Hastings hung the rajah in India."

Here one of the surgeons observed to the magistrates, that he thought they might venture to proceed in the examination.

"When you first saw the murderer of Sir William," said Colonel Butler, "you say his back was turned towards you?"

"It was."

"Did you afterwards behold his face?"

"As distinctly as I now see yours!" replied the old man, mentally gathering strength for the completion of his narrative.

"And recognised it?"

"I knew him," continued the witness, "before I saw his features; for we had eaten the same master's bread for years together!"

"His name?"

There was a breathless silence in the room. All expected what the answer would be; but still they were anxious to hear it.

With an effort which none supposed him capable of making, Martin rose from his chair without the least assistance; and, deliberately raising his arm, pointed to the prisoner, and pronounced his name—"Will Sideler!"

The features of the murderer were bathed in a cold perspiration, and his coarse, iron-grey, matted locks rose and fell with terror. For some seconds the wretched man felt incapable of speech. The words rose in his throat; but a sensation like that of a hand tightly grasping it impeded their utterance. Every eye in the room was fixed upon him with a cold, glassy, stone-like glance; for the intense feeling of horror in the breasts of all was too profound to admit of expression. Like the head of Medusa, it had paralysed them.

"It is a lie!" roared the warrener, with a desperate effort to break the spell which appeared to rest upon him. "I was not near the abbey!"

"Will Sideler!" repeated Martin, still pointing towards him.

"You are my enemy!" continued the warrener, hoarsely.

"It was through you that I lost my place in Sir William's family, as keeper! Through you that men looked coldly upon me! You have hated and persecuted me for years! My judges will not believe you! You are mad—perjured! You murdered him yourself, perhaps, to cast the blame on me!"

To the last monstrous accusation, old Martin replied only by a contemptuous smile. For the third time he pronounced the name of "Will Sideler," and slowly sank back in his seat.

No one present doubted for an instant that the old man had spoken truth. God had not restored him to reason merely to utter a lie.

"Do you feel sufficiently strong," inquired the rector, "to relate what followed the murder?"

"I forced open the door," replied the witness. "I know not how—but I did force it. Although too late to save my noble master, I hoped at least to avenge him! There was a struggle! I felt his assassin's breath upon my face! I—I can't recollect anything further. I suppose I must have received some hurt!"

"Have you any recollection how long it is since this occurred?"

"No. They tell me it is weeks since," replied the witness.

"I thought it only two or three days."

"Nor where you have been?"

"Here, at the rectory!" answered Martin, with a look of surprise. "Where should I have been?"

It was evident, from these replies, that the interval between the murder and the recovery of his reason had left a perfect blank upon the old man's mind. He was as unconscious of his madness as of his residence with the sexton.

Mrs. Jarmy and the servants, who first discovered the bodies of Sir William and his faithful servitor, were next examined. They deposed to the condition in which they found the latter, as well as their astonishment at discovering no trace of the means by which the assassin had escaped—which first gave rise to the supposition that the death of the baronet was the result of suicide.

After a whispered consultation between the magistrates, Colonel Butler asked the warrener if he had any statement to make. He replied by a sullen negative.

"Prisoner," resumed the colonel, "it is the decision of the bench that you stand fully committed to Norwich Castle for the murder of your late master, Sir William Mowbray."

"I won't go there!" exclaimed the ruffian, furiously; "you have no right to send me there! It is a trumped-up scheme against me, to swear away my life! Send me back to Newgate! I escaped only a few days since! I tell you," he added, frantically, "that I will go back to Newgate!"

It was explained to him that the present charge was so much more serious than the one brought by Lawyer Elworthy against him, that his request could not be complied with.

"Bail me, then!" continued the warrener. "I can find bail! I have friends—rich friends—who will see me righted! I can procure bail for a thousand pounds!"

Sir Jasper Pepper, who hitherto had taken no active part in the proceedings, was about to explain to the prisoner that murder was not a bailable offence, when Dr. Orme, in whose ear Henry Ashton had hastily whispered a few words, interrupted him, by demanding the name of the party whom the accused proposed as his bail for appearing upon his trial.

"He is rich!" eagerly answered the ruffian—catching, as drowning men catch at straws, at the hope—"rich enough to buy you all!"

There was a look of surprise upon every countenance present, except our hero's and the rector's.

"His name?" inquired Colonel Butler, blandly.

"The rich Indian gentleman, Meeran Hafaz!"

A sigh of deep and painful satisfaction broke from the bosom of Henry Ashton: his doubts were confirmed.

"He won't bail thee!" whispered Joe to the prisoner; "he be like the devil, who first leads men into sin, then leaves them in the lurch!"

It was explained to Sideler that this was not a case in which bail—no matter what the amount—could be taken.

"And you are determined to send me to Norwich Castle?" said the accused.

"Of course!"

"Then I won't go alone!" exclaimed the assassin, in a determined tone. "If I must hang, I'll hang in company: there be a greater villain than I am in the job!"

"His name?"

"Meeran Hafaz! I wor poor, and he tempted me with his cursed gold—sent for me to Sir Jasper's, and talked to me about Sir William!"

"You confess, then, that you murdered him," eagerly demanded Henry, "at the instigation of this Meeran?"

"No—no!" replied the wretch—for all his cunning had not quite deserted him—"I won't say that; but this I will say, that the Indian gentleman told me to do so. I refused—of course I refused: so most likely he employed some one else; that old rogue, perhaps," he added, pointing at the same time to Martin, "as likely as any other!"

An incredulous smile was the only notice taken by the magistrates of the preposterous supposition.

When General Bouchier and Sir Jasper Pepper first heard the name of Meeran, they exchanged glances of surprise merely; but when the warrener proceeded to relate how he had tempted him to commit the crime which he stood charged with, each felt the propriety of standing forth as his defender. The general had introduced him into society, and stood pledged, as it were, to his character; the director had received him as his guest. Each felt himself, therefore, unpleasantly compromised.

"This charge, gentlemen," said the former, "is so ridiculous—so evidently the result of malice—that I should apologise for noticing it, were not Meeran Hafaz my friend: that is to say," he added, correcting himself, "recommended to me by friends in whom I can place the most unbounded reliance. In India his rank is princely."

There was a silence. No one echoed the convictions of the speaker.

"His fortune colossal!" added the director.

"Ay, ay!" interrupted Will Sideler, with a sneer; "he be rich enough!"

"A person so respectable!" continued the first speaker.

"So extremely wealthy!" chimed in Sir Jasper.

"What motive?"

"What motive!" exclaimed Joe Beans, unable any longer to control his indignation. "I'll tell 'ee, gentlemen, what motive! He loves Miss Ellen, who doesn't love him. He and Colonel Mowbray carried her off to Cromwell House, and kept her a prisoner. It's my belief he wouldn't stick at murder, or worse—if anything can be worse—to gain his purpose! Would I had shot un!" he muttered in an under-tone to himself; "would I had shot un!"

The general and Sir Jasper Pepper seated themselves with a dissatisfied air: the few simple words of the honest rustic had cast a new light upon the motives of the young Indian.

"Devilish unpleasant!" whispered the soldier to his friend: who replied only by an expressive shrug of the shoulders.

The depositions of Martin and the servants were read over, and signed by them in the presence of the accused, whom Colonel Butler directed to be instantly conveyed, upon a warrant from the bench, to Norwich Castle. No sooner had the order been given, than the door of the library opened, and Mayes and Kemp, two well-known officers of police, who had been all the time in waiting, made their appearance. With a dexterity which long practice alone could insure, they approached the warrener, and, before he could offer the least resistance, or even seemed aware of their intention, clapped a pair of handcuffs upon his wrists.

"Come!" said Kemp, placing his hand upon the ruffian's collar, "the gig is at the door!"

"I won't go!" gasped, rather than uttered, the wretched man. "I have confessed nothing—done nothing! I am innocent, I tell you—innocent!"

"We know all that!" coolly replied the officers—who, without further ceremony, dragged him from the room.

The curses and protestations of the murderer were heard by those who remained in the library till the vehicle had driven away—when he suddenly became silent, and sank into a state of sullen despair; the only request he ventured to make to his conductors was, that they would not drive him through the village. He dreaded to meet the curious and reproachful looks of those who had once been his friends and companions.

As soon as Martin had been removed once more to his chamber, Colonel Butler proposed to his brother magistrates that they should issue a second warrant for the apprehension of Meeran Hafaz—a step which the general and Sir Jasper stoutly opposed. The opinions were evenly balanced on either side, when Henry Ashton requested to be heard.

"I believe, young gentleman," observed the East India director, with a sneer, "that you are not yet in the commission of the peace?"

"True, Sir Jasper!" replied our hero; "but I am a witness!"

The little man sat down with a look of disappointment. He had failed to browbeat one whom he had looked upon as a mere parvenu in fortune—a defect which, in his judgment, exceeded even the want of birth.

The youth related as briefly as possible his adventures in Italy; suppressing only that portion of them which related to the unhappy Lady Mowbray. His hearers listened with horror to his account of the death of Walter, and the discovery of the villainy of Martingale; but when he produced the confession of the unprincipled agent of his rival, the feeling was changed to indignation—not a word was uttered in opposition to the issuing of the warrant for the apprehension of Meeran.

"Decidedly," said the general to his companion, "this Hafaz has proved himself an infernal fool! What want of tact! Decidedly unpleasant to have a fellow hanged, whom one introduced to society—in fact, made a sort of lion of! Though, perhaps, after all," he added, "the contretemps may increase his popularity!"

"Only to think that I should have invited him to Bungalow Hall!" groaned Sir Jasper. "I shall never hear the last of it! If I had my choice, I had ten times rather my acceptance had been protested upon 'Change. But do you think that he is really guilty?"

General Bouchier looked at him with an air of assumed surprise; and, to avoid giving a direct answer, pointed to some distant object from the carriage window. He wondered at his obtuseness.

CHAPTER CVII.

I cannot rest. This fever of the blood
Consumes me. Inaction gnaws my heart-strings.
OLD PLAY.

HENRY ASHTON'S first care, after the departure of the magistrates, was to visit the chamber of poor old Martin. A weight was removed from his mind—the assassin of his revered benefactor at last was in the iron grasp of justice—and the disclosure which the villain had partially made raised an insurmountable barrier between his rival and Ellen. Still he was unhappy. A hundred times he demanded of himself what was her fate.

Mrs. Jarmy met him at the door of the apartment. The good old lady had been severely affected by the shock of Sir William's death, which the scene of the morning recalled with all its horrors.

"You cannot see Martin now," she said, placing her finger upon her lips to impose silence; "he sleeps."

"How has he borne it?"

"Well," she replied; "the surgeons are of opinion that he will rally, for some months at least. Only to think," she added, "that Will Siderer—whose father and grandfather both ate the bread of the Mowbrays—should have—have—" Sobs choked her utterance. She could not bring her lips to utter the fearful word. "I never thought him so bad as that!" she continued, after she had partially recovered her self-possession. "Miss Ellen, too!"

"I will seek her, Jarmy, through the world!" exclaimed the young man. "I have been tied here in consuming inactivity by the strong bonds of duty. Tomorrow I depart for London, to demand an account of his niece at the hands of her—Colonel Mowbray."

He felt that it would have been an insult to the memory of the dead to style the heartless, scheming man of the world by the name which Ellen most revered—"uncle."

Sorrow had lessened many of the worthy housekeeper's prejudices. She no longer looked with distaste upon the possibility of the nephew of Farmer Ashton becoming the husband of her young lady. The man who had avenged the death of Sir William merited everything.

"God speed you!" said she, leading him still further away from the door of the sick man's chamber; "and bring you and Miss Ellen safe to Carrow again! I shall never rest till I see her dear, sweet face again!"

She hesitated—our hero distinctly saw that there was something upon her mind she wished to give utterance to. Taking her hand, he asked her if she doubted him.

"It is not that, Master Henry!" replied the old lady; "it is not that! He that was wiser and better than us all, both trusted and loved you! It is that I do not like to speak a disparaging word of any one who shares the blood of the Mowbrays."

"What mean you?" demanded our hero.

"Do not trust the colonel!" whispered the housekeeper, impressively; "he never loved his brother. He will speak you fairly to your face, whilst he meditates the blackest treachery in his heart. He is a bold, bad man, and has much to answer for. If he speaks you fairly, doubt him; if kindly," she added, "look to your safety! God help the innocent victim so blindly intrusted to his hands!"

It was no slight mark of the old lady's confidence and regard, her speaking thus freely of one whom she considered the head of the house she had so long and faithfully served.

"Trust to me!" exclaimed our hero, after thanking her for the caution she had given him; "the love and gratitude I bear the memory of his son will not blind me to the duplicity of the father; he will find me no easy dupe!"

So saying, he descended to the garden, to inform Dr. Orme of his intended departure. The worthy rector had too lately recovered his adopted son, to contemplate a second separation without uneasiness. He urged him to remain, assuring him that Lawyer Elworthy would be a much more likely person to ferret out his rival, and deliver him into the hands of justice, than he could possibly prove himself.

"Father! friend!" exclaimed his former pupil; "for you have permitted me to call you by those loved, familiar names—do not blame me, but my resolution is taken. There is a gnawing viper at my heart which will not rest; a dream which haunts my troubled sleep! Ellen in the power of Meeran Hafaz! I must seek her! Action may end in disappointment, but if I remain idly here I shall go mad—mad! My heart is almost broken!"

"Seek her, then, my son!" replied the old man; "and heaven direct your search!"

"It has directed it!" exclaimed a deep, calm voice, so near to them, that both the rector and Henry, when they turned and beheld the Khan and Farmer Ashton, wondered how they had approached them unperceived.

"What mean you?" demanded the lover of Ellen.

"That you must remain at Carrow."

"Must!"

"If you wish to find her whom you seek."

"Explain yourself, mysterious man!" exclaimed our hero; "hitherto you have spoken only in obscure phrases, and yet I believe your purpose is a friendly one!"

"At least towards you!" answered the renegade with a sigh. "I have proved it at the cost of many a bitter struggle! But, enough of this: you seek the niece of the late Sir William Mowbray?"

"Yes!"

"And would give much to discover her abode?"

"My life—my life!" eagerly answered the young man.

"It needs not so costly a sacrifice," replied the Khan; "merely that of your purpose and impatience for a few hours! You gaze upon me," he added, "as if you think I could deceive you!"

When Henry remembered how lately he had trusted and been deceived, he wondered at the half-formed inclination which he felt, difficult as the task would be, to repress his impatience, and accede to the request.

"Thee mayst believe him, Harry!" said Farmer Ashton, grasping his nephew's hand; "he will not deceive thee!"

"You know him, then?"

"Yes!"

The suspicion which Henry had formerly entertained that the mysterious stranger was his father, once more returned: and yet he felt no yearning of the heart, none of those strong but unaccountable impulses which draw the parent and the child together.

He looked alternately from the farmer to his companion: there was not the least resemblance, either in voice, form, or feature, to induce him to believe that they were brothers—and he felt relieved by the observation.

"And can you, too," said our hero, appealing to his uncle; "can you torture me by this suspense?"

"It be for thy good, Harry—for thy good! and can only last for a few hours. Be patient!" continued the old man.

"Till when?"

"Till darkness has settled upon the face of nature," replied the renegade, answering for him. "I am tied by circumstances, which at times are as imperative as necessity."

"Be it so!" replied the lover, strongly tempted by the hope of so soon beholding his adored Ellen. "Should you deceive me, God forgive you for your cruelty!"

"He will not deceive thee!" repeated Farmer Ashton. "Think you I would trust your happiness, and my own, which hangs on it, to any but —"

He paused—a glance from the Khan had checked him.

"Whom?" demanded Dr. Orme.

"One whom I feel well assured will not betray the trust!" answered the old man, firmly.

The rector invited the new comers into the house. He felt naturally anxious to fathom, if possible, the motive of the man who certainly had, on more than one occasion, proved the friend of his adopted son. Whatever his opinion of him, he could not doubt the sincerity of the farmer.

"Be it so!" said the renegade; "I had a task to perform, but you can probably arrange it better. You must procure the assistance of ten or a dozen men, upon whose courage, as well as fidelity, every reliance may be placed."

"For what purpose?" inquired Henry Ashton, eagerly.

"That you shall know in time. I have no half-confidence to give—with me it is all or none!"

It was finally arranged that Joe Beans should be sent to the farm and village to collect a party such as the speaker had suggested, and bring them, by seven in the evening, to the rectory.

"A dozen!" exclaimed the faithful Joe; "a hundred, if you want them! I have only to say that Harry Ashton requires their services, and there are not three lads in all Carrow that would lag behind! Be I to bring them direct to parson's?"

"Direct!" replied the Khan, "and in silence!"

Joe assured him that he would break the head of the first man that uttered a word; and, proud of the commission, as he would have been of any office that could serve his friend, started at once upon his errand, whilst the rest of the rector's visitors retired to the house.

Our hero would willingly have accompanied him, but he yielded to the remonstrance of his uncle and Dr. Orme, backed by the strong desire he felt to know more of the character of the Khan and his motives—which, up to the present, appeared to him inexplicable.

Love works a strange metamorphosis in the habits, as well as the heart of man. Till he knew Ellen, Henry Ashton had never been known to abandon either his will or his design.

CHAPTER CVIII.

Then marvelled he much, that a man of pride
Like a book-learned priest should ride. SCOTT.

As Joe Beans passed the lodge at the entrance to the rectory, his reveries and speculations as to the motive of the errand he was dispatched upon, were broken by the voice of Red Ralph—who, seated upon a stile on the opposite side of the road, had evidently been waiting for him.

"Master Beans," said the urchin, "beest that thee?"

"Can't you see it is?"

"I be almost a tired o' stoppin'."

"And what are you stopping for?" demanded the young man, who felt at first anxious to get rid of the boy, although a little consideration induced him to change his purpose—for he recollected that if any enterprise were on foot, he could scarcely have a more efficient ally than Ralph.

"Why, to see and talk to 'ee a bit!" answered the lad, with a grin; "so thee ha' sent t' old man to gaol?"

Joe nodded in the affirmative.

"And will they hang un?"

"Most likely."

"I be mortal glad of that!" observed Ralph, who continued to walk by the side of his patron—for such Joe Beans must be considered. "He wanted to kill I at Mortlake—now," he added, with a grin, "I shall see un dangle like a varmint from the gallows, as I told un: that be better than the rats!"

His companion shuddered, although he scarcely wondered at the resentful feelings of the poor ignorant speaker, who had never known kindlier nurture than the parish house, and whose mind was even more uncultivated than his looks.

Ralph was evidently in high glee. He had seen the warren driven down the lane towards the city by the police-officers; and followed the gig, running by the side, and jeering the prisoner, till a well-directed cut from the driver's whip taught him to keep at a more respectful distance.

"He looked mortal down!" he added, after relating to his companion the above circumstance. "They do say he has committed murder!"

"Who could have told you that?" inquired Joe.

"Oh, it be murder!" said the lad, regarding him with a half-laughing, cunning expression. "I thought it wor!"

His patron felt half inclined to be angry at the ruse by which the urchin had drawn from him the admission; and Ralph, with his usual discretion, kept, for the next ten minutes, beyond the reach of his hand.

"I suppose," he said, musingly, "that farmer will g' I a holiday to go and see the old man hanged! I never did see one! Did thee, Mister Beans?"

"No! And now, Ralph, don't speak of it again. The fellow may deserve his fate; and though I sometimes feel that I could strangle the ruffian with my own hands, or dash his wicked brains out, I should not like to see him turned off like a dog upon a gibbet!"

"Not!" repeated the boy, with surprise. "Well, that be mortal curious! Now, I should!"

By this time they had reached the common; upon whose broken sward the lengthened shadows of here and there a solitary tree indicated that day was drawing to a close.

"What be that?" demanded Red Ralph, pointing to a carriage which had been overturned close to the chalk-pits, where Henry Ashton had formerly preserved the life of Ellen. "There be a mishap o' some sort!"

Both hastened their steps, to see if they could render any assistance. On reaching the spot, the carriage proved to be one of the chaises from the Angel; and the inmate, rather a venerable-looking man, was struggling to extricate himself.

Joe and his companion assisted the driver to turn over the body of the vehicle, and set the gentleman at liberty: who no sooner found himself safe on terra firma, than he commenced a volley of abuse against both road and position; swearing that the first was only fit for a dray to pass over, and the second to drive it.

No sooner did Red Ralph hear the sound of the speaker's voice, than he opened his immense jaws, threw back his head, and indulged in one of his terrific grins, much to the annoyance of his companion, who thought that the urchin's mirth proceeded from his natural love for mischief. But he was mistaken. The lad and the gentleman in the post-chaise were old acquaintances, but not friends. In fact, "Remnant's cow-boy," as he was generally called when at Mortlake, was friendly with very few.

"Are you hurt, sir?" inquired Joe.

"No bones broken, I believe; but infernally shaken. How far is it to Carrow Abbey?"

"To where?" demanded the young man, with surprise.

"To Carrow Abbey."

"About two miles."

"That is fortunate!" remarked the gentleman. "I can walk there!"

"Walk there!" repeated the rustic. "Why it is uninhabited!"

"Ah, yes; I have heard so. No matter! It is rather a curious old place, I believe?"

"Very curious, sir!"

"No objection, I suppose, to a gentleman who is travelling for pleasure seeing it?"

"I never heard of any," replied Joe Beans, who was very far from feeling assured that curiosity was the only motive which had brought the querist, at the close of a dull October day, to inquire about the ancient mansion of the Mowbrays.

The stranger drew forth his purse and proffered a crown to Joe Beans, as a trifling recompense for the service he had rendered him. The young man civilly but firmly declined it.

"I'll take it, parson!" exclaimed Red Ralph, with a broad grin. "I see'd 'ee fast, and beant' above it!"

With a look of surprise and annoyance at the unexpected recognition, the gentleman placed the money in his hand.

"Egad!" continued the boy, looking first at the coin and then at the donor; "thee beest in luck! Few, I reckon, see the colour o' thy brass! It be a good un, beant' it?" he added, thrusting the crown-piece between his teeth, to try if it would bend.

Without condescending to reply, the traveller, with an air of mortification which he could not conceal, walked away, taking the direction towards the abbey. A small carpet-bag which he carried in his hand was the only luggage in the chaise.

The adventure puzzled our honest friend exceedingly: he felt assured that something more than curiosity brought the stranger to Carrow, and he hesitated whether to follow him or not.

"When did the gentleman arrive?" he demanded of the postilion, who was busily occupied in attempting to repair the broken wheels of his chaise.

"By the Telegraph—about an hour ago," was the reply.

"Did any one meet him at the office?"

"No; the moment he got off the coach he ordered a chaise for the abbey," said the lad; "ordered me to take the nearest way, and drive as if the devil or a bailiff were after him."

"That be parson, all over!" observed Ralph. "He can smell a bailiff as readily as old Snap a rat! And so he ought—he had enough of such varmint arter him when he lived at Mortlake!"

Joe bade the postilion good-bye, promising to send him a wheelwright to assist him in putting the chaise in a fit state to be taken back to Norwich. Instead of pursuing his way, as he at first intended, to the village, he retraced his steps, and walked towards the park.

"That beant' the way!" observed his companion; "it be my belief, Mister Beans, thee beest troubling thee head about parson!"

"Is he a parson?" demanded Joe.

Ralph grinned, and shook his shaggy head, as he made answer, that "the folks called un so at Mortlake!"

"And what sort of character did he bear?" added the young man.

"A bad un," replied the boy; "ran away in debt—cheated Farmer Jacks of a power o' money! Skitter, the tailor, says that he has had no luck with his wife, and all because he married un!"

At the word married, Joe became violently agitated—a terrible impression crossed his mind: he might be wrong in entertaining it, but he determined to act as if assured that he was right. He had but little time to decide and act.

"Can you climb, Ralph?" he said, pointing to the park wall, which ran parallel with the narrow footpath they were traversing.

"Climb!" repeated the boy; "egad, I should think so! what does 'ee think I ha' gotten legs for?"

"Over with you, then!" said the young man, pointing to the wall.

In a few moments they both stood on the other side.

"Now Ralph," continued Joe Beans, "follow my directions, and I'll make a man of you for life!"

"Ees!"

"You see that tree?"

He pointed out to the boy a lofty sycamore, which grew at the end of the avenue crossing the park.

"Ees, Mister Beans."

"Creep like a snake along the grass, and climb amongst the branches; watch if any one arrives, and is admitted to the house; but above all, don't stir till I return!"

"I won't, tho' it be all night!"

"Good! I must return!"

The urchin looked towards Joe Beans, and the expression of his ill-shaped countenance became almost human—for his elf-like features were lit with an expression of gratitude and regard such as he had seldom entertained for any human being. Joe, perhaps, was the only person in the world who had ever treated him with real kindness.

"Mister Beans," he said, "be it parson thee beest afraid on?"

"Yes—no!—that is, I can't explain. I have not a moment to lose!"

"He shan't get to the house!" added the boy, resolutely.

"How can you prevent it?" demanded the young man, with a look of astonishment.

"Break his neck, or his leg, if he means any harm to thee! Tho' he has given I a crown, I always thought he wor nought for a parson; perhaps," added the urchin, drawing the coin from his pocket, "it be a bad un, arter all!"

Ralph once more placed the piece between his teeth; but it stood the test—it was a good one.

"No—no!" exclaimed Joe, after an instant's reflection; "do as I tell you, and all, perhaps, will be well. It would take some time," he mentally calculated, "to prepare the poor young lady, even if they contemplate such a piece of villainy! Watch if he approaches the house; I will soon be back. Away with you at once!"

The last directions of course were spoken aloud.

"I will, Mister Beans!" said the urchin, throwing himself upon the grass, and creeping as stealthily as a pole-cat in the direction towards the tree. His companion did not wait more than a few seconds to note his progress. Catching the branch of a lofty cedar, which grew near, he swung himself over the wall of the park, and directed his steps towards the spot where he had left the postilion and his horses. Without a word he sprang into the saddle, and galloped like a madman towards the village—the astonished lad shouting and calling after him.

"This be a rum go!" said the lad, scratching his head; "first the chase upset and broken, now the brown mare stolen! I do wonder what old master will say! Shan't I catch it when I drive into the Angel Yard!"

(Continued from our last.)

THE FAITHFUL SLAVE.

BY ROBERT MORRIS.

Author of "Sketches by a Travelling Naturalist," "Lectures to a Normal Class," "Lights and Shadows of Freemasonry," &c.

(Continued from our last.)

But the act called up to her mind all the realities of her situation. The smile fled from her face and the light from her eye. She dropped the splendid fabric upon the floor; her hands opening, set free the necklace and the money we had given her. She falls on her knees, and, with a loud, terrified voice, repeats the declaration so often made before:

"I didn't tetch it, marser! 'deed I didn't!"

The disappointment is general and severe.

The sheriff breaks out into a fierce oath, even in spite of himself, and the overseer echoes it fervently.

An expression of anger goes around the circle as Mr. Enloe returns to his seat.

After a hurried consultation, carried on in whispers between himself and the officer, he takes the lead in the second scheme that had been proposed to win the grand secret.

He approaches the girl, now weeping and sobbing as though her heart would break, takes her chilly hand in his, and begs her—the master condescending to the humblest supplications before his slave—she begs her, for God's sake, to give him back his money. He tells her, with the most solemn appeals, that the loss of it will utterly ruin him—will force him to sell his plantation, to sell his servants, one and all, who will be sent off to the sugar plantations, and scattered far apart, never to see each other any more—that the money her father has been saving up to buy her freedom will not be half enough now—that his loss will oblige him to take his little boys from school, and put them to the hoe-handle—will oblige her dear young mistress to leave home, and go out to work for a living—will cause him, her master, who has raised her, and always been kind to her, and is now so willing to make her free and happy, to be looked upon in his old age as a thief, and driven out of good society, and die a miserable man.

He promises her everything calculated to win a negro's heart—her freedom, the freedom of her husband, Tom, a handsome cabin, with good furniture, all to herself. Nothing that occurred to his experienced mind, in the way of lure, was forgotten.

It was utterly useless! All this humiliation and profusion of promise were as nothing!

Loogy wept; Loogy sobbed; Loogy fell on her knees, as before, and embraced his feet. But she could not be tempted to make any other response to his earnest entreaties than the words:

"'Deed, marser, I didn't tetch it! 'deed I didn't!"

Then exclaims the sheriff—his ill-favoured face glaring up with the same look that had inflamed it when he joined, the year before, in a death-grapple with one of Murrell's stoutest desperadoes—then says the furious officer:

"Take her to the whipping-post! The money shall come, or she shall die under the lash!"

Will the reader pardon me a short digression here, even though it may appear to be apologetic? I have utterly failed in making myself understood, if I have not cleared up these two points—that the negro girl knows what disposition has been made of this immense booty, even if she is not the real robber, and that the whole fortune and the social standing of Mr. Enloe depend upon its recovery.

Not one in the room—at least it appears so to me—has the shadow of a doubt but what Loogy took the money, and handed it to some second person. No clue has yet been gained as to who that second person is.

The man Tom (a very honest, pious negro, by the way) has been again interrogated since daylight, and his whereabouts during the whole night of the robbery so accurately traced up, that although he is still kept in durance, it is only to hinder him from communicating with his fellow-servants until the examination of Loogy is ended—and not that any one believes him guilty, either before or after the fact.

Now the question with those deeply-interested individuals is, shall this stubborn girl be permitted to remain silent, when so much depends on her testimony? If she did not take the money, who did? If she has not concealed it, who has? To these reasonable inquiries the prisoner has given no reply.

The sheriff himself is a surety upon Mr. Enloe's bonds for several thousand dollars; nearly every other man in the room is peculiarly involved in this affair. Is it a matter of surprise, then, that extreme measures suggest themselves to their minds? Let the reader divest himself of prejudice, and reply.

The whipping-post, which is the smooth trunk of a cherry-tree, selected for the occasion, has received its victim, and the overseer stands with his heavy whip ready to strike.

My heart sinks within me. I would fain fly, but stand still—fascinated, as it were—hoping, yet doubtfully, that the girl will make a confession before the lash should fall.

The sheriff has put on an air of determination that brooks no further gentleness or delay.

The plantation physician has held a consultation with Mr. Enloe. The conclusion which he expresses, as he turns to the gate, unwilling to witness the scene, may be inferred from his words, which barely reach my ears:

"Not more than ten or twelve, Mr. Enloe; and I can't answer for that!"

Poor Loogy! How well for you had you carried your little burthen, yet unborn, to an earlier grave! As she raises her head from its drooping posture, and glances appealingly towards the apartment to which the ladies have retired, there is a shadow on it that agonises my heart to behold. Heaven grant she may yet confess!

"And now, you cursed thief!" hisses the overseer, in his most repulsive manner, "tell me where's the money—quick, or I'll cut your back into slivers! Where is it?"

"I hain't got it, sir—'deed I hain't! Oh, tell Miss Caroline to come to me!"

"You'll never see your Miss Caroline again if you don't tell me where's that money! I'll cut you all to pieces, and then sell you to the nigger-trader! Where's the money?"

"'Deed, sir, I don't know—'deed I don't!"

The blow falls, cutting like a knife-blade through the flimsy chemise, which for decency's sake has been left upon her back.

She screams, until the woods ring again. An answering scream is heard from the ladies.

The negroes in the cotton-patch—we can distinctly see them from where we stand—stop their work, raise themselves up, and look towards us; then the women toss their arms wildly above their heads.

"Where is it?" again demands the overseer. "Tell me, you thief, before I strike again!"

"Do you know who took it?" interrupts the sheriff, observing how earnestly she watches the upraised lash.

"Yes, yes, marser, but I didn't tetch it!" is the reply—extorted, beyond doubt, by the extremity of her pain.

"I didn't tetch it—'deed I didn't!"

Down comes the lash a second time, and again the thin cotton fabric is cut in two and tinged with blood. Her piteous cries are answered as before, and then the door of the ladies' apartment flies violently open, and Caroline, tearing herself from her mother's hands, runs to us.

There has been an earnest strife between them—the one to restrain, the other to escape. The daughter has gained her desire, and is with us in an instant. She answers Loogy's welcoming words. She throws those lovely arms around her neck, and kisses her affectionately, as though she were her own sister. And when the overseer takes her hand to lead her away, she vows that they may strike her, but they shall not again touch poor Loogy. No, no! She promises that to the writhing, bleeding creature—and she will perform it.

The scene has become too affecting. My heart is sick. I cannot bear to remain a spectator any longer, and walk rapidly away.

CHAPTER IV.

THE NEGRO-CATCHER AND HIS DOGS—SALE OF THE SLAVE—BREAKING UP.

So precarious was the situation of my horse, Pompey, that even though I had not believed my presence very welcome at Mr. Enloe's house at this time of distress, I should have tarried yet another day. His stomach is distressingly thin; he is not able yet to walk to the water-trough without support, and stands all day long a striking and pitiful monument of the sad effects of gormandising. It is to be hoped he will never forget his sufferings, or be guilty of a similar offence.

When I return to the house, after the painful scene described in the last chapter, I am informed that Loogy was released at the prayer of Caroline, and a last effort made (and made under the clear understanding that unless she acknowledges her share of the fatal secret, she should be sold to the negro-trader) to conquer her obstinacy.

But the pleadings of her young mistress were as fruitless as the persuasions of the others. She would do no more than admit that she knew who stole the money, but couldn't say where it was now, and would confess nothing.

The party returned late to town, and if the general expression of their countenances was a fair criterion of their thoughts, they had resigned themselves to the severe necessity of paying the heavy debt.

On the next morning the discovery is made of the escape of Gabriel and Tom, rationally supposed to have run away in each other's company.

This circumstance affords an apparent clue to the tangled skein, for no other motive can be assigned for their departure just at this crisis, except that they have an interest in the concealment of the money.

Old Gabriel had not informed any person except Tom of his own loss, and it is supposed that he took his deposit with him. So, after an early breakfast, the whole settlement starts out in pursuit.

I have notified to my readers in the last chapter that this pursuit was unsuccessful, but the sketch of a slave-hunt may be interesting; sufficiently so, at least, for an episode.

After the first superficial search, embracing the out-houses and neighbouring woods, to which escaped slaves often direct their steps, a messenger is sent for Obin Sanford, the negro-catcher, and his dogs.

Obin is a lank, unhealthy-looking creature, of the greyhound stock, who lives in a small hut by the cane-brake, and pursues this rather disreputable calling for a support. His domestic life, smothered in a cloud of miasma, and half the time surrounded by the bayou-water, accounts for his sallow hue, while the flavour from his lungs explains the scarlatina of his nose.

Obin is labouring at this moment under a chronic attack of chills and fever—but fortunately it is a tertian, and he has two good days to go upon. His dogs, five in number, really seem to be—what no recorded dogs ever were before—ashamed of good company. They hang their long, bony heads as low as a serpent trails his. They crouch around Obin's feet, nor by any inducement can they be persuaded to eat a morsel on the plantation.

This latter peculiarity Obin explains by saying that he never allows them to touch a bit from any man's hand but his own. Would he add nor from his own either, it would better account for their excessive thinness in the region of the stomach.

This Obin Sanford is the famous "nigger-catcher," who, for five dollars a head, guarantees to find any runaway, if he can have notice within two days of his departure.

Obin's first demand is of course for something alcoholic to drink; his second is for articles of clothing belonging to the deserters.

Those of Tom are easily found, for Loogy has them all safely locked up in her little red chest; but old Gabriel is too experienced a hand to leave a rag behind him. He knows too well with what certainty a negro dog can catch a trail, and he has burnt all his wardrobe to ashes except the articles taken with him, even to his last winter's shoes. However, the hoe that he ordinarily used in the garden will answer the same purpose, after all. It is found and placed before the dogs, and great interest it seems to excite among them.

They sniff at it long and delightedly, as though it were perfumed with the very Cologne of Farina. Then they hold a conference on one side, the old white hound presiding, until they harmonise in sentiment as to the particular flavour represented in it.

This being satisfactorily settled, the bundle from the little red chest is next brought forward, containing Tom's shoes, coat, and other garments—and their opinion requested on that.

A similar conference begins, but does not, however, lead to a similar result.

The dogs appear to be puzzled. They return again and again, sometimes one by himself, sometimes two or three together, but somehow they cannot harmonise. The old white hound made up her opinion at the first sniff, and she stands to it, like one conscientious jurymen among eleven hungry ones. She lies down behind the horse-block, declaring, most positively, that she will not change her views on any consideration whatever.

The bystanders call upon Obin Sanford for an explanation. This gentleman has been redeeming the time by eating some water-melons that the lads had gathered and brought in from the patch, and he really seems to be the only disinterested man in the party.

When informed of the difficulty his canine friends labour under, he draws his long jack-knife of a body straight out, and, looking at the pile of clothes, suggests that possibly somebody's else has got mixed with them.

Sure enough his idea, compounded as it is of whisky and water-melons, is correct. The clothes had been tied up in Loogy's own handkerchief, as old Pink, the white hound, informs us—and upon the removal of that she readily consents, the other dogs concurring, to open the hunt. So, taking a parting sniff at the hoe-handle to freshen their memories, the whole pack follow their master to "the quarters," and begin forthwith upon Gabriel's track.

This leads, as had been anticipated, to the dwelling of the neighbouring planter, Tom's master, and directly under the room in which Tom had been confined. There the dogs recognise Tom's flavour, open a series of gratified howls, and dash off at full speed in pursuit.

Had not the runaways been directed by one familiar with all the tricks of woodcraft, they could not have baffled that pursuit for an hour; for the dogs, with noses breast-high, raced through the cotton-patch and through the hazel-thicket with as much ease and almost as much speed as a locomotive upon its iron path. But Gabriel remembered his experience of younger days, and most severely did he put their canine skill to the test.

At the first creek which the fugitives had crossed, the dogs lost several hours regaining the scent; for the old oster had only gone over so as to touch the opposite bank and confuse the trail, then, returning, had swung by a long vine to the other side, and followed its course for a great distance.

A small lake, dotted here and there with hammocks, that the runaways had used for steps, cost the pursuers another tedious delay. Passing this, the negroes had found a flock of sheep in the woods, and, driving these before them, they were enabled by this means to disguise their scent so effectually, that it was the second day before the dogs got through that difficulty.

By this time the foot-marks were getting very indistinct, even to the instinct of old Pink. She became low-spirited and sullen—as well she might be, for never had her powers been so mocked before; and that day yielded no discoveries.

Upon the next, Obin took his tertian, slightly aggravated, perhaps, by the two or three water-melons he had indulged in at every house, and then the party who had accompanied him returned home discouraged.

There are so many means in the possession of a runaway, that it is wonderful how they suffer themselves to be so readily taken. Those employed by Gabriel are amongst the simplest on record. I have known an expert negro to "lie out" for a twelvemonth, in sight of his master's plantation, fed daily by his master's slaves, clothed comfortably from his master's stock, and thoroughly hunted at least once a week by the enraged overseer, who well knew that the slave was lurking about, but couldn't find his hiding place. In such a case, there is no secrecy in the world so complete as that of the fellow-servants towards one another. Such a thing as treachery is unprecedented.

Let us return to Mr. Enloe.

Other conferences have been held, both at his house and at the county town. The question as to the legal responsibility has been settled by the highest authority in the state, and it only remains for my friend, like an honourable man as he is, to resign his property into the hands of the civil officers. There is an abundance of sympathy offered him by those who know his stern integrity, and who pity him for his misfortunes; and, to the credit of humanity be it said, not a few offers of aid.

The latter, however, consist principally in indorsements of credit, in case he should think proper to commence a mercantile business; for it was a time of great monetary embarrassments, and few of his friends were able at the time to meet their own current demands.

But sympathy is precious in a season of distress—and so Mr. Enloe felt it. The other proffers he declined, declaring that he had injured his friends sufficiently already, and would henceforth rely solely upon his own efforts.

But a severe blow was in reserve for him. Our worst anticipations relative to the use his political enemies would make of his misfortunes were realised. The newspapers of the opposite party went so far in the excitement of the campaign as to accuse him of dishonesty, and to call him a rogue.

Being at the time a candidate for the state legislature, he was charged upon the stump with an attempt to defraud the government; and although he triumphantly refuted the slander, by proving that he had assigned over every dollar of his property, yet the very charge broke him down. It cost him his election, and took away that elasticity of mind which had buoyed him up thus far.

I grieve to add, that for a little while the strong man lost all hope, and, taking to dissipation, remained for a week stupidly drunk, to the great grief of his family, and the scandal of his friends. This cost him an expulsion from his church.

Ashamed of this, and perhaps won over by the two affectionate women whose hearts were like his heart, he swore, with his hand upon the Book of Books, to do so no more—and he kept his vow.

A faithful friend, formerly his partner in some mercantile transactions, came to his relief at this crisis, and secured for him a land agency, which, besides yielding a liberal salary, afforded him that which most of all he needed, mental and physical employment.

All these occurrences, the reader must understand, were compressed within a month of the time of the robbery.

But we are getting on too fast.

The first act of the drama of breaking up was the sale of Loogy. This, the reader will admit, was but an act of retributive justice. The legal title to the girl was really vested in Caroline—but, upon understanding her father's condition, that excellent young woman unhesitatingly offered up, not only her waiting-maid, but three other slaves that had been presented to her as successive New Year's gifts—and he had accepted them, to save the honour of the family.

The reader must not suppose that any means of persuasion or intimidation, save the lash, had been untried to win the secret from the girl. Caroline had scarcely ceased to importune her night or day—but always with the same want of success. The secret seemed destined to die with her.

I happened to be at Mr. Enloe's house on the morning the trader came to remove Loogy, and as I have not spared the reader any of the melancholy scenes of this history, I will also describe this.

Mr. Derrieks, the "nigger-trader," as his class is technically styled, is quite a different man in outward show to what a person would suppose from his calling. It has been his annual task for twenty years to visit Virginia, purchase a company of twenty or thirty slaves of different sizes and sexes, and conduct them to Mississippi for sale.

It is this man, who so well knows the market value of a negro girl in Loogy's situation, to whom she has been sold, with the special proviso, however, that she is to go to the sugar plantations in Louisiana.

The sugar plantations! That threat pregnant with all that is dreadful to the mind of the slave—that term suggestive of driving labour, scanty food, restricted society, deprivation of Sabbath privileges, and early death! That idea which, to the negro, brings separation from his friends, a long, hard journey under the most cruel of drivers, and a change of occupation under the severest of taskmasters!

Unfortunate negro! what a change to her! But two weeks before she had been rejoicing over the expectation of personal freedom, a home of her own, and a free-born child!

This pampered housemaid—for such she was—was to leave her gentle mistress, her light and easy tasks, her old companions, her father and husband, and all hopes of freedom, to pine away in the cane-fields of a sugar-plantation.

Nothing definite upon this subject has been said to her, until the very arrival of the trader. It is true that she whole series of threats with which she has been so liberally plied terminated in the phrase sugar plantations; but this is so common an expression in an overseer's mouth, that she has not realised it as a fact until this very moment.

She is called out of the house by Mr. Allansby, who still has the charge of the plantation, and ordered in his harshest manner to get her things together and be off to the sugar-plantation; for that yonder is the "nigger-trader" come for her.

Her look of affright is indescribable. I had never seen such a look but once in all my life before. It was on the countenance of a convict, who was waked up one morning in his cell, and told to come out and prepare to die.

This paralysis lasts for an instant, during which she stands as if fixed to the ground; then, as a child to its mother's protection, she flies to Caroline. She clings convulsively to her feet, and declares that the "nigger-trader" shall not take her away. Oh, she will do anything—this is her pathetic appeal—she will do anything not to leave her young mistress. She will wait on her all the day, watch over her all the night, work for her, die for her—but never can she leave her—never—never!

My presence, as I have said, is accidental. I would not have remained a spectator to such a painful scene, except at Mrs. Enloe's urgent request; and it is now at her desire that I endeavour to untwine the girl's arm from Caroline. But it is like tearing off the stout ivy from the grey old oak, nor with all my strength can I effect it.

While the overseer is approaching to assist me in this ungrateful task, a thought occurs to me to advise Caroline to offer the girl her liberty, if she will point out the person who stole the money.

I have become so much excited with the scene, that at this moment I have determined to pay the purchase-money myself, and set her free, if she will show marks of reformation, and give us some clue to trace out the guilty person.

Caroline catches at the hint, which I whisper in her ear, and, addressing herself to Loogy, says:

"My poor girl, there is only one way that I can serve you. Father has sold you to the trader, and he has come to carry you off to the sugar plantations. You can never come back to us as long as you live. But now tell us who stole father's money, and the trader shan't have you."

Loogy rises eagerly up and declares she will. She shudders at the sight of the overseer, who is cracking his whip carelessly in the yard, or at that of the trader, whose light carriage is waiting to bear her away, and begs that her old mistress may be sent for, and she will tell us all about it.

Charmed at the prospect, I hurry in search of Mrs. Enloe, who has retired to avoid seeing Loogy's departure, and bring her in an instant to the spot.

Caroline has seated herself upon the sofa, and placed her attached servant at her side. As we enter, we can see that she has been whispering to Loogy of something that brings the deep scarlet to her own lovely cheeks, and hear her concluding words:

"Soon as I am married, dear Loogy!"

But these words, so suggestive of the tender declaration that has preceded them, seem to work in the mind of the slave an effect the very reverse of what Caroline anticipated.

Up to that moment Loogy had seemed to be determined to make a full confession.

When I left the room, she had asked me to be as quick as possible, so that she might begin, and I had comforted Mrs. Enloe out of her tears by the assurance that now the cloud was about to be cleared up.

There was even a cheerful smile on Loogy's face, so long unmoved by smiles, and she had answered the kind looks of her young mistress with affectionate fervour. But as the "marriage" strikes her ear, she drops her eyes to the floor, relaxes her grasp upon Caroline's arm, and, to our unbounded disappointment and chagrin, repeats the declaration of the last two weeks:

"I didn't tetch it, Miss Caroline—'deed I didn't!"

And therein has she pronounced her own sentence—for who can believe her against such testimony as we have had, or where is the mercy in lavishing tenderness upon one who is so cruel to others?

Loogy is delivered over to the trader, and taken away. Happily for the poor wretch, she is in a state of insensibility, and no sound comes from her lips to interrupt the thoughtless whistle of the negro boy who drives off the vehicle in which we have laid her.

It has been agreed upon between the district attorney and the trustees in whose hands Mr. Enloe lodged his estate, that he shall occupy the houses for the remainder of the year as a residence for his family, and that Mr. Allansby shall manage the plantation until the crop is gathered.

The very day after the removal of Loogy I was appointed general agent to superintend the sale of the stock, land, and crop. This was quite against my own wishes, the reader may be assured, and I was only persuaded to accept the appointment by an earnest expression from Mr. Enloe himself. It is true that it gave me more opportunities to extend such courtesies to the distressed family as lay in my power—but this fact scarcely balanced the unpleasantness of the charge. I saw, day after day, my dear young friend Caroline studying up her plain and ornamental accomplishments, that she might commence teaching a school, already engaged for the next year.

I saw Mrs. Enloe, a lady of delicate constitution, and one who had never known the violence of a storm before, arranging the family wardrobe to a rigid standard of economy, that, to have known it, would have made her wealthy ancestors move in their tomb with surprise.

I saw the stout-hearted little boys, whose playfulness had taught poor Pompey so valuable a lesson, studying day and night this session, that next year they might help pa and ma work, as good boys ought to.

Everything about the family reminded me of a vessel storm-beaten and injured, but in an active way of refitting aloft and aloft for another voyage.

I commenced my work as general agent by disposing of the negroes, one by one, to be delivered and paid for on the next New Year's Day.

Poor creatures! Only one more Christmas week—that bright oasis in the long desert of a twelvemonth—would they ever enjoy together before their separation.

The cotton as fast as picked out was waggoned to the nearest mart, and the proceeds deposited in the public treasury. The land was rented for the coming year, in hopes that that species of property would rise from its present depreciated rates.

Arrangements were made for a public vendue, for the disposal of the farming stock and utensils—and so the dispersion of my friend's possessions was complete.

CHAPTER V.

A SITUATION OF DANGER.—THE RELEASE.

MR. COLSTON'S behaviour, since the robbery, has had no influence to remove my prejudice. For the first few days, and especially while the active search was going on for the runaways, he had seemed to have some unaccountable weight upon his mind. Nor am I the only person that observed it. The sheriff, in his suspicious manner, eyed him frequently, and once I observed that he stepped aside and examined some printed notes, as if comparing him with a public description of some sort—but he came to no conclusion; only scrutinised him more closely than before.

After Leogy was sold and transported southward, his spirits had become much lighter, and he made unusual advances to me in the way of conversation. But then—almost instantaneously—there came over him another change; all his former stiffness was resumed, and he even put on an appearance of indifference towards his betrothed Caroline.

No cause for disagreement had yet occurred between them. Indeed, no disagreement had occurred—so the young lady declared in confidence to me—but those long conferences in the parlour window were intermitted, and they rarely walked together as formerly.

A painful suspicion crept over me, in spite of myself—for my prejudice against the young man could not have carried me thus far. I coupled his abstractedness of mind on the morning of the robbery with his present coldness, and for the life of me I could not avoid the conclusion (the same to which Mr. Blote and the overseer had already arrived, as I learned afterwards) that her change of circumstances had cooled the ardour of his love, and he would fain sever the engagement.

Caroline observed the change in his manner—how could she avoid it?—and, with the genuine spirit of a woman, she met it with equal coolness. But this was too unlike the sunny warmth of her character. Suddenly she changed her scheme—if scheme it may be called, which was the prompting of a pure, earnest heart, anxious to win back its beloved—and, dropping all hauteur, she redoubled her endearments, and seemed resolved to conquer him with very tenderness.

This succeeded no better than the other. His distance of manner increased day by day; and whereas formerly he was her constant visitor, he now rarely made his appearance at her father's house.

Caroline's parents had not failed to observe what was passing, but left it to their daughter's discretion, believing that she was competent to the charge of her own heart.

It is time that the reader should understand who this coquetish gentleman was.

Oliver Colston had been introduced to Caroline only a few months before, while on a visit to some relatives in a neighbouring state. The family which she was visiting seemed to take an extraordinary interest in him, and exerted themselves to clear his way to her favour. His family connections were said to be as respectable as any in the country, and although he had no settled property of his own, yet he had always passed among them for the owner of considerable wealth. He at least gave no evidences of want, but sported the finest horse, wore the most costly clothing and jewellery, and was the acknowledged leader of the fashion among his acquaintances.

It was not long before an attachment sprang up in Caroline's breast, heretofore unoccupied by love; and in all the parties and social amusements got up in her honour, she accepted Mr. Colston as her favoured attendant. He offered to accompany her upon her return to her father's; but by this time she had discovered the secret of her own heart, and, shrinking from any engagement without her parents' consent, she declined his escort, and set out with no other company than the servants of the family.

That day, however, she was attacked by a ruffian, masked and otherwise disguised, who, after robbing her of her money, made insulting advances, and was putting her in great terror, when Mr. Colston rode up most opportunely, and assumed her championship. The combat was very short—the highwayman being driven from the ground severely wounded by two pistol-balls at point-blank distance.

No further objections could Caroline offer to his company. On the contrary, it was as eagerly accepted as tendered; and the pair, arriving at her father's house, commenced those intimacies so full of danger to her guileless heart.

After a few weeks, Mr. Colston made her an offer of marriage in due form. Mr. Enloe made very strict inquiries respecting him, and received the favourable statements I have already given.

His education at the Virginia University was said to be complete; his property respectable; his course in the law-school thorough; his private character had no apparent stain. Yet, despite of all this, neither of the parents could become attached to the young man. There was somehow a repulsiveness, an undefined manner, that barred his intimacy with any but Caroline.

I need not add, that the more these things were whispered to her the more closely she drew to her lover; and when her parents discovered that the intercourse could not be broken off except at the cost of her peace, they gave a reluctant consent, and the parties were betrothed.

The two little boys disliked Mr. Colston, as they said, "like poison." They openly avowed, in their exaggerated style of talk, "that they'd shoot him dead if he took sister off! leastways, they'd kill him when they grew up!"

Mr. Blote, the overseer, and the negroes, one and all, hated him.

It was really strange, as a matter of personal feeling, that there was not one individual on the plantation who confessed to an ordinary liking for this young man, except Caroline.

And the more those signs of unfriendliness became visible in the family, the more freely did Caroline cast in her lot with her betrothed, and declare herself his for ever.

My reader will now have an opportunity to see the end of this ill-matched engagement.

It is about a month subsequent to the mysterious robbery so often mentioned; Leogy has arrived at her destined home, and Mr. Dericks, who returned this morning, declares that she commenced the hard labour of the sugar plantation with more resignation than he had anticipated. Her only message is to her young mistress; and it amounts to nothing more than this—"that she hopes Miss Caroline will be a happy wife, and find somebody to wait on her who will love her as well as Leogy did."

The eight hundred and forty dollars which she brought to Mr. Dericks' hand, has gone to swell the sum total of his bank account; and that worthy, but rather obtrusive gentleman, in the plenitude of his gratitude, has offered Caroline a twenty-dollar shawl, bought in New Orleans, as part of the sale-money of the slave.

Caroline has refused the gift with horror, and insulted the old gentleman by a passionate declaration that she would die before she would use money thus acquired.

The "nigger-trader" has gone away offended, and is now at the house of Mr. Girard, three plantations down the creek, whose embarrassments require him to sell a boy or two to straighten out his affairs.

Mr. Enloe is out, examining a large tract of land, bought recently by the company for which he is agent, and contriving, by the aid of several surveyors, how best to lay off the city, locate the railroad, designate the mill-site, and sell the lots.

My duty has called me down to the cotton-patch, to consult with Mr. Allansby about the weight of the last ten bales ginned, and I have hitched old Pompey, now quite recovered in wind and limb, to the further corner of the "new-ground" patch.

As I sit here with the rough old overseer upon the tenail fence, I have a bird's-eye view of the whole plantation.

So, as we sit, the cotton-pickers pass us, each with a large basket, crammed with the day's picking, upon his head.

This procession having gone by (there was no person in all the immense train at the obsequies of Alexander the Great, who carried an object more suggestive of national wealth), we are saluted by the two little boys, John and Alfred, who—the snakes being now all in their holes—are permitted by their anxious mamma to range the woods with a light fowling-piece, and "play hunt." These young sprouts of a vigorous tree are a joy to behold. Their tread is that of a hero. The bold swing of their limbs, scarcely restrained by their loose, home-made coats, and the extravagant waste of atmosphere in their loud way of talking, bespeak for the state a couple of worthy citizens for home edifying, or for home defence.

Although the consent of the timid mamma only extends to a fanciful hunt with that light gun, yet there is real powder in that horn, and real hard shot in that pouch, as the fated squirrels shall discover before the sun goes down. Altogether, the twain are as fine specimens of country growth as we shall find anywhere in the whole thirty-one.

In answer to my inquiry why they are not at school to-day, they tell me that Mr. Blote has gone out on a botanical excursion, and given three days' vacation.

The next moving objects within the scope of our vision are not so pleasing to contemplate. Caroline and her lover are treading the grassy path as in their old-time walks; and as they draw near the spot where we are sitting, both of us, with a simultaneous movement, dismount from the fence, and walk through the cotton-patch to the house, leaving Pompey to be brought up by a messenger.

Mr. Colston has to-day conceived some new project. His smile is certainly brighter; his words are softer than they have appeared to Caroline for many a day. Perhaps that ugly, sensual curl on his lip is more distinctly marked; but the affectionate girl would not see it, were it a thousand times plainer. Their old seat in the parlour window has been occupied all the day.

To her exceeding delight, her lover resumes the subject of marriage, so long unnamed, and presses the blushing maid to set an early day for his happiness. Caroline consents; and in the low, tender communion which follows, that man dares to speak to her of a long life-time of devotion—of home joys—of the smiles and voices of children—of every dear thought which makes a green spot in the long vista of wedded hopes.

Thus the day passes brightly away, the last of that ill-matched betrothal. As evening comes on, they are mutually reminded of the happy walks by the hazel-thicket, in which their engagement commenced.

At a hint from her lover, Caroline runs (did Camilla more lightly skim across the fancy of the classic poet?) to bring her bonnet, and then the pair pass between the tall poplars, and through the white gate, and down the long lane, to their ancient trysting-place.

It is a small area, not larger than the floor of a lady's chamber, surrounded by a dense copse of hazel, through which only one path, a narrow and a winding one, and difficult to find, has been made. There is a small mound in the centre, one of the most diminutive of those which are scattered here and there over the continent, to point out that the nation's dead are yet honoured, though the very name of that nation has passed away.

The biting frosts of the past week have changed the green dye of the grass into a yellowish hue, but the low mound is soft with the dying herbage; and there, passing through that narrow path, the betrothed pair enter and seat themselves.

There is no eye to see them, there is no ear to catch the words that pass between them. Could any behold that eager gaze, which is now all-licentiously fixed upon the unsuspecting girl—could any hear the words so skillfully ordered to shake a maiden's resolution, what fortune to the trusting Caroline! But she is all alone—alone, with her fond heart all his; her endearments lavishly bestowed upon him in reward for his rekindled affection; her soft hand in his; her arm wound around his neck; her cheek pressing upon his bosom. What guardian hand shall snatch the tender bird from the beguiling serpent?

Her healthy frame, weakened by no folly of dress, but braced up with the habits of a country life and the joy of a country air, countervail for a time all the seducer's efforts, even after her astonished heart has been made to understand all his intentions.

Her screams reach us as we walk through the painted gate, and call us back, at the top of our speed, to her aid. Her resistance, so unexpected by the villain, delays the execution of his foul project, and when, with torn dress, and hair all wildly floating around her neck, she is about to swoon, she hears, crashing through the hazels, the footsteps of a friend.

It is but a boy—but oh, what daring dwells on that brow! what resolution is on that tongue, as the brave little fellow springs into the area, and shouts aloud:

"Caroline, don't be afraid! He shan't hurt you! Let go my sister, Mr. Colston!"

It is but a word and a blow; for as the monster turns a step towards him, still clasping the girl firmly to his side, the boy levels his fowling-piece right at his head, and fires.

Wonderful Providence, that has saved her honour in this moment of danger! The small squirrel-shot enters his neck and shoulder, and although the broad flesh-wound will hardly be fatal, yet the pain is excessive; and now the bad man turns coward at the sight of his own blood, drops his prey, as the eagle would release the lamb, and flies, dastard as he is, to the road.

Glancing hastily around, he sees Pompey tied where I left him, at the corner of the "new-ground" patch, and, without an instant's hesitation, springs upon his back and flies.

Beloved Caroline! how tenderly those little brothers sustain her head, as she reclines upon that grassy mound.

The overseer and myself run with the energy of despair. We pass through the dense copse, not knowing the secret of the little path. We are much too late to have done her any service.

We find Alf pouring cold water upon her face, from his hat, while the hero of the fowling-piece is talking bold words, to give her and himself courage.

"He has loaded his gun again," he says; "he has put in a double load this time; maybe 'twill burst the gun; but he doesn't care a bit for that: he means to aim right point blank at Mr. Colston's breast next time; he would have done it then, only sister's arm was there, and he was afraid of hurting her!"

And all the time big tears are running down his own face, as if to mock his assumption of manhood.

Stripling of promise! Is there anything he would not attempt for her whom we all love so well?

And now we group around her, and the mound, beneath which rest the bones of a chieftain, becomes witness to an episode in the white man's life rarely beheld.

The brave boys are perfectly wild with their triumph. The hero, whose steady eye and bold heart have saved his sister from a fate oh, how much worse than death! now proposes to get father's horse—the big, wild one that nobody has dared to ride for a year—and pursue the villain to the ends of the earth! He declares his readiness to go alone, if necessary, and he will never turn back, though it should be a hundred miles!

The overseer, having reached the place a minute before me, claims the post of honour, and it is upon his shoulder that her drooping head is reclining.

Caroline, though pale, is strong. I cannot consent, even to arouse my reader's sympathy, to forego the truth. Broken hearts are sad things. They may form appropriate pictures in the panorama of a romance, but they are too morbid for my truthful sketch.

Caroline's education, under the eye of her mother, has imparted an air of resolution to her character (we have observed it displayed more than once already in this sketch) that more than balances any shock of the heart. The immense, the never-to-be-forgotten insult she has received from Oliver Colston, saved her; when, had he merely deserted her, or had he been suddenly snatched from her by death, the consequences might have been more serious.

Those who would require me, in a spirit of romance, to close such a scene with a lingering life and an early death, have none of my sympathy in their disappointment. Caroline, though pale, though sad, though cruelly shaken, is yet strong; and were the vile attack now to be renewed by the ruffian, who is several miles distant, her physical powers would probably be greater than before.

She has, of course, but little to say; but little is needed. We can read the whole attempt in her torn dress and hair—we can read its failure in her high brow and steady breathing. But when, by the refreshment from little Alfred's hat, and the kind words of the whole group, she declares her ability to walk home, she says to me, but in a whisper, so that the overreer may not hear it:

"Don't pursue him, sir! I would rather he was not pursued, if you please!"

And her wish is gratified.

CHAPTER VI.

CAMP OF RUNAWAY NEGROES.—LOST IN THE CANE-BRAKE.

RETURN we to the two runaways, Gabriel and Tom.

Gabriel and Tom had established themselves in a place well known to the ostler years before, about two days' travel from Mr. Enloe's plantation. The hiding-place selected was an island of an acre or two, in the very heart of the cane-brake.

To reach it, in the warm season, the visitor must wade a hundred yards or more, breast deep, through a bayou occupied by all manner of reptiles common to that latitude. At the high stages of water in the Mississippi, it was entirely inaccessible for weeks, and sometimes months together.

Many such a place have I visited in the more active days of my life, and the jungles of India have nothing more striking.

It is there that "the water-moccasin" takes its noon-tide excursions to and fro, winding over the surface of the shining pool as though it were a quicksilver sea, and displaying its livid hues to the best advantage.

It is there that the moribund "cotton-mouth" lives and breeds its horrid family, and coils itself by day or night on the margin, ready at the slightest sound to swim to the moving object, and attack it; while above it, twining swiftly through the sarsaparilla vines, the tree-serpents seek for the young birds as their prey.

It is there that the large turtle, with frame more powerful in leverage than any machine made by man's hands, stalks over the muddy bottom, and seeks its carrion food, or burrows its nest in the sand.

It is there that the alligator upraises its knobbed back a bank of mud, when the warm weather calls it out from its hybernation to fight its fellows through the long summer days, or build mounds in the cane-brake for the reception of its eggs. And by day or night, summer or winter, there comes up from the pest-hole of corruption such a deadly steam, such a charnel-house vapour, and upon its wings such clouds of insects, that humanity must yield its delicacy of lungs and well-balanced powers of life, ere it be able to exist there.

Yet in such an abode have the runaways established themselves. Running all hazards for the sake of liberty, they had waded the bayou—as Gabriel had done more than once in former days—had found the little island, unvisited since the creation, save by himself, and established themselves in some sort of comfort.

The thoughtfulness of the elder had secured a hatchet, several fish-hooks and lines, blankets, clothing, and various trifles highly useful in their sequestered home.

It was no trouble for them to erect a cabin of poles, to roof it tightly in, with broad strips from the slippery elm, to daub it with the stiff bayou mud, and even to make a sort of door for their protection from the wild beasts that might be disposed to trouble them.

Fish of a large size, the perch and catfish, were abundant on every side of them, and easily caught. A pen, constructed upon the simple model used throughout the South and West, enabled them to add a fat turkey to their larder whenever they chose; and although Gabriel had never made the attempt, yet he had no doubt but what he could contrive to kill a deer, or even a bear, if pressed for provisions. Birds and rabbits were so tame that they would come to the very door. Hazel, pecan, hickory, and black walnuts fell down in showers at every breeze. The nut of the Indian bean (Nebumba nucifera) was ripening in the swamp.

What more desirable place for mere animal comforts could be found than that? It was a situation of absolute security.

Their pursuers never could trace them there; for, even if a pack of dogs were to follow their footsteps to the bayou, they dare not swim it at the risk of their lives. Before a hound could get half way to the little island, a dozen alligators would be battling over his remains.

On the morning that Gabriel left his place of deposit, stripped of its contents by his own daughter's hand, his feelings underwent a change. The great purpose of his life being thus a second time frustrated, he had nothing further to live for; and could he have laid hands upon his knife at the instant of the discovery, his bones had bleached at the bottom of the ravine. But existence is too sacred a thing to be thus lightly cast off.

With his returning calmness, a sort of feeling came over him to fly to the woods, to baffle all pursuit, to laugh in scorn at all the white man's efforts to re-capture him, and, establishing himself in some secure place (he knew of many such), to spend the remnant of his days a free man.

He would not upbraid his daughter—poor Loogy, she had enough on her mind now; but he would see her no more.

Over this scheme he brooded all that day, and when night came, made his preparations for a stealthy departure.

He gathered up a pack of necessities, as we have seen, burnt to ashes everything that he could not carry away, and, with his daughter's screams still ringing in his ears, left the "quarters," as he hoped, for ever.

He called upon Tom in the place of his imprisonment, and, by informing him of Loogy's faults, and holding up before him the prospect of a severe flogging on the one hand, and liberty on the other, readily gained his consent to accompany him.

This was a matter of importance to Gabriel—for he dreaded being taken sick and starving to death in his solitude.

He easily released Tom from his durance, by raising up the floor of the room in which he was confined; and the pair fled, as before related.

But after a few quiet weeks had passed, and the runaways had settled themselves down in their new life, Gabriel, reviewing all the circumstances connected with the two robberies, strange to say, came to a conclusion different from any that had occurred to our minds. It was that Mr. Colston was somehow connected with them, if not the actual robber.

It must be admitted, however, that the handkerchief, and the marks of hands and feet in the ravine, will scarcely justify Gabriel's suspicions; but with the obstinacy of his race, and, we may add, the parental devotion which belongs to the African character, he settled his mind firmly upon it, that Loogy was innocent, and Mr. Colston guilty. He intimated this change of sentiment to his companion, Tom, and brought him partially round to the same views.

This was about a month after their escape from the plantation. Gabriel did not say that he should leave the island in consequence of it, nor did he offer any plan of communicating it to his late master.

He only said, in his peculiar dialect:

"Wicked rascall, Misty Colsten! Knew de gal nebber got de money! 'Twill all come out, bimeby! You'll see it!"

Mr. Colston, after his unsuccessful attempt upon the honour of Caroline, rode off as though Tarleton's legion were at his heels. Only the day before had he resolved to close his intercourse with her, and, like the villain he was, he deliberately planned to leave this ruin behind him. He had certainly not anticipated so vigorous a resistance—if any—for he made no preparation for flight, and it was only the accidental discovery of Pompey that gave him the means.

In no previous part of his licentious life—whether at the university, or in the law school, or in any part of his extended travels—had he been so baffled. The severe wound upon his neck pained him almost beyond endurance; but it may be doubted whether his mental agony, not at his wicked effort, but his cowardly failure, were not greater pain.

He rode at full speed, passing several plantations, but meeting no person, until he had followed the main road more than five miles; stopping but once, and that only for a moment, to draw out of a hollow tree some small but heavy sacks, that he had previously deposited there.

At a private way he turned off, and until the darkness became too great to travel, ceased not to urge Pompey forward in the same headlong manner. Alighting only when it was impracticable to proceed further, he hobbled his horse's feet in a manner that proved him to be an old campaigner, and turned him out to graze; then, wrapping the saddle-blanket around himself, and heaping a pile of dry leaves for a pillow, he laid down and slept soundly until morning.

Conscience had long finished her work with him, and had fled to a more tractable subject. He had been Divinely given over to hardness of heart.

By this time his wound had become less irritable. The blood, which at first had poured down his breast to his very feet, had ceased to flow, and could he get the small pellets extracted, it would soon heal up.

The seducer then sought the nearest water-course, and washed his body and clothes clear of the stains.

Dressing again, he mounted, sought a neighbouring plantation, readily found, even at a distance, by observing where the removal of the forest trees had opened a thin spot in the landscape, and refreshed himself and horse with food.

Baffling the curiosity of his entertainers, he remounted, pursued his way in the manner of a man who knows every step of it, and drew not his rein again until he approached the edge of the cane-brake.

The place to which he had been directing his course lay exactly beyond the cane, and he had come thus far by means of a dim bridle-path, which, leaving it on the right, wound for a dozen miles around it.

It was not half that distance in a direct course, however, and he seemed disposed to try the nearer way. He paused, compared the sun's height with his watch, calculated the hours of daylight which remained to him, and then, though reluctantly, and as if oppressed with doubt, he entered the brake.

Well might he hesitate long before taking such a step.

To those who have never seen that display of nature's bounty, a canebrake—or, having seen one, perchance, on a rapid journey down the Mississippi, have not penetrated its depths, the incidents I am about to relate will appear romantic. The reader will be surprised to learn that the oldest hunters, the best woodsmen, doubt their capacity to thread the mazes of an untired cane-brake! He will scarcely credit my assertion, that animal instinct not unfrequently fails here; nevertheless, it is so. If he has not seen one, let him imagine a thicket of cane-stalks, the same that are exported for fishing-poles, standing, in general, so densely that they touch each other, needles in a case, and rising to the height of twenty feet, so as to shut out all the brighter rays, and turn the sunniest day into a gloomy twilight. Consider this land of vegetation as extending over a space two hundred miles in length and from three to thirty miles in breadth. Let it be intersected in various directions with small paths, made by the hogs and wilder animals—if, indeed, there be a wilder animal than the wild hog—these paths running in no particular direction, but interlacing with each other in inextricable confusion. Weave festoons of grape-vines and ivy and the tough green-brier from tree to tree, wherever a thin spot enables the sun to reach them—and such is the great Mississippi cane-brake.

The wildest, the most improbable legends are related of this dreary spot, of which those which seem to the stranger most improbable, are most strictly true. Men have been lost in that wilderness, and they have wandered and hungered and died, within gunshot sound of their own dwellings. Bewildered travellers, catching a glimpse of the blessed sun, after several hours' burial in the thicket, have refused to credit their own eyes as to its direction in the heavens, and have struck back again into the thickets, to wander on and to die. Children, after struggling a few hours in the mazes of this labyrinth, have lost their reason, and, when found, have forgotten their own names and the faces of their friends.

